PREFACE.

The great progress which classical studies have made in Europe, and more especially in Germany during the present century, has superseded most of the Works usually employed in the elucidation of the Greek and Roman writers. It had long been felt by our best scholars and teachers that something better was required than we yet possessed in the English language for illustrating the Antiquities, Literature, Mythology, and Geography of the Ancient Writers, and for enabling a diligent student to read them in the most profitable manner. It was with a view of supplying this acknowledged want that the series of Classical Dictionaries was undertaken; and the very favourable manner in which these Works have been received by the Scholars and Teachers of this country demands from the Editor his most grateful acknowledgments. The approbation with which he has been favoured has encouraged him to proceed in the design which he had formed from the beginning, of preparing a series of works which might be useful not only to the scholar and the more advanced student, but also to those who were entering on their classical studies. The Dictionaries of "Greek and Roman Antiquities," of "Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology," and of "Greek and Roman Geography," are intended to meet the wants of the more advanced scholar; but these Works are on too extended a scale, and enter too much into details, to be suitable for the use of junior students. For the latter class of persons a work is required of the same kind as Lempriere's well-known Dictionary, containing in a single volume the most important names, Biographical, Mythological, and Geographical, occurring in the Greek and Roman writers usually read in our public schools. It is invidious for an author to speak of the defects of his predecessors; but it may safely be said that Lempriere's work, which originally contained the most serious mistakes, has long since become obsolete; and that since the time it was compiled we have attained to more correct knowledge on a vast number of subjects comprised in that work.

The present Dictionary is designed, as already remarked, chiefly to elucidate the Greek and Roman writers usually read in schools; but at the same time it has not been considered expedient to omit any proper names connected with classical antiquity, of which it is expected that some knowledge ought to be possessed by every person who aspires to a liberal education. Accordingly, while more space has been given to the prominent Greek and Roman writers, and to the more distinguished characters of Greek and Roman history, other names have not been omitted altogether, but only treated with greater brevity. The chief difficulty which every Author has to contend with in a Work like the present is the vastness of his subject and the copiousness of his materials. It has therefore been necessary in all cases to study the greatest possible brevity; to avoid all discussions; and to be satisfied with giving simply the results at which the best modern scholars have arrived. The Writer is fully aware that in adopting this plan he has frequently stated dogmatically conclusions which may be open to much dispute; but he has thought it better to run this risk, rather than to encumber and bewilder the junior student with conflicting opinions. With the view likewise of economising space few references have been given to ancient and modern writers. In fact such references are rarely of service to the persons for whom such a Work as the present is intended, and serve more for parade than for any useful purpose; and it has been the less necessary to give them in this Work, as it is supposed that the persons who really require them will be in possession of the larger Dictionaries

The present Work may be divided into three distinct parts, Biography, Mythology, and Geography, on each of which a few words may be necessary.

The Biographical portion may again be divided into the three departments of History, Literature, and Art. The Historical articles include all the names of any importance which occur in the Greek and Roman writers, from the earliest times down to the extinction of the Western Empire in the year 476 of our era. Very few names are inserted which are not included in this period; but still there are some persons who lived after the fall of the Western Empire who could not with propriety be omitted in a Classical Dictionary. Such is the case with Justinian, whose legislation has exerted such an important influence upon the nations of Western Europe; with Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at whose court lived Cassiodorus and Boëthius; and with a few others. The lives of the later Western Emperors and their contemporaries are given with greater brevity than the lives of such persons as lived in the more important epochs of Greek and Roman history, since the students for whom the present Work is intended will rarely require information respecting the later period of the empire. The Romans, as a general rule, have been given under the cognomens, and not under the gentile names; but in cases where a person is more usually mentioned under the name of his gens than under that of his cognomen, he will be found under the former. Thus, for example, the two celebrated conspirators against Caesar, Brutus and Cassius, are given under these names respectively; though uniformity would require, either that Cassius should be inserted under his cognomen of Longinus, or Brutus under his gentile name of Junius. But in this, as in all other cases, it has been considered more advisable to consult utility, than to adhere to any prescribed rule, which would be attended with practical inconveniences.

To the Literary articles considerable space has been devoted. Not only are all Greek and Roman writers inserted whose works are extant, but also all such as exercised any important influence upon Greek and Roman literature, although their writings have not come down to us. It has been thought quite unnecessary, however, to give the vast number of writers mentioned only by Athenaeus, Stobaeus, the Lexicographers, and the Scholiasts; for though such names ought to be found in a complete history of Greek and Roman Literature, they would be clearly out of place in a Work like the present. In the case of all writers whose works are extant, a brief account of their works, as well as of their lives, is given; and at the end of each article one or two of the best modern editions are specified. As the present work is designed for the elucidation of the Classical writers, the Christian writers are omitted, with the exception of the more distinguished Fathers, who form a constituent part of the history of Greek and Roman literature. The Byzantine historians are, for the same reason, inserted; though in their case, as well as in the case of the Christian Fathers, it has been impossible to give a complete account either of their lives or of their writings.

The lives of all the more important Artists have been inserted, and an account has also been given of their extant works. The history of ancient Art has received so little attention from the scholars of this country, that it has been deemed advisable to devote as much space to this important subject as the limits of the Work would allow. Accordingly, some artists are noticed on account of their celebrity in the history of Art, although their names are not even mentioned in the ancient writers. This remark applies to Agasias, the sculptor of the Borghese gladiator, which is still preserved in the Louvre at Paris: to Agesander, one of the sculptors of the group of Laocoön; to Glycon, the sculptor of the Farnese Hercules; and to others. On the contrary, many of the names of the artists in Pliny's long list are omitted, because they possess no importance in the history of Art.

In writing the Mythological articles care has been taken to avoid, as far as possible, all indelicate allusions, as the Work will probably be much in the hands of young persons. It is of so much importance to discriminate between the Greek and Roman mythology, that an account of the Greek divinities is given under their Greek names, and of the Roman divinities under their Latin names, a practice which is universally adopted by the continental writers, which has received the sanction of some of our own scholars, and which is moreover of such great utility in guarding against endless confusions and mistakes as to require no apology for its introduction into this Work.

In the Geographical articles, besides the original sources, use has been made of the best modern treatises on the subject, and of the valuable works of travels in Greece, Italy, and the East, which have appeared within the last few years, both in England and in Germany. It would have been impossible to give references to these treatises, without interfering with the general plan of the present Work; but this omission is supplied in the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography." It is hoped that in the Geographical portion of the Work very few omissions will be discovered of names occurring in the chief classical writers; but the great number of names found only in Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, and the Itineraries, have been purposely omitted, except in cases where such names have become of historical celebrity, or have given rise to important towns in modern times. At the commencement of every geographical article the Ethnic name and the modern name have been given, whenever they could be ascertained.

The present Edition has been revised, and Illustrations have been inserted for the first time. These illustrations, which exceed 750 in number, have reference to the Mythological, Biographical, and Geographical articles, and will, it is believed, add considerably to the value and usefulness of the Work. The Mythological illustrations, taken from ancient works of art, give numerous representations of the Greek and Roman divinities, with their various attributes, of the most celebrated heroes, and of other mythical beings. The Biographical illustrations consist of coins drawn from originals in the British Museum, and exhibit a complete series of the rulers of the chief nations of antiquity, such as the Roman emperors from Augustus to the last emperor of the West, the monarchs of the Greek kingdoms founded by the successors of Alexander, and various others. The Geographical illustrations contain, in addition to coins of the more important places, representations of public buildings and of other ancient monuments.

A

CLASSICAL DICTIONARY,

BIOGRAPHICAL, MYTHOLOGICAL, AND GEOGRAPHICAL.

Abacaenum (Ἀβακαῖνον or τὰ Ἀβάκαινα: Ἀβακαινῖνος: nr. Tripi, Ru.), an ancient town of the Siculi in Sicily, W. of Messana, and S. of Tyndaris.

Abae (Ἄβαι: Ἀβαῖος: nr. Exarcho, Ru.), an ancient town of Phocis, on the boundaries of Boeotia, said to have been founded by the Argive Abas, but see ABANTES. It possessed an ancient temple and oracle of Apollo, who hence derived the surname of Abaeus. The temple was destroyed by the Persians in the invasion of Xerxes, and a second time by the Boeotians in the sacred war: it was rebuilt by Hadrian.

Abantes (Ἄβαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Euboea. (Hom. Il. ii. 536.) They are said to have been of Thracian origin, to have first settled in Phocis, where they built Abae, and afterwards to have crossed over to Euboea. The Abantes of Euboea assisted in colonising several of the Ionic cities of Asia Minor.

Abantĭădes (Ἀβαντιάδης), any descendant of Abas, but especially Perseus, great-grandson of Abas, and Acrisius, son of Abas. A female descendant of Abas, as Danaë and Atalante, was called Abantias.

Abantīas. [ABANTIADES.]

Abantĭdas (Ἀβαντίδας), son of Paseas, became tyrant of Sicyon, after murdering Clinias, the father of Aratus, B. C. 264, but was soon after assassinated.

Abăris (Ἄβαρις), son of Seuthes, was a Hyperborean priest of Apollo, and came from the country about the Caucasus to Greece, while his own country was visited by a plague. In his travels through Greece he carried with him an arrow as the symbol of Apollo, and gave oracles. His history is entirely mythical, and is related in various ways: he is said to have taken no earthly food, and to have ridden on his arrow, the gift of Apollo, through the air. He cured diseases by incantations, and delivered the world from a plague. Later writers ascribe to him several works; but if such works were really current in ancient times, they were not genuine. The time of his appearance in Greece is stated differently: he may perhaps be placed about B. C. 570.

Abarnis (Ἄβαρνις or Ἄβαρνος: Ἀβαρνεύς), a town and promontory close to Lampsacus on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont.

Abas (Ἄβας). 1. Son of Metanīra, was changed by Demeter into a lizard, because he mocked the goddess when she had come on her wanderings into the house of his mother, and drank eagerly to quench her thirst.—2. Twelfth king of Argos, son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, grandson of Danaus, and father of Acrisius and Proetus. When he informed his father of the death of Danaus, he was rewarded with the shield of his grandfather, which was sacred to Hera. This shield performed various marvels, and the mere sight of it could reduce a revolted people to submission. He is described as a successful conqueror and as the founder of the town of Abae in Phocis, and of the Pelasgic Argos in Thessaly.

Abdēra (τὰ Ἄβδηρα, Abdera, ae, and Abdera, orum: Ἀβδηρίτης, Abdērītes and Abdērīta). 1. (Polystilo), a town of Thrace, near the mouth of the Nestus, which flowed through the town. According to mythology, it was founded by Hercules in honour of his favourite ABDERUS; but according to history, it was colonised by Timesius of Clazomenae about B. C. 656. Timesius was expelled by the Thracians, and the town was colonised a second time by the inhabitants of Teos in Ionia, who settled there after their own town had been taken by the Persians B. C. 544. Abdera was a flourishing town when Xerxes invaded Greece, and continued a place of importance under the Romans, who made it a free city. It was the birthplace of Democritus, Protagoras, Anaxarchus, and other distinguished men; but its inhabitants notwithstanding were accounted stupid, and an "Abderite" was a term of reproach.—2. (Adra), a town of Hispania Baetica on the coast, founded by the Phoenicians.

Abdērus (Ἄβδηρος), a favourite of Hercules, was torn to pieces by the mares of Diomedes, which Hercules had given him to pursue the Bistones. Hercules is said to have built the town of Abdera in honour of him.

Abdŏlŏnymus or Abdălŏnĭmus, also called Ballonymus, a gardener, but of royal descent, was made king of Sidon by Alexander the Great.

Abella or Avella (Abellānus: Avella vecchia), a town of Campania, not far from Nola, founded by the Chalcidians in Euboea. It was celebrated for its apples, whence Virgil (Aen. vii. 740) calls it mālifĕra, and for its great hazel-nuts, nuces Avellānae.

Abellīnum (Abellīnas: Avellino), a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, near the sources of the Sabatus.

Abgărus, Acbărus, or Augărus (Ἄϐγαρος, Ἄκϐαρος, Αὔγαρος), a name common to many rulers of Edessa, the capital of the district of Osrhoëne in Mesopotamia. Of these rulers one is supposed by Eusebius to have been the author of a letter written to Christ, which he found in a church at Edessa and translated from the Syriac. The letter is believed to be spurious.

Abĭa (ἡ Ἀϐία: nr. Zarnata), a town of Messenia, on the Messenian gulf. It is said to have been the same town as the Ire of the Iliad (ix. 292), and to have acquired the name of Abia in honour of Abia, the nurse of Hyllus, a son of Hercules. At a later time Abia belonged to the Achaean League.

Abĭi (Ἄϐιοι), a tribe mentioned by Homer (Il. xiii. 6), and apparently a Thracian people. This matter is discussed by Strabo (p. 296).

Abīla (τὰ Ἄϐιλα: Ἀϐιληνός), a town of Coele-Syria, afterwards called Claudiopolis, and the capital of the tetrarchy of Abilēne (Luke, iii. 1). The position seems doubtful. A town of the same name is mentioned by Josephus as being 60 stadia E. of the Jordan.

Abisăres (Ἀϐισάρης), also called Embisarus, an Indian king beyond the river Hydaspes, sent embassies to Alexander the Great, who not only allowed him to retain his kingdom, but increased it, and on his death appointed his son his successor.

Abnŏba Mons, the range of hills covered by the Black Forest in Germany, not a single mountain.

Abōnitīchos (Ἀϐώνου τεῖχος), a town of Paphlagonia on the Black Sea, with a harbour, afterwards called Ionopolis (Ἰωνόπολις), whence its modern name Ineboli, the birth-place of the pretended prophet Alexander, of whom Lucian has left us an account.

Abŏrīgĭnes, the original inhabitants of a country, equivalent to the Greek αὐτόχθονες. But the Aborigines in Italy are not in the Latin writers the original inhabitants of all Italy, but the name of an ancient people who drove the Siculi out of Latium, and there became the progenitors of the Latini.

Aborrhas (Ἀϐόῤῥας: Khabur), a branch of the Euphrates, which joins that river on the east side near Arcesium. It is called the Araxes by Xenophon (Anab. i. 4. § 19), and was crossed by the army of Cyrus the Younger in the march from Sardis to the neighbourhood of Babylon, B. C. 401. A branch of this river, which rises near Nisibis, and is now called Jakhjakhah, is probably the ancient Mygdonius. The Khabur rises near Orfah, and is joined near the lake of Khatuniyah by the Jakhjakhah, after which the united stream flows into the Euphrates. The course of the Khabur is very incorrectly represented in the maps.

Abradātas (Ἀϐραδάτας), a king of Susa and an ally of the Assyrians against Cyrus, according to Xenophon's Cyropaedia. His wife Panthēa was taken on the conquest of the Assyrian camp. In consequence of the honourable treatment which she received from Cyrus, Abradatas joined the latter with his forces. He fell in battle, while fighting against the Egyptians. Inconsolable at her loss, Panthea put an end to her own life. Cyrus had a high mound raised in honour of them.

Abrincatŭi, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis in the neighbourhood of the modern Avranches.

Abrŏcŏmas (Ἀϐροκόμας), one of the satraps of Axtaxerxes Mnemon, was sent with an army, to oppose Cyrus on his march into Upper Asia, B. C. 401. He retreated on the approach of Cyrus, but did not join the king in time for the battle of Cunaxa.

Abrōnȳchus (Ἀϐρώνυχος), an Athenian, served in the Persian war, B.C. 480, and was subsequently sent as ambassador to Sparta with Themistocles and Aristides respecting the fortifications of Athens.

Abrŏtŏnum, mother of Themistocles.

Abrŏtŏnum (Ἀϐρότονον: Sabart or Old Tripoli), a city on the coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, founded by the Phoenicians; a colony under the Romans. It was also called Sabrăta and Neapolis, and it formed, with Oea and Leptis Magna, the African Tripolis.

Absyrtīdes or Apsyrtīdes, sc. insulae (Ἀψυρτίδες: Cherso and Osero), the name of two islands off the coast of Illyricum. According to one tradition Absyrtus was slain in these islands by his sister Medēa and by Jason.

Absyrtus or Apsyrtus (Ἄψυρτος), son of Aeētes, king of Colchis, and brother of Medēa. When Medea fled with Jason, she took her brother Absyrtus with her; and when she was nearly overtaken by her father, she murdered Absyrtus, cut his body in pieces and strewed them on the road, that her father might thus be detained by gathering the limbs of his child. Tomi, the place where this horror was committed, was believed to have derived its name from τέμνω, "cut." According to another tradition Absyrtus did not accompany Medea, but was sent out by his father in pursuit of her. He overtook her in Corcyra, where she had been kindly received by king Alcinous, who refused to surrender her to Absyrtus. When he overtook her a second time in certain islands off the Illyrian coast, he was slain by Jason. The son of Aeëtes, who was murdered by Medea, is called by some writers Aegialeus.

Abūlītes (Ἀϐουλίτης), the satrap of Susiana, surrendered Susa to Alexander. The satrapy was restored to him by Alexander, but he and his son Oxyathres were afterwards executed by Alexander for the crimes they had committed.

Aburnus Valens. [Valens.]

Abus (Humber), a river in Britain.

Abydēnus (Ἀϐυδηνός), a Greek historian, wrote a history of Assyria. His date is uncertain: he made use of the works of Megasthenes and Berosus, and he wrote in the Ionic dialect. His work was particularly valuable for chronology. The fragments of his history have been published by Scaliger, De Emendatione Temporum, and Richter, Berosi Chaldaeorum Historiae, &c., Lips. 1825.

Abȳdos (Ἄϐυδος: Ἀϐυδηνός). 1. A town of the Troad on the Hellespont, and a Milesian colony. It was nearly opposite to Sestos, but a little lower down the stream. The bridge of boats which Xerxes constructed over the Hellespont, B.C. 480, commenced a little higher up than Abydos, and touched the European shore between Sestos and Madȳtus. The site of Abydos is a little N. of Sultania or the old castle of Asia, which is opposite to the old castle of Europe. — 2. (Nr. Arabat el Matfoon and El Birbeh, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, near the W. bank of the Nile; once second only to Thebes, but in Strabo's time (A. D. 14) a small village. It had a temple of Osiris and a Memnonium, both still standing, and an oracle. Here was found the inscription known as the Table of Abydos, which contains a list of the Egyptian kings.

Abȳla or Abīla Mons or Columna (Ἀβύλη or Ἀβίλη στήλη or ὄρος: Jebel Zatout, i. e. Apes' Hill, above Ceuta), a mountain in Mauretania Tingitana, forming the E. extremity of the S. or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum. This and M. Calpe (Gibraltar), opposite to it on the Spanish coast, were called the Columns of Hercules, from the fable that they were originally one mountain, which was torn asunder by Hercules.

Acacallis (Ἀκακαλλίς), daughter of Minos, by whom Apollo begot a son Miletus, as well as other children. Acacallis was in Crete a common name for a narcissus.

Acacēsium (Ἀκακήσιον: Ἀκακήσιος), a town of Arcadia, at the foot of a hill of the same name.

Acacēsius (Ἀκακήσιος), a surname of Hermes, for which Homer uses the form Acacetes. Some writers derive it from the Arcadian town of Acacesium, in which he was believed to have been brought up; others from κακὸς, and suppose it to mean "the god who does not hurt." The same surname is given to Prometheus, whence it may be inferred that its meaning is that of benefactor or deliverer from evil.

Acacētes. [ACACESIUS.]

Acădēmīa (Ἀκαδήμεια or Ἀκακδήμῑα: also Academīa in the older Latin writers), a piece of land on the Cephissus, 6 stadia from Athens, originally belonging to the hero ACADEMUS, and subsequently a gymnasium, which was adorned by Cimon with plane and olive plantations, statues, and other works of art. Here taught Plato, who possessed a piece of land in the neighbourhood, and after him his followers, who were hence called the Academici, or Academic philosophers. When Sulla besieged Athens in B. C. 87, he cut down the plane trees in order to construct his military machines; but the place was restored soon afterwards. Cicero gave the name of Academia to his villa near Puteoli, where he wrote his "Quaestiones Academicae."

Acădēmĭci. [ACADEMIA.]

Acădēmus (Ἀκάδημος), an Attic hero, who betrayed to Castor and Pollux, when they invaded Attica to liberate their sister Helen, that she was kept concealed at Aphidnae. For this the Tyndarids always showed him gratitude, and whenever the Lacedaemonians invaded Attica, they spared the land belonging to Academus. [ACADEMIA.]

Acalandrus (Salandrella), a river in Lucania, flowing into the gulf of Tarentum.

Acămas (Ἀκάμας). 1. Son of Theseus and Phaedra, accompanied Diomedes to Troy to demand the surrender of Helen. During his stay at Troy he won the affection of Laodice, daughter of Priam, and begot by her a son, Munitus. He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse at the taking of Troy. The Attic tribe Acamantis derived its name from him. — 2. Son of Antenor and Theano, one of the bravest Trojans, slain by Meriones. — 3. Son of Eussorus, one of the leaders of the Thracians in the Trojan war, slain by the Telamonian Ajax.

Acanthus (Ἄκανθος: Ἀκάνθιος). 1. (Nr. Erso, Ru.), a town on the Isthmus, which connects the peninsula of Athos with Chalcidice. It was founded by the inhabitants of Andros, and continued to be a place of considerable importance from the time of Xerxes to that of the Romans. — 2. (Dashur), a town on the W. bank of the Nile, 120 stadia S. of Memphis, with a temple of Osiris.

Acarnān (Ἀκαρνάν, -ᾶνος), one of the Epigoni, son of Alcmaeon and Callirrhoë, and brother of Amphoterus. Their father was murdered by Phegeus, when they were very young, and Callirrhoë prayed to Zeus to make her sons grow quickly, that they might be able to avenge the death of their father. The prayer was granted, and Acarnan with his brother slew Phegeus, his wife, and his two sons. The inhabitants of Psophis, where the sons had been slain, pursued the murderers as far as Tegea, where, however, they were received and rescued. They afterwards went to Epirus, where Acarnan founded the state called after him Acarnania.

Acarnānĭa (Ἀκαρνανία: Ἀκαρνάν, -ᾶνος), the most westerly province of Greece, was bounded on the N. by the Ambracian gulf, on the W. and S. W. by the Ionian Sea, on the N. E. by Amphilochia, which is sometimes included in Acarnania, and on the E. by Aetolia, from which at a later time it was separated by the Achelous. The name of Acarnania does not occur in Homer. In the most ancient times the land was inhabited by the Taphii, Teleboae, and Leleges, and subsequently by the Curetes, who emigrated from Aetolia and settled there. At a later time a colony from Argos, said to have been led by ACARNAN, the son of Alcmaeon, settled in the country. In the seventh century B. C. the Corinthians founded several towns on the coast. The Acarnanians first emerge from obscurity at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 431. They were then a rude people, living by piracy and robbery, and they always remained behind the rest of the Greeks in civilization and refinement. They were good slingers, and are praised for their fidelity and courage. The different towns formed a League with a Strategus at their head in the time of war: the members of the League met at Stratos, and subsequently at Thyrium or Leucas. Under the Romans Acarnania formed part of the province of Macedonia.

Acastus (Ἄκαστος), son of Pelias, king of Iolcus, and of Anaxibia or Philomache. He was one of the Argonauts, and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. His sisters were seduced by Medea to cut up their father and boil him, in order to make him young again. Acastus, in consequence, drove Jason and Medea from Iolcus, and instituted funeral games in honour of his father. During these games Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, also called Hippolyte, fell in love with Peleus, whom Acastus had purified from the murder of Eurytion. When Peleus refused to listen to her addresses, she accused him to her husband of having attempted her dishonour. Shortly afterwards, when Acastus and Peleus were hunting on mount Pelion, and the latter had fallen asleep, Acastus took his sword from him, and left him alone. He was in consequence nearly destroyed by the Centaurs; but he was saved by Chiron or Hermes, returned to Acastus, and killed him together with his wife.

Acbarus. [ABGARUS.]

Acca Laurentĭa or Larentĭa, a mythical woman in early Roman story. According to one account, in the reign of Ancus Martius a servant (aedituus) of the temple of Hercules invited the god to a game of dice, promising that if he should lose the game, he would treat the god with a repast and a beautiful woman. When the god had conquered the servant, the latter shut up Acca Laurentia together with a well-stored table in the temple of Hercules. On the following morning the god advised her to gain the affection of the first wealthy man she should meet. She succeeded in making Carutius or Tarrutius, an Etruscan, love and marry her. After his death she inherited his large property, which she left to the Roman people. Ancus, in gratitude for this, allowed her to be buried in the Velabrum, and instituted an annual festival, the Larentalia, at which sacrifices were offered to the Lares. According to another account, Acca Laurentia was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus and the nurse of Romulus and Remus after they had been taken from the she-wolf. According to other accounts again she was not the wife of Faustulus, but a prostitute who from her mode of life was called lupa by the shepherds, and who left the property she gained in that way to the Roman people. Thus much seems certain, whatever we may think of the stories, that she was of Etruscan origin, and connected with the worship of the Lares, from which her name Larentia seems to be derived.

L. Accĭus or Attĭus, an early Roman tragic poet and the son of a freedman, was born B. C. 170, and lived to a great age. Cicero, when a young man, frequently conversed with him. His tragedies were chiefly imitated from the Greek, but he also wrote some on Roman subjects (Praetextata) ; one of which, entitled Brutus, was probably in honour of his patron D. Brutus. We possess only fragments of his tragedies, but they are spoken of in terms of admiration by the ancient writers. Accius also wrote Annales in verse, containing the history of Rome, like those of Ennius ; and a prose work, Libri Didascalion, which seems to have been a history of poetry. The fragments of his tragedies are given by Bothe, Poet. Scenici Latin. vol. v. Lips. 1834 : and those of the Didascalia by Madvig, De L. Attii Didascaliis Comment. Hafniae, 1831.

Acco, a chief of the Senones in Gaul, who induced his countrymen to revolt against Caesar, B. C. 53, by whom he was put to death.

Acē. [PTOLEMAIS.]

Acerbas, a Tyrian priest of Hercules, who married Elissa, the sister of king Pygmalion. He had concealed his treasures in the earth, knowing the avarice of Pygmalion, but he was murdered by Pygmalion, who hoped to obtain his treasures through his sister. The prudence of Elissa saved the treasures, and she emigrated from Phoenicia. In this account, taken from Justin, Acerbas is the same person as Sichaeus, and Elissa the same as Dido in Virgil (Aen. i. 343, seq.). The names in Justin are undoubtedly more correct than in Virgil ; for Virgil here, as in other cases, has changed a foreign name into one more convenient to him.

Acerrae (Acerrānus). 1. (Acerra), a town in Campania on the Clanius, received the Roman franchise in B. C. 332. It was destroyed by Hannibal, but was rebuilt.—2. (Gerra), a town of the Insubres in Gallia Transpadana.

Acersĕcōmes (Ἀκερσεκόμης), a surname of Apollo expressive of his beautiful hair which was never cut or shorn.

Acĕsas (Ἀκεσᾶς), a native of Salamis in Cyprus, famed for his skill in weaving cloth with variegated patterns (polymitarius). He and his son Helicon were the first who made a peplus for Athena Polias. They must have lived before the time of Euripides and Plato, who mention this peplus.

Acĕsīnes (Ἀκεσίνης). 1. (Chenaub), a river in India, into which the Hydaspes flows, and which itself flows into the Indus.—2. (Alcantara), a river in Sicily, near Tauromenium.

Acestes (Ἀκέστης), son of a Trojan woman of the name of Egesta or Segesta, who was sent by her father to Sicily, that she might not be devoured by the monsters which infested the territory of Troy. When Egesta arrived in Sicily, the river-god Crimisus begot by her a son Acestes, who was afterwards regarded as the hero who had founded the town of Segesta. Aeneas, on his arrival in Sicily, was hospitably received by Acestes.

Acestor (Ἀκέστωρ). 1. Surnamed Sacas, on account of his foreign origin, was a tragic poet at Athens, and a contemporary of Aristophanes.—2. A sculptor of Cnossus, who flourished about B. C. 452.

Achaea (Ἀχαία, from ἄχος, "grief"), "the distressed one," a surname of Demeter at Athens, so called on account of her sorrow for the loss of her daughter.

Achaei (Ἀχαιοί), one of the chief Hellenic races, were according to tradition descended from Achaeus, who was the son of Xuthus and Creusa, and grandson of Hellen. The Achaei originally dwelt in Thessaly, and from thence migrated to Peloponnesus, the whole of which became subject to them with the exception of Arcadia, and the country afterwards called Achaia. As they were the ruling nation in Peloponnesus in the heroic times, Homer frequently gives the name of Achaei to the collective Greeks. On the conquest of the greater part of Peloponnesus by the Heraclīdae and the Dorians 80 years after the Trojan war, many of the Achaei under Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, left their country and took possession of the northern coast of Peloponnesus then called Aegialēa, and inhabited by the Ionians, whom they expelled from the country, which was henceforth called Achaia. The expelled Ionians migrated to Attica and Asia Minor. The Achaei settled in 12 cities: Pellene, Aegira, Aegae, Bura, Helice, Aegium, Rhypae, Patrae, Pharae, Olenus, Dyme, and Tritaea. These cities are said to have been governed by Tisamenus and his descendants till Ogyges, upon whose death a democratical form of government was established in each state ; but the twelve states formed a league for mutual defence and protection. In the Persian war the Achaei took no part ; and they had little influence in the affairs of Greece till the time of the successors of Alexander. In B.C. 281 the Achaei, who were then subject to the Macedonians, resolved to renew their ancient league for the purpose of shaking off the Macedonian yoke. This was the origin of the celebrated Achaean League. It at first consisted of only four towns, Dyme, Patrae, Tritaea, and Pharae, but was subsequently joined by the other towns of Achaia with the exception of Olenus and Helice. It did not, however, obtain much importance till B. C. 251, when Aratus united to it his native town, Sicyon. The example of Sicyon was followed by Corinth and many other towns in Greece, and the League soon became the chief political power in Greece. At length the Achaei declared war against the Romans, who destroyed the League, and thus put an end to the independence of Greece. Corinth, then the chief town of the League, was taken by the Roman general Mummius, in B. C. 146, and the whole of southern Greece made a Roman province under the name of ACHAIA. The different states composing the Achaean League had equal rights. The assemblies of the League were held twice a year, in the spring and autumn, in a grove of Zeus Homagyrius near Aegium. At these assemblies all the business of the League was conducted, and at the spring meeting the public functionaries were chosen. These were:—1. a Strategus (στρατηγός) or General, and an Hipparchus (ἵππαρχος) or commander of the cavalry; 2. a Secretary (γραμματεύς); and 3. ten Demiurgi (δημιουργοί, also called ἄρχοντες), who appear to have had the right of convening the assembly. For further particulars see Dict. of Ant., art. Achaicum Foedus.

Achaemĕnes (Ἀχαιμένης). 1. The ancestor of the Persian kings, who founded the family of the Achaemenidae (Ἀχαιμενίδαι), which was the noblest family of the Pasargadae, the noblest of the Persian tribes. The Roman poets use the adjective Achaemenius in the sense of Persian. — 2. Son of Darius I., governor of Egypt, commanded the Egyptian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, B. C. 480. He was defeated and killed in battle by Inarus the Libyan, B. C. 460.

Achaemĕnĭdes, or Achemĕnĭdes, son of Adamastus of Ithaca, and a companion of Ulysses, who left him behind in Sicily, when he fled from the Cyclops. Here he was found by Aeneas, who took him with him.

Achaeus (Ἀχαιός). 1. Son of Xuthus, the mythical ancestor of the ACHAEI. — 2. Governor under Antiochus III. of all Asia W. of mount Taurus. He revolted against Antiochus, but was defeated by the latter, taken prisoner at Sardis, and put to death, B. C. 214. — 3. Of Eretria in Euboea, a tragic poet, born B. C. 484. In 447, he contended with Sophocles and Euripides, and though he subsequently brought out many dramas, according to some as many as 34 or 40, he nevertheless only gained the prize once. In the satyrical drama he possessed considerable merit. The fragments of his pieces have been published by Urlichs, Bonn, 1834.

Achāĭă (Ἀχαΐα: Ἀχαιός). 1. The northern coast of the Peloponnesus, originally called Aegialēa (Αἰγιάλεια) or Aegialus (Αἰγιαλός), i. e. the coastland, was bounded on the N. by the Corinthian gulf and the Ionian sea, on the S. by Elis and Arcadia, on the W. by the Ionian sea, and on the E. by Sicyonia. It was a narrow slip of country sloping down from the mountains to the sea. The coast is generally low, and has few good ports. Respecting its inhabitants see ACHAEI. — 2. A district in Thessaly, which appears to have been the original seat of the Achaei. It retained the name of Achaia in the time of Herodotus. — 3. The Roman province, included Peloponnesus and northern Greece S. of Thessaly. It was formed on the dissolution of the Achaean League in B. C. 146, and hence derived its name.

Acharnae (Ἀχαρναί: Ἀχαρνεύς, Pl. Ἀχαρνῆς), the principal demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, 60 stadia N. of Athens, possessed a rough and warlike population, who were able to furnish 3000 hoplitae at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. Their land was fertile and they carried on a considerable traffic in charcoal. One of the plays of Aristophanes bears the name of the inhabitants of this demus.

Acharrae, a town in Thessaliotis in Thessaly, on the river Pamisus.

Achātes (Dirillo), a river in southern Sicily, between Camarina and Gela, in which the first agate is said to have been found.

Achĕlōĭdes, a surname of the Sirens, the daughters of Achelous and a Muse: also a surname of water-nymphs.

Achĕlōus (Ἀχελῷος, Ἀχελώϊος in Hom.: Aspro Potamo), more anciently called Thoas, Axenus, and Thestius, the largest river in Greece. It rises in Mount Pindus, and flows southward, forming the boundary between Acarnania and Aetolia, and falls into the Ionian sea opposite the islands called Echinades. It is about 130 miles in length. The god of this river is described as the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and as the eldest of his 3000 brothers. He fought with Hercules for Deïanīra, but was conquered in the contest. He then took the form of a bull, but was again overcome by Hercules, who deprived him of one of his horns, which however he recovered by giving up the horn of Amalthea. According to Ovid (Met. ix. 87), the Naiads changed the horn which Hercules took from Achelous into the horn of plenty. Achelous was from the earliest times considered to be a great divinity throughout Greece, and was invoked in prayers, sacrifices, &c. On several coins of Acarnania the god is represented as a bull with the head of an old man. — Achelous was also the name of a river in Arcadia, and of another in Thessaly.

Achemĕnĭdes [ACHAEMENIDES.]

Achĕron (Ἀχέρων), the name of several rivers, all of which were, at least at one time, believed to be connected with the lower world. — 1. A river in Thesprotia in Epirus, which flows through the lake Acherusia into the Ionian sea. — 2. A river in Elis which flows into the Alphēus. — 3. A river in southern Italy in Bruttii, on which Alexander of Epirus perished. — 4. The river of the lower world, round which the shades hover, and into which the Pyriphlegethon and Cocytus flow. In late writers the name of Acheron is used in a general sense to designate the whole of the lower world. The Etruscans were acquainted with the worship of Acheron (Acheruns) from very early times, as we must infer from their Acheruntici libri, which treated of the deification of souls, and of the sacrifices (Acheruntia sacra) by which this was to be effected.

Achĕrontĭa. 1. (Acerenza), a town in Apulia on a summit of Mount Vultur, whence Horace (Carm. iii. 4. 14) speaks of celsae nidum Acherontiae. — 2. A town on the river Acheron, in Bruttii. [ACHERON, No. 3.]

Achĕrūsĭa (Ἀχερουσία λίμνη or Ἀχερουσίς), the name of several lakes and swamps, which, like the various rivers of the name of Acheron, were at some time believed to be connected with the lower world, until at last the Acherusia came to be considered to be in the lower world itself. The lake to which this belief seems to have been first attached was the Acherusia in Thesprotia, through which the Acheron flowed. Other lakes or swamps of the same name were near Hermione in Argolis, between Cumae and cape Misenum in Campania, and lastly in Egypt, near Memphis. — Acherusia was also the name of a peninsula, near Heraclēa in Bithynia, with a deep chasm, into which Hercules is said to have descended to bring up the dog Cerberus.

Achetum, a small town in Sicily, the site of which is uncertain.

Achilla or Acholla (Ἄχολλα: Ἀχολλαῖος, Achillitanus: El Aliah, Ru.), a town on the seacoast of Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena), a little above the northern point of the Syrtis Minor.

Achillas (Ἀχιλλᾶς), one of the guardians of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Dionysus, and commander of the troops, when Pompey fled to Egypt, B. C. 48. It was he and L. Septimius who killed Pompey. He subsequently joined the eunuch Pothinus in resisting Caesar, and obtained possession of the greatest part of Alexandria. He was shortly afterwards put to death by Arsinoë, the youngest sister of Ptolemy, B. C. 47.

Achilles (Ἀχιλλεύς), the great hero of the Iliad. —Homeric story. Achilles was the son of Peleus, king of the Myrmidones in Phthiotis, in Thessaly, and of the Nereid Thetis. From his father's name he is often called Pelīdes, Peleïades, or Pelīon, and from his grandfather's, Aeacides. He was educated by Phoenix, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war, and accompanied him to the Trojan war. In the healing art he was instructed by Chiron, the centaur. His mother Thetis foretold him that his fate was either to gain glory and die early, or to live a long but inglorious life. The hero chose the former, and took part in the Trojan war, from which he knew that he was not to return. In 50 ships he led his hosts of Myrmidones, Hellenes, and Achaeans against Troy. Here the swift-footed Achilles was the great bulwark of the Greeks, and the worthy favourite of Athena and Hera. Previous to the dispute with Agamemnon, he ravaged the country around Troy, and destroyed 12 towns on the coast and 11 in the interior of the country. When Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseïs to her father, he threatened to take away Briseïs from Achilles, who surrendered her on the persuasion of Athena, but at the same time refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. Zeus, on the entreaty of Thetis, promised that victory should be on the side of the Trojans, until the Achaeans should have honoured her son. The affairs of the Greeks declined in consequence, and they were at last pressed so hard, that an embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseïs; but in vain. Finally, however, he was persuaded by Patroclus, his dearest friend, to allow him to make use of his men, his horses, and his armour. Patroclus was slain, and when this news reached Achilles, he was seized with unspeakable grief. Thetis consoled him, and promised new arms, to be made by Hephaestus, and Iris appeared to rouse him from his lamentations, and exhorted him to rescue the body of Patroclus. Achilles now rose, and his thundering voice alone put the Trojans to flight. When his new armour was brought to him, he hurried to the field of battle, disdaining to take any drink or food until the death of his friend should be avenged. He wounded and slew numbers of Trojans, and at length met Hector, whom he chased thrice around the walls of the city. He then slew him, tied his body to his chariot, and dragged him to the ships of the Greeks. After this, he burnt the body of Patroclus, together with twelve young captive Trojans, who were sacrificed to appease the spirit of his friend; and subsequently gave up the body of Hector to Priam, who came in person to beg for it. Achilles himself fell in the battle at the Scaean gate, before Troy was taken. His death itself does not occur in the Iliad, but it is alluded to in a few passages (xxii. 358, xxi. 278). It is expressly mentioned in the Odyssey (xxiv. 36), where it is said that his fall — his conqueror is not mentioned — was lamented by gods and men, that his remains together with those of Patroclus were buried in a golden urn which Dionysus had given as a present to Thetis, and were deposited in a place on the coast of the Hellespont, where a mound was raised over them. Achilles is the principal hero of the Iliad: he is the handsomest and bravest of all the Greeks; he is affectionate towards his mother and his friends; formidable in battles, which are his delight; openhearted and without fear, and at the same time susceptible of the gentle and quiet joys of home. His greatest passion is ambition, and when his sense of honour is hurt, he is unrelenting in his revenge and anger, but withal submits obediently to the will of the gods. — Later traditions. These chiefly consist in accounts which fill up the history of his youth and death. His mother wishing to make her son immortal, is said to have concealed him by night in the fire, in order to destroy the mortal parts he had inherited from his father, and by day to have anointed him with ambrosia. But Peleus one night discovered his child in the fire, and cried out in terror. Thetis left her son and fled, and Peleus entrusted him to Chiron, who educated and instructed him in the arts of riding, hunting, and playing the phorminx, and also changed his original name, Ligyron, i. e. the "whining," into Achilles. Chiron fed his pupil with the hearts of lions and the marrow of bears. According to other accounts, Thetis endeavoured to make Achilles immortal by dipping him in the river Styx, and succeeded with the exception of the ankles, by which she held him. When he was nine years old, Calchas declared that Troy could not be taken without his aid, and Thetis knowing that this war would be fatal to him, disguised him as a maiden, and introduced him among the daughters of Lycomedes of Scyros, where he was called by the name of Pyrrha on account of his golden locks. But his real character did not remain concealed long, for one of his companions, Deïdamīa, became mother of a son, Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus, by him. Ulysses at last discovered his place of concealment, and Achilles immediately promised his assistance. During the war against Troy, Achilles slew Penthesilēa, an Amazon. He also fought with Memnon and Troilus. The accounts of his death differ very much, though all agree in stating that he did not fall by human hands, or at least not without the interference of the god Apollo. According to some traditions, he was killed by Apollo himself; according to others, Apollo assumed the appearance of Paris in killing him, while others say that Apollo merely directed the weapon of Paris against Achilles, and thus caused his death, as had been suggested by the dying Hector. Others again relate that Achilles loved Polyxena, a daughter of Priam, and tempted by the promise that he should receive her as his wife, if he would join the Trojans, he went without arms into the temple of Apollo at Thymbra, and was assassinated there by Paris. His body was rescued by Ulysses and Ajax the Telamonian; his armour was promised by Thetis to the bravest among the Greeks, which gave rise to a contest between the two heroes who had rescued his body. [AJAX.] After his death, Achilles became one of the judges in the lower world, and dwelled in the islands of the blessed, where he was united with Medēa or Iphigenīa.

Achilles Tatĭus, or as others call him Achilles Statius, an Alexandrine rhetorician, lived in the latter half of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century of our era. He is the author of a Greek romance in eight books, containing the adventures of two lovers, Clitophon and Leucippe, which has come down to us. The best edition is by Fr. Jacobs, Lips. 1821. Suidas ascribes to this Achilles a work on the sphere (περὶ σφαίρας), a fragment of which professing to be an introduction to the Phaenomena of Aratus is still extant. But this work was written at an earlier period. It is printed in Petavius, Uranologia, Paris, 1630, and Amsterdam, 1703.

Achillēum (Ἀχίλλειον), a town near the promontory Sigēum in the Troad, where Achilles was supposed to have been buried. There was a place of the same name on the Cimmerian Bosporus, or Straits of Kaffa, on the Asiatic side.

Achilleus, assumed the title of emperor under Diocletian, and reigned over Egypt for some time. He was taken by Diocletian after a siege of 8 months in Alexandria, and put to death, A. D. 296.

Achillēus Drŏmos (Ἀχίλλειος δρόμος: Tendera or Tendra), a narrow tongue of land in the Euxine Sea, not far from the mouth of the Borysthenes, where Achilles is said to have made a race-course. Before it lay the celebrated Island of Achilles (Insula Achillis) or Leuce (Λευκή), where there was a temple of Achilles.

Achillēus Portus (Ἀχίλλειος λιμήν), a harbour in Laconia, near the promontory Taenarum.

Achillīdes, a patronymic of Pyrrhus, son of Achilles.

Achillis Insŭla. [ACHILLEUS DROMOS.]

Achirŏe (Ἀχιρόη), daughter of Nilus, and wife of Belus, by whom she became the mother of Aegyptus and Danaus.

Achīvi, the name of the Achaei in the Latin writers, and frequently used, like Achaei, to signify the whole Greek nation. [ACHAEI.]

Acholla. [ACHILLA.]

Acholŏē. [HARPYIAE.]

Achrădīna or Acrădīna. [SYRACUSAE.]

Acichōrĭus (Ἀκιχώριος), one of the leaders of the Gauls, who invaded Thrace and Macedonia in B. C. 280. In the following year he accompanied Brennus in his invasion of Greece. Some writers suppose that Brennus and Acichorius are the same persons, the former being only a title and the latter the real name.

Acidālĭa, a surname of Venus, from the well Acidalius near Orchomenos, where she used to bathe with the Graces.

Acĭdīnus, L. Manlĭus. 1. One of the Roman generals in the second Punic war, praetor urbanus B. C. 210, served against Hasdrubal in 207, and was sent into Spain in 206, where he remained till 199.—2. Surnamed FULVIANUS, because he originally belonged to the Fulvia gens, praetor B. C. 188 in Nearer Spain, and consul in 179 with his own brother Q. Fulvius Flaccus, which is the only instance of two brothers holding the consulship at the same time.

Acīlĭa Gens, plebeian. Its members are mentioned under the family-names of AVIOLA, BALBUS, and GLABRIO.

Acis (Ἄκις), son of Faunus and Symaethis, was beloved by the nymph Galatea: Polyphemus the Cyclop, jealous of him, crushed him under a huge rock. His blood gushing forth from under the rock was changed by the nymph into the river Acis or Acinius at the foot of Mount Aetna (now Fiume di Jaci). This story, which is related only by Ovid (Met. xiii. 750, seq.), is perhaps no more than a happy fiction suggested by the manner in which the little river springs forth from under a rock.

Acmŏnĭa (Ἀκμονία: Ἀκμονίτης, Acmonensis), a city of the Greater Phrygia.

Acmŏnĭdes, one of the three Cyclopes in Ovid, is the same as Pyracmon in Virgil, and as Arges in most other accounts of the Cyclopes.

Acoetes (Ἀκοίτης), son of a poor fisherman of Maeonia, who served as a pilot in a ship. After landing at the island of Naxos, the sailors brought with them on board a beautiful boy asleep, whom they wished to take with them; but Acoetes, who recognised in the boy the god Bacchus, dissuaded them from it, but in vain. When the ship had reached the open sea, the boy awoke, and desired to be carried back to Naxos. The sailors promised to do so, but did not keep their word. Hereupon the god disclosed himself to them in his majesty; vines began to twine round the vessel, tigers appeared, and the sailors, seized with madness, jumped into the sea and perished. Acoetes alone was saved and conveyed back to Naxos, where he was initiated in the Bacchic mysteries. This is the account of Ovid (Met. iii. 582, &c.). Other writers call the crew of the ship Tyrrhenian pirates, and derive the name of the Tyrrhenian sea from them.

Acontĭus (Ἀκόντιος), a beautiful youth of the island of Ceos. On one occasion he came to Delos to celebrate the annual festival of Diana, and fell in love with Cydippe, the daughter of a noble Athenian. In order to gain her, he had recourse to a stratagem. While she was sitting in the temple of Diana, he threw before her an apple upon which he had written the words "I swear by the sanctuary of Diana to marry Acontius." The nurse took up the apple and handed it to Cydippe, who read aloud what was written upon it, and then threw the apple away. But the goddess had heard her vow, and the repeated illness of the maiden, when she was about to marry another man, at length compelled her father to give her in marriage to Acontius. This story is related by Ovid (Heroid. 20, 21), who borrowed it from a lost poem of Callimachus, entitled "Cydippe."

Acŏris (Ἄκορις), king of Egypt, assisted Evagoras king of Cyprus, against Artaxerxes king of Persia, about B. C. 385. He died about 374, before the Persians entered Egypt, which was in the following year.

Acrae (Ἄκραι) 1. (Nr. Palazzalo, Ru.), a town in Sicily, W. of Syracuse, and 10 stadia from the river Anapus, was founded by the Syracusans 70 years after the foundation of their own city.—2. A town in Aetolia.

Acraea (Ἀκραία), and Acraeus, are surnames given to various goddesses and gods whose temples were situated upon hills, such as Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Pallas, Artemis, and others.

Acraepheus. [ACRAEPHIA.]

Acraephīa, Acraephīae, or Acraephīon (Ἀκραιφία, Ἀκραιφίαι, Ἀκραίφιον: Ἀκραίφιος, Ἀκραιφιαῖος: Kardhitza), a town in Boeotia, on the lake Copais, said to have been founded by Acraepheus, the son of Apollo.

Acrăgas. [AGRIGENTUM.]

Acrātus, a freedman of Nero, sent into Asia and Achaia (A. D. 64) to plunder the temples and take away the statues of the gods.

Acriae (Ἀκριαί, or Ἀκραῖαι), a town in Laconia, not far from the mouth of the Eurotas.

Acrillae, a town in Sicily between Agrigentum and Acrae.

Acrĭsĭōnē (Ἀκρισιώνη), a patronymic of Danaë, daughter of Acrisius. Perseus, grandson of Acrisius, was called in the same way Acrisĭonĭădēs.

Acrĭsĭus (Ἀκρίσιος), son of Abas, king of Argos, and of Ocalīa, grandson of Lynceus, and great-grandson of Danaus. His twin-brother was Proetus, with whom he is said to have quarrelled even in the womb of his mother. Acrisius expelled Proetus from his inheritance; but, supported by his father-in-law Iobates, the Lycian, Proetus returned, and Acrisius was compelled to share his kingdom with his brother by giving up to him Tiryns, while he retained Argos for himself. An oracle had declared that Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius, would give birth to a son who would kill his grandfather. For this reason he kept Danaë shut up in a subterraneous apartment, or in a brazen tower. But here she became mother of Perseus, notwithstanding the precautions of her father, according to some accounts by her uncle Proetus, and according to others by Zeus, who visited her in the form of a shower of gold. Acrisius ordered mother and child to be exposed on the wide sea in a chest; but the chest floated towards the island of Seriphus, where both were rescued by Dictys. As to the manner in which the oracle was subsequently fulfilled, see PERSEUS.

Acrītas (Ἀκρείτας: C. Gallo), the most southerly promontory in Messenia.

Acrŏcĕraunĭa (τὰ Ἀκροκεραύνια, sc. ὄρη: C. Linguetta), a promontory in Epirus, jutting out into the Ionian sea, was the most westerly part of the CERAUNII MONTES. The coast of the Acroceraunia was dangerous to ships, whence Horace (Carm. i. 3. 20) speaks of infames scopulos Acroceraunia.

Acrŏcŏrinthus. [CORINTHUS.]

Acrŏlissus. [LISSUS.]

Acron. 1. King of the Caeninenses, whom Romulus slew in battle, and whose arms he dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius as Spolia Opima.—2. An eminent physician of Agrigentum in Sicily, is said to have been in Athens during the great plague (B. C. 430) in the Peloponnesian war, and to have ordered large fires to be kindled in the streets for the purpose of purifying the air, which proved of great service to several of the sick. This fact, however, is not mentioned by Thucydides. The medical sect of the Empirici, in order to boast of a greater antiquity than the Dogmatici (founded about B. C. 400), claimed Acron as their founder, though they did not really exist before the third century B. C.

Acron, Helēnĭus, a Roman grammarian, probably of the fifth century A. D., wrote notes on Horace, part of which are extant, and also, according to some critics, the scholia which we have on Persius.

Acrŏpŏlis. [ATHENAE.]

Acrŏpŏlīta, Georgĭus (Γεώργιος Ἀκροπολίτης), a Byzantine writer, was born at Constantinople in A. D. 1220, and died in 1282. He wrote several works which have come down to us. The most important of them is a history of the Byzantine empire, from the taking of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, down to the year 1261, when Michael Palaeologus delivered the city from the foreign yoke. Edited by Leo Allatius, Paris, 1651, reprinted at Venice, 1729.

Acrōrēa (ἡ Ἀκρώρεια), a mountainous tract of country in the north of Elis.

Acrŏtătus (Ἀκρότατος). 1. Son of Cleomenes II. king of Sparta, sailed to Sicily in B. C. 314 to assist the Agrigentines against Agathocles of Syracuse. On his arrival at Agrigentum he acted with such tyranny that the inhabitants compelled him to leave the city. He returned to Sparta, and died before his father, leaving a son, Areus.—2. Grandson of the preceding, and the son of Areus I. king of Sparta; bravely defended Sparta against Pyrrhus in B. C. 272; succeeded his father as king in 265, but was killed in the same year in battle against Aristodemus, the tyrant of Megalopolis.

Acrŏthōum or Acrŏthōi (Ἀκρόθωον, Ἀκρόθωοι: Ἀκροθωΐτης: Lavra), afterwards called Uranopolis, a town near the extremity of the peninsula of Athos.

Actaea (Ἀκταία), daughter of Nereus and Doris.

Actaeon (Ἀκταίων). 1. A celebrated huntsman, son of Aristaeus and Autonoë, a daughter of Cadmus, was trained in the art of hunting by the centaur Chiron. One day as he was hunting, he saw Artemis with her nymphs bathing in the vale of Gargaphia, whereupon the goddess changed him into a stag, in which form he was torn to pieces by his 50 dogs on Mount Cithaeron. Others relate that he provoked the anger of the goddess by boasting that he excelled her in hunting.—2. Son of Melissus, and grandson of Abron, who had fled from Argos to Corinth for fear of the tyrant Phidon. Archias, a Corinthian, enamoured with the beauty of Actaeon, endeavoured to carry him off; but in the struggle which ensued between Melissus and Archias, Actaeon was killed. [ARCHIAS]

Actaeus (Ἀκταῖος), son of Erisichthon, and the earliest king of Attica. He had three daughters, Agraulos, Herse, and Pandrosus, and was succeeded by Cecrops, who married Agraulos.

Actē, the concubine of Nero, was originally a slave from Asia Minor. Nero at one time thought of marrying her; whence he pretended that she was descended from king Attalus. She survived Nero.

Actē (Ἀκτή), properly a piece of land running into the sea, and attached to another larger piece of land, but not necessarily by a narrow neck. 1. An ancient name of Attica, used especially by the poets.—2. The eastern coast of Peloponnesus near Troezen and Epidaurus.—3. The peninsula between the Strymonic and Singitic gulfs, on which Mount Athos is.

Actĭacus. [Actium.]

Actisănes (Ἀκτισάνης), a king of Ethiopia, who conquered Egypt and governed it with justice, in the reign of Amasis. This Amasis is a more ancient king than the contemporary of Cyrus.

Actĭum (Ἄκτιον: Ἄκτιος: La Punta not Azio), a promontory, and likewise a place, in Acarnania, at the entrance of the Ambracian gulf, off which Augustus gained the celebrated victory over Antony and Cleopatra, on September 2, B.C. 31. At Actium there was originally no town, but only a temple of Apollo, who was hence called Actiacus and Actius. This temple was beautified by Augustus, who established, or rather revived, a festival to Apollo, called Actia (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.), and erected Nicopolis on the opposite coast, in commemoration of his victory. A few buildings sprung up around the temple at Actium, but the place was only a kind of suburb of Nicopolis.

Actĭus. [Attius.]

Actor (Ἄκτωρ). 1. Son of Deion and Diomede, father of Menoetius, and grandfather of Patroclus. — 2. Son of Phorbas and Hyrmine, and husband of Molione. — 3. A companion of Aeneas, of whose conquered lance Turnus made a boast. This story seems to have given rise to the proverb Actoris spolium (Juv. ii. 100), for any poor spoil.

Actŏrĭdes or Actŏrĭon (Ἀκτορίδης or Ἀκτορίων), patronymics of descendants of an Actor, such as Patroclus, Erithus, Eurytus, and Cteatus.

Actuarĭus, Joannes, a Greek physician of Constantinople, probably lived in the reign of Andronicus II. Palaeologus, A. D. 1281—1328. He was the author of several medical works, which are extant.

C. Acŭlĕo, an eminent Roman lawyer, who married the sister of Helvia, the mother of Cicero: his son was C. Visellius Varro; whence it would appear that Aculeo was only a surname given to the father from his acuteness, and that his full name was C. Visellius Varro Aculeo.

Acūsilāus (Ἀκουσίλαος), of Argos, one of the earlier Greek logographers, flourished about B.C. 525. Three books of his Genealogies are quoted, which were for the most part only a translation of Hesiod into prose. He wrote in the Ionic dialect. His fragments are published by Sturtz, Lips. 1824, and in Didot's Fragm. Histor. Graec. p. 100, seq.

Ada (Ἄδα), daughter of Hecatomnus, king of Caria, and sister of Mausolus, Artemisia, Idrieus, and Pixodarus. She was married to her brother Idrieus, on whose death (B.C. 344) she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her brother Pixodarus in 340. When Alexander entered Caria in 334, Ada, who was in possession of the fortress of Alinda, surrendered this place to him. After taking Halicarnassus, Alexander committed the government of Caria to her.

Adamantēa. [Amalthea.]

Adamantĭus. (Ἀδαμάντιος), a Greek physician, flourished about A. D. 415, the author of a Greek treatise on Physiognomy, which is borrowed in a great measure from Polemo's work on the same subject. Edited by Franzius, in Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, 1780, 8vo.

Addŭa (Adda), a river of Gallia Cisalpina, which rises in the Rhaetian Alps, and flows through the Lacus Larius (L. di Como) into the Po, about 8 miles above Cremona.

Adherbal (Ἀτάρβας), son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, had the kingdom of Numidia left to him by his father in conjunction with his brother Hiempsal and Jugurtha, B.C. 118. After the murder of his brother by Jugurtha, Adherbal fled to Rome and was restored to his share of the kingdom by the Romans in 117. But he was again stripped of his dominions by Jugurtha and besieged in Cirta, where he was treacherously killed by Jugurtha in 112.

Adiabēnē (Ἀδιαβηνή), a district of Assyria, E. of the Tigris, and between the river Lycus, called Zabatus in the Anabasis of Xenophon, and the Caprus, both of which are branches of the Tigris.

Adīmantus (Ἀδείμαντος). 1. The commander of the Corinthian fleet, when Xerxes invaded Greece (B.C. 480), vehemently opposed the advice of Themistocles to give battle to the Persians. — 2. An Athenian, one of the commanders at the battle of Aegospotami, B.C. 405, where he was taken prisoner. He was accused of treachery in this battle, and is ridiculed by Aristophanes in the "Frogs." — 3. The brother of Plato, frequently mentioned by the latter.

Adis (Ἀδίς: Rhades?), a considerable town on the coast of Africa, in the territory of Carthage (Zeugitana), a short distance E. of Tunis. Under the Romans it appears to have been supplanted by a new city, named Maxula.

Admētē (Ἀδμήτη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Thetys. — 2. Daughter of Eurystheus and Antimache or Admete. Hercules was obliged by her father to fetch for her the girdle of Ares, which was worn by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons.

Admētus (Ἄδμητος). 1. Son of Pheres and Periclymene or Clymene, was king of Pherae in Thessaly. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He sued for the hand of Alcestis, the daughter of Pelias, who promised her to him on condition that he should come to her in a chariot drawn by lions and boars. This task Admetus performed by the assistance of Apollo, who served him, according to some accounts, out of attachment to him, or, according to others, because he was obliged to serve a mortal for one year for having slain the Cyclops. On the day of his marriage with Alcestis, Admetus neglected to offer a sacrifice to Artemis, but Apollo reconciled the goddess to him, and at the same time induced the Moirae to grant to Admetus deliverance from death, if at the hour of his death his father, mother, or wife would die for him. Alcestis died in his stead, but was brought back by Hercules from the lower world. — 2. King of the Molossians, to whom Themistocles fled for protection, when pursued as a party to the treason of Pausanias.

Adōnis (Ἄδωνις), a beautiful youth, beloved by Aphrodite. He was, according to Apollodorus, a son of Cinyras and Medarme, or, according to the cyclic poet Panyasis, a son of Theias, king of Assyria, and Smyrna (Myrrha). The ancient story ran thus: Smyrna had neglected the worship of Aphrodite, and was punished by the goddess with an unnatural love for her father. With the assistance of her nurse she contrived to share her father's bed. When he discovered the crime he wished to kill her; but she fled, and on being nearly overtaken, prayed to the gods to make her invisible. They were moved to pity and changed her into a tree called σμύρνα. After the lapse of 9 months the tree burst, and Adonis was born. Aphrodite was so much charmed with the beauty of the infant, that she concealed it in a chest which she entrusted to Persephone ; but the latter refused to give it up. Zeus decided the dispute by declaring that during 4 months of every year Adonis should be left to himself, during 4 months he should belong to Persephone, and during the remaining 4 to Aphrodite. Adonis, however, preferring to live with Aphrodite, also spent with her the four months over which he had control. Adonis afterwards died of a wound which he received from a boar during the chase. The grief of the goddess at the loss of her favourite was so great, that the gods of the lower world allowed him to spend 6 months of every year with Aphrodite upon the earth. The worship of Adonis, which in later times was spread over nearly all the countries round the Mediterranean, was, as the story itself sufficiently indicates, of Asiatic, or more especially of Phoenician origin. Thence it was transferred to Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and even to Italy, though of course with various modifications. In the Homeric poems no trace of it occurs, and the later Greek poets changed the original symbolic account of Adonis into a poetical story. In the Asiatic religions Aphrodite was the fructifying principle of nature, and Adonis appears to have reference to the death of nature in winter and its revival in spring — hence he spends 6 months in the lower and 6 in the upper world. His death and his return to life were celebrated in annual festivals (Adonia) at Byblos, Alexandria in Egypt, Athens, and other places

Adōnis (Ἄδωνις), a small river of Phoenicia, which rises in the range of Libanus.

Adramyttium (Ἀδραμύττειον or Ἀδραμύττιον : Ἀδραμυττηνός : Adramyti), a town of Mysia near the head of the gulf of Adramyttium, and opposite to the island of Lesbos.

Adrāna (Eder), a river in Germany, which flows into the Fulda near Cassel.

Adrānum or Hadrānum (Ἄδρανον, Ἅδρανον : Ἀδρανίτης : Aderno), a town in Sicily, on the river Adranus, at the foot of M. Aetna, was built by Dionysius, and was the seat of the worship of the god Adranus.

Adrānus (Ἀδρανός). [ADRANUM.]

Adrastīa (Ἀδράστεια). 1. A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melisseus, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be reared in the Dictaean grotto. — 2. A surname of Nemesis, derived by some writers from Adrastus, who is said to have built the first sanctuary of Nemesis on the river Asopus, and by others from the verb διδράσκειν, i. e. the goddess whom none can escape.

Adrastus (Ἄδραστος). 1. Son of Talaus, king of Argos, and Lysimache, or Lysianassa or Eurynome. Adrastus was expelled from Argos by Amphiarāus, and fled to Polybus, king of Sicyon, whom he succeeded on the throne of Sicyon, and instituted the Nemean games. Afterwards he became reconciled to Amphiaraus, and returned to his kingdom of Argos. He married his two daughters Deipyle and Argīa, the former to Tydeus of Calydon, and the latter to Polynīces of Thebes, both fugitives from their native countries. He now prepared to restore Polynices to Thebes, who had been expelled by his brother Eteocles, although Amphiaraus foretold that all who should engage in the war should perish, with the exception of Adrastus. Thus arose the celebrated war of the "Seven against Thebes," in which Adrastus was joined by six other heroes, viz. Polynices, Tydeus, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, Hippomedon, and Parthenopaeus. Instead of Tydeus and Polynices other legends mention Eteocles and Mecisteus. This war ended as unfortunately as Amphiaraus had predicted, and Adrastus alone was saved by the swiftness of his horse Arīon, the gift of Hercules. Creon of Thebes refusing to allow the bodies of the six heroes to be buried, Adrastus went to Athens and implored the assistance of the Athenians. Theseus was persuaded to undertake an expedition against Thebes ; he took the city and delivered up the bodies of the fallen heroes to their friends for burial. Ten years after this Adrastus persuaded the seven sons of the heroes who had fallen in the war, to make a new attack upon Thebes, and Amphiaraus now promised success. This war is known as the war of the "Epigoni" (Ἐπίγονοι) or descendants. Thebes was taken and razed to the ground. The only Argive hero that fell in this war, was Aegialeus, the son of Adrastus : the latter died of grief at Megara on his return to Argos, and was buried in the former city. He was worshipped in several parts of Greece, as at Megara, at Sicyon, where his memory was celebrated in tragic choruses, and in Attica. The legends about Adrastus and the two wars against Thebes furnished ample materials for the epic as well as tragic poets of Greece. — 2. Son of the Phrygian king Gordius, having unintentionally killed his brother, fled to Croesus, who received him kindly. While hunting he accidentally killed Atys, the son of Croesus, and in despair put an end to his own life.

Adrĭa or Hadrĭa. 1. (Adria), also called Atrica, a town in Gallia Cisalpina, between the mouths of the Po and the Athesis (Adige), from which the Adriatic sea takes its name. It was originally a powerful town of the Etruscans. — 2. (Atri), a town of Picenum in Italy, probably an Etruscan town originally, afterwards a Roman colony, at which place the family of the emperor Hadrian lived.

Adrĭa (Ἀδρίας, Ion. Ἀδρίης), or Mare Adriaticum, also Mare Superum, so called from the town Adria [No. 1], was in its widest signification the sea between Italy on the W., and Illyricum, Epirus, and Greece, on the E. By the Greeks the name Adrias was only applied to the northern part of this sea, the southern part being called the Ionian Sea.

Adriānus. [HADRIANUS.]

Adriānus (Ἀδριανός), a Greek rhetorician, born at Tyre in Phoenicia, was the pupil of Herodes Atticus, and obtained the chair of philosophy at Athens during the lifetime of his master. He was invited by M. Antonius to Rome, where he died about A. D. 192. Three of his declamations are extant, edited by Walz in Rhetores Graeci, vol. i. 1832.

Adrumētum. [HADRUMETUM.]

Aduatŭca, a castle of the Eburones in Gaul, probably the same as the later Aduaca Tongrorum (Tongern).

Aduatŭci or Aduatĭci, a powerful people of Gallia Belgica in the time of Caesar, were the descendants of the Cimbri and Teutoni, and lived between the Scaldis (Schelde) and Mosa (Maas).

Adūla Mons. [ALPES.]

Adūle or Adūlis (Ἀδούλη, Ἄδουλις, and also other forms: Ἀδουλίτης, Adulitānus: Arkiko or Zula, Ru.), a maritime city of Aethiopia, on a bay of the Red Sea, called Adulitanus Sinus (Ἀδουλιτικὸς κόλπος, Annesley Bay). It was believed to have been founded by slaves who fled from Egypt, and afterwards to have fallen into the power of the Auxumitae, for whose trade it became the great emporium. Cosmas Indicopleustes (A. D. 535) found here the Monumentum Adulitanum, a Greek inscription recounting the conquests of Ptolemy II. Euergetes in Asia and Thrace.

Adyrmăchĭdae (Ἀδυρμαχίδαι), a Libyan people, who appear to have once possessed the whole coast of Africa from the Canopic mouth of the Nile to the Catabathmus Major, but were afterwards pressed further inland. In their manners and customs they resembled the Egyptians, to whom they were the nearest neighbours.

Aea (Αἶα), sometimes with the addition of the word Colchis, may be considered either a part of Colchis or another name for the country. (Herod. i. 2.)

Aeăces (Αἰάκης), son of Syloson, and grandson of Aeaces, was tyrant of Samos, but was deprived of his tyranny by Aristagoras, when the Ionians revolted from the Persians, B. C. 500. He then fled to the Persians, who restored him to the tyranny of Samos, B. C. 494.

Aeăcēum (Αἰάκειον). [AEGINA.]

Aeăcĭdes (Αἰακίδης), a patronymic of the descendants of Aeacus, as Peleus, Telamon, and Phocus, sons of Aeacus; Achilles, son of Peleus and grandson of Aeacus; Pyrrhus, son of Achilles and great-grandson of Aeacus; and Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who claimed to be a descendant of Achilles.

Aeăcĭdes, son of Arymbas, king of Epirus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy, B. C. 326. Aeacides married Phthia, by whom he had the celebrated PYRRHUS. He took an active part in favour of Olympias against Cassander; but his subjects disliked the war, rose against their king, and drove him from the kingdom. He was recalled to his kingdom by his subjects in B. C. 313: Cassander sent an army against him under Philip, who conquered him the same year in two battles, in the last of which he was killed.

Aeăcus (Αἰακός), son of Zeus and Aegina, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. He was born in the island of Oenone or Oenopia, whither Aegina had been carried by Zeus, and from whom this island was afterwards called Aegina. Some traditions related that at the birth of Aeacus, Aegina was not yet inhabited, and that Zeus changed the ants (μύρμηκες) of the island into men (Myrmidones) over whom Aeacus ruled. Ovid (Met. vii. 520) relates the story a little differently. Aeacus was renowned in all Greece for his justice and piety, and was frequently called upon to settle disputes not only among men, but even among the gods themselves. He was such a favourite with the gods, that, when Greece was visited by a drought, rain was at length sent upon the earth in consequence of his prayers. Respecting the temple which Aeacus erected to Zeus Panhellenius, and the Aeacēum, where he was worshipped by the Aeginetans, see AEGINA. After his death Aeacus became one of the three judges in Hades. The Aeginetans regarded him as the tutelary deity of their island.

Aeaea (Αἰαία). 1. A surname of Circe, the sister of Aeëtes. Her son Telegonus is likewise mentioned with this surname.—2. A surname of Calypso, who was believed to have inhabited a small island of the name of Aeaea in the straits between Italy and Sicily.

Aebūra (Cuerva), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Aebūtĭa Gens, patrician, was distinguished in the early ages of the Roman republic, when many of its members were consuls, viz. in B. C. 499, 463, and 442.

Aeca or Aecae (Aecānus), a town of Apulia on the road from Aquilonia in Samnium to Venusia.

Aeculānum or Aeclānum, a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, a few miles S. of Beneventum.

Aedepsus (Αἴδηψος: Αἰδήψιος: Dipso), a town on the W. coast of Euboea, N. of Chalcis, with warm baths sacred to Hercules, which the dictator Sulla used.

Aēdon (Ἀηδών), daughter of Pandareus of Ephesus, wife of Zethus king of Thebes, and mother of Itylus. Envious of Niobe, the wife of her brother Amphion, who had six sons and six daughters, she resolved to kill the eldest of Niobe's sons, but by mistake slew her own son Itylus. Zeus relieved her grief by changing her into a nightingale, whose melancholy tunes are represented by the poets as Aëdon's lamentations about her child. Aëdon's story is related differently in a later tradition.

Aedŭi or Hēdŭi, one of the most powerful people in Gaul, lived between the Liger (Loire) and the Arar (Saone). They were the first Gallic people who made an alliance with the Romans, by whom they were called "brothers and relations." On Caesar's arrival in Gaul, B. C. 58, they were subject to Ariovistus, but were restored by Caesar to their former power. In B. C. 52 they joined in the insurrection of Vercingetorix against the Romans, but were at the close of it treated leniently by Caesar. Their principal town was BIBRACTE. Their chief magistrate, elected annually by the priests, was called Vergobretus.

Aeētes or Aeēta (Αἰήτης), son of Helios (the Sun) and Perseïs, and brother of Circe, Pasiphaë, and Perses. His wife was Idyia, a daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had two daughters, Medea and Chalciope, and one son, Absyrtus. He was king of Colchis at the time when Phrixus brought thither the golden fleece. For the remainder of his history, see ABSYRTUS, ARGONAUTAE, JASON, MEDEA.

Aeētis, Aeētĭas, and Aeētīne, patronymics of Medea, daughter of Aeëtes.

Aega (Αἴγη), daughter of Olenus, who with her sister Helice, nursed the infant Zeus in Crete, and was changed by the god into the constellation Capella.

Aegae (Αἰγαί: Αἰγαῖος). 1. A town in Achaia on the Crathis, with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, was originally one of the twelve Achaean towns, but its inhabitants subsequently removed to Aegira. — 2. A town in Emathia in Macedonia, the burial-place of the Macedonian kings, was probably a different place from EDESSA. — 3. A town in Euboea with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, who was hence called Aegaeus. — 4. Also Aegaeae (Αἰγαῖαι: Αἰγεάτης), one of the twelve cities of Aeolis in Asia Minor, N. of Smyrna, on the river Hyllus: it suffered greatly from an earthquake in the time of Tiberius. — 5. (Ayas), a seaport town of Cilicia.

Aegaeon (Αἰγαίων), son of Uranus by Gaea. Aegaeon and his brothers Gyges and Cottus are known under the name of the Uranids, and are described as huge monsters with a hundred arms (ἑκατόγχειρες) and fifty heads. Most writers mention the third Uranid under the name of Briareus instead of Aegaeon, which is explained by Homer (Il. i. 403), who says that men called him Aegaeon, but the gods Briareus. According to the most ancient tradition Aegaeon and his brothers conquered the Titans when they made war upon the gods, and secured the victory to Zeus, who thrust the Titans into Tartarus, and placed Aegaeon and his brothers to guard them. Other legends represent Aegaeon as one of the giants who attacked Olympus; and many writers represent him as a marine god living in the Aegaean sea. Aegaeon and his brothers must be regarded as personifications of the extraordinary powers of nature, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and the like.

Aegaeum Mare (τὸ Αἰγαῖον πέλαγος, ὁ Αἰγαῖος πόντος), the part of the Mediterranean now called the Archipelago. It was bounded on the N. by Thrace and Macedonia, on the W. by Greece, and on the E. by Asia Minor. It contains in its southern part two groups of islands, the Cyclades, which were separated from the coasts of Attica and Peloponnesus by the Myrtoan sea, and the Sporades, lying off the coasts of Caria and Ionia. The part of the Aegaean which washed the Sporades was called the Icarian sea, from the island Icaria, one of the Sporades. The origin of the name of Aegaean is uncertain; some derive it from Aegeus, the king of Athens, who threw himself into it; others from Aegaea, the queen of the Amazons, who perished there; others from Aegae in Euboea; and others from αἰγίς, a squall, on account of its storms.

Aegaeus (Αἰγαῖος). [AEGAE, No. 3.]

Aegălĕos (Αἰγάλεως, τὸ Αἰγάλεων ὄρος: Skarmanga), a mountain in Attica opposite Salamis, from which Xerxes saw the defeat of his fleet. B. C. 480.

Aegātes, the goat islands, were three islands off the W. coast of Sicily, between Drepanum and Lilybaeum, near which the Romans gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians, and thus brought the first Punic war to an end, B. C. 241. The islands were Aegūsa (Αἰγοῦσσα) or Caprārĭa (Favignana), Phorbantĭa (Levanzo) and Hiera (Maretimo).

Aegĕrĭa or Egĕrĭa, one of the Camenae in Roman mythology, from whom Numa received his instructions respecting the forms of worship which he introduced. The grove in which the king had his interviews with the goddess, and in which a well gushed forth from a dark recess, was dedicated by him to the Camenae. The Roman legends point out two distinct places sacred to Aegeria, one near Aricia, and the other near Rome at the Porta Capena, in the valley now called Caparella. Aegeria was regarded as a prophetic divinity, and also as the giver of life, whence she was invoked by pregnant women.

Aegesta. [SEGESTA.]

Aegestus. [ACESTES.]

Aegeus (Αἰγεύς). 1. Son of Pandion and king of Athens. He had no children by his first two wives, but he afterwards begot THESEUS by Aethra at Troezen. When Theseus had grown up to manhood, he went to Athens and defeated the 50 sons of his uncle Pallas, who had made war upon Aegeus and had deposed him. Aegeus was now restored. When Theseus went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute it had to pay to Minos, he promised his father that on his return he would hoist white sails as a signal of his safety. On approaching the coast of Attica he forgot his promise, and his father, perceiving the black sail, thought that his son had perished and threw himself into the sea, which according to some traditions received from this event the name of the Aegean. Aegeus was one of the eponymous heroes of Attica; and one of the Attic tribes (Aegēis) derived its name from him.—2. The eponymous hero of the phyle called the Aegīdae at Sparta, son of Oeolycus, and grandson of Theras, the founder of the colony in Thera. All the Aegeïds were believed to be Cadmeans, who formed a settlement at Sparta previous to the Dorian conquest.

Aegīae (Αἰγειαί, Αἰγαῖαι), a small town in Laconia, not far from Cythium, the Augiae of Homer (Il. ii. 583).

Aegĭălē or Aegĭălēa (Αἰγιάλη, Αἰγιάλεια), daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, or of Aegialeus the son of Adrastus, whence she is called Adrastine. She was married to Diomedes, who, on his return from Troy, found her living in adultery with Cometes. The hero attributed this misfortune to the anger of Aphrodite, whom he had wounded in the war against Troy: when Aegiale threatened his life, he fled to Italy.

Aegĭălēa, Aegĭălos. [ACHAIA; SICYON.]

Aegĭăleus (Αἰγιαλεύς). 1. Son of Adrastus, the only one among the Epigoni that fell in the war against Thebes. [ADRASTUS.]—2. Son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia, from whom the part of Peloponnesus afterwards called Achaia derived its name Aegialea: he is said to have been the first king of Sicyon.—3. Son of Aeëtes, and brother of Medea, commonly called Absyrtus.

Aegīdes (Αἰγείδης), a patronymic from Aegeus, especially his son Theseus.

Aegĭla (τὰ Αἴγιλα), a town of Laconia with a temple of Demeter.

Aegĭlĭa (Αἰγιλία: Αἰγιλιεύς). 1. A demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, celebrated for its figs. — 2. (Cerigotto), an island between Crete and Cythera. — 3. An island W. of Euboea and opposite Attica.

Aegĭmĭus (Αἰγίμιος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, whose king he was when they were yet inhabiting the northern parts of Thessaly. Involved in a war with the Lapithae, he called Hercules to his assistance, and promised him the third part of his territory, if he delivered him from his enemies. The Lapithae were conquered. Hercules did not take the territory for himself, but left it to the king who was to preserve it for the sons of Hercules. Aegimius had two sons, Dymas and Pamphylus, who migrated to Peloponnesus, and were regarded as the ancestors of two branches of the Doric race (Dymanes and Pamphylians), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hylleans), the son of Hercules, who had been adopted by Aegimius. There existed in antiquity an epic poem called Aegimius, which described the war of Aegimius and Hercules against the Lapithae.

Aegimūrus (Αἰγίμουρος, Aegimōri Arae, Plin., and probably the Arae of Virg. Aen. i. 108; Zowamour or Zembra), a lofty island, surrounded by cliffs, off the African coast, at the mouth of the Gulf of Carthage.

Aegīna (Αἴγινα: Αἰγινήτης: Eghina), a rocky island in the middle of the Saronic gulf, about 200 stadia in circumference. It was originally called Oenone or Oenopia, and is said to have obtained the name of Aegina from Aegina, the daughter of the river god Asopus, who was carried to the island by Zeus, and there bore him a son Aeacus. As the island had then no inhabitants, Zeus changed the ants into men (Myrmidones), over whom Aeacus ruled. [AEACUS.] It was first colonized by Achaeans, and afterwards by Dorians from Epidaurus, whence the Doric dialect and customs prevailed in the island. It was at first closely connected with Epidaurus, and was subject to the Argive Phidon, who is said to have established a silver-mint in the island. It early became a place of great commercial importance, and its silver coinage was the standard in most of the Dorian states. In the sixth century B. C. Aegina became independent, and for a century before the Persian war was a prosperous and powerful state. The Aeginetans fought with 30 ships against the fleet of Xerxes at the battle of Salamis, B. C. 480, and are allowed to have distinguished themselves above all the other Greeks by their bravery. After this time its power declined. In B. C. 429 the Athenians took possession of the island and expelled its inhabitants, and though a portion of them was restored by Lysander in B. C. 404, the island never recovered its former prosperity. In the NW. of the island there was a city of the same name, which contained the Aeacēum or temple of Aeacus, and on a hill in the NE. of the island was the celebrated temple of Zeus Panhellenius, said to have been built by Aeacus, the ruins of which are still extant. The sculptures which occupied the tympana of the pediment of this temple were discovered in 1811, and are now preserved at Munich. In the half century preceding the Persian war, and for a few years afterwards, Aegina was the chief seat of Greek art: the most eminent artists of the Aeginetan school were CALLON, ANAXAGORAS, GLAUCIAS, SIMON, and ONATAS.

Aegineta Paulus. [PAULUS AEGINETA.]

Aeginium (Αἰγίνιον: Αἰγινιεύς: Stagus), a town of the Tymphaei in Thessaly on the confines of Athamania.

Aegiŏchus (Αἰγίοχος), a surname of Zeus, because he bore the Aegis.

Aegipan (Αἰγίπαν), that is, Goat-Pan, was, according to some, a being distinct from Pan, while others regard him as identical with Pan. His story appears to be of late origin. [PAN.]

Aegiplanctus Mons (τὸ Αἰγίπλαγκτον ὄρος), a mountain in Megaris.

Aegīra (Αἴγειρα: Αἰγειράτης), formerly Hyperesia (Ὑπερησία), a town in Achaia on a steep hill, with a sea-port about 12 stadia from the town. [AEGAE, No. 1.]

Aegirūssa (Αἰγιρόεσσα, Αἰγιροῦσσα), one of the 12 cities of AEOLIS in Asia Minor.

Aegisthus (Αἴγισθος), son of Thyestes, who unwittingly begot him by his own daughter Pelopia. Immediately after his birth he was exposed, but was saved by shepherds and suckled by a goat (αἴξ), whence his name. His uncle Atreus brought him up as his son. When Pelopia lay with her father, she took from him his sword, which she afterwards gave to Aegisthus. This sword was the means of revealing the crime of Thyestes, and Pelopia thereupon put an end to her own life. Aegisthus murdered Atreus, because he had ordered him to slay his father Thyestes, and he placed Thyestes upon the throne, of which he had been deprived by Atreus. Homer appears to know nothing of these tragic events; and we learn from him only that Aegisthus succeeded his father Thyestes in a part of his dominions. According to Homer Aegisthus took no part in the Trojan war, and during the absence of Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, Aegisthus seduced his wife Clytemnestra. Aegisthus murdered Agamemnon on his return home, and reigned 7 years over Mycenae. In the 8th Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, avenged the death of his father by putting the adulterer to death. [AGAMEMNON, CLYTEMNESTRA, ORESTES.]

Aegithallus (Αἰγίθαλλος; C. di S. Teodoro), a promontory in Sicily, between Lilybaeum and Drepanum, near which was the town Aegithallum.

Aegitium (Αἰγίτιον), a town in Aetolia, on the borders of Locris.

Aegium (Αἴγιον: Αἰγιεύς: Vostitza), a town of Achaia, and the capital after the destruction of Helice. The meetings of the Achaean league were held at Aegium in a grove of Zeus called Homarium.

Aeglē (Αἴγλη), that is "Brightness" or "Splendour," is the name of several mythological females, such as, 1. The daughter of Zeus and Neaera, the most beautiful of the Naiads;—2. A sister of Phaëton;—3. One of the Hesperides;—4. A nymph beloved by Theseus, for whom he forsook Ariadne;—5. One of the daughters of Aesculapius.

Aeglētes (Αἰγλήτης), that is, the radiant god, a surname of Apollo.

Aegŏcĕrus (Αἰγόκερως), a surname of Pan, descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, but more commonly the name of one of the signs of the Zodiac, Capricornus.

Aegos-Pŏtămos (Αἰγὸς ποταμός), the "goat's-river," a small river, with a town of the same name on it, in the Thracian Chersonesus, flows into the Hellespont. Here the Athenians were defeated by Lysander, B. C. 405.

Aegosthĕna (Αἰγόσθενα: Αἰγοσθενεύς, Αἰγοσθενίτης), a town in Megaris on the borders of Boeotia, with a sanctuary of Melampus.

Aegus and Roscillus, two chiefs of the Allobroges, who had served Caesar with fidelity in the Gallic war, deserted to Pompey in Greece (B. C. 48).

Aegūsa. [AEGATES.]

Aegypsus or Aegy̆sus, a town of Moesia on the Danube.

Aegyptus (Αἴγυπτος), son of Belus and Anchinoe or Achiroe, and twin-brother of Danaus. Belus assigned Libya to Danaus, and Arabia to Aegyptus, but the latter subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Aegypt after his own name. Aegyptus by his several wives had 50 sons, and his brother Danaus 50 daughters. Danaus had reason to fear the sons of his brother, and fled with his daughters to Argos in Peloponnesus. Thither he was followed by the sons of Aegyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives, and promised faithful alliance. Danaus complied with their request, and distributed his daughters among them, but to each of them he gave a dagger, with which they were to kill their husbands in the bridal night. All the sons of Aegyptus were thus murdered, with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. The Danaids buried the heads of their murdered husbands in Lerna, and their bodies outside the town, and were afterwards purified of their crime by Athena and Hermes at the command of Zeus.

Aegyptus (ἡ Αἴγυπτος : Αἰγύπτιος, Aegyptius: Egypt), a country in the N.E. corner of Africa, bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean, on the E. by Palestine, Arabia Petraea, and the Red Sea, on the S. by Ethiopia, the division between the two countries being at the First or Little Cataract of the Nile, close to Syene (Assouan; Lat. 24° 8′), and on the W. by the Great Libyan Desert. This is the extent usually assigned to the country; but it would be more strictly correct to define it as that part of the basin of the Nile which lies below the First Cataract. — 1. Physical Description of Egypt. The river Nile, flowing from S. to N. through a narrow valley, encounters, in Lat. 24° 8′, a natural barrier, composed of two islands (Philae and Elephantine) and between them a bed of sunken rocks, by which it is made to fall in a series of cataracts, or rather rapids (τὰ Κατάδουπα, ὁ μικρὸς Καταῤῥάκτης, Catarrhactes Minor, comp. CATARRHACTES), which have always been regarded as the southern limit assigned by nature to Egypt. The river flows due N. between two ranges of hills, so near each other as to leave scarcely any cultivable land, as far as Silsilis (Jebel Selseleh), about 40 miles below Syene, where the valley is enlarged by the W. range of hills retiring from the river. Thus the Nile flows for about 500 miles, through a valley whose average breadth is about 7 miles, between hills which in one place (W. of Thebes) attain the height of 1000 or 1200 feet above the sea, to a point some few miles below Memphis, where the W. range of hills runs to the N. W., and the E. range strikes off to the E., and the river divides into branches (seven in ancient time, but now only two), which flow through a low alluvial land, called, from its shape, the Delta, into the Mediterranean. To this valley and Delta must be added the country round the great natural lake Moeris (Birket-el-Keroun), called Nomos Arsinoïtes (Faioum), lying N. W. of Heracleopolis, and connected with the valley of the Nile by a break in the W. range of hills. The whole district thus described is periodically laid under water by the overflowing of the Nile from April to October. The river, in subsiding, leaves behind a rich deposit of fine mud, which forms the soil of Egypt. All beyond the reach of the inundation is rock or sand. Hence Egypt was called the "Gift of the Nile." The extent of the cultivable land of Egypt is in the Delta about 4500 square miles, in the valley about 2255, in Faioum about 340, and in all about 7095 square miles. The outlying portions of ancient Egypt consisted of 3 cultivable valleys (called Oases), in the midst of the Western or Libyan Desert, a valley in the W. range of hills on the W. of the Delta, called Nomos Nitriotes from the Natron Lakes which it contains, some settlements on the coast of the Red Sea and in the mountain passes between it and the Nile, and a strip of coast on the Mediterranean, extending E. as far as Rhinocolura (El-Arish), and W. as far (according to some of the ancients) as the Catabathmus Magnus (Long. about 25° 10′ E.). The only river of Egypt is the Nile [NILUS]. A great artificial canal (Bahr-Yussouf, i. e. Joseph's Canal) runs parallel to the river, at the distance of about 6 miles, from Diospolis Parva in the Thebais to a point on the W. mouth of the river about half-way between Memphis and the sea. Many smaller canals were cut to regulate the irrigation of the country. A canal from the E. mouth of the Nile to the head of the Red Sea was commenced under the native kings, and finished by Darius, son of Hystaspes. There were several lakes in the country, respecting which see MOERIS, MAREOTIS, BUTOS, TANIS, SIRBONIS, and LACUS AMARI. — 2. Ancient History. At the earliest period, to which civil history reaches back, Egypt was inhabited by a highly civilized agricultural people, under a settled monarchical government, divided into castes, the highest of which was composed of the priests, who were the ministers of a religion based on a pantheistic worship of nature, and having for its sacred symbols not only images but also living animals and even plants. The priests were also in possession of all the literature and science of the country and all the employments based upon such knowledge. The other castes were, 2nd, the soldiers, 3rd, the husbandmen, 4th, the artificers and tradesmen, and last, held in great contempt, the shepherds or herdsmen, poulterers, fishermen, and servants. The Egyptians possessed a written language, which appears to have had affinities with both the great families of Language, the Semitic and the Indo-European; and the priestly caste had, moreover, the exclusive knowledge of a sacred system of writing, the characters of which are known by the name of Hieroglyphics, in contradistinction to which the common characters are called Enchorial (i. e. of the country). They were acquainted with all the processes of manufacture which are essential to a highly civilized community: they had made great advances in the fine arts, especially architecture and sculpture (for in painting their progress was impeded by a want of knowledge of perspective): they were deterred from commercial enterprize by the policy of the priests, but they obtained foreign productions to a great extent, chiefly through the Phoenicians, and at a later period they engaged in maritime expeditions: in science they do not seem to have advanced so far as some have thought, but their religion led them to cultivate astronomy and its application to chronology, and the nature of their country made a knowledge of geometry (in its literal sense) indispensable, and their application of its principles to architecture is attested by their extant edifices. There can be little doubt that the origin of this remarkable people and of their early civilization is to be traced to the same Asiatic source as the early civilization of Assyria and India. The ancient history of Egypt may be divided into 4 great periods:—(1) From the earliest times to its conquest by Cambyses; during which it was ruled by a succession of native princes, into the difficulties of whose history this is not the place to inquire. The last of them, Psammenitus, was conquered and dethroned by Cambyses in B. C. 525, when Egypt became a province of the Persian empire. During this period Egypt was but little known to the Greeks. The Homeric poems show some slight acquaintance with the country and its river (which is also called Αἴγυπτος, Od. xiv. 25), and refer to the wealth and splendour of "Thebes with the Hundred Gates." In the latter part of the period learned men among the Greeks began to travel to Egypt for the sake of studying its institutions: among others it was visited by Pythagoras, Thales, and Solon. (2) From the Persian conquest in B. C. 525, to the transference of their dominion to the Macedonians in B. C. 332. This period was one of almost constant struggles between the Egyptians and their conquerors, until B. C. 340, when Nectanebo II., the last native ruler of Egypt, was defeated by Darius Ochus. It was during this period that the Greeks acquired a considerable knowledge of Egypt. In the wars between Egypt and Persia, the two leading states of Athens and Sparta at different times assisted the Egyptians, according to the state of their relations to each other and to Persia; and, during the intervals of those wars, Egypt was visited by Greek historians and philosophers, such as Hellanicus, Herodotus, Anaxagoras, Plato, and others, who brought back to Greece the knowledge of the country which they acquired from the priests and through personal observation. (3) The dynasty of Macedonian kings, from the accession of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, in B. C. 323, down to B. C. 30, when Egypt became a province of the Roman empire. When Alexander invaded Egypt in B. C. 332, the country submitted to him without a struggle; and, while he left it behind him to return to the conquest of Persia, he conferred upon it the greatest benefit that was in his power, by giving orders for the building of Alexandria. In the partition of the empire of Alexander after his death in B. C. 323, Egypt fell to the share of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who assumed the title of king in B. C. 306, and founded the dynasty of the Ptolemies, under whom the country greatly flourished, and became the chief seat of Greek learning. But soon came the period of decline. Wars with the adjacent kingdom of Syria, and the vices, weaknesses, and dissensions of the royal family, wore out the state, till in B. C. 81 the Romans were called upon to interfere in the disputes for the crown, and in B. C. 55 the dynasty of the Ptolemies came to be entirely dependent on Roman protection, and, at last, after the battle of Actium and the death of Cleopatra, who was the last of the Ptolemies, Egypt was made a Roman province, B. C. 30. (4) Egypt under the Romans, down to its conquest by the Arabs in A. D. 638. As a Roman province, Egypt was one of the most flourishing portions of the empire. The fertility of its soil, and its position between Europe and Arabia and India, together with the possession of such a port as Alexandria, gave it the full benefit of the two great sources of wealth, agriculture and commerce. Learning continued to flourish at Alexandria, and the patriarchs of the Christian Church in that city became so powerful as to contend for supremacy with those of Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome, while a succession of teachers, such as Origen and Clement of Alexandria, conferred real lustre on the ecclesiastical annals of the country. When the Arabs made their great inroad upon the Eastern empire, the geographical position of Egypt naturally caused it to fall an immediate victim to that attack, which its wealth and the peaceful character of its inhabitants invited. It was conquered by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, in A. D. 638. — 3. Political Geography. — From the earliest times the country was divided into (1) The Delta or Lower Egypt (τὸ Δέλτα, ἡ κάτω χώρα, El-Bahari, El-Kebit) (2) The Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, Ἑπτανομίς, ἡ μεταξὺ χώρα, Mesr Mostani); (3) The Thebaïs, or Upper Egypt (Θηβαΐς, ἡ ἄνω χώρα, Said): and it was further subdivided into 36 nomes or governments. Respecting the Oases, see OASIS.

Aegys (Αἶγυς, Αἰγύτης: nr. Ghiorgitza), a town of Laconia on the borders of Arcadia.

Aelāna (Αἴλανα: Αἰλανίτης), a town on the northern arm of the Red Sea, near the Bahr-el-Akaba, which was called by the Greeks Aelanītes from the name of the town. It is the Elath of the Hebrews, and one of the sea-ports of which Solomon possessed himself.

Aelĭa Gens, plebeian, the members of which are given under their surnames, GALLUS, LAMIA, PAETUS, SEJANUS, STILO, TUBERO.

Aelĭa, a name given to Jerusalem after its restoration by the Roman emperor Aelius Hadrianus.

Aeliānus, Claudĭus, was born at Praeneste in Italy, and lived at Rome about the middle of the 3rd century of the Christian era. Though an Italian, he spoke and wrote Greek as well as a native Athenian. He never married, and lived to the age of 60. Two of his works have come down to us: one a collection of miscellaneous history (Ποικίλη Ἱστορία) in 14 books, commonly called Varia Historia; and the other a work on the peculiarities of animals (Περὶ Ζώων Ἰδιότητος) in 17 books, commonly called De Animalium Natura. The former work contains short narrations and anecdotes, historical, biographical, antiquarian, &c., selected from various authors, generally without their names being given, and on a great variety of subjects. The latter work is of the same kind, scrappy and gossipping. It is partly collected from older writers, and partly the result of his own observations both in Italy and abroad. There are also attributed to him 20 letters on husbandry (Ἀγροικικαὶ Ἐπιστολαί), written in a rhetorical style and of no value.—Editions. Of the Varia Historia, by Perizonius, Leyden, 1701; by Gronovius, Leyden, 1731; and by Kühn, Leipzig, 1780. Of the De Animalium Natura, by Gronovius, Lond. 1744; by J. Schneider, Leipzig, 1784; and by Fr. Jacobs, Jena, 1832. Of the Letters, by Aldus Manutius, in his Collectio Epistolarum Graecarum, Venice, 1499, 4to.

Aeliānus Meccĭus, an ancient physician, who must have lived in the 2nd century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galen as the oldest of his tutors.

Aeliānus Tactĭcus, a Greek writer, who lived in Rome and wrote a work on the Military Tactics of the Greeks (Περὶ Στρατηγικῶν Τάξεων Ἑλληνικῶν), dedicated to the emperor Hadrian. He also gives a brief account of the constitution of a Roman army at that time. —Editions. By Franciscus Robortellus, Venice, 1552; and by Elzevir, Leyden, 1613.

Aello, one of the Harpies. [HARPYIAE.]

Aellŏpus (Ἀελλόπους), a surname of Iris, the messenger of the gods, by which she is described as swift-footed as a storm-wind.

Aemilĭa. 1. The 3rd daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, who fell in the battle of Cannae, was the wife of Scipio Africanus I. and the mother of the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi. — 2. Aemilia Lepida. [LEPIDA.] —3. A Vestal virgin, put to death B. C. 114 for having committed incest upon several occasions.

Aemĭlia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, said to have been descended from Mamercus, who received the name of Aemilius on account of the persuasiveness of his language (δι' αἱμυλίαν λόγου). This Mamercus is represented by some as the son of Pythagoras, and by others as the son of Numa. The most distinguished members of the gens are given under their surnames Barbula, Lepidus, Mamercus or Mamercinus, Papus, Paulus, Regillus, Scaurus.

Aemĭlia Via, made by M. Aemilius Lepidus, cos. B. C. 187, continued the Via Flaminia from Ariminum, and traversed the heart of Cisalpine Gaul through Bononia, Mutina, Parma, Placentia (where it crossed the Po) to Mediolanum. It was subsequently continued as far as Aquileia.

Aemĭliānus. 1. The son of L. Aemilius Paulus Macedonicus, was adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and was thus called P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africanus. [Scipio.] — 2. The governor of Pannonia and Moesia in the reign of Gallus, was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in A. D. 253, but was slain by them after reigning a few months. — 3. One of the 30 tyrants (A. D. 259—268), assumed the purple in Egypt, but was taken prisoner and strangled by order of Gallienus.

Aemilius Probus. [Nepos, Cornelius.]

Aemōna or Emōna (Laibach), a fortified town in Pannonia, and an important Roman colony, said to have been built by the Argonauts.

Aenārĭa, also called Pithēcūsa and Inărĭme (Ischia), a volcanic island off the coast of Campania, at the entrance of the bay of Naples, under which the Roman poets represented Typhoeus as lying.

Aenēa (Αἴνεια: Αἰνειεύς, Αἰνειάτης), a town in Chalcidice, on the Thermaic gulf.

Aeneădes (Αἰνειάδης), a patronymic from Aeneas, given to his son Ascanius or Iulus, and to those who were believed to be descended from him, such as Augustus, and the Romans in general.

Aenēas (Αἰνείας). 1. Homeric Story. Aeneas was the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, and born on mount Ida. On his father's side he was a great-grandson of Tros, and thus nearly related to the royal house of Troy, as Priam himself was a grandson of Tros. He was educated from his infancy at Dardanus, in the house of Alcathous, the husband of his sister. At first he took no part in the Trojan war; and it was not till Achilles attacked him on mount Ida, and drove away his flocks, that he led his Dardanians against the Greeks. Henceforth he and Hector are the great bulwarks of the Trojans against the Greeks, and Aeneas appears beloved by gods and men. On more than one occasion he is saved in battle by the gods: Aphrodite carried him off when he was wounded by Diomedes, and Poseidon, when he was on the point of perishing by the hands of Achilles. Homer makes no allusion to the emigration of Aeneas after the capture of Troy, but on the contrary he evidently conceives Aeneas and his descendants as reigning at Troy after the extinction of the house of Priam. — Later Stories. The later stories present the greatest variations respecting the conduct of Aeneas at the capture of Troy and in the events immediately following. Most accounts, however, agree that after the city had fallen, he withdrew to mount Ida with his friends and the images of the gods, especially that of Pallas (Palladium); and that from thence he crossed over to Europe, and finally settled at Latium in Italy, where he became the ancestral hero of the Romans. A description of the wanderings of Aeneas before he reached Latium, and of the various towns and temples he was believed to have founded during his wanderings, is given by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 50, &c.), whose account is on the whole the same as the one followed by Virgil in his Aeneid, although the latter makes various embellishments and additions, some of which, such as his landing at Carthage and meeting with Dido, are irreconcilable with mythical chronology. From Pallene, where Aeneas stayed the winter after the taking of Troy, he sailed with his companions to Delos, Cythera, Boiae in Laconia, Zacynthus, Leucas, Actium, Ambracia, and to Dodona, where he met the Trojan Helenus. From Epirus he sailed across the Ionian sea to Italy, where he landed at the Iapygian promontory. Thence he crossed over to Sicily, where he met the Trojans, Elymus and Aegestus (Acestes), and built the towns of Elyme and Aegesta. From Sicily he sailed back to Italy, landed in the port of Palinurus, came to the island of Leucasia, and at last to the coast of Latium. Various signs pointed out this place as the end of his wanderings, and he and his Trojans accordingly settled in Latium. The place where they had landed was called Troy. Latinus, king of the Aborigines, prepared for war, but afterwards concluded an alliance with the strangers, gave up to them part of his dominions, and with their assistance conquered the Rutulians. Aeneas founded the town of Lavinium, called after Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, whom he married. A new war then followed between Latinus and Turnus, in which both chiefs fell, whereupon Aeneas became sole ruler of the Aborigines and Trojans, and both nations were united into one. Soon after this Aeneas fell in a battle with the Rutulians, who were assisted by Mezentius, king of the Etruscans. As his body was not found after the battle, it was believed that it had been carried up to heaven, or that he had perished in the river Numicius. The Latins erected a monument to him, with the inscription To the father and native god. Virgil represents Aeneas landing in Italy 7 years after the fall of Troy, and comprises all the events in Italy from the landing to the death of Turnus, within the space of 20 days. The story of the descent of the Romans from the Trojans through Aeneas was believed at an early period, but probably rests on no historical foundation. — 2. Aenēas Silvius, son of Silvius, and grandson of Ascanius, is the 3rd in the list of the mythical kings of Alba in Latium: the Silvii regarded him as the founder of their house.

Aenēas Gazaeus, so called from Gaza, his birthplace, flourished A. D. 487. He was at first a Platonist and a Sophist, but afterwards became a Christian, when he composed a dialogue, On the Immortality of the Soul, called Theophrastus. — Editions. By Barthius, Lips. 1655; by Boissonade, Par. 1836.

Aenēas Tactĭcus, a Greek writer, may be the same as the Aeneas of Stymphalus, the general of the Arcadians, B. C. 362 (Xen. Hell. vii. 3. § 1); and he probably lived about that period. He wrote a work on the art of war, of which a portion only is preserved, commonly called Commentarius Poliorceticus, showing how a siege should be resisted. An epitome of the whole book was made by Cineas.

Aenēsĭdēmus (Αἰνησίδημος), a celebrated sceptic, born at Cnossus in Crete, probably lived a little later than Cicero. He differed on many points from the ordinary sceptics. The grand peculiarity of his system was the attempt to unite scepticism with the earlier philosophy, to raise a positive foundation for it by accounting from the nature of things for the never-ceasing changes both in the material and spiritual world. None of the works of Aenesidemus have come down to us. To them Sextus Empiricus was indebted for a considerable part of his work.

Aeniānes (Αἰνιᾶνες, Ion. Ἐνιῆνες), an ancient Greek race, originally near Ossa, afterwards in southern Thessaly, between Oeta and Othrys, on the banks of the Sperchēus.

Aenus (Αἶνος: Αἴνιος, Αἰνιάτης: Eno), an ancient town in Thrace, near the mouth of the Hebrus, mentioned in the Iliad. It was colonized by the Aeolians of Asia Minor. Virgil (Aen. iii. 18) supposes Aenos to have been built by Aeneas, but he confounds it with Aenea in Chalcidice. Under the Romans Aenos was a free town, and a place of importance.

Aenus (Inn) a river in Rhaetia, the boundary between Rhaetia and Noricum.

Aeŏles or Aeŏlii (Αἰολεῖς), one of the chief branches of the Hellenic race, supposed to be descended from Aeolus, the son of Hellen. [Aeolus, No. 1.] They originally dwelt in Thessaly, from whence they spread over various parts of Greece, and also settled in Aeolis in Asia Minor, and in the island of Lesbos.

Aeŏlĭae Insŭlae (αἱ Αἰόλου νῆσοι: Lipari Islands), a group of islands N. E. of Sicily, where Aeolus, the god of the winds, reigned. Homer (Od. x. 1) mentions only one Aeolian island, and Virgil (Aen. i. 52) accordingly speaks of only one Aeolia (sc. insula), where Aeolus reigned, supposed to be Strongyle or Lipara. These islands were also called Hephaestiădes or Vulcāniae, because Hephaestus or Vulcan was supposed to have had his workshop in one of them called Hiera. (Virg. Aen. viii. 415, seq.) They were also named Lipărenses, from Lipăra, the largest of them. The names of these islands were, Lipăra (Lipari); Hiĕra (Volcano); Strongўle (Stromboli); Phoenicūsa (Felicudi); Ericūsa (Alicudi); Euonymus (Panaria); Didyme (Salina); Hicesia (Lisca Bianca); Basilidia (Basilizzo); Osteodes (Ustica).

Aeŏlĭdes (Αἰολίδης), a patronymic given to the sons of Aeolus, as Athamas, Cretheus, Sisyphus, Salmoneus, &c., and to his grandsons, as Cephalus, Ulysses and Phrixus. Aeolis is the patronymic of the female descendants of Aeolus, given to his daughters Canace and Alcyone.

Aeŏlis (Αἰολίς) or Aeŏlĭa, a district of Mysia in Asia Minor, was peopled by Aeolian Greeks, whose cities extended from the Troad along the shores of the Aegaean to the river Hermus. In early times their 12 most important cities were independent and formed a League, the members of which celebrated an annual festival (Panaeolium) at Smyrna. The 12 cities comprising this League were Cyme, Larissae, Neontīchos, Temnus, Cilla, Notium, Aegirūsa, Pitane, Aegaeae, Myrina, Grynēa, and Smyrna; but Smyrna subsequently became a member of the Ionian confederacy. (Herod. i. 149, seq.) These cities were subdued by Croesus, and were incorporated in the Persian empire on the conquest of Croesus by Cyrus.

Aeŏlus (Αἴολος). 1. Son of Hellen and the nymph Orseïs, and brother of Dorus and Xuthus. He was the ruler of Thessaly, and the founder of the Aeolic branch of the Greek nation. His children are said to have been very numerous; but the most ancient story mentioned only four sons, viz. Sisyphus, Athamas, Cretheus, and Salmoneus. The great extent of country which this race occupied probably gave rise to the varying accounts about the number of his children. — 2. Son of Hippotes, or, according to others, of Poseidon and Arne, a descendant of the previous Aeolus. His story probably refers to the emigration of a branch of the Aeolians to the west. His mother was carried to Metapontum in Italy, where she gave birth to Aeolus and his brother Boeotus. The two brothers afterwards fled from Metapontum, and Aeolus went to some islands in the Tyrrhenian sea, which received from him the name of the Aeolian islands. Here he reigned as a just and pious king, taught the natives the use of sails for ships, and foretold them the nature of the winds that were to rise. In these accounts Aeolus, the father of the Aeolian race, is placed in relationship with Aeolus the ruler and god of the winds. In Homer, however, Aeolus, the son of Hippotes, is neither the god nor the father of the winds, but merely the happy ruler of the Aeolian island, to whom Zeus had given dominion over the winds, which he might soothe or excite according to his pleasure. (Od. x. 1, seq.) This statement of Homer and the etymology of the name of Aeolus from ἀέλλω led to Aeolus being regarded in later times as the god and king of the winds, which he kept enclosed in a mountain. It is therefore to him that Juno applies when she wishes to destroy the fleet of the Trojans. (Virg. Aen. i. 78.) The Aeolian island of Homer was in later times believed to be Lipara or Strongyle, and was accordingly regarded as the place in which the god of the winds dwelt. [Aeoliae Insulae.]

Aepēa (Αἴπεια: Αἰπεάτης). 1. A town in Messenia on the sea-coast, afterwards Thuria.—2. A town in Cyprus, afterwards Soli.

Aepy (Αἶπυ), a town in Elis, situated on a height, as its name indicates.

Aepўtus (Αἴπυτος). 1. A mythical king of Arcadia, from whom a part of the country was called Aepytis. — 2. Youngest son of the Heraclid Cresphontes, king of Messenia, and of Merope, daughter of the Arcadian king Cypselus. When his father aud brothers were murdered during an insurrection, Aepytus alone, who was with his grandfather Cypselus, escaped the danger. The throne of Cresphontes was in the meantime occupied by the Heraclid Polyphontes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. When Aepytus had grown to manhood, he returned to his kingdom, and put Polyphontes to death. From him the kings of Messenia were called Aepytids instead of the more general name Heraclids. — 3. Son of Hippothous, king of Arcadia, and great-grandson of the Aepytus mentioned first.

Aequi, Aequĭcŏli, Aequĭcŏlae, Aequĭcŭlāni, an ancient warlike people of Italy, dwelling in the upper valley of the Anio in the mountains forming the eastern boundary of Latium, and between the Latini, Sabini, Hernici, and Marsi. In conjunction with the Volsci, who were of the same race, they carried on constant hostilities with Rome, but were finally subdued in B. C. 302. One of their chief seats was Mount Algidus, from which they were accustomed to make their marauding expeditions.

Aequi Falisci. [FALERII.]

Aequimaelĭum. [MAELIUS.]

Aërŏpē (Ἀερόπη), daughter of Catreus, king of Crete, and granddaughter of Minos. Her father, who had received an oracle that he should lose his life by one of his children, gave her and her sister Clymene to Nauplius, who was to sell them in a foreign land. Aerope married Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, and became by him the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus. After the death of Plisthenes Aerope married Atreus; and her two sons, who were educated by Atreus, were generally believed to be his sons. Aerope was faithless to Atreus, being seduced by Thyestes.

Aesăcus (Αἴσακος), son of Priam and Alexirrhoë. He lived far from his father's court in the solitude of mountain-forests. Hesperia, however, the daughter of Cebren, kindled love in his heart, and on one occasion while he was pursuing her, she was stung by a viper and died. Aesacus in his grief threw himself into the sea and was changed by Thetis into an aquatic bird. This is the story related by Ovid (Met. xi. 750), but it is told differently by Apollodorus.

Aesar, the name of the deity among the Etruscans.

Aesar or Aesărus (Esaro), a river near Croton in Bruttii, in southern Italy.

Aeschĭnes (Αἰσχίνης). 1. The Athenian orator born B. C. 389, was the son of Atrometus and Glaucothea. According to Demosthenes, his political antagonist, his parents were of disreputable character and not even citizens of Athens; but Aeschines himself says that his father was descended from an honourable family, and lost his property during the Peloponnesian war. In his youth Aeschines appears to have assisted his father in his school; he next acted as secretary to Aristophon, and afterwards to Eubulus; he subsequently tried his fortune as an actor, but was unsuccessful; and at length, after serving with distinction in the army, came forward as a public speaker and soon acquired great reputation. In 347 he was sent along with Demosthenes as one of the 10 ambassadors to negotiate a peace with Philip: from this time he appears as the friend of the Macedonian party and as the opponent of Demosthenes. Shortly afterwards Aeschines formed one of the second embassy sent to Philip to receive the oath of Philip to the treaty which had been concluded with the Athenians; but as the delay of the ambassadors in obtaining the ratification had been favourable to the interests of Philip, Aeschines on his return to Athens was accused by Timarchus. He evaded the danger by bringing forward a counter-accusation against Timarchus (345), and by showing that the moral conduct of his accuser was such that he had no right to speak before the people. The speech in which Aeschines attacked Timarchus is still extant: Timarchus was condemned and Aeschines gained a brilliant triumph. In 343 Demosthenes renewed the charge against Aeschines of treachery during his second embassy to Philip. This charge of Demosthenes (περὶ παραπρεσβείας) was not spoken, but published as a memorial, and Aeschines answered it in a similar memorial on the embassy (περὶ παραπρεσβείας), which was likewise published. Shortly after the battle of Chaeronēa in 338, which gave Philip the supremacy in Greece, Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre at the great Dionysia. Aeschines in consequence accused Ctesiphon; but he did not prosecute the charge till 8 years later, 330. The speech which he delivered on the occasion is extant, and was answered by Demosthenes in his celebrated oration on the crown (περὶ στεφάνου). Aeschines was defeated, and withdrew from Athens. He went to Asia Minor, and at length established a school of eloquence at Rhodes. On one occasion he read to his audience in Rhodes his speech against Ctesiphon, and when some of his hearers expressed their astonishment at his defeat, he replied, "You would cease to be astonished if you had heard Demosthenes." From Rhodes he went to Samos, where he died in 314. Besides the 3 orations extant, we also possess 12 letters which are ascribed to Aeschines, but which are the work of late sophists.—Editions. In the editions of the Attic orators [DEMOSTHENES], and by Bremi, Zurich, 1823. — 2. An Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, and a disciple of Socrates. After the death of his master, he went to Syracuse; but returned to Athens after the expulsion of Dionysius, and supported himself, receiving money for his instructions. He wrote several dialogues, but the 3 which have come down to us under his name are not genuine. — Editions. By Fischer, Lips. 1786; by Böckh, Heidel. 1810; and in many editions of Plato. — 3. Of Neapolis, a Peripatetic philosopher, who was at the head of the Academy at Athens, together with Charmades and Clitomachus about B. C. 109. — 4. Of Miletus, a contemporary of Cicero, and a distinguished orator in the Asiatic style of eloquence.

Aeschrĭon (Αἰσχρίων). 1. Of Syracuse, whose wife Pippa was one of the mistresses of Verres, and who was himself one of the scandalous instruments of Verres. — 2. An iambic poet, a native of Samos. There was an epic poet of the same name, who was a native of Mytilene and a pupil of Aristotle, and who accompanied Alexander on some of his expeditions. He may perhaps be the same person as the Samian. — 3. A native of Pergamus, and a physician in the second century after Christ, was one of Galen's tutors.

Aeschўlus (Αἰσχύλος). 1. The celebrated tragic poet, was born at Eleusis in Attica, B. C. 525, so that he was 35 years of age at the time of the battle of Marathon, and contemporary with Simonides and Pindar. His father Euphorion was probably connected with the worship of Demeter, and Aeschylus himself was, according to some authorities, initiated in the mysteries of this goddess. At the age of 25 (B. C. 499), he made his first appearance as a competitor for the prize of tragedy, without being successful. He fought with his brothers Cynaegīrus and Aminius, at the battle of Marathon (490), and also at those of Salamis (480) and Plataea (479). In 484 he gained the prize of tragedy; and in 472 he gained the prize with the trilogy, of which the Persae, the earliest of his extant dramas, was one piece. In 468 he was defeated in a tragic contest by his younger rival Sophocles; and he is said in consequence to have quitted Athens in disgust, and to have gone to the court of Hiero, king of Syracuse, where he found Simonides the lyric poet. In 467, his friend and patron king Hiero died; and in 458, it appears that Aeschylus was again at Athens, from the fact that the trilogy of the Oresteia was produced in that year. In the same or the following year, he again visited Sicily, and he died at Gela in 456, in the 69th year of his age. It is said that an eagle, mistaking the poet's bald head for a stone, let a tortoise fall upon it to break the shell, and so fulfilled an oracle, according to which Aeschylus was fated to die by a blow from heaven. The alterations made by Aeschylus in the composition and dramatic representation of Tragedy were so great, that he was considered by the Athenians as the father of it, just as Homer was of Epic poetry and Herodotus of History. Even the improvements and alterations introduced by his successors were the natural results and suggestions of those of Aeschylus. The first and principal alteration which he made was the introduction of a second actor (δευτεραγωνιστής), and the consequent formation of the dialogue properly so called, and the limitation of the choral parts. This innovation was of course adopted by his contemporaries, just as Aeschylus himself followed the example of Sophocles, in subsequently introducing a third actor. But the improvements of Aeschylus were not limited to the composition of tragedy: he added the resources of art in its exhibition. Thus, he is said to have availed himself of the skill of Agatharchus, who painted for him the first scenes which had ever been drawn according to the principles of linear perspective. He also furnished his actors with more suitable and magnificent dresses, with significant and various masks, and with the thick-soled cothurnus, to raise their stature to the height of heroes. He moreover bestowed so much attention on the choral dances, that he is said to have invented various figures himself, and to have instructed the choristers in them without the aid of the regular ballet-masters. With him also arose the usage of representing at the same time a trilogy of plays connected in subject, so that each formed one act, as it were, of a great whole, which might be compared with some of Shakspeare's historical plays. Even before the time of Aeschylus, it had been customary to contend for the prize of tragedy with 3 plays exhibited at the same time, but it was reserved for him to show how each of 3 tragedies might be complete in itself, and independent of the rest, and nevertheless form a part of an harmonious and connected whole. The only example still extant of such a trilogy is the Oresteia, as it was called. A satyrical play commonly followed each tragic trilogy. Aeschylus is said to have written 70 tragedies. Of these only 7 are extant, namely, the Persians, the Seven against Thebes, the Suppliants, the Prometheus, the Agamemnon, the Choephori, and Eumenides; the last three forming, as already remarked, the trilogy of the Oresteia. The Persians was acted in 472, and the Seven against Thebes a year afterwards. The Oresteia was represented in 458; the Suppliants and the Prometheus were brought out some time between the Seven against Thebes and the Oresteia. It has been supposed from some allusions in the Suppliants, that this play was acted in 461, when Athens was allied with Argos.—Editions. By Wellauer, Lips. 1823, W. Dindorf, Lips. 1827, and Scholefield, Camb. 1830.

Aescŭlāpĭus (Ἀσκληπιός), the god of the medical art. In the Homeric poems Aesculapius is not a divinity, but simply the "blameless physician" (ἰητὴρ ἀμύμων), whose sons, Machaon and Podalīrius, were the physicians in the Greek army, and ruled over Tricca, Ithome, and Oechalia. Homer says nothing of the descent of Aesculapius. The common story relates that he was a son of Apollo and Coronis, and that when Coronis was with child by Apollo, she became enamoured with Ischys, an Arcadian. Apollo, informed of this by a raven, which he had set to watch her, or, according to others, by his own prophetic powers, sent his sister Artemis to kill Coronis. Artemis accordingly destroyed Coronis in her own house at Lacerīa in Thessaly, on the shore of lake Baebia. According to Ovid (Met. ii. 605), it was Apollo himself who killed Coronis and Ischys. When the body of Coronis was to be burnt, either Apollo or Hermes saved the child Aesculapius from the flames, and carried it to Chiron, who instructed the boy in the art of healing and in hunting. There are various other narratives respecting his birth, according to some of which he was a native of Epidaurus, and this was a common opinion in later times. After he had grown up, reports spread over all countries, that he not only cured all the sick, but called the dead to life again. But while he was restoring Glaucus to life, Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning, as he feared lest men might contrive to escape death altogether, or, because Pluto had complained of Aesculapius diminishing the number of the dead. But, on the request of Apollo, Zeus placed Aesculapius among the stars. Aesculapius is also said to have taken part in the expedition of the Argonauts and in the Calydonian hunt. He was married to Epione, and besides the two sons spoken of by Homer, we also find mention of the following children of his: Ianiscus, Alexenor, Aratus, Hygieia, Aegle, Iaso, and Panaceia, most of whom are only personifications of the powers ascribed to their father. Aesculapius was worshipped all over Greece. His temples were usually built in healthy places, on hills outside the town, and near wells which were believed to have healing powers. These temples were not only places of worship, but were frequented by great numbers of sick persons, and may therefore be compared to modern hospitals. The principal seat of his worship in Greece was Epidaurus, where he had a temple surrounded with an extensive grove. Serpents were everywhere connected with his worship, probably because they were a symbol of prudence and renovation, and were believed to have the power of discovering herbs of wondrous powers. For these reasons, a peculiar kind of tame serpents, in which Epidaurus abounded, was not only kept in his temple, but the god himself frequently appeared in the form of a serpent. At Rome the worship of Aesculapius was introduced from Epidaurus at the command of the Delphic oracle or of the Sibylline books, in B. C. 293, for the purpose of averting a pestilence. The supposed descendants of Aesculapius were called by the patronymic name Asclepiadae (Ἀσκληπιάδαι), and their principal seats were Cos and Cnidus. They were an order or caste of priests, and for a long period the practice of medicine was intimately connected with religion. The knowledge of medicine was regarded as a sacred secret, which was transmitted from father to son in the families of the Asclepiadae. Respecting the festivals of Aesculapius, see Dict. of Antiq.

Aesēpus (Αἴσηπος), a river which rises in the mountains of Ida, and flows by a N. E. course into the Propontis, which it enters W. of Cyzicus and E. of the Granicus.

Aesernĭa (Aeserninus: Isernia), a town in Samnium, made a Roman colony in the first Punic war.

Aesis (Esino or Fiumesino), a river which formed the boundary between Picenum and Umbria, was anciently the S. boundary of the Senones, and the N.E. boundary of Italy proper.

Aesis or Aesium (Aesīnas: Jesi), a town and a Roman colony in Umbria on the river Aesis, celebrated for its cheese, Aesīnas caseus.

Aeson (Αἴσων), son of Cretheus, the founder of Iolcus, and of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, and father of Jason and Promachus. He was excluded from the throne by his half-brother Pelias, who endeavoured to keep the kingdom to himself by sending Jason away with the Argonauts. Pelias subsequently attempted to get rid of Aeson by force, but the latter put an end to his own life. According to Ovid (Met. vii. 162, seq.), Aeson survived the return of the Argonauts, and was made young again by Medea.

Aesōpus (Αἴσωπος). 1. A writer of Fables, lived about B.C. 570, and was a contemporary of Solon. He was originally a slave, and received his freedom from his master Iadmon the Samian. Upon this he visited Croesus, who sent him to Delphi, to distribute among the citizens 4 minae apiece; but in consequence of some dispute on the subject, he refused to give any money at all, upon which the enraged Delphians threw him from a precipice. Plagues were sent upon them from the gods for the offence, and they proclaimed their willingness to give a compensation for his death to any one who could claim it. At length Iadmon, the grandson of his old master, received the compensation, since no nearer connection could be found. A life of Aesop prefixed to a book of fables purporting to be his, and collected by Maximus Planudes, a monk of the 14th century, represents Aesop as a perfect monster of ugliness and deformity; a notion for which there is no authority whatever in the classical authors. Whether Aesop left any written works at all, is a question which affords considerable room for doubt; though it is certain that fables, bearing Aesop's name, were popular at Athens in its most intellectual age. We find them frequently noticed by Aristophanes. They were in prose, and were turned into poetry by several writers. Socrates turned some of them into verse during his imprisonment; and Demetrius Phalereus (B.C. 320) imitated his example. The only Greek versifier of Aesop, of whose writings any whole fables are preserved, is Babrius. [BABRIUS.] Of the Latin writers of Aesopean fables, Phaedrus is the most celebrated. [PHAEDRUS.] The fables now extant in prose, bearing the name of Aesop, are unquestionably spurious, as is proved by Bentley in his dissertation on the Fables of Aesop appended to his celebrated letters on Phalaris.—Editions. By Ernesti, Lips. 1781, and by Schaefer, Lips. 1820.—2. A Greek historian, who wrote a life of Alexander the Great. The original is lost, but there is a Latin translation of it by Julius VALERIUS.

Aesōpus, Claudĭus, or Clodĭus, was the greatest tragic actor at Rome, and a contemporary of Roscius, the greatest comic actor; and both of them lived on intimate terms with Cicero. Aesopus appeared for the last time on the stage at an advanced age at the dedication of the theatre of Pompey (B.C. 55), when his voice failed him, and he could not go through with the speech. Aesopus realized an immense fortune by his profession, which was squandered by his son, a foolish spendthrift. It is said, for instance, that he dissolved in vinegar and drank a pearl worth about 8000*l.*, which he took from the ear-ring of Caecilia Metella.

Aestii, Aestyi, or Aestui, a people dwelling on the sea-coast, in the N. E. of Germany, probably in the modern Kurland, who collected amber, which they called glessum. Their customs, says Tacitus, resembled the Suevic, and their language the British. They were probably a Sarmatian or Slavonic race, and not a Germanic.

Aesŭla (Aesŭlānus), a town of the Aequi on a mountain between Praeneste and Tibur. (Aesulae declive arvum," Hor. Carm. iii. 29.)

Aethālĭa (Αἰθαλία, Αἰθάλη), called Ilva (Elba) by the Romans, a small island in the Tuscan sea, opposite the town of Populonia, celebrated for its iron mines. It had on the N. E. a good harbour, "Argous Portus" (Porto Ferraio), in which the Argonaut Jason is said to have landed.

Aethălĭdes (Αἰθαλίδης), son of Hermes and Eupolemīa, the herald of the Argonauts. He had received from his father the faculty of remembering every thing, even in Hades, and was allowed to reside alternately in the upper and in the lower world. His soul, after many migrations, at length took possession of the body of Pythagoras, in which it still recollected its former migrations.

Aether (Αἰθήρ), a personified idea of the mythical cosmogonies, in which Aether was considered as one of the elementary substances out of which the Universe was formed. Aether was regarded by the poets as the pure upper air, the residence of the gods, and Zeus as the Lord of the Aether, or Aether itself personified.

Aethīces (Αἴθικες), a Thessalian or Epirot people, near M. Pindus.

Aethĭcus, Hister or Ister, a Roman writer of the 4th century after Christ, a native of Istria, the author of a geographical work, called Aethici Cosmographia, which appears to have been chiefly drawn up from the measurement of the whole Roman world ordered by Julius Caesar, B.C. 44, and from other official documents. Edited by Gronovius, in his edition of Pomponius Mela, Leyden, 1722.

Aethilla (Αἴθιλλα or Αἴθυλλα), daughter of Laomedon and sister of Priam, became after the fall of Troy the prisoner of Protesilaus.

Aethĭŏpes (Αἰθίοπες, said to be from αἴθω and ὤψ, but perhaps really a foreign name corrupted), was a name applied (1) most generally to all black or dark races of men; (2) to the inhabitants of all the regions S. of those with which the early Greeks were well acquainted, extending even as far N. as Cyprus and Phoenicia; (3) to all the inhabitants of Inner Africa, S. of Mauretania, the Great Desert, and Egypt, from the Atlantic to the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, and to some of the dark races of Asia; and (4) most specifically to the inhabitants of the land S. of Egypt, which was called AETHIOPIA.

Aethĭŏpĭa (Αἰθιοπία, Αἰθ. ὑπὲρ Αἰγύπτου: Αἰθίοψ, Αἰθιοπεύς, Hom., fem. Αἰθιοπίς, Aethiops: Nubia, Kordofan, Sennaar, Abyssinia), a country of Africa, S. of Egypt, the boundary of the countries being at Syene (Assouan) and the Smalier Cataract of the Nile, and extending on the E. to the Red Sea, and to the S. and S.W. indefinitely, as far apparently as the knowledge of the ancients extended. In its most exact political sense the word Aethiopia seems to have denoted the kingdom of MEROE; but in its wider sense it included also the kingdom of the AXOMITAE, besides several other peoples, such as the Troglodytes and the Ichthyophagi on the Red Sea, the Blemmyes and Megabari and Nubae in the interior. The country was watered by the Nile and its tributaries, the Astapus (Bahr-el-Azrek or Blue Nile) and the Astaboras (Atbara or Tacazze). The people of Ethiopia seem to have been of the Caucasian race, and to have spoken a language allied to the Arabic. Monuments are found in the country closely resembling those of Egypt, but of an inferior style. The religion of the Ethiopians appears to have been similar to that of the Egyptians, but free from the grosser superstitions of the latter, such as the worship of animals. Some traditions made Meroë the parent of Egyptian civilization, while others ascribed the civilization of Ethiopia to Egyptian colonization. So great was the power of the Ethiopians, that more than once in its history Egypt was governed by Ethiopian kings; and even the most powerful kings of Egypt, though they made successful incursions into Ethiopia, do not appear to have had any extensive or permanent hold upon the country. Under the Ptolemies Graeco-Egyptian colonies established themselves in Ethiopia, and Greek manners and philosophy had a considerable influence on the upper classes; but the country was never subdued. The Romans failed to extend their empire over Ethiopia, though they made expeditions into the country, in one of which C. Petronius, prefect of Egypt under Augustus, advanced as far as Napata, and defeated the warrior queen Candace (B. C. 22). Christianity very early extended to Ethiopia, probably in consequence of the conversion of the treasurer of queen Candace (Acts, viii. 27). The history of the downfall of the great Ethiopian kingdom of Meroë is very obscure.

Aethlĭus (Ἀέθλιος), first king of Elis, father of Endymion, was son of Zeus and Protogenīa, daughter of Deucalion, or son of Aeolus.

Aethra (Αἴθρα). 1. Daughter of Pittheus of Troezen, was mother of Theseus by Aegeus. She afterwards lived in Attica, from whence she was carried off to Lacedaemon by Castor and Pollux, and became a slave of Helen, with whom she was taken to Troy. At the capture of Troy she was restored to liberty by her grandson Acamas or Demophon. — 2. Daughter of Oceanus, by whom Atlas begot the 12 Hyades and a son Hyas.

Aĕtĭon (Ἀετίων). 1. A sculptor of Amphipolis, flourished about the middle of the 3rd century B. C. — 2. A celebrated painter, whose best picture represented the marriage of Alexander and Roxana. It is commonly supposed that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great; but the words of Lucian (Herod. 4) show that he must have lived about the time of Hadrian and the Antonines.

Aĕtĭus. 1. A celebrated Roman general, defended the Western empire against the barbarians during the reign of Valentinian III. In A. D. 451 he gained a great victory over Attila, near Chalons in Gaul; but he was treacherously murdered by Valentinian in 454. — 2. A Greek medical writer, born at Amida in Mesopotamia, lived at the end of the 5th or the beginning of the 6th century after Christ. His work Βιβλία Ἰατρικὰ Ἑκκαίδεκα, "Sixteen Books on Medicine," is one of the most valuable medical remains of antiquity, as being a judicious compilation from many authors whose works are lost. The whole of it has never appeared in the original Greek, but a corrupt translation of it into Latin was published by Cornarius, Basil. 1542, often reprinted, and in H. Stephens's Medicae Artis Principes, Paris, 1567.

Aetna (Αἴτνη). 1. (Monte Gibello), a volcanic mountain in the N. E. of Sicily between Tauromenium and Catana. It is said to have derived its name from Aetna, a Sicilian nymph, a daughter of Uranus and Gaea, or of Briareus. Zeus buried under it Typhon or Enceladus; and in its interior Hephaestus and the Cyclops forged the thunderbolts for Zeus. There were several eruptions of M. Aetna in antiquity. One occurred in B. C. 475, to which Aeschylus and Pindar probably allude, and another in B. C. 425, which Thucydides says (iii. 116) was the third on record since the Greeks had settled in Sicily. The form of the mountain seems to have been much the same in antiquity as it is at present. Its base covers an area of nearly 90 miles in circumference, and its highest point is 10,874 feet above the level of the sea. The circumference of the crater is variously estimated from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 miles, and the depth from 600 to 800 feet. — 2. (Aetnenses: S. Maria di Licodia), a town at the foot of M. Aetna, on the road to Catana, formerly called Inessa or Innesa. It was founded in B. C. 461, by the inhabitants of Catana, who had been expelled from their own town by the Siculi. They gave the name of Aetna to Inessa, because their own town Catana had been called Aetna by Hiero I.

Aetnaeus (Αἰτναῖος), an epithet of several gods and mythical beings connected with Mount Aetna; — of Zeus, of whom there was a statue on Mount Aetna, and to whom a festival was celebrated there, called Aetnea; of Hephaestus; and of the Cyclops.

Aetōlĭa (Αἰτωλία: Αἰτωλός), a division of Greece, was bounded on the W. by Acarnania, from which it was separated by the river Achelous, on the N. by Epirus and Thessaly, on the E. by the Ozolian Locrians, and on the S. by the entrance to the Corinthian gulf. It was divided into two parts, Old Aetolia, from the Achelous to the Evenus and Calydon, and New Aetolia, or the Acquired (ἐπίκτητος), from the Evenus and Calydon to the Ozolian Locrians. On the coast the country is level and fruitful, but in the interior mountainous and unproductive. The mountains contained many wild beasts, and were celebrated in mythology for the hunt of the Calydonian boar. The country was originally inhabited by Curetes and Leleges, but was at an early period colonized by Greeks from Elis, led by the mythical AETOLUS. The Aetolians took part in the Trojan war, under their king Thoas. They continued for a long time a rude and uncivilized people, living to a great extent by robbery; and even in the time of Thucydides (B. C. 410) many of their tribes spoke a language which was not Greek, and were in the habit of eating raw flesh. Like the other Greeks, they abolished at an early time the monarchical form of government, and lived under a democracy. They appear to have been early united by a kind of League, but this League first acquired political importance about the middle of the 3rd century B. C., and became a formidable rival to the Macedonian monarchs and the Achaean League. The Aetolian League at one time included not only Aetolia Proper, but Acarnania, part of Thessaly, Locris, and the island of Cephallenia; and it also had close alliances with Elis and several towns in the Peloponnesus, and likewise with Cius on the Propontis. Its annual meetings, called Panaetolica, were held in the autumn at Thermus, and at them were chosen a General (στρατηγός), who was at the head of the League, an Hipparchus, or Master of the Horse, a Secretary, and a select committee called Apocleti (ἀπόκλητοι). For further particulars respecting the constitution of the League, see Dict. of Ant. art. Aetolicum Foedus. The Aetolians took the side of Antiochus III. against the Romans, and on the defeat of that monarch B. C. 189, they became virtually the subjects of Rome. On the conquest of the Achaeans, B. C. 146, Aetolia was included in the Roman province of Achaia. After the battle of Actium, B. C. 31, a considerable part of the population of Aetolia was transplanted to the city of NICOPOLIS, which Augustus built in commemoration of his victory.

Aetōlus (Αἰτωλός), son of Endymion and Neïs, or Iphianassa, married Pronoë, by whom he had two sons, Pleuron and Calydon. He was king of Elis, but was obliged to leave Peloponnesus, because he had slain Apis, the son of Jason or Salmoneus. He went to the country near the Achelous, which was called Aetolia after him.

Aexōnē (Αἰξωνή and Αἰξωνῆς: Αἰξωνεύς: Asani?), an Attic demus of the tribe Cecropis or Pandionis. Its inhabitants had the reputation of being mockers and slanderers.

Afer, Domĭtius, of Nemausus (Nismes) in Gaul, was the teacher of Quintilian, and one of the most distinguished orators in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, but he sacrificed his character by conducting accusations for the government. He was consul suffectus in A. D. 39, and died in 60. Quintilian mentions several works of his on oratory, which are all lost.

Afrānĭus. 1. L. A Roman comic poet, flourished about B. C. 100. His comedies described Roman scenes and manners (Comoediae togatae), and the subjects were mostly taken from the life of the lower classes. (Comoediae tabernariae.) They were frequently polluted with disgraceful amours; but he depicted Roman life with such accuracy, that he is classed with Menander (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 57). His comedies continued to be acted under the empire. The names and fragments of between 20 and 30 are still preserved.—2. L., a person of obscure origin, and a faithful adherent of Pompey. He served under Pompey against Sertorius and Mithridates, and was, through Pompey's influence, made consul, B. C. 60. When Pompey obtained the provinces of the two Spains in his second consulship (B. C. 55), he sent Afranius and Petreius to govern them, while he himself remained in Rome. In B. C. 49, Afranius and Petreius were defeated by Caesar in Spain. Afranius thereupon passed over to Pompey in Greece; was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48; and subsequently at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, B. C. 46. He then attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and killed.

Afrĭca (Ἀφρίκη: Africānus), was used by the ancients in two senses, (1) for the whole continent of Africa, and (2) for the portion of N. Africa which constituted the territory of Carthage, and which the Romans erected into a province, under the name of Africa Propria.—1. In the more general sense the name was not used by the Greek writers; and its use by the Romans arose from the extension to the whole continent of the name of a part of it. The proper Greek name for the continent is Libya (Λιβύη). Considerably before the historical period of Greece begins, the Phoenicians extended their commerce over the Mediterranean, and founded several colonies on the N. coast of Africa, of which Carthage was the chief. [CARTHAGO.] The Greeks knew very little of the country until the foundation of the Dorian colony of CYRENE (B. C. 620), and the intercourse of Greek travellers with Egypt in the 6th and 5th centuries; and even then their knowledge of all but the part near Cyrene was derived from the Egyptians and Phoenicians, who sent out some remarkable expeditions to explore the country. A Phoenician fleet sent by the Egyptian king Pharaoh Necho (about B. C. 600), was said to have sailed from the Red Sea, round Africa, and so into the Mediterranean: the authenticity of this story is still a matter of dispute. We still possess an authentic account of another expedition, which the Carthaginians despatched under Hanno (about B. C. 510), and which reached a point on the W. coast nearly, if not quite, as far as lat. 10° N. On the opposite side of the continent, the coast appears to have been very little known beyond the S. boundary of Egypt, till the time of the Ptolemies. In the interior, the Great Desert (Sahara) interposed a formidable obstacle to discovery; but even before the time of Herodotus the people on the northern coast told of individuals who had crossed the Desert and had reached a great river flowing towards the E., with crocodiles in it, and black men living on its banks; which, if the story be true, was probably the Niger in its upper course, near Timbuctoo. That the Carthaginians had considerable intercourse with the regions S. of the Sahara, has been inferred from the abundance of elephants they kept. Later expeditions and inquiries extended the knowledge which the ancients possessed of the E. coast to about 10° S. lat., and gave them, as it seems, some further acquaintance with the interior, about Lake Tchad, but the southern part of the continent was so totally unknown, that Ptolemy, who finally fixed the limits of ancient geographical science, recurred to the old notion, which seems to have prevailed before the time of Herodotus, that the S. parts of Africa met the S.E. part of Asia, and that the Indian Ocean was a vast lake. The greatest geographers who lived before Ptolemy, namely, Eratosthenes and Strabo, had accepted the tradition that Africa was circumnavigable. The shape of the continent they conceived to be that of a right-angled triangle, having for its hypotenuse a line drawn from the Pillars of Hercules to the S. of the Red Sea; and, as to its extent, they did not suppose it to reach nearly so far as the Equator. Ptolemy supposed the W. coast to stretch N. and S. from the Pillars of Hercules, and he gave the continent an indefinite extent towards the S. There were also great differences of opinion as to the boundaries of the continent. Some divided the whole world into only two parts, Europe and Asia, and they were not agreed to which of these two Libya (i. e. Africa) belonged; and those who recognised three divisions differed again in placing the boundary between Libya and Asia either on the W. of Egypt, or along the Nile, or at the isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea: the last opinion gradually prevailed. As to the subdivision of the country itself, Herodotus distributes it into Aegyptus, Aethiopia (i. e. all the regions S. of Egypt and the Sahara), and Libya, properly so called; and he subdivides Libya into three parts, according to their physical distinctions, namely, (1) the Inhabited Country along the Mediterranean, in which dwelt the Nomad Libyans (οἱ παραθαλάσσιοι τῶν νομάδων Λιβύων: the Barbary States); (2) the Country of Wild Beasts (ἡ θηριώδης), S. of the former, that is, the region between the Little and Great Atlas, which still abounds in wild beasts, but takes its name from its prevailing vegetation (Beled-el-Jerid, i. e. the Country of Palms), and (3) the Sandy Desert (ἡ ψάμμος; the Sahara), that is, the table land bounded by the Atlas on the N. and the margin of the Nile-valley on the E., which is a vast tract of sand broken only by a few habitable islands, called Oases. As to the people, Herodotus distinguishes four races, two native, namely, the Libyans and Ethiopians, and two foreign, namely, the Phoenicians and the Greeks. The Libyans, however, were a Caucasian race: the Ethiopians of Herodotus correspond to our Negro races. The Phoenician colonies were planted chiefly along, and to the W. of, the great recess in the middle of the N. coast, which formed the two SYRTES, by far the most important of them being Carthage; and the Greek colonies were fixed on the coast along and beyond the E. side of the Syrtes; the chief of them was CYRENE, and the region was called Cyrenaïca. Between this and Egypt were Libyan tribes, and the whole region between the Carthaginian dominions and Egypt, including Cyrenaïca, was called by the same name as the whole continent, Libya. The chief native tribes of this region were the ADYRMACHIDAE, MARMARIDAE, PSYLLI, and NASAMONES. The last extended into the Carthaginian territory. To the W. of the Carthaginian possessions, the country was called by the general names of NUMIDIA and MAURETANIA, and was possessed partly by Carthaginian colonies on the coast, and partly by Libyan tribes under various names, the chief of which were the NUMIDAE, MASSYLII, MASSAESYLII, and MAURI, and to the S. of them the GAETULI. The whole of this northern region fell successively under the power of Rome, and was finally divided into provinces as follows: — (1) Aegypt; (2) Libya, including (a) Libyae Nomos or Libya Exterior, (b) Marmarica, (c) Cyrenaïca; (3) Africa Propria, the former empire of Carthage (see below, No. 2); (4) Numidia; (5) Mauretania, divided into (a) Sitifensis, (b) Caesariensis, (c) Tingitana: these, with (6) Aethiopia, make up the whole of Africa, according to the divisions recognised by the latest of the ancient geographers. The northern district was better known to the Romans than it is to us, and was extremely populous and flourishing; and, if we may judge by the list of tribes in Ptolemy, the interior of the country, especially between the Little and Great Altars, must have supported many more inhabitants than it does at present. Further information respecting the several portions of the country will be found in the separate articles. — 2. Africa Propria or Provincia, or simply Africa, was the name under which the Romans, after the Third Punic War (B. C. 146), erected into a province the whole of the former territory of Carthage. It extended from the river Tusca, on the W., which divided it from Numidia, to the bottom of the Syrtis Minor, on the S. E. It was divided into two districts (regiones), namely, (1) Zeugis or Zeugitana, the district round Carthage, (2) Byzacium or Byzacena, S. of Zeugitana, as far as the bottom of the Syrtis Minor. It corresponds to the modern regency of Tunis. The province was full of flourishing towns, and was extremely fertile, especially Byzacena: it furnished Rome with its chief supplies of corn. The above limits are assigned to the province by Pliny: Ptolemy makes it extend from the river Ampsaga on the W., to the borders of Cyrenaica, at the bottom of the Great Syrtis, on the E., so as to include Numidia and Tripolitana.

Afrĭcānus, a surname given to the Scipios on account of their victories in Africa. [SCIPIO.]

Afrĭcānus. 1. Sex. Caecilius, a Roman jurisconsult, lived under Antoninus Pius (A. D. 138—161), and wrote Libri IX. Quaestionum, from which many extracts are made in the Digest. — 2. Julius, a celebrated orator in the reign of Nero, is much praised by Quintilian, who speaks of him and Domitius Afer as the best orators of their time. — 3. Sex. Julius, a learned Christian writer at the beginning of the 3rd century, passed the greater part of his life at Emmaus in Palestine, and afterwards lived at Alexandria. His principal work was a Chronicon in five books, from the creation of the world, which he placed in 5499 B.C., to A. D. 221. This work is lost, but part of it is extracted by Eusebius in his Chronicon, and many fragments of it are preserved by Georgius Syncellus, Cedrenus, and in the Paschale Chronicon. There was another work written by Africanus, entitled Cesti (Κεστοί), that is, embroidered girdles, so called from the celebrated Cestus of Aphrodite (Venus). It treated of a vast variety of subjects—medicine, agriculture, natural history, the military art, &c. The work itself is lost, but some extracts from it are published by Thevenot in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693, and also in the Geoponica.

Afrĭcus (λίψ by the Greeks), the S. W. wind, so called because it blew from Africa, frequently brought storms with it (creberque procellis Africus, Virg. Aen. i. 85).

Agămēdē (Ἀγαμήδη), daughter of Augīas and wife of Mulius, who, according to Homer (Il. xi. 739), was acquainted with the healing powers of all the plants that grow upon the earth.

Agămēdes (Ἀγαμήδης), commonly called son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, and brother of Trophonius; though his family connexions are related differently by different writers. Agamedes and Trophonius distinguished themselves as architects: they built a temple of Apollo at Delphi, and a treasury of Hyrieus, king of Hyria in Boeotia. The story about this treasury resembles the one which Herodotus (ii. 121) relates of the treasury of the Egyptian king Rhampsinitus. In the construction of the treasury of Hyrieus, Agamedes and Trophonius contrived to place one stone in such a manner, that it could be taken away outside, and thus formed an entrance to the treasury, without any body perceiving it. Agamedes and Trophonius now constantly robbed the treasury; and the king, seeing that locks and seals were uninjured while his treasures were constantly decreasing, set traps to catch the thief. Agamedes was thus ensnared, and Trophonius cut off his head to avert the discovery. After this Trophonius was immediately swallowed up by the earth. On this spot there was afterwards, in the grove of Lebadēa, the cave of Agamedes with a column by the side of it. Here also was the oracle of Trophonius, and those who consulted it first offered a ram to Agamedes and invoked him. A tradition mentioned by Cicero (Tusc. Quaest. i. 47) states that Agamedes and Trophonius, after building the temple of Apollo at Delphi, prayed to the god to grant them in reward for their labour what was best for men. The god promised to do so on a certain day, and when the day came, the two brothers died.

Agămemnon (Ἀγαμέμνων), son of Plīsthenes and Aĕrope or Eriphyle, and grandson of Atreus, king of Mycenae; but Homer and others call him a son of Atreus and grandson of Pelops. Agamemnon and his brother Menelaus were brought up together with Aegisthus, the son of Thyestes, in the house of Atreus. After the murder of Atreus by Aegisthus and Thyestes, who succeeded Atreus in the kingdom of Mycenae [AEGISTHUS], Agamemnon and Menelaus went to Sparta, where Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, the daughter of Tyndareus, by whom he became the father of Iphianassa (Iphigenīa), Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Orestes. The manner in which Agamemnon obtained the kingdom of Mycenae, is differently related. From Homer, it appears as if he had peaceably succeeded Thyestes, while, according to others, he expelled Thyestes, and usurped his throne. He now became the most powerful prince in Greece. A catalogue of his dominions is given in the Iliad (ii. 569, &c.). When Homer attributes to Agamemnon the sovereignty over all Argos, the name Argos signifies Peloponnesus, or the greater part of it, for the city of Argos was governed by Diomedes. When Helen, the wife of Menelaus, was carried off by Paris, and the Greek chiefs resolved to recover her by force of arms, Agamemnon was chosen their commander in chief. After two years of preparation, the Greek army and fleet assembled in the port of Aulis in Boeotia. At this place Agamemnon killed a stag which was sacred to Artemis, who in return visited the Greek army with a pestilence, and produced a calm which prevented the Greeks from leaving the port. In order to appease her wrath, Agamemnon consented to sacrifice his daughter Iphigenīa; but at the moment she was to be sacrificed, she was carried off by Artemis herself to Tauris and another victim was substituted in her place. The calm now ceased, and the army sailed to the coast of Troy. Agamemnon alone had 100 ships, independent of 60 which he had lent to the Arcadians. In the tenth year of the siege of Troy we find Agamemnon involved in a quarrel with Achilles respecting the possession of Briseïs, whom Achilles was obliged to give up to Agamemnon. Achilles withdrew from the field of battle, and the Greeks were visited by successive disasters. The danger of the Greeks at last induced Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, to take part in the battle, and his fall led to the reconciliation of Achilles and Agamemnon. [ACHILLES.] Agamemnon, although the chief commander of the Greeks, is not the hero of the Iliad, and in chivalrous spirit, bravery, and character, altogether inferior to Achilles. But he nevertheless rises above all the Greeks by his dignity, power, and majesty: his eyes and head are likened to those of Zeus, his girdle to that of Ares, and his breast to that of Poseidon. The emblem of his power is a sceptre, the work of Hephaestus, which Zeus had once given to Hermes, and Hermes to Pelops, from whom it descended to Agamemnon. At the capture of Troy he received Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his prize. On his return home he was murdered by Aegisthus, who had seduced Clytemnestra during the absence of her husband. The tragic poets make Clytemnestra alone murder Agamemnon: her motive is in Aeschylus her jealousy of Cassandra, in Sophocles and Euripides her wrath at the death of Iphigenīa.

Agamemnŏnĭdes (Ἀγαμεμνονίδης), the son of Agamemnon, i. e. Orestes.

Agănippe (Ἀγανίππη), a nymph of the well of the same name at the foot of Mount Helicon, in Boeotia, which was considered sacred to the Muses (who were hence called Aganippides), and which was believed to have the power of inspiring those who drank of it. The fountain of Hippocrēne has the epithet Aganippis (Ov. Fast. v. 7), from its being sacred to the Muses, like that of Aganippe.

Agapēnor (Ἀγαπήνωρ), son of Ancaeus king of the Arcadians, received 60 ships from Agamemnon, in which he led his Arcadians to Troy. On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Cyprus, where he founded the town of Paphus, and in it the famous temple of Aphrodite.

Agarista (Ἀγαρίστη). 1. Daughter of Clīsthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, wife of Megacles, and mother of Clīsthenes who divided the Athenians into ten tribes, and of Hippocrates.—2. Daughter of the above-mentioned Hippocrates, and granddaughter of No. 1, wife of Xanthippus, and mother of Pericles.

Agasīas (Ἀγασίας), son of Dositheus, a sculptor of Ephesus, probably a contemporary of Alexander the Great (B. C. 330), sculptured the statue known by the name of the Borghese gladiator, which is still preserved in the gallery of the Louvre. This statue, as well as the Apollo Belvidere, was discovered among the ruins of a palace of the Roman emperors on the site of the ancient Antium (Capo d'Anzo). From the attitude of the figure it is clear, that the statue represents not a gladiator, but a warrior contending with a mounted combatant. Perhaps it was intended to represent Achilles fighting with Penthesilēa.

Agasicles, Agesicles, or Hegesicles (Ἀγασικλῆς, Ἀγησικλῆς, Ἡγησικλῆς), king of Sparta, succeeded his father Archidamus I., about B.C. 600 or 590.

Agatharchĭdes (Ἀγαθαρχίδης) or Agatharchus (Ἀγάθαρχος), a Greek grammarian, born at Cnidos, lived at Alexandria, probably about B. C. 130. He wrote a considerable number of geographical and historical works; but we have only an epitome of a portion of his work on the Erythraean sea, which was made by Photius: it is printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores.

Agatharchus (Ἀγάθαρχος), an Athenian artist, said to have invented scene-painting, and to have painted a scene for a tragedy which Aeschylus exhibited. It was probably not till towards the end of Aeschylus's career that scene-painting was introduced, and not till the time of Sophocles that it was generally made use of; which may account for Aristotle's assertion (Poët. iv. 16) that scene-painting was introduced by Sophocles. — 2. A Greek painter, a native of Samos, and son of Eudemus. He was a contemporary of Alcibiades and Zeuxis, and must not be confounded with the contemporary of Aeschylus.

Agathēmerus (Ἀγαθήμερος), the author of "A sketch of Geography in epitome" (τῆς γεωγραφίας ὑποτυπώσεις ἐν ἐπιτομῇ), probably lived about the beginning of the 3rd century after Christ. The work consists chiefly of extracts from Ptolemy and other earlier writers. It is printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores.

Agathĭas (Ἀγαθίας), a Byzantine writer, born about A. D. 536 at Myrina in Aeolia, practised as an advocate at Constantinople, whence he obtained his surname Scholasticus (which word signified an advocate in his time), and died about A. D. 582. He wrote many poems, of which several have come down to us; but his principal work was his History in five books, which is also extant, and is of considerable value. It contains the history from A. D. 553—558, a period remarkable for important events, such as the conquest of Italy by Narses and the exploits of Belisarius over the Huns and other barbarians. The best edition is by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828.

Agathŏclēa (Ἀγαθόκλεια), mistress of Ptolemy IV. Philopator, king of Egypt, and sister of his minister Agathocles. She and her brother were put to death on the death of Ptolemy (B. C. 205).

Agathŏcles (Ἀγαθοκλῆς). 1. A Sicilian, raised himself from the station of a potter to that of tyrant of Syracuse and king of Sicily. Born at Thermae, a town of Sicily subject to Carthage, he is said to have been exposed when an infant, by his father, Carcinus of Rhegium, in consequence of a succession of troublesome dreams, portending that he would be a source of much evil to Sicily. His mother, however, secretly preserved his life, and at 7 years old he was restored to his father, who had long repented of his conduct to the child. By him he was taken to Syracuse and brought up as a potter. His strength and personal beauty recommended him to Damas, a noble Syracusan, who drew him from obscurity, and on whose death he married his rich widow, and so became one of the wealthiest citizens in Syracuse. His ambitious schemes then developed themselves, and he was driven into exile. After several changes of fortune, he collected an army which overawed both the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and was restored under an oath that he would not interfere with the democracy, which oath he kept by murdering 4000 and banishing 6000 citizens. He was immediately declared sovereign of Syracuse, under the title of Autocrator, B. C. 317. In the course of a few years the whole of Sicily, which was not under the dominion of Carthage, submitted to him. In B. C. 310 he was defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, under Hamilcar, who straightway laid siege to Syracuse; whereupon he formed the bold design of averting the ruin which threatened him, by carrying the war into Africa. His successes were most brilliant and rapid. He constantly defeated the troops of Carthage, but was at length summoned from Africa by the affairs of Sicily, where many cities had revolted from him, B. C. 307. These he reduced, after making a treaty with the Carthaginians. He had previously assumed the title of king of Sicily. He afterwards plundered the Lipari isles, and also carried his arms into Italy in order to attack the Bruttii. But his last days were embittered by family misfortunes. His grandson Archagathus murdered his son Agathocles, for the sake of succeeding to the crown, and the old king feared that the rest of his family would share his fate. He accordingly sent his wife Texena and her two children to Egypt, her native country; and his own death followed almost immediately, B. C. 289, after a reign of 28 years, and in the 72nd year of his age. Other authors relate an incredible story of his being poisoned by Maeno, an associate of Archagathus. The poison, we are told, was concealed in the quill with which he cleaned his teeth, and reduced him to so frightful a condition, that he was placed on the funeral pile and burnt while yet living, being unable to give any signs that he was not dead.— 2. Of Pella, father of Lysimachus.—3. Son of Lysimachus, was defeated and taken prisoner by Dromichaetis, king of the Getae, about B. C. 292, but was sent back to his father with presents. In 287, he defeated Demetrius Poliorcetes. At the instigation of his stepmother, Arsinoë, Lysimachus cast him into prison, where he was murdered (284) by Ptolemaeus Ceraunus.—4. Brother of AGATHOCLEA.—5. A Greek historian, of uncertain date, wrote the history of Cyzicus, which was extensively read in antiquity, and is referred to by Cicero (de Div. i. 24).

Agathŏdaemon (Ἀγαθοδαίμων or Ἀγαθὸς θεός). 1. The "Good Deity," in honour of whom the Greeks drank a cup of unmixed wine at the end of every repast.—2. Of Alexandria, the designer of some maps to accompany Ptolemy's Geography. Copies of these maps are found appended to several MSS. of Ptolemy.

Agăthon (Ἀγάθων), an Athenian tragic poet, born about B. C. 447, of a rich and respectable family, was a friend of Euripides and Plato. He gained his first victory in 416: in honour of which Plato represents the Symposium to have been given, which he has made the occasion of his dialogue so called. In 407, he visited the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, where his friend Euripides was also a guest at the same time. He died about 400, at the age of 47. The poetic merits of Agathon were considerable, but his compositions were more remarkable for elegance and flowery ornaments than force, vigour, or sublimity. In the Thesmophoriazusae of Aristophanes he is ridiculed for his effeminacy, being brought on the stage in female dress.

Agathyrna, Agathyrnum (Ἀγάθυρνα, -ον: Ἀγαθυρναῖος: Agatha), a town on the N. coast of Sicily.

Agăthyrsi (Ἀγάθυρσοι), a people in European Sarmatia, on the river Maris (Marosch) in Transylvania. From their practice of painting or tatooing their skin, they are called by Virgil (Aen. iv. 146) picti Agathyrsi.

Agāvē (Ἀγαυή), daughter of Cadmus, wife of Echion, and mother of Pentheus. When Pentheus attempted to prevent the women from celebrating the Dionysiac festivals on mount Cithaeron, he was torn to pieces there by his own mother Agave, who in her frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. [PENTHEUS.]—One of the Nereids, one of the Danaids, and one of the Amazons were also called Agavae.

Agbatăna. [ECBATANA.]

Agdistis (Ἀγδίστις), an androgynous deity, the offspring of Zeus and Earth, connected with the Phrygian worship of Attes or Atys.

Agĕlādas (Ἀγελάδας), an eminent statuary of Argos, the instructor of the three great masters, Phidias, Myron, and Polycletus. Many modern writers suppose that there were two artists of this name; one an Argive, the instructor of Phidias, born about B. C. 540, the other a native of Sicyon, who flourished about B. C. 432.

Agelāus (Ἀγέλαος). 1. Son of Hercules and Omphale, and founder of the house of Croesus. —2. Son of Damastor and one of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Ulysses.—3. A slave of Priam, who exposed the infant Paris on mount Ida, in consequence of a dream of his mother.

Agendĭcum or Agedĭcum (Sens), the chief town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Agēnor (Ἀγήνωρ). 1. Son of Poseidon and Libya, king of Phoenicia, twin-brother of Belus, and father of Cadmus, Phoenix, Cylix, Thasus, Phineus, and according to some of Europa also. Virgil (Aen. i. 338) calls Carthage the city of Agenor, since Dido was descended from Agenor. —2. Son of Jasus, and father of Argus Panoptes, king of Argos.—3. Son and successor of Triopas, in the kingdom of Argos.—4. Son of Pleuron and Xanthippe, and grandson of Aetolus.—5. Son of Phegeus, king of Psophis, in Arcadia. He and his brother Pronous slew Alcmaeon, when he wanted to give the celebrated necklace and peplus of Harmonia to his second wife Calirrhoë. [PHEGEUS.] The two brothers were afterwards killed by Amphoterus and Acarnan, the sons of Alcmaeon and Callirrhoë.—6. Son of the Trojan Antenor and Theano, one of the bravest among the Trojans, was wounded by Achilles, but rescued by Apollo.

Agēnŏrĭdes (Ἀγηνορίδης), a descendant of an Agenor, such as Cadmus, Phineus, and Perseus.

Agēsander, a sculptor of Rhodes, who, in conjunction with Polydorus and Athenodorus, sculptured the group of Laocoon, one of the most perfect specimens of art. This celebrated group was discovered in the year 1506, near the baths of Titus on the Esquiline hill: it is now preserved in the museum of the Vatican. The artists probably lived in the reign of Titus, and sculptured the group expressly for that emperor.

Agēsĭlāus (Ἀγησίλαος), kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Doryssus, reigned 44 years, and died about B. C. 886. He was contemporary with the legislation of Lycurgus. — 2. Son of Archidāmus II., succeeded his half-brother Agis II., B. C. 398, excluding, on the ground of spurious birth, and by the interest of Lysander, his nephew LEOTYCHIDES. From 396 to 394 he carried on the war in Asia Minor with great success, and was preparing to advance into the heart of the Persian empire, when he was summoned home to defend his country against Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, which had been induced by Artaxerxes to take up arms against Sparta. Though full of disappointment, he promptly obeyed; and in the course of the same year (394), he met and defeated at Coronēa in Boeotia the allied forces. During the next 4 years he regained for his country much of its former supremacy, till at length the fatal battle of Leuctra, 371, overthrew for ever the power of Sparta, and gave the supremacy for a time to Thebes. For the next few years Sparta had almost to struggle for its existence amid dangers without and within, and it was chiefly owing to the skill, courage, and presence of mind of Agesilaus that she weathered the storm. In 361 he crossed with a body of Lacedaemonian mercenaries into Egypt. Here, after displaying much of his ancient skill, he died, while preparing for his voyage home, in the winter of 361—360, after a life of above 80 years and a reign of 38. His body was embalmed in wax, and splendidly buried at Sparta. In person Agesilaus was small, mean-looking, and lame, on which last ground objection had been made to his accession, an oracle, curiously fulfilled, having warned Sparta of evils awaiting her under a "lame sovereignty." In his reign, indeed, her fall took place, but not through him, for he was one of the best citizens and generals that Sparta ever had.

Agēsĭpŏlis (Ἀγησίπολις), kings of Sparta. 1. Succeeded his father Pausanias, while yet a minor, in B. C. 394, and reigned 14 years. As soon as his minority ceased, he took an active part in the wars in which Sparta was then engaged with the other states of Greece In 390 he invaded Argolis with success; in 385 he took the city of Mantinēa; in 381 he went to the assistance of Acanthus and Apollonia against the Olynthians, and died in 380 during this war in the peninsula of Pallene. — 2. Son of Cleombrotus, reigned one year B. C. 371.—3. Succeeded Cleomenes in B. C. 220, but was soon deposed by his colleague Lycurgus: he afterwards took refuge with the Romans.

Agētor (Ἀγήτωρ), "the leader," a surname of Zeus at Lacedaemon, of Apollo, and of Hermes, who conducts the souls of men to the lower world.

Aggēnus Urbĭcus, a writer on the science of the Agrimensores, may perhaps have lived at the latter part of the 4th century of our era. His works are printed in Goesius, Rei Agrariae Auctores.

Aggrammes or Xandrames (Ξανδράμης), the ruler of the Gangaridae and Prasii in India, when Alexander invaded India, B. C. 327.

Agĭas (Ἀγίας), a Greek epic poet, erroneously called Augias, a native of Troezen, flourished about B. C. 740, and was the author of a poem called Nosti (Νόστοι), i. e. the history of the return of the Achaean heroes from Troy.

Aginnum (Agen), the chief town of the Nitiobriges in Gallia Aquitanica.

Agis (Ἆγις), kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Eurysthenes, the founder of the family of the Agidae.—2. Son of Archidāmus II., reigned B.C. 427—398. He took an active part in the Peloponnesian war, and invaded Attica several times. While Alcibiades was at Sparta he was the guest of Agis, and is said to have seduced his wife Timaea; in consequence of which Leotychides, the son of Agis, was excluded from the throne as illegitimate.—3. Son of Archidāmus III., reigned B. C. 338—330, attempted to overthrow the Macedonian power in Europe, while Alexander the Great was in Asia, but was defeated and killed in battle by Antipater in 330.—4. Son of Eudamidas II., reigned B. C. 244—240. He attempted to re-establish the institutions of Lycurgus, and to effect a thorough reform in the Spartan state; but he was resisted by his colleague Leonidas II. and the wealthy, was thrown into prison, and was there put to death by command of the ephors, along with his mother Agesistrata, and his grandmother Archidamia.

Agis, a Greek poet of Argos, a notorious flatterer of Alexander the Great.

Aglāia (Ἀγλαΐα), "the bright one." 1. One of the CHARITES or Graces.—2. Wife of Charopus and mother of Nireus, who came from the island of Sime against Troy.

Aglaophēmē. [SIRENES.]

Aglaŏphon (Ἀγλαοφῶν). 1. Painter of Thasos, father and instructor of Polygnotus and Aristophon, lived about B. C. 500.—2. Painter, lived about B. C. 420, probably grandson of No. 1.

Aglāus (Ἀγλαός), a poor citizen of Psophis in Arcadia, whom the Delphic oracle declared happier than Gyges king of Lydia, on account of his contented disposition. Pausanias places him in the time of Croesus.

Agnŏdĭcē (Ἀγνοδίκη), an Athenian maiden, was the first of her sex to learn midwifery, which a law at Athens forbade any woman to learn. Dressed as a man, she obtained instruction from a physician named Hierophilus, and afterwards practised her art with success. Summoned before the Areopagus by the envy of the other practitioners, she was obliged to disclose her sex, and was not only acquitted, but obtained the repeal of the obnoxious law. This tale, though often repeated, does not deserve much credit, as it rests on the authority of Hyginus alone.

Agnōnĭdes (Ἀγνωνίδης), an Athenian demagogue, induced the Athenians to sentence Phocion to death (B. C. 318), but was shortly afterwards put to death himself by the Athenians.

Agoracrĭtus (Ἀγοράκριτος), a statuary of Paros, flourished B. C. 440—428, and was the favourite pupil of Phidias. His greatest work was a statue of Aphrodite, which he changed into a statue of Nemesis, and sold it to the people of Rhamnus, because he was indignant that the Athenians had given the preference to a statue by Alcamenes, who was another distinguished pupil of Phidias.

Agŏraea and Agŏraeus (Ἀγοραία and Ἀγοραῖος), epithets of several divinities who were considered as the protectors of the assemblies of the people in the agora, such as Zeus, Athena, Artemis, and Hermes.

Agraei (Ἀγραῖοι), a people of Aetolia on the Achelous.

Agraulē (Ἀγραυλή and Ἀγρύλη: Ἀγρυλεύς), an Attic demus of the tribe Erechtheis, named after AGRAULOS, No. 2.

Agraulos (Ἄγραυλος, also Ἄγλαυρος). 1. Daughter of Actaeus, first king of Athens, and wife of Cecrops.—2. Daughter of Cecrops and Agraulos, is an important personage in the legends of Attica, and there were three different stories about her. 1. According to some writers Athena gave Erichthonius in a chest to Agraulos and her sister Herse, with the command not to open it; but unable to control their curiosity, they opened it, and thereupon were seized with madness at the sight of Erichthonius, and threw themselves down from the Acropolis. 2. According to Ovid (Met. ii. 710) Agraulos and her sister survived opening the chest, but Agraulos was subsequently punished by being changed into a stone by Hermes, because she attempted to prevent the god from entering the house of Herse, when he had fallen in love with the latter. 3. The third legend relates that Athens was once involved in a long-protracted war, and that Agraulos threw herself down from the Acropolis because an oracle had declared that the Athenians would conquer if some one would sacrifice himself for his country. The Athenians in gratitude built her a temple on the Acropolis, in which it became customary for the young Athenians, on receiving their first suit of armour, to take an oath that they would always defend their country to the last. One of the Attic demi (Agraule) derived its name from this heroine, and a festival and mysteries (Agraulia) were celebrated at Athens in honour of her.

Agreus (Ἀγρεύς), a hunter, a surname of Pan and Aristaeus.

Agri Decumātes, tithe lands, the name given by the Romans to a part of Germany, E. of the Rhine and N. of the Danube, which they took possession of when the Germans retired eastward, and which they gave to Gauls and subsequently to their own veterans on the payment of a tenth of the produce (decŭma). Towards the end of the first or the beginning of the second century after Christ, these lands were incorporated in the Roman empire.

Agrĭcŏla, Cn. Jūlĭus, born June 13th, A. D. 37, at Forum Julii (Fréjus in Provence), was the son of Julius Graecinus, who was executed by Caligula, and of Julia Procilla. He received a careful education; he first served in Britain, A. D. 60, under Suetonius Paulinus; was quaestor in Asia in 63; was governor of Aquitania from 74 to 76; and was consul in 77, when he betrothed his daughter to the historian Tacitus, and in the following year gave her to him in marriage. In 78 he received the government of Britain, which he held for 7 years, during which time he subdued the whole of the country with the exception of the highlands of Caledonia, and by his wise administration introduced among the inhabitants the language and civilization of Rome. He was recalled in 85 through the jealousy of Domitian, and on his return lived in retirement till his death in 93, which according to some was occasioned by poison, administered by order of Domitian. His character is drawn in the brightest colours by his son-in-law Tacitus, whose Life of Agricola has come down to us.

Agrĭgentum (Ἀκράγας: Ἀκραγαντῖνος, Agrĭgentīnus: Girgenti), a town on the S. coast of Sicily, about 2½ miles from the sea, between the rivers Acragas (Fiume di S. Biagio), and Hypsas (Fiume Drago). It was celebrated for its wealth and populousness, and till its destruction by the Carthaginians (B.C. 405) was one of the most splendid cities of the ancient world. It was the birthplace of Empedocles. It was founded by a Doric colony from Gela, about B. C. 579, was under the government of the cruel tyrant Phalăris (about 560), and subsequently under that of Theron (488—472), whose praises are celebrated by Pindar. After its destruction by the Carthaginians, it was rebuilt by Timoleon, but it never regained its former greatness. After undergoing many vicissitudes it at length came into the power of the Romans (210), in whose hands it remained. There are still gigantic remains of the ancient city, especially of the Olympiēum, or temple of the Olympian Zeus.

Agrīnĭum (Ἀγρίνιον), a town in Aetolia, perhaps near the sources of the Thermissus.

Agrippa, first a praenomen, and afterwards a cognomen among the Romans, signifies a child presented at its birth with its feet foremost.

Agrippa, Herōdes. 1. Called "Agrippa the Great," son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with the future emperor Claudius, and Drusus the son of Tiberius. Having given offence to Tiberius he was thrown into prison; but Caligula, on his accession (A. D. 37), set him at liberty, and gave him the tetrarchies of Abilene, Batanaea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. On the death of Caligula (41), Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services, Judaea and Samaria were annexed to his dominions. His government was mild and gentle, and he was exceedingly popular amongst the Jews. It was probably to increase his popularity with the Jews that he caused the apostle James to be beheaded, and Peter to be cast into prison (44). The manner of his death, which took place at Caesarea in the same year, is related in Acts xii. By his wife Cypros he had a son Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla.—2. Son of Agrippa I., was educated at the court of Claudius, and at the time of his father's death was 17 years old. Claudius kept him at Rome, and sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator of the kingdom, which thus again became a Roman province. On the death of Herodes, king of Chalcis (48), his little principality was given to Agrippa, who subsequently received an accession of territory. Before the outbreak of the war with the Romans, Agrippa attempted in vain to dissuade the Jews from rebelling. He sided with the Romans in the war; and after the capture of Jerusalem, he went with his sister Berenice to Rome, and died in the 70th year of his age, A. D. 100. It was before this Agrippa that the apostle Paul made his defence, A. D. 60 (Acts xxv. xxvi.).

Agrippa, M. Vipsānĭus, born in B. C. 63, of an obscure family, studied with young Octavius (afterwards the emperor Augustus) at Apollonia in Illyria; and upon the murder of Caesar in 44, was one of the friends of Octavius, who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. In the civil wars which followed, and which terminated in giving Augustus the sovereignty of the Roman world, Agrippa took an active part; and his military abilities, combined with his promptitude and energy, contributed greatly to that result. In 41 Agrippa, who was then praetor, commanded part of the forces of Augustus in the Perusinian war. In 38 he obtained great successes in Gaul and Germany; in 37 he was consul; and in 36 he defeated Sex. Pompey by sea. In 33 he was aedile, and in this office expended immense sums of money upon great public works. He restored old aqueducts, constructed a new one, to which he gave the name of the Julian, in honour of Augustus, and also erected several public buildings. In 31 he commanded the fleet of Augustus at the battle of Actium; was consul a second time in 28, and a third time in 27, when he built the Pantheon. In 21 he married Julia, daughter of Augustus. He had been marred twice before, first to Pomponia, daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, and next to Marcella, niece of Augustus. He continued to be employed in various military commands in Gaul, Spain, Syria, and Pannonia, till his death in B. C. 12. By his first wife Pomponia, Agrippa had Vipsania, married to Tiberius, the successor of Augustus; and by his third wife, Julia, he had 2 daughters, Julia, married to L. Aemilius Paulus, and Agrippina, married to Germanicus, and 3 sons, Caius Caesar, Lucius Caesar [CAESAR], and Agrippa Postumus, who was banished by Augustus to the island of Planasia, and was put to death by Tiberius at his accession, A. D. 14.

Agrippīna. 1. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, married Germanicus, by whom she had nine children, among whom was the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. She was distinguished for her virtues and heroism, and shared all the dangers of her husband's campaigns. On his death in A. D. 17 she returned to Italy; but the favour with which she was received by the people increased the hatred and jealousy which Tiberius and his mother Livia had long entertained towards her. For some years Tiberius disguised his hatred, but at length under the pretext that she was forming ambitious plans, he banished her to the island of Pandataria (A. D. 30), where she died 3 years afterwards, A. D. 33, probably by voluntary starvation.—2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina [No. 1.], and mother of the emperor Nero, was born at Oppidum Ubiorum, afterwards called in honour of her Colonia Agrippina, now Cologne. She was beautiful and intelligent, but licentious, cruel, and ambitious. She was first married to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus (A. D. 28), by whom she had a son, afterwards the emperor Nero; next to Crispus Passienus; and thirdly to the emperor Claudius (49), although she was his niece. In 50, she prevailed upon Claudius to adopt her son, to the prejudice of his own son Britannicus; and in order to secure the succession for her son, she poisoned the emperor in 54. Upon the accession of her son Nero, who was then only 17 years of age, she governed the Roman empire for a few years in his name. The young emperor soon became tired of the ascendency of his mother, and after making several attempts to shake off her authority, he caused her to be assassinated in 59.

Agrippīnenses. [COLONIA AGRIPPINA.]

Agrĭus (Ἄγριος), son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus, king of Calydon in Aetolia: his six sons deprived Oeneus of his kingdom, and gave it to their father; but Agrius and his sons were afterwards slain by Diomedes, the grandson of Oeneus.

Agroecĭus or Agroetĭus, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the 5th century after Christ, and wrote an extant work De Orthographia et Differentia Sermonis, which is printed in Putschius, Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, pp. 2266—2275.

Agron (Ἄγρων). 1. Son of Ninus, the first of the Lydian dynasty of the Heraclīdae.—2. Son of Pleuratus, king of Illyria, died B. C. 231, and was succeeded by his wife Teuta, though he left a son Pinnes or Pinneus by his first wife, Triteuta, whom he had divorced.

Agrŏtĕra (Ἀγροτέρα), the huntress, a surname of Artemis. There was a festival celebrated to her honour at Athens under this name. (See Dict. of Antiq.)

Agryle. [AGRAULE.]

Agyieus (Ἀγυιεύς), a surname of Apollo, as the protector of the streets and public places.

Agylla (Ἄγυλλα), the ancient Greek name of the Etruscan town of CAERE.

Agyrĭum (Ἀγύριον: Ἀγυριναῖος, Agyrinensis:

S. Filipo d'Argiro), a town in Sicily on the Cyamosorus, N. W. of Centuripae and N. E. of Enna, the birth-place of the historian Diodorus.

Agyrrhĭus (Ἀγύῤῥιος), an Athenian, after being in prison many years for embezzlement of public money, obtained about B. C. 395 the restoration of the Theoricon, and also tripled the pay for attending the assembly: hence he became so popular, that he was appointed general in 389.

Ahāla, Servīlius, the name of several distinguished Romans, who held various high offices in the state from B. C. 478 to 342. Of these the best known is C. Servilius Ahala, magister equitum in 439 to the dictator L. Cincinnatus, when he slew SP. MAELIUS in the forum, because he refused to appear before the dictator. Ahala was afterwards brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile.

Aharna, a town in Etruria, N. E. of Volsinii.

Ahēnŏbarbus, Domitĭus, the name of a distinguished Roman family. They are said to have obtained the surname of Ahenobarbus, i. e. "Brazen-Beard" or "Red-Beard," because the Dioscuri announced to one of their ancestors the victory of the Romans over the Latins at lake Regillus (B. C. 496), and, to confirm the truth of what they said, stroked his black hair and beard, which immediately became red.—1. Cn., plebeian aedile B. C. 196, praetor 194, and consul 192, when he fought against the Boii.—2. Cn., son of No. 1, consul suffectus in 162.—3. Cn., son of No. 2, consul 122, conquered the Allobroges in Gaul, in 121, at the confluence of the Sulga and Rhodanus. He was censor in 115 with Caecilius Metellus. The Via Domitia in Gaul was made by him.—4. Cn., son of No. 3, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward the law (Lex Domitia), by which the election of the priests was transferred from the collegia to the people. The people afterwards elected him Pontifex Maximus out of gratitude. He was consul in 96, and censor in 92, with Licinius Crassus, the orator. In his censorship he and his colleague shut up the schools of the Latin rhetoricians: but otherwise their censorship was marked by their violent disputes.—5. L., brother of No. 4, praetor in Sicily, probably in 96, and consul in 94, belonged to the party of Sulla, and was murdered at Rome in 82, by order of the younger Marius.—6. Cn., son of No. 4, married Cornelia, daughter of L. Cinna, consul in 87, and joined the Marian party. He was proscribed by Sulla in 82, and fled to Africa, where he was defeated and killed by Cn. Pompey in 81.—7. L., son of No. 4, married Porcia, the sister of M. Cato, and was a stanch and courageous supporter of the aristocratical party. He was aedile in 61, praetor in 58, and consul in 54. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he threw himself into Corfinium, but was compelled by his own troops to surrender to Caesar. He next went to Massilia, and, after the surrender of that town, repaired to Pompey in Greece: he fell in the battle of Pharsalia (48), where he commanded the left wing, and, according to Cicero's assertion in the second Philippic, by the hand of Antony.—8. Cn., son of No. 7, was taken with his father at Corfinium (49), was present at the battle of Pharsalia (48), and returned to Italy in 46, when he was pardoned by Caesar. After Caesar's death in 44, he commanded the republican fleet in the Ionian sea. He afterwards became reconciled to Antony, whom he accompanied in his campaign against the Parthians in 36. He was consul in 32, and deserted to Augustus shortly before the battle of Actium.—9. L., son of No. 8, married Antonia, the daughter of Antony by Octavia; was aedile in 22, and consul in 16; and after his consulship, commanded the Roman army in Germany and crossed the Elbe. He died A. D. 25.—10. Cn., son of No. 9, consul A. D. 32, married Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and was father of the emperor Nero. [AGRIPPINA.]

Ajax (Αἴας). 1. Son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Periboea or Eriboea, and grandson of Aeacus. Homer calls him Ajax the Telamonian, Ajax the Great, or simply Ajax, whereas the other Ajax, son of Oïleus, is always distinguished from the former by some epithet. He sailed against Troy in 12 ships, and is represented in the Iliad as second only to Achilles in bravery, and as the hero most worthy, in the absence of Achilles, to contend with Hector. In the contest for the armour of Achilles, he was conquered by Ulysses, and this, says Homer, was the cause of his death. (Od. xi. 541, seq.) Homer gives no further particulars respecting his death; but later poets relate that his defeat by Ulysses threw him into an awful state of madness; that he rushed from his tent and slaughtered the sheep of the Greek army, fancying they were his enemies; and that at length he put an end to his own life. From his blood there sprang up a purple flower bearing the letters αἰ on its leaves, which were at once the initials of his name and expressive of a sigh. Homer does not mention his mistress TECMESSA. Ajax was worshipped in Salamis, and was honoured with a festival (Αἰάντεια). He was also worshipped at Athens, and one of the Attic tribes (Aeantis) was called after him.—2. Son of Oïleus, king of the Locrians, also called the lesser Ajax, sailed against Troy in 40 ships. He is described as small of stature, and wears a linen cuirass (λινοθώρηξ), but is brave and intrepid, skilled in throwing the spear, and, next to Achilles, the most swift-footed among the Greeks. On his return from Troy his vessel was wrecked on the Whirling Rocks (Γυραὶ πέτραι); he himself got safe upon a rock through the assistance of Poseidon; but as he boasted that he would escape in defiance of the immortals, Poseidon split the rock with his trident, and Ajax was swallowed up by the sea. This is the account of Homer, but his death is related somewhat differently by Virgil and other writers, who also tell us that the anger of Athena was excited against him, because, on the night of the capture of Troy, he violated Cassandra in the temple of the goddess, where she had taken refuge. The Opuntian Locrians worshipped Ajax as their national hero.

Aides (Ἀΐδης). [HADES.]

Aidōneus (Ἀϊδωνεύς). 1. A lengthened form of Aïdes. [HADES.]—2. A mythical king of the Molossians in Epirus, husband of Persephone, and father of Core. When Theseus and Pirithous attempted to carry off Core, Aïdoneus had Pirithous killed by Cerberus, and kept Theseus in captivity till he was released by Hercules.

Aius Locūtĭus or Lŏquens, a Roman divinity. A short time before the Gauls took Rome (B. C. 390) a voice was heard at Rome in the Via nova, during the silence of night, announcing that the Gauls were approaching. No attention was at the time paid to the warning, but the Romans afterwards erected on the spot where the voice had been heard, an altar with a sacred enclosure around it, to Aius Locutius, or the "Announcing Speaker."

Alăbanda (ἡ Ἀλάβανδα or τὰ Ἀλάβανδα: Ἀλαβανδεύς or Ἀλάβανδος: Arabissar), an inland town of Caria, near the Marsyas, to the S. of the Maeander, was situated between two hills: it was a prosperous place, but one of the most corrupt and luxurious towns in Asia Minor. Under the Romans it was the seat of a conventus juridicus.

Alăbon (Ἀλαβών), a river and town in Sicily, N. of Syracuse.

Alagŏnĭa (Ἀλαγονία), a town of the Eleuthero-Laconians on the frontiers of Messenia.

Alalcŏmĕnae (Ἀλαλκομεναί: Ἀλαλκομεναῖος, Ἀλαλκομενιεύς). 1. (Sulinari), an ancient town of Boeotia, E. of Coronēa, with a temple of Athene, who is said to have been born in the town, and who was hence called Alalcomenēis (Ἀλαλκομενηΐς, ΐδος). The name of the town was derived either from Alalcomenia, a daughter of Ogyges, or from the Boeotian hero Alalcomenes. —2. A town in Ithaca, or in the island Asteria, between Ithaca and Cephallenia.

Alalĭa. [ALERIA.]

Alāni (Ἀλανοί, Ἀλαυνοί, i. e. mountaineers, from the Sarmatian word ala), a great Asiatic people, included under the general name of Scythians, but probably a branch of the Massagetae. They were a nation of warlike horsemen. They are first found about the E. part of the Caucasus, in the country called Albania, which appears to be only another form of the same name. In the reign of Vespasian they made incursions into Media and Armenia; and at a later time they pressed into Europe, as far as the banks of the Lower Danube, where, towards the end of the 5th century, they were routed by the Huns, who then compelled them to become their allies. In A. D. 406, some of the Alani took part with the Vandals in their irruption into Gaul and Spain, where they gradually disappear from history.

Alarĭcus, in German Al-ric, i. e. "All-rich," elected king of the Visigoths in A. D. 398, had previously commanded the Gothic auxiliaries of Theodosius. He twice invaded Italy, first in A. D. 402—403, when he was defeated by Stilicho at the battle of Pollentia, and a second time in 408—410; in his second invasion he took and plundered Rome, 24th of August, 410. He died shortly afterwards at Consentia in Bruttium, while preparing to invade Sicily.

Alastor (Ἀλάστωρ). 1. A surname of Zeus as the avenger of evil, and also in general any deity who avenges wicked deeds.—2. A Lycian, and companion of Sarpedon, slain by Ulysses.

Alba Silvĭus, one of the mythical kings of Alba, son of Latinus, reigned 39 years.

Alba. 1. (Abla), a town of the Bastitani in Spain.—2. (Alvanna), a town of the Barduli in Spain.—3. Augusta (Aulps, nr. Durance), a town of the Elicoci in Gallia Narbonensis.—4. Fūcentia or Fucentis (Albenses: Alba or Albi), a town of the Marsi, and subsequently a Roman colony, was situated on a lofty rock near the lake Fucĭnus. It was a strong fortress, and was used by the Romans as a state prison.—5. Longa (Albāni), the most ancient town in Latium, is said to have been built by Ascanius, and to have founded Rome. It was called Longa, from its stretching in a long line down the Alban Mount towards the Alban Lake, perhaps near the modern convent of Palazzolo. It was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, and was never rebuilt: its inhabitants were removed to Rome. At a later time the surrounding country, which was highly cultivated and covered with vineyards, was studded with the splendid villas of the Roman aristocracy and emperors (Pompey's, Domitian's, &c.), each of which was called Albanum, and out of which a new town at length grew, also called Albanum (Albano), on the Appian road, ruins of which are extant.—6. Pompeia (Albenses Pompeiani: Alba), a town in Liguria, founded by Scipio Africanus I., and colonized by Pompeius Magnus, the birthplace of the emperor Pertinax.

Albānĭa (Ἀλβανία: Ἀλβανοί, Albāni; Schirwan and part of Daghestan, in the S.E. part of Georgia), a country of Asia on the W. side of the Caspian, extending from the rivers Cyrus and Araxes on the S. to M. Ceraunius (the E. part of the Caucasus) on the N., and bounded on the W. by Iberia. It was a fertile plain, abounding in pasture and vineyards; but the inhabitants were fierce and warlike. They were a Scythian tribe, probably a branch of the Massagetae, and identical with the ALANI. The Romans first became acquainted with them at the time of the Mithridatic war, when they encountered Pompey with a large army.

Albānum. [ALBA, No. 5.]

Albānus Lacus (Lago di Albano), a small lake about 5 miles in circumference, W. of the Mons Albanus between Bovillae and Alba Longa, is the crater of an extinct volcano, and is many hundred feet deep. The emissarium which the Romans bored through the solid rock during the siege of Veii, in order to carry off the superfluous water of the lake, is extant at the present day.

Albānus Mons (Monte Cavo or Albano), was, in its narrower signification, the mountain in Latium on whose declivity the town of Alba Longa was situated. It was the sacred mountain of the Latins, on which the religious festivals of the Latin League were celebrated (Feriae Latinae), and on its highest summit was the temple of Jupiter Latiaris, to which the Roman generals ascended in triumph, when this honour was denied them in Rome. The Mons Albanus in its wider signification included the Mons ALGIDUS and the mountains about Tusculum.

Albi Montes, a lofty range of mountains in the W. of Crete, 300 stadia in length, covered with snow the greater part of the year.

Albĭci (Ἀλβίοικοι, Ἀλβιεῖς), a warlike Gallic people, inhabiting the mountains north of Massilia.

Albingaunum. [ALBIUM INGAUNUM.]

Albinovānus, C. Pedo, a friend of Ovid, who addresses to him one of his Epistles from Pontus (iv. 10). Three Latin elegies are attributed to Albinovanus, printed by Wernsdorf, in his Poëtae Latini Minores, vol. iii. iv., and by Meinecke, Quedlinburg, 1819.

Albīnŏvānus, P. Tullĭus, belonged to the Marian party, was proscribed in B.C. 87, but was pardoned by Sulla in 81, in consequence of his putting to death many of the officers of Norbanus, whom he had invited to a banquet at Ariminum.

Albīnus or Albus, Postumĭus, the name of a patrician family at Rome, many of the members of which held the highest offices of the state from the commencement of the republic to its downfal.—1. A., surnamed Regillensis, dictator B.C. 498, when he conquered the Latins in the great battle near lake Regillus, and consul 496, in which year some of the annals placed the battle.—2. Sp., consul 466, and a member of the first decemvirate 451.—3. Sp., consul 344, and again 321. In the latter year he marched against the Samnites, but was defeated near Caudium, and obliged to surrender with his whole army, who were sent under the yoke. The senate, on the advice of Albinus, refused to ratify the peace which he had made with the Samnites, and resolved that all persons who had sworn to the peace should be given up to the Samnites, but they refused to accept them.—4. L., consul 234, and again 229. In 216 he was praetor, and was killed in battle by the Boii.—5. Sp., consul in 186, when the senatusconsultum was passed, which is extant, for suppressing the worship of Bacchus in Rome. He died in 179.—6. A., consul 180, when he fought against the Ligurians, and censor 174. He was subsequently engaged in many public missions. Livy calls him Luscus, from which it would seem that he was blind of one eye.—7. L., praetor 180, in Further Spain, where he remained two years, and conquered the Vaccaei and Lusitani. He was consul in 173, and afterwards served under Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia in 168.—8. A., consul 151, accompanied L. Mummius into Greece in 146. He was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote in that language a poem and a Roman history, which is censured by Polybius.—9. Sp., consul 110, carried on war against Jugurtha in Numidia, but effected nothing. When Albinus departed from Africa, he left his brother Aulus in command, who was defeated by Jugurtha. Spurius was condemned by the Mamilia Lex, as guilty of treasonable practices with Jugurtha.—10. A., consul B. C. 99, with M. Antonius, is said by Cicero to have been a good speaker.

Albīnus (Ἀλβῖνος), a Platonic philosopher, lived at Smyrna in the 2nd century after Christ, and wrote an Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato, which contains hardly any thing of importance.—Editions. In the first edition of Fabricius's Bibl. Graec. vol. ii., aud prefixed to Etwall's edition of three dialogues of Plato, Oxon. 1771; and to Fischer's four dialogues of Plato, Lips. 1783.

Albīnus, Clōdius, whose full name was Decimus Clodius Ceionius Septimius Albinus, was born at Adrumetum in Africa. The emperor Commodus made him governor of Gaul and afterwards of Britain, where he was on the death of Commodus in A. D. 192. In order to secure the neutrality of Albinus, Septimius Severus made him Caesar; but after Severus had defeated his rivals, he turned his arms against Albinus. A great battle was fought between them at Lugdunum (Lyons), in Gaul, the 19th of February, 197, in which Albinus was defeated and killed.

Albĭon or Alebĭon (Ἀλβίων, Ἀλεβίων), son of Poseidon and brother of Dercynus or Bergion, with whom he attacked Hercules, when he passed through their country (Liguria) with the oxen of Geryon. They were slain by Hercules.

Albĭon, another name of BRITANNIA, the white land, from its white cliffs opposite the coast of Gaul.

Albis (Elbe), one of the great rivers in Germany, the most easterly which the Romans became acquainted with, rises according to Tacitus in the country of the Hermunduri. The Romans reached the Elbe for the first time in B. C. 9 under Drusus, and crossed it for the first time in B. C. 3 under Domitius Ahenobarbus. The last Roman general who saw the Elbe was Tiberius in A. D. 5.

Albĭum Ingaunum or Albingaunum (Albengo), a town of the Ingauni on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium.

Albĭum Intemelĭum or Albintemelĭum (Vintimiglia), a town of the Intemelii on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium.

T. Albūcĭus or Albūtĭus, studied at Athens, and belonged to the Epicurean sect; he was well acquainted with Greek literature, but was satirized by Lucilius on account of his affecting on every occasion the Greek language and philosophy. He was praetor in Sardinia in B. C. 105; and in 103 was accused of repetundae by C. Julius Caesar, and condemned. He retired to Athens and pursued the study of philosophy.

Albŭla, an ancient name of the river TIBER.

Albŭlae Aquae [ALBUNEA.]

Albūnĕa or Albūna, a prophetic nymph or Sybil, to whom a grove was consecrated in the neighbourhood of Tibur (Tivoli), with a fountain and a temple. This fountain was the largest of the Albulae aquae, still called Acque Albule, sulphureous springs at Tibur, which flow into the Anio. Near it was the oracle of Faunus Fatidicus. The temple is still extant at Tivoli.

Alburnus Mons, a mountain in Lucania, covered with wood, behind Paestum.

Alcaeus (Ἀλκαῖος), son of Perseus and Andromeda, and father of Amphitryon and Anaxo.

Alcaeus. 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the earliest of the Aeolian lyric poets, began to flourish about B. C. 611. In the war between the Athenians and Mytilenaeans for the possession of Sigēum (B. C. 606) he incurred the disgrace of leaving his arms on the field of battle: these arms were hung up as a trophy by the Athenians in the temple of Pallas at Sigeum. Alcaeus took an active part in the struggles between the nobles and people of Mytilene: he belonged by birth to the nobles and was driven into exile with his brother Antimenidas, when the popular party got the upper hand. He attempted by force of arms to regain his country; but all his attempts were frustrated by PITTACUS, who had been chosen by the people Aesymnetes or dictator for the purpose of resisting him and the other exiles. Alcaeus and his brother afterwards travelled into various countries: the time of his death is uncertain. Some fragments of his poems which remain, and the excellent imitations of Horace, enable us to understand something of their character. Those which have received the highest praise are his warlike odes, in which he tried to rouse the spirits of the nobles, the Alcaei minaces Camenae of Horace (Carm. iv. 9. 7). In others he described the hardships of exile, and his perils by sea (dura navis, dura fugae mala, dura belli, Hor. Carm. ii. 13. 27). Alcaeus is said to have invented the well-known Alcaic metre.—Editions. By Matthiae, Alcaei Mytilenaei reliquiae, Lips. 1827; and by Bergk, in Poetae Lyrici Graeci, Lips. 1843.—2. A comic poet at Athens, flourished about B. C. 388, and exhibited plays of that mixed comedy, which formed the transition between the old and the middle.—3. Of Messene, the author of 22 epigrams in the Greek anthology, written between B. C. 219 and 196.

Alcămĕnes (Ἀλκαμένης). 1. Son of Teleclus, king of Sparta, from B. C. 779 to 742.—2. A statuary of Athens flourished from B. C. 444 to 400 and was the most famous of the pupils of Phidias. His greatest work was a statue of Aphrodite.

Alcander (Ἄλκανδρος), a young Spartan, who thrust out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, when his fellow-citizens were discontented with the laws he proposed. Lycurgus pardoned the outrage, and thus converted Alcander into one of his warmest friends.

Alcăthŏē or Alcĭthŏē (Ἀλκαθόη or Ἀλκιθόη), daughter of Minyas, refused with her sisters Leucippe and Arsippe to join in the worship of Dionysus when it was introduced into Boeotia, and were accordingly changed by the god into bats, and their work into vines. See Dict. of Ant. art. Agrionia.

Alcăthŏus (Ἀλκάθοος). 1. Son of Pelops and Hippodamīa, brother of Atreus and Thyestes, obtained as his wife Euaechme, the daughter of Megareus, by slaying the Cithaeronian lion, and succeeded his father-in-law as king of Megara. He restored the walls of Megara, in which work he was assisted by Apollo. The stone upon which the god used to place his lyre while he was at work, was believed, even in late times, to give forth a sound, when struck, similar to that of a lyre (Ov. Met. viii. 15).—2. Son of Aesyetes and husband of Hippodamīa, the daughter of Anchises and sister of Aeneas, was one of the bravest of the Trojan leaders in the war of Troy, and was slain by Idomeneus.

Alcestis or Alcestē (Ἄλκηστις or Ἀλκέστη), daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, wife of Admetus, died in place of her husband. [ADMETUS.]

Alcĕtas (Ἀλκέτας), two kings of Epirus. 1. Son of Tharypus, was expelled from his kingdom, and was restored by the elder Dionysius of Syracuse. He was the ally of the Athenians in B. C. 373.—2. Son of Arymbas, and grandson of Alcetas I., reigned B. C. 313—303, and was put to death by his subjects.

Alcĕtas. 1. King of Macedonia, reigned 29 years, and was father of Amyntas I.—2. Brother of Perdiccas and son of Orontes, was one of Alexander's generals. On the death of Alexander, he espoused his brother's party, and upon the murder of the latter in Egypt in 321, he joined Eumenes. He killed himself at Termessus in Pisidia in 320, to avoid falling into the hands of Antigonus.

Alcĭbĭădes (Ἀλκιβιάδης), son of Clinias and Dinomache, was born at Athens about B. C. 450, and on the death of his father in 447, was brought up by his relation Pericles. He possessed a beautiful person, transcendent abilities, and great wealth, which received a large accession through his marriage with Hipparĕte, the daughter of Hipponīcus. His youth was disgraced by his amours and debaucheries, and Socrates, who saw his vast capabilities, attempted to win him to the paths of virtue, but in vain. Their intimacy was strengthened by mutual services. At the battle of Potidaea (B. C. 432) his life was saved by Socrates, and at that of Delium (424) he saved the life of Socrates. He did not take much part in public affairs till after the death of Cleon (422), but he then became one of the leading politicians, and the head of the war party in opposition to Nicias. Enraged at the affront put upon him by the Lacedaemonians, who had not chosen to employ his intervention in the negotiations which ended in the peace of 421, and had preferred Nicias to him, he induced the Athenians to form an alliance with Argos, Mantinēa, and Elis, and to attack the allies of Sparta. In 415 he was foremost among the advocates of the Sicilian expedition, which he believed would be a step towards the conquest of Italy, Carthage, and Peloponnesus. While the preparations for the expedition were going on, there occurred the mysterious mutilation of the Hermes-busts, which the popular fears connected in some unaccountable manner with an attempt to overthrow the Athenian constitution. Alcibiades was charged with being the ringleader in this attempt. He had been already appointed along with Nicias and Lamachus as commander of the expedition to Sicily, and he now demanded an investigation before he set sail. This, however, his enemies would not grant; as they hoped to increase the popular odium against him in his absence. He was therefore obliged to depart for Sicily; but he had not been there long, before he was recalled to stand his trial. On his return homewards, he managed to escape at Thurii, and thence proceeded to Sparta, where he acted as the avowed enemy of his country. At Athens sentence of death was passed upon him, and his property was confiscated. At Sparta he rendered himself popular by the facility with which he adopted the Spartan manners; but the machinations of his enemy AGIS II. induced him to abandon the Spartans and take refuge with Tissaphernes (412), whose favour he soon gained. Through his influence Tissaphernes deserted the Spartans and professed his willingness to assist the Athenians, who accordingly recalled Alcibiades from banishment in 411. He did not immediately return to Athens, but remained abroad for the next 4 years, during which the Athenians under his command gained the victories of Cynossema, Abydos, and Cyzicus, and got possession of Chalcedon and Byzantium. In 407 he returned to Athens, where he was received with great euthusiasm, and was appointed commander-in-chief of all the land and sea forces. But the defeat at Notium, occasioned during his absence by the imprudence of his lieutenant, Antiochus, furnished his enemies with a handle against him, and he was superseded in his command (B. C. 406). He now went into voluntary exile to his fortified domain at Bisanthe in the Thracian Chersonesus, where he made war on the neighbouring Thracians. Before the fatal battle of Aegos-Potami (405), he gave an ineffectual warning to the Athenian generals. After the fall of Athens (404), he was condemned to banishment, and took refuge with Pharnabazus; he was about to proceed to the court of Artaxerxes, when one night his house was surrounded by a band of armed men, and set on fire. He rushed out sword in hand, but fell, pierced with arrows (404). The assassins were probably either employed by the Spartans, or by the brothers of a lady whom Alcibiades had seduced. He left a son by his wife Hipparete, named Alcibiades, who never distinguished himself. It was for him that Isocrates wrote the speech Περὶ τοῦ Ζεύγους.

Alcĭdămas (Ἀλκιδάμας), a Greek rhetorician, of Elaea in Aeolis, in Asia Minor, was a pupil of Gorgias, and resided at Athens between B. C. 432 and 411. His works were characterised by pompous diction and the extravagant use of poetical epithets and phrases. There are two declamations extant which bear his name, entitled Ulysses, and On the Sophists, but they were probably not written by him. Editions.—In Reiske's Oratores Graeci, vol. viii., and in Bekker's Oratores Attici, vol. vii.

Alcīdas (Ἀλκίδας Dor. = Ἀλκείδης), a Spartan commander of the fleet in the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 428—427. In the former year he was sent to Mytilene, and in the latter to Corcyra.

Alcīdes (Ἀλκείδης), a name of Amphitryon, the son of Alcaeus, and more especially of Hercules, the grandson of Alcaeus.

Alcĭmēdē (Ἀλκιμέδη), daughter of Phylacus and Clymene, wife of Aeson, and mother of Jason.

Alcĭmus (Avītus) Alethĭus, the writer of 7 short poems, a rhetorician in Aquitania, in Gaul, is spoken of in terms of praise by Sidonius Apollinaris, and Ausonius.—Editions. In Meier's Anthologia Latina, ed. 254—260, and in Wernsdorf's Poëtae Latini Minores, vol. vi.

Alcĭnŏus (Ἀλκίνοος). 1. Son of Nausithous, and grandson of Poseidon, is celebrated in the story of the Argonauts, and still more in the Odyssey. Homer represents him as the happy ruler of the Phaeacians in the island of Scheria, who has by Arete five sons and one daughter, Nausicaa. The way in which he received Ulysses, and the stories which the latter related to the king about his wanderings, occupy a considerable portion of the Odyssey (books vi. to xiii.).—2. A Platonic philosopher, who probably lived under the Caesars, wrote a work entitled Epitome of the Doctrines of Plato.—Editions. By Fell, Oxon. 1667, and by J. F. Fischer, Lips. 1783, 8vo.

Alciphron (Ἀλκίφρων), the most distinguished of the Greek epistolary writers, was perhaps a contemporary of Lucian, about A. D. 180. The letters (113 in number, in 3 books) are written by fictitious personages, and the language is distinguished by its purity and elegance. The new Attic comedy was the principal source from which the author derived his information respecting the characters and manners which he describes, and for this reason they contain much valuable information about the private life of the Athenians of that time.—Editions. By Bergler, Lips. 1715, and by Wagner, Lips. 1798.

Alcĭthŏe. [ALCATHOE.]

Alcmaeon (Ἀλκμαίων). 1. Son of Amphiarāus and Eriphyle, and brother of Amphilochus. His mother was induced by the necklace of Harmonia, which she received from Polynīces, to persuade her husband Amphiaraus to take part in the expedition against Thebes; and as he knew he should perish there, he enjoined his sons to kill their mother as soon as they should be grown up. Alcmaeon took part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes, and on his return home after the capture of the city, he slew his mother according to the injunction of his father. For this deed he became mad, and was haunted by the Erinnyes. He went to Phegeus in Psophis, and being purified by the latter, he married his daughter Arsinoë or Alphesiboea, to whom he gave the necklace and peplus of Harmonia. But as the land of this country ceased to bear on account of its harbouring a matricide, he left Psophis and repaired to the country at the mouth of the river Achelous. The god Achelous gave him his daughter Callirrhoë in marriage; and as the latter wished to possess the necklace and peplus of Harmonia, Alcmaeon went to Psophis and obtained them from Phegeus, under the pretext of dedicating them at Delphi; but when Phegeus heard that the treasures were fetched for Callirrhoë, he caused his sons to murder Alcmaeon. Alcmaeon was worshipped as a hero at Thebes, and at Psophis his tomb was shown, surrounded with cypresses.—2. Son of Megacles, was greatly enriched by Croesus.—3. Of Crotona in Italy, said to have been a pupil of Pythagoras, though this is very doubtful. He is said to have been the first person who dissected animals, and he made some important discoveries in anatomy and natural philosophy. He wrote several medical and philosophical works, which are lost.

Alcmaeōnĭdae (Ἀλκμαιωνίδαι), a noble family at Athens, members of which fill a space in Grecian history from B. C. 750 to 400. They were a branch of the family of the Nelīdae, who were driven out of Pylus in Messenia by the Dorians, and settled at Athens. In consequence of the way in which Megacles, one of the family, treated the insurgents under CYLON (B. C. 612), they brought upon themselves the guilt of sacrilege, and were in consequence banished from Athens, about 595. About 560 they returned from exile, but were again expelled by Pisistratus. In 548 they contracted with the Amphictyonic council to rebuild the temple of Delphi, and obtained great popularity throughout Greece by executing the work in a style of magnificence which much exceeded their engagement. On the expulsion of Hippias in 510, they were again restored to Athens. They now joined the popular party, and Clisthenes, who was at that time the head of the family, gave a new constitution to Athens. [CLISTHENES.]

Alcman (Ἀλκμάν, also called Ἀλκμαίων), the chief lyric poet of Sparta, by birth a Lydian of Sardis, was brought to Laconia as a slave, when very young, and was emancipated by his master, who discovered his genius. He probably flourished about B. C. 631, and most of his poems were composed after the conclusion of the second Messenian war. He is said to have died, like Sulla, of the morbus pedicularis. Alcman's poems were comprised in 6 books: many of them were erotic, and he is said by some ancient writers to have been the inventor of erotic poetry. His metres were very various. The Cretic hexameter was named Alcmanic, from his being its inventor. His dialect was the Spartan Doric, with an intermixture of the Aeolic. The Alexandrian grammarians placed Alcman at the head of their canon of the 9 lyric poets. The fragments of his poems are edited by Welcker, Giessen, 1815; and by Bergk, in Poetae Lyrici Graeci, 1843.

Alcmēnē (Ἀλκμήνη), daughter of Electryon, king of Mycenae, by Anaxo or Lysidice. The brothers of Alcmene were slain by the sons of Pterelaus; and their father set out to avenge their death, leaving to Amphitryon his kingdom and his daughter Alcmene, whom Amphitryon was to marry. But Amphitryon having unintentionally killed Electryon before the marriage, Sthenelus expelled both Amphitryon and Alcmene, who went to Thebes. But here, instead of marrying Amphitryon, Alcmene declared that she would only marry the man who should avenge the death of her brothers. Amphitryon undertook the task, and invited Creon of Thebes to assist him. During his absence, Zeus, in the disguise of Amphitryon, visited Alcmene, and, pretending to be her husband, related in what way he had avenged the death of her brothers. Amphitryon himself returned the next day; Alcmene became the mother of Hercules by Zeus, and of Iphicles by Amphitryon. [HERCULES.] After the death of Amphitryon, Alcmene married Rhadamanthys, at Ocalīa in Boeotia. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, Alcmene, fearing Eurystheus, fled with the sons of Hercules to Athens.

Alcyŏnē or Halcyŏnē (Ἀλκυόνη). 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and beloved by Poseidon. — 2. Daughter of Aeolus and Enarete or Aegiale, and wife of Ceÿx. They lived so happily that they were presumptuous enough to call each other Zeus and Hera, for which Zeus metamorphosed them into birds, alcyon and ceÿx. Others relate that Ceÿx perished in a shipwreck, that Alcyone for grief threw herself into the sea, and that the gods, out of compassion, changed the two into birds. It was fabled, that during the seven days before, and as many after, the shortest day of the year, while the bird alcyon was breeding, there always prevailed calms at sea.

Alcyŏneus (Ἀλκυονεύς), a giant, killed by Hercules at the Isthmus of Corinth.

Alcyŏnĭum Măre (ἡ Ἀλκυονὶς θάλασσα), the E. part of the Corinthian gulf.

Alĕa (Ἀλέα), a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Alea, Mantinea, and Tegea. Her temple at the latter place was one of the most celebrated in Greece. It is said to have been built by Aleus, son of Aphīdas, king of Tegea, from whom the goddess is supposed to have derived this surname.

Alĕa (Ἀλέα: Ἀλεύς), a town in Arcadia, E. of the Stymphalian lake, with a celebrated temple of Athena, the ruins of which are near Piali.

Alebĭon. [ALBION.]

Alecto. [EUMENIDES.]

Alemanni or Alamanni or Alamani (from the German alle Männer, all men), a confederacy of German tribes, chiefly of Suevic extraction, between the Danube, the Rhine, and the Main, though we subsequently find them extending their territories as far as the Alps and the Jura. The different tribes of the confederacy were governed by their own kings, but in time of war they obeyed a common leader. They were brave and warlike, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They first came into contact with the Romans in the reign of Caracalla, who assumed the surname of Alemannicus on account of a pretended victory over them (A. D. 214). They were attacked by Alexander Severus (234), and by Maximin (237). They invaded Italy in 270, but were driven back by Aurelian, and were again defeated by Probus in 282. After this time they continually invaded the Roman dominions in Germany, and, though defeated by Constantius I., Julian (357), Valentinian, and Gratian, they gradually became more and more powerful, and in the fifth century were in possession of Alsace and of German Switzerland.

Alĕrĭa (Ἀλερία: Ἀλαλία in Herod.), one of the chief cities of Corsica, on the E. of the island, on the S. bank of the river Rhotanus (Tarignano) near its mouth. It was founded by the Phocaeans B. C. 564, was plundered by L. Scipio in the first Punic war, and was made a Roman colony by Sulla.

Alĕsa. [HALESA.]

Alĕsĭa (Ἀλεσία), an ancient town of the Mandubii in Gallia Lugdunensis, said to have been founded by Hercules, and situated on a high hill (now Auxois), which was washed by the two rivers Lutosa (Oze) and Osera (Ozerain). It was taken and destroyed by Caesar, in B. C. 52, after a memorable siege, but was afterwards rebuilt.

Alĕsĭae (Ἀλεσίαι), a town in Laconia, W. of Sparta, on the road to Pherae.

Alēsĭum (Ἀλείσιον), a town in Elis, not far from Olympia, afterwards called Alesiaeum.

Alēsĭus Mons (τὸ Ἀλήσιον ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia, with a temple of Poseidon Hippius and a grove of Demeter.

Alētes (Ἀλήτης), son of Hippotes and a descendant of Hercules, is said to have taken possession of Corinth, and to have expelled the Sisyphids, 30 years after the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Heraclids. His family, called the Aletidae, maintained themselves at Corinth down to the time of Bacchis.

Alētĭum (Aletīnus), a town of Calabria.

Aletrĭum or Alatrĭum (Aletrīnas, -ātis: Alatri), an ancient town of the Hernici, subsequently a municipium and a Roman colony, W. of Sora and E. of Anagnia.

Aleuădae. [ALEUAS.]

Aleuas (Ἀλεύας), a descendant of Hercules, was the ruler of Larissa in Thessaly, and the reputed founder of the celebrated family of the Aleuadae. Before the time of Pisistratus (B. C. 560), the family of the Aleuadae appears to have become divided into two branches, the Aleuadae and the Scopadae. The Scopadae inhabited Crannon and perhaps Pharsalus also, while the main branch, the Aleuadae, remained at Larissa. The influence of the families, however, was not confined to these towns, but extended more or less over the greater part of Thessaly. They formed in reality a powerful aristocratic party in opposition to the great body of the Thessalians. In the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (480), the Aleuadae espoused the cause of the Persians, and the family continued to be the predominant one in Thessaly for a long time afterwards. But after the end of the Peloponnesian war (404), another Thessalian family, the dynasts of Pherae, gradually rose to power and influence, and gave a great shock to the power of the Aleuadae. The most formidable of these princes was Jason of Pherae, who succeeded, after various struggles, in raising himself to the dignity of Tagus, or supreme ruler of Thessaly. [JASON.]

Aleus. [ALEA.]

Alex or Hălex (Alece), a small river in S. Italy, was the boundary between the territory of Rhegium and of the Locri Epizephyrii.

Alexander (Ἀλέξανδρος), the usual name of PARIS in the Iliad.

Alexander Sevērus. [SEVERUS.]

Alexander. I. Minor Historical Persons.

1. Son of Aeropus, a native of the Macedonian district called Lyncestis, whence he is usually called Alexander Lyncestes. He was an accomplice in the murder of Philip, B. C. 336, but was pardoned by Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alexander to Asia; but in 334 he was detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Darius, was kept in confinement and put to death in 330. — 2. Son of Antonius the triumvir, and Cleopatra, born with his twin-sister Cleopatra, B. C. 40. After the battle of Actium they were taken to Rome by Augustus, and were generously educated by Octavia, the wife of Antonius, with her own children. — 3. Eldest son of Aristobulus II., king of Judaea, rose in arms in B. C. 57, against Hyrcanus, who was supported by the Romans. Alexander was defeated by the Romans in 56 and 55, and was put to death by Pompey at Antioch in 49.—4. Third son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great. In his quarrel with his elder brother Antipater for the government [ANTIPATER], he called in the aid of Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes, by the latter of whom he was murdered B. C. 294.—5. Jannaeus, the son of Joannes Hyrcanus, and brother of Aristobulus I., king of the Jews B. C. 104—77. At the commencement of his reign he was engaged in war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus ; and subsequently he had to carry on for six years a dangerous struggle with his own subjects, to whom he had rendered himself obnoxious by his cruelties and by opposing the Pharisees. He signalized his victory by the most frightful butchery of his subjects.—6. Surnamed Isius, the chief commander of the Aetolians, took an active part in opposing Philip of Macedonia (B. C. 198, 197), and in the various negotiations with the Romans.—7. Tyrant of Pherae, was a relation of Jason, and succeeded either Polydorus or Polyphron, as Tagus of Thessaly, about B. C. 369. In consequence of his tyrannical government the Thessalians applied for aid first to Alexander II., king of Macedonia, and next to Thebes. The Thebans sent Pelopidas into Thessaly to succour the malcontents ; but having ventured incautiously within the power of the tyrant, he was seized by Alexander, and thrown into prison B. C. 368. The Thebans sent a large army into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas, but they were defeated in the first campaign, and did not obtain their object till the next year, 367. In 364 Pelopidas again entered Thessaly with a small force, but was slain in battle by Alexander. The Thebans now sent a large army against the tyrant, and compelled him to become a dependent ally of Thebes. We afterwards hear of Alexander making piratical descents on many of the Athenian dependencies and even on Attica itself. He was murdered in 367, by his wife Thebe, with the assistance of her three brothers.—8. Son of Polysperchon, the Macedonian, was chiefly employed by his father in the command of the armies which he sent against Cassander. Thus he was sent against Athens in B. C. 318, and was engaged in military operations during the next year in various parts of Greece. But in 315 he became reconciled to Cassander, and we find him in 314 commanding on behalf of the latter. He was murdered at Sicyon in 314.—9. Ptolemaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS.] —10. Tiberius, born at Alexandria, of Jewish parents, and nephew of the writer Philo. He deserted the faith of his ancestors, and was rewarded for his apostacy by various public appointments. In the reign of Claudius he succeeded Fadius as procurator of Judaea (A. D. 46), and was appointed by Nero procurator of Egypt. He was the first Roman governor who declared in favour of Vespasian ; and he accompanied Titus in the war against Judaea, and was present at the taking of Jerusalem.

II. Kings of Epirus.

1. Son of Neoptolemus and brother of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Philip made him king of Epirus in place of his cousin Aeacides, and gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage (B. C. 336). In 332, Alexander, at the request of the Tarentines, crossed over into Italy, to aid them against the Lucanians and Bruttii. After meeting with considerable success, he was defeated and slain in battle in 326, near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron in Southern Italy.—2. Son of Pyrrhus and Lanassa, daughter of the Sicilian tyrant Agathocles, succeeded his father in B. C. 272, and drove Antigonus Gonatas out of Macedonia. He was shortly afterwards deprived of both Macedonia and Epirus by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus ; but he recovered Epirus by the aid of the Acarnanians.

III. Kings of Macedonia.

1. Son of Amyntas I., distinguished himself in the life-time of his father by killing the Persian ambassadors who had come to demand the submission of Amyntas, because they attempted to offer indignities to the ladies of the court, about B. C. 507. He succeeded his father shortly afterwards, was obliged to submit to the Persians, and accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B. C. 480). He gained the confidence of Mardonius, who sent him to Athens to propose peace to the Athenians, which was rejected. He was secretly inclined to the cause of the Greeks, and informed them the night before the battle of Plataeae of the intention of Mardonius to fight on the following day. He died about B. C. 455, and was succeeded by Perdiccas II.—2. Son of Amyntas II., whom he succeeded, reigned B. C. 369—367. A usurper of the name of Ptolemy Alorites, having risen against him, Pelopidas, who was called in to mediate between them, left Alexander in possession of the kingdom, but took with him to Thebes several hostages ; among whom was Philip, the youngest brother of Alexander, afterwards king of Macedonia. Alexander was shortly afterwards murdered by Ptolemy Alorites.—3. Surnamed the Great, son of Philip II. and Olympias, was born at Pella, B. C. 356. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus ; and he was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character, which was manifest to the latest period of his life. At the age of 16 Alexander was entrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father, while he was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronēa (338), where the victory was mainly owing to his impetuosity and courage. On the murder of Philip (336), Alexander ascended the throne, at the age of 20, and found himself surrounded by enemies on every side. He first put down rebellion in his own kingdom, and then rapidly marched into Greece. His unexpected activity overawed all opposition ; Thebes, which had been most active against him, submitted when he appeared at its gates ; and the assembled Greeks at the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Lacedaemonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. He now directed his arms against the barbarians of the north, marched (early in 335) across mount Haemus, defeated the Triballi, and advanced as far as the Danube, which he crossed ; and on his return subdued the Illyrians and Taulantii. A report of his death having reached Greece, the Thebans once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. He advanced into Boeotia by rapid marches took Thebes by assault, destroyed all the buildings, with the exception of the house of Pindar, killed most of the inhabitants, and sold the rest as slaves. Alexander now prepared for his great expedition against Persia. In the spring of 334, he crossed the Hellespont, with about 35,000 men. Of these 30,000 were foot and 5000 horse; and of the former only 12,000 were Macedonians. Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the river Granicus in Mysia (May 334), where they were entirely defeated by him. This battle was followed by the capture or submission of the chief towns on the W. coast of Asia Minor. Halicarnassus was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defence by Memnon, the ablest general of Darius, and whose death in the following year (333) relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. He now marched along the coast of Lycia and Pamphylia, and then N. into Phrygia and to Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated Gordian knot, which, it was said, was to be loosened only by the conqueror of Asia. In 333, he marched from Gordium through the centre of Asia Minor into Cilicia, where he nearly lost his life at Tarsus by a fever, brought on by his great exertions, or through throwing himself, when heated, into the cold waters of the Cydnus. Darius meantime had collected an army of 500,000 or 600,000 men, with 30,000 Greek mercenaries, whom Alexander defeated in the narrow plain of Issus. Darius escaped across the Euphrates by the ford of Thapsacus; but his mother, wife, and children fell into the hands of Alexander, who treated them with the utmost delicacy and respect. Alexander now directed his arms against the cities of Phoenicia, most of which submitted; but Tyre was not taken till the middle of 332, after an obstinate defence of seven months. Next followed the siege of Gaza, which again delayed Alexander two months. Afterwards, according to Josephus, he marched to Jerusalem, intending to punish the people for refusing to assist him, but he was diverted from his purpose by the appearance of the high priest, and pardoned the people. This story is not mentioned by Arrian, and rests on questionable evidence.—Alexander next marched into Egypt, which willingly submitted to him, for the Egyptians had ever hated the Persians. At the beginning of 331, Alexander founded at the mouth of the W. branch of the Nile, the city of ALEXANDRIA, and about the same time visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, in the desert of Libya, and was saluted by the priests as the son of Jupiter Ammon. —In the spring of the same year (331), Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army. He marched through Phoenicia and Syria to the Euphrates, which he crossed at the ford of Thapsacus; thence he proceeded through Mesopotamia, crossed the Tigris, and at length met with the immense hosts of Darius, said to have amounted to more than a million of men, in the plains of Gaugamela. The battle was fought in the month of October, 331, and ended in the complete defeat of the Persians. Alexander pursued the fugitives to Arbela (Erbil), which place has given its name to the battle, though distant about 50 miles from the spot where it was fought. Darius, who had left the field of battle early in the day, fled to Ecbatana (Hamadan), in Media. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia, and began to adopt Persian habits and customs, by which he conciliated the affections of his new subjects. From Arbela he marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, all of which surrendered to him. He is said to have set fire to the palace of Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian courtezan.—At the beginning of 330 Alexander marched from Persepolis into Media, in pursuit of Darius, whom he followed through Rhagae and the passes of the Elburz mountains, called by the ancients the Caspian Gates, into the deserts of Parthia, where the unfortunate king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Alexander sent his body to Persepolis, to be buried in the tombs of the Persian kings. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of king of Persia. Alexander was engaged during the remainder of the year in subduing the N. provinces of Asia between the Caspian and the Indus, namely, Hyrcania, Parthia, Aria, the Drangae and Sarangae. It was during this campaign that PHILOTAS, his father PARMENION, and other Macedonians, were executed on the charge of treason. In 329 Alexander crossed the mountains of the Paropamisus (the Hindoo Koosh), and marched into Bactria against Bessus, whom he pursued across the Oxus into Sogdiana. In this country Bessus was betrayed to him, and was put to death. From the Oxus he advanced as far as the Jaxartes (the Sir), which he crossed, and defeated several Scythian tribes N. of that river. After founding a city Alexandria on the Jaxartes, he retraced his steps, and returned to Zariaspa or Bactra, where he spent the winter of 329. It was here that he killed his friend Clitus in a drunken revel.—In 328, Alexander again crossed the Oxus to complete the subjugation of Sogdiana, but was not able to effect it in the year, and accordingly went into winter quarters at Nautaca, a place in the middle of the province. At the beginning of 327, he took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposited his wife and daughters. The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror, and he accordingly made her his wife. This marriage with one of his Eastern subjects was in accordance with the whole of his policy. Having completed the conquest of Sogdiana, he marched S. into Bactria, and made preparations for the invasion of India. While in Bactria another conspiracy was discovered for the murder of the king. The plot was formed by Hermolaus with a number of the royal pages, and Callisthenes, a pupil of Aristotle, was involved in it. All the conspirators were put to death. Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of 327, and crossed the Indus, probably near the modern Attock. He met with no resistance till he reached the Hydaspes, where he was opposed by Porus, an Indian king, whom he defeated after a gallant resistance, and took prisoner. Alexander restored to him his kingdom, and treated him with distinguished honour. He founded two towns, one on each bank of the Hydaspes: one called Bucephala, in honour of his horse Bucephalus, who died here, after carrying him through so many victories; and the other Nicaea, to commemorate his victory. From thence he marched across the Acesines (the Chinab) and the Hydraotes (the Ravee), and penetrated as far as the Hyphasis (Garra). This was the furthest point which he reached, for the Macedonians, worn out by long service, and tired of the war, refused to advance further; and Alexander, notwithstanding his entreaties and prayers, was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, where he had previously given orders for the building of a fleet, and then sailed down the river with about 8000 men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. This was late in the autumn of 327. The people on each side of the river submitted without resistance, except the Malli, in the conquest of one of whose places Alexander was severely wounded. At the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus, Alexander founded a city, and left Philip as satrap, with a considerable body of Greeks. Here he built some fresh ships, and continued his voyage down the Indus, founded a city at Pattala, the apex of the delta of the Indus, and sailed into the Indian ocean, which he reached about the middle of 326. Nearchus was sent with the fleet to sail along the coast to the Persian gulf [NEARCHUS]; and Alexander marched with the rest of his forces through Gedrosia, in which country his army suffered greatly from want of water and provisions. He reached Susa at the beginning of 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest from their labours; and anxious to form his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned to about 80 of his generals Asiatic wives, and gave with them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius, and according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About 10,000 Macedonians followed the example of their king and generals, and married Asiatic women. Alexander also enrolled large numbers of Asiatics among his troops, and taught them the Macedonian tactics. He moreover directed his attention to the increase of commerce, and for this purpose had the Euphrates and Tigris made navigable, by removing the artificial obstructions which had been made in the river for the purpose of irrigation. The Macedonians, who were discontented with several of the new arrangements of the king, rose in mutiny against him, which he quelled with some difficulty. Towards the close of the same year (325) he went to Ecbatana, where he lost his great favourite HEPHAESTION. From Ecbatana he marched to Babylon, subduing in his way the Cossaei, a mountain tribe; and before he reached Babylon he was met by ambassadors from almost every part of the known world. Alexander entered Babylon in the spring of 324, about a year before his death, notwithstanding the warnings of the Chaldaeans, who predicted evil to him if he entered the city at that time. He intended to make Babylon the capital of his empire, as the best point of communication between his eastern and western dominions. His schemes were numerous and gigantic. His first object was the conquest of Arabia, which was to be followed, it was said, by the subjugation of Italy, Carthage, and the West. But his views were not confined merely to conquest. He ordered a fleet to be built on the Caspian, in order to explore that sea. He also intended to improve the distribution of waters in the Babylonian plain, and for that purpose sailed down the Euphrates to inspect the canal called Pallacopas. On his return to Babylon he was attacked by a fever, probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts around Babylon, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died after an illness of 11 days, in the month of May or June B.C. 323, at the age of 32, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months. He appointed no one as his successor, but just before his death he gave his ring to Perdiccas. Roxana was with child at the time of his death, and afterwards bore a son who is known by the name of Alexander Aegus. — The history of Alexander forms an important epoch in the history of mankind. Unlike other Asiatic conquerors, his progress was marked by something more than devastation and ruin; at every step of his course the Greek language and civilization took root and flourished; and after his death Greek kingdoms were formed in all parts of Asia, which continued to exist for centuries. By his conquests the knowledge of mankind was increased; the sciences of geography, natural history and others, received vast additions; and it was through him that a road was opened to India, and that Europeans became acquainted with the products of the remote East. — 4. Aegus, son of Alexander the Great and Roxana, was born shortly after the death of his father, in B. C. 323, and was acknowledged as the partner of Philip Arrhidaeus in the empire, under the guardianship of Perdiccas, Antipater, and Polysperchon in succession. Alexander and his mother Roxana were imprisoned by Cassander, when he obtained possession of Macedonia in 316, and remained in prison till 311, when they were put to death by Cassander.

IV. Kings of Syria.

1. Surnamed Balas, a person of low origin, pretended to be the son of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, and reigned in Syria B. C. 150—146. He defeated and slew in battle Demetrius I. Soter, but was afterwards defeated and dethroned by Demetrius II. Nicator. — 2. Surnamed Zebina or Zabinas, son of a merchant, was set up by Ptolemy Physcon as a pretender to the throne of Syria, shortly after the return of Demetrius II. Nicator from his captivity among the Parthians, B C. 128. He defeated Demetrius in 125, but was afterwards defeated by Antiochus Grypus, by whom he was put to death, 122.

V. Literary.

1. Of Aegae, a peripatetic philosopher at Rome in the first century after Christ, was tutor to the emperor Nero. — 2. The Aetolian, of Pleuron in Aetolia, a Greek poet, lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus (B. C. 285—247), at Alexandria, where he was reckoned one of the seven tragic poets who constituted the tragic pleiad. He also wrote other poems besides tragedies. His fragments are collected by Capellmann, Alexandri Aetoli Fragmenta, Bonn, 1829. — 3. Of Aphrodisias, in Caria, the most celebrated of the commentators on Aristotle, lived about A. D. 200. About half his voluminous works were edited and translated into Latin at the revival of literature; there are a few more extant in the original Greek, which have never been printed, and an Arabic version is preserved of several others. His most important treatise is entitled De Fato, an inquiry into the opinions of Aristotle on the subject of Fate and Freewill: edited by Orelli, Zurich, 1824. — 4. Cornelius, surnamed Polyhistor, a Greek writer, was made prisoner during the war of Sulla in Greece (B. C. 87—84), and sold as a slave to Cornelius Lentulus, who took him to Rome, made him the teacher of his children, and subsequently restored him to freedom. The surname of Polyhistor was given to him on account of his prodigious learning. He is said to have written a vast number of works, all of which have perished: the most important of them was one in 42 books, containing historical and geographical accounts of nearly all countries of the ancient world. — 5. Surnamed Lychnus, of Ephesus, a Greek rhetorician and poet, lived about B. C. 30. A few fragments of his geographical and astronomical poems are extant. — 6. Of Myndus, in Caria, a Greek writer on zoology of uncertain date. — 7. Numenius, a Greek rhetorician, who lived in the second century of the Christian aera. Two works are ascribed to him, one De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, from which Aquila Romanus took his materials for his work on the same subject; and the other On Show-speeches; which was written by a later grammarian of the name of Alexander. Edited in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. viii. — 8. The Paphlagonian, a celebrated impostor, who flourished about the beginning of the second century after Christ, of whom Lucian has given an amusing account, chiefly of the various contrivances by which he established and maintained the credit of an oracle. The influence he attained over the populace seems incredible; indeed, the narrative of Lucian would appear to be a mere romance, were it not confirmed by some medals of Antoninus and M. Aurelius. — 9. Surnamed Peloplaton, a Greek rhetorician of Seleucia in Cilicia, was appointed Greek secretary to M. Antoninus, about A. D. 174. At Athens he conquered the celebrated rhetorician Herodes Atticus, in a rhetorical contest. All persons, however, did not admit his abilities; for a Corinthian of the name of Sceptes said that he had found in Alexander "the clay (Πῆλος), but not Plato." This saying gave rise to the surname of Peloplaton. — 10. Philalēthes, an ancient Greek physician, lived probably towards the end of the first century B. C., and succeeded Zeuxis as head of a celebrated Herophilean school of medicine, established in Phrygia between Laodicea and Carura. — 11. Of Tralles in Lydia, an eminent physician, lived in the 6th century after Christ, and is the author of two extant Greek works: — 1. Libri Duodecim de Re Medica; 2. De Lumbricis.

Alexandrīa, oftener -ĭa, rarely -ēa (Ἀλεξάνδρεια: Ἀλεξανδρεύς, Alexandrīnus), the name of several cities founded by, or in memory of Alexander the Great. — 1. (Alexandria, Arab. Iskanderia), the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, ordered by Alexander to be founded in B. C. 332. It was built on the narrow neck of land between the Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, opposite to the I. of Pharos, which was joined to the city by an artificial dyke, called Heptastadium, which formed, with the island, the two harbours of the city, that on the N. E. of the dyke being named the Great Harbour (now the New Port), that on the S. W. Eunostos (εὔνοστος, the Old Port). These harbours communicated with each other by two channels cut through the Heptastadium, one at each end of it; and there was a canal from the Eunostos to the Lake Mareotis. The city was built on a regular plan; and was intersected by two principal streets, above 100 feet wide, the one extending 30 stadia from E. to W., the other across this, from the sea towards the lake, to the length of 10 stadia. At the E. extremity of the city was the royal quarter, called Bruchium, and at the other end of the chief street, outside of the city, the Necropolis or cemetery. A great lighthouse was built on the I. of Pharos in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B. C. 283). Under the care of the Ptolemies, as the capital of a great kingdom and of the most fertile country on the earth, and commanding by its position all the commerce of Europe with the East, Alexandria soon became the most wealthy and splendid city of the known world. Greeks, Jews, and other foreigners flocked to it; and its population probably amounted to three quarters of a million. But a still greater distinction was conferred upon it through the foundation, by the first two Ptolemies, of the Museum, an establishment in which men devoted to literature were maintained at the public cost, and of the Library, which contained 90,000 distinct works, and 400,000 volumes, and the increase of which made it necessary to establish another library in the Serapeum (Temple of Serapis), which reached to 42,800 volumes, but which was destroyed by the bishop Theophilus, at the time of the general overthrow of the heathen temples under Theodosius (A. D. 389). The Great Library suffered severely by fire when Julius Caesar was besieged in Alexdria, and was finally destroyed by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, in A. D. 651. These institutions made Alexandria the chief centre of literary activity. When Egypt became a Roman province [AEGYPTUS], Alexandria was made the residence of the Praefectus Aegypti. It retained its commercial and literary importance, and became also a chief seat of Christianity and theological learning. Its site is now covered by a mass of ruins, among which are the remains of the cisterns by which the whole city was supplied with water, house by house; the two obelisks (vulg. Cleopatra's Needles), which adorned the gateway of the royal palace, and, outside the walls, to the S., the column of Diocletian (vulg. Pompey's Pillar). The modern city stands on the dyke uniting the island of Pharos to the mainland. — 2. A. Troas, also Troas simply (Ἀ. ἡ Τρῳάς: Eskistamboul, i. e. the Old City), on the sea-coast S.W. of Troy, was enlarged by Antigonus, hence called Antigonīa, but afterwards it resumed its first name. It flourished greatly, both under the Greeks and the Romans; it was made a colonia; and both Julius Caesar and Constantine thought of establishing the seat of empire in it. — 3. A. ad Issum (Ἀ. κατὰ Ἰσσόν: Iskenderoon, Scanderoun, Alexandrette), a sea-port at the entrance of Syria, a little S. of Issus. — 4. In Susiana, aft. Antiochia, aft. Charax Spasini (Χάραξ Πασίνου or Σπασ.), at the mouth of the Tigris, built by Alexander; destroyed by a flood; restored by Antiochus Epiphanes: birthplace of Dionysius Periesgetes and Isidorus Characenus. — 5. A. Ariae (Ἀ. ἡ ἐν Ἀρίοις: Herat), founded by Alexander on the river Arius, in the Persian province of Aria, a very flourishing city, on the great caravan road to India. — 6. A. Arachosiae or Alexandropolis (Kandahar ?), on the river Arachotus, was probably not founded till after the time of Alexander. — 7. A. Bactriana (Ἀ. κατὰ Βάκτρα: prob. Khooloom, Rn.), E. of Bactra (Balkh). — 8. A. ad Caucasum, or apud Paropamisidas (Ἀ. ἐν Παροπαμισάδαις), at the foot of M. Paropamisus (Hindoo Koosh), probably near Cabool. — 9. A. Ultima or Alexandrescata (Ἀ. ἡ ἐσχάτη: Kokand ?), in Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, a little E. of Cyropolis or Cyreschata, marked the furthest point reached by Alexander in his Scythian expedition.—These are not all the cities of the name.

Alexĭcăcus (Ἀλεξίκακος), the averter of evil, a surname of several deities, but particularly of Zeus, Apollo, and Hercules.

Alexīnus (Ἀλεξῖνος), of Elis, a philosopher of the Dialectic or Megarian school, and a disciple of Eubulides, lived about the beginning of the 3rd century B. C.

Alexis (Ἄλεξις). 1. A comic poet, born at Thurii in Italy, and an Athenian citizen. He was the uncle and instructor of Menander, was born about B. C. 394, and lived to the age of 106. Some of his plays, of which he is said to have written 245, belonged to the Middle, and others to the New Comedy.—2. A sculptor and statuary, one of the pupils of Polycletus.

Alfēnus Varus. [VARUS.]

Algĭdum or Algĭdus (nr. Cava ?), a small but strongly fortified town of the Aequi on one of the hills of M. Algidus, of which all trace has now disappeared.

Algĭdus Mons, a range of mountains in Latium, extending S. from Praeneste to M. Albanus, cold, but covered with wood, and containing good pasturage (gelido Algido, Hor. Carm. i. 21. 6; nigrae feraci frondis in Algido, Id. iv. 4. 58). It was an ancient seat of the worship of Diana. From it the Aequi usually made their incursions into the Roman territory.

Aliēnus Caecīna. [CAECINA.]

Alimentus, L. Cincĭus, a celebrated Roman annalist, antiquary, and jurist, was praetor in Sicily, B. C. 209, and wrote several works, of which the best known was his Annales, which contained an account of the second Punic war.

Alinda (τὰ Ἄλινδα: Ἀλινδεύς), a fortress and small town, S.E. of Stratonīce, where Ada, queen of Caria, fixed her residence, when she was driven out of Halicarnassus (B. C. 340).

Aliphēra (Ἀλίφειρα, Ἀλίφηρα: Ἀλιφειραῖος, Ἀλιφηρεύς: nr. Nerovitza, Ru.), a fortified town in Arcadia, situated on a mountain on the borders of Elis, S. of the Alphēus, said to have been founded by the hero Alipherus, son of Lycaon.

Aliphērus. [ALIPHERA.]

Alĭso (Elsen), a strong fortress built by Drusus B. C. 11, at the confluence of the Luppia (Lippe) and the Eliso (Alme).

Alĭsontĭa (Alsitz), a river flowing into the Mosella (Mosel).

Allectus, the chief officer of Carausius in Britain, whom he murdered in A. D. 293. He then assumed the imperial title himself, but was defeated and slain in 296 by the general of Constantius.

Allĭa or more correctly Alĭa, a small river, which rises about 11 miles from Rome, in the neighbourhood of Crustumerium, and flows into the Tiber about 6 miles from Rome. It is memorable by the defeat of the Romans by the Gauls on its banks, July 16th, B. C. 390; which day, dies Alliensis, was hence marked as an unlucky day in the Roman calendar.

A. Alliēnus. 1. A friend of Cicero, was the legate of Q. Cicero in Asia, B. C. 60, praetor in 49, and governor of Sicily on behalf of Caesar in 48 and 47.—2. A legate of Dolabella, by whom he was sent into Egypt in 43.

Allīfae or Alīfae (Allifanus: Allife), a town of Samnium, on the Vulturnus, in a fertile country. It was celebrated for the manufacture of its large drinking-cups (Allifana sc. pocula, Hor. Sat. ii. 8. 39).

Allobrŏges (Nom. Sing. Allŏbrox: Ἀλλόβρογες, Ἀλλόβρυγες, Ἀλλόβριγες: perhaps from the Celtic aill, "rock" or "mountain," and brog, "dwelling," consequently "dwellers in the mountains"), a powerful people of Gaul dwelling between the Rhodanus (Rhone) and the Isara (Isère), as far as the L. Lemannus (Lake of Geneva), consequently in the modern Dauphiné and Savoy. Their chief town was VIENNA on the Rhone. They are first mentioned in Hannibal's invasion, B. C. 218. They were conquered, in B. C. 121, by Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus, and made subjects of Rome, but they bore the yoke unwillingly, and were always disposed to rebellion. In the time of Ammianus the eastern part of their country was called Sapaudia, i. e. Savoy.

Almo (Almone), a small river, rises near Bovillae, and flows into the Tiber S. of Rome, in which the statues of Cybele were washed annually.

Almōpes (Ἀλμῶπες), a people in Macedonia, inhabiting the district Almopia between Eordaea and Pelagonia.

Alōeus (Ἀλωεύς), son of Poseidon and Canace, married Iphimedīa, the daughter of Triops. His wife was beloved by Poseidon, by whom she had two sons, Otus and Ephialtes, who are usually called the Aloïdae, from their reputed father Aloeus. They were renowned for their extraordinary strength and daring spirit. When they were 9 years old, each of their bodies measured 9 cubits in breadth and 27 in height. At this early age, they threatened the Olympian gods with war, and attempted to pile Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. They would have accomplished their object, says Homer, had they been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood; but Apollo destroyed them before their beards began to appear (Od. xi. 305, seq.). They also put the god Ares in chains, and kept him imprisoned for 13 months. Other stories are related of them by later writers.

Alōīdae. [ALOEUS.]

Alonta (Ἀλόντα: Terek), a river of Albania, in Sarmatia Asiatica, flowing into the Caspian.

Alŏpe (Ἀλόπη), daughter of Cercyon, became by Poseidon the mother of HIPPOTHOUS. She was put to death by her father, but her body was changed by Poseidon into a well, which bore the same name.

Alŏpe (Ἀλόπη: Ἀλοπεύς, Ἀλοπίτης). 1. A town in the Opuntian Locris, opposite Euboea.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly (Il. ii. 682).

Alōpĕce (Ἀλωπεκή and Ἀλωπεκαί: Ἀλωπεκεύς), a demus of Attica, of the tribe Antiochis, 11 stadia E. of Athens, on the hill Anchesmus.

Alopeconnēsus (Ἀλωπεκόννησος: Ἀλωπεκοννήσιοι: Alexi ?), a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, founded by the Aeolians.

Alpēnus (Ἀλπηνός, Ἀλπηνοί), a town of the Epicnemidii Locri at the entrance of the pass of Thermopylae.

Alpes (αἱ Ἄλπεις, ἡ Ἄλπις, τὰ Ἀλπεινὰ ὄρη, τὰ Ἄλπεια ὄρη; probably from the Celtic Alb or Alp, "a height"), the mountains forming the boundary of northern Italy, are a part of the great mountain-chain, which extends from the Gulf of Genoa across Europe to the Black Sea, of which the Apennines and the mountains of the Grecian peninsula may be regarded as off-shoots. Of the Alps proper, the Greeks had very little knowledge, and included them under the general name of the Rhipaean mountains. The Romans first obtained some knowledge of them by Hannibal's passage across them: this knowledge was gradually extended by their various wars with the inhabitants of the mountains, who were not finally subdued till the reign of Augustus. In the time of the emperors the different parts of the Alps were distinguished by the following names, most of which are still retained. We enumerate them in order from W. to E. 1. Alpes Maritimae, the Maritime or Ligurian Alps, from Genua (Genoa), where the Apennines begin, run W. as far as the river Varus (Var) and M. Cema (la Caillole), and then N. to M. Vesulus (Monte Viso), one of the highest points of the Alps. — 2. Alpes Cottiae or Cottianae, the Cottian Alps (so called from a king Cottius in the time of Augustus), from Monte Viso to Mont Cenis, contained M. Matrona, afterwards called M. Janus or Janua (Mont Genèvre), across which Cottius constructed a road, which became the chief means of communication between Italy and Gaul: this road leads from the valley of the Durance in France to Segusio (Susa) and the valley of the Dora in Piedmont. The pass over Mont Cenis, now one of the most frequented of the Alpine passes, appears to have been unknown in antiquity. — 3. Alpes Graiae, also Saltus Graius (the name is probably Celtic, and has nothing to do with Greece), the Graian Alps, from Mont Cenis to the Little St. Bernard inclusive, contained the Jugum Cremonis (le Cramont) and the Centronicae Alpes, apparently the Little St. Bernard and the surrounding mountains. The Little St. Bernard, which is sometimes called Alpis Graia, is probably the pass by which Hannibal crossed the Alps; the road over it, which was improved by Augustus, led to Augusta (Aosta) in the territory of the Salassi. — 4. Alpes Penninae, the Pennine Alps, from the Great St. Bernard to the Simplon inclusive, the highest portion of the chain, including Mont Blanc, Monte Rosa, and Mont Cervin. The Great St. Bernard was called M. Penninus, and on its summit the inhabitants worshipped a deity, whom the Romans called Jupiter Penninus. The name is probably derived from the Celtic pen, "a height." — 5. Alpes Lepontiorum or Lepontiae, the Lepontian or Helvetian Alps, from the Simplon to the St. Gothard. — 6. Alpes Rhaeticae, the Rhaetian Alps, from the St. Gothard to the Orteler by the pass of the Stelvio. M. Adūla is usually supposed to be the St. Gothard, but it must be another name for the whole range, if Strabo is right in stating that both the Rhine and the Adda rise in M. Adula. The Romans were acquainted with two passes across the Rhaetian Alps, connecting Curia (Coire) and Milan, one across the Splügen and the other across Mont Septimer, and both meeting at Clavenna (Chiavenna). — 7. Alpes Tridentīnae, the mountains of southern Tyrol, in which the Athĕsis (Adige) rises, with the pass of the Brenner. — 8. Alpes Noricae, the Noric Alps, N. E. of the Tridentine Alps, comprising the mountains in the neighbourhood of Salzburg. — 9. Alpes Carnicae, the Carnic Alps, E. of the Tridentine, and S. of the Noric, to Mount Terglu. — 10. Alpes Juliae, the Julian Alps, from Mount Terglu to the commencement of the Illyrian or Dalmatian mountains, which are known by the name of the Alpes Dalmaticae, further north by the name of the Alpes Pannonicae. The Alpes Juliae were so called because Julius Caesar or Augustus constructed roads across them: they are also called Alpes Venetae.

Alphēnus Varus. [Varus.]

Alphēsiboea (Ἀλφεσίβοια). 1. Mother of Adonis. [Adonis.] — 2. Daughter of Phegeus, who married Alcmaeon. [Alcmaeon.]

Alphēus Mytilēnaeus (Ἀλφεῖος Μυτιληναῖος), the author of about 12 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was probably a contemporary of the emperor Augustus.

Alphēus (Ἀλφειός: Dor. Ἀλφεός; Alfeo, Rofeo, Rufo, Rufea), the chief river of Peloponnesus, rises at Phylace in Arcadia, shortly afterwards sinks under ground, appears again near Asea, and then mingles its waters with those of the Eurōtas. After flowing 20 stadia, the two rivers disappear under ground: the Alpheus again rises at Pegae in Arcadia, and increased by many affluents, flows N. W. through Arcadia and Elis, not far from Olympia, and falls into the Ionian sea. The subterranean descent of the river, which is confirmed by modern travellers, gave rise to the story about the river-god Alphēus and the nymph Arethusa. The latter, pursued by Alpheus, was changed by Artemis into the fountain of Arethusa in the island of Ortygia at Syracuse, but the god continued to pursue her under the sea, and attempted to mingle his stream with the fountain in Ortygia. Hence it was said that a cup thrown into the Alpheus would appear again in the fountain of Arethusa in Ortygia. Other accounts related that Artemis herself was beloved by Alpheus: the goddess was worshipped, under the name of Alpheaea, both in Elis and Ortygia.

Alphīus Avītus. [Avitus.]

Alpīnus, a name which Horace gives in ridicule to a bombastic poet. He probably means Bibaculus.

Alsīum (Alsiensis: Palo), one of the most ancient Etruscan towns on the coast near Caere, and a Roman colony after the 1st Punic war. In its neighbourhood Pompey had a country-seat (villa Alsiensis).

Althaea (Ἀλθαία), daughter of the Aetolian king Thestius and Eurythemis, married Oeneus, king of Calydon, by whom she became the mother of several children, and among others of Meleager, upon whose death she killed herself.

Althaea, the chief town of the Olcades in the country of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Althēmĕnes (Ἀλθημένης or Ἀλθαιμένης), son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle, that Catreus would lose his life by one of his children, Althemenes quitted Crete and went to Rhodes. There he unwittingly killed his father, who had come in search of his son.

Altīnum (Altīnas: Altino), a wealthy municipium in the land of the Veneti in the N. of Italy, at the mouth of the river Silis and on the road from Patavium to Aquileia, was a wealthy manufacturing town, and the chief emporium for all the goods which were sent from southern Italy to the countries of the north. Goods could be brought from Ravenna to Altinum through the Lagoons and the numerous canals of the Po, safe from storms and pirates. There were many beautiful villas around the town. (Mart. iv. 25.)

Altis (Ἄλτις), the sacred grove of Zeus at Olympia.

Aluntĭum or Haluntĭum (Ἀλούντιον), a town on the N. coast of Sicily on a steep hill, celebrated for its wine.

Alus or Halus (Ἄλος, Ἅλος: Ἀλεύς: nr. Kefalosi, Ru.), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the extremity of M. Othrys, built by the hero Athamas.

Alўattes (Ἀλυάττης), king of Lydia, B.C. 617—560, succeeded his father Sadyattes, and was himself succeeded by his son Croesus. He carried on war with Miletus from 617 to 612, and with Cyaxares, king of Media, from 590 to 585; an eclipse of the sun, which happened in 585 during a battle between Alyattes and Cyaxares, led to a peace between them. Alyattes drove the Cimmerians out of Asia and took Smyrna. The tomb of Alyattes, N. of Sardis, near the lake Gygaea, which consisted of a large mound of earth, raised upon a foundation of great stones, still exists. Mr. Hamilton says that it took him about ten minutes to ride round its base, which would give it a circumference of nearly a mile.

Alўba (Ἀλύβη), a town on the S. coast of the Euxine. (Hom. Il. ii. 857.)

Alypĭus (Ἀλύπιος), of Alexandria, probably lived in the 4th century of the Christian aera, and is the author of a Greek musical treatise entitled "Introduction to Music" (εἰσαγωγὴ μουσική), printed by Meibomius in Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amstel. 1652.

Alyzĭa or Alyzēa (Ἀλυζία, Ἀλύζεια: Ἀλυζαῖος; Ru. in the valley of Kandili), a town in Acarnania near the sea opposite Leucas, with a harbour and a temple both sacred to Hercules. The temple contained one of the works of Lysippus representing the labours of Hercules, which the Romans carried off.

Amădŏcus (Ἀμάδοκος) or Mēdŏcus (Μήδοκος). 1. King of the Odrysae in Thrace, when Xenophon visited the country in B. C. 400. He and Seuthes, who were the most powerful Thracian kings, were frequently at variance, but were reconciled to one another by Thrasybulus, the Athenian commander, in 390, and induced by him to become the allies of Athens. — 2. A ruler in Thrace, who, in conjunction with Berisades and Cersobleptes, succeeded Cotys in 358.

Amagetobria. [Magetobria.]

Amalthēa (Ἀμάλθεια). 1. The nurse of the infant Zeus in Crete. According to some traditions Amalthēa is the goat who suckled Zeus, and who was rewarded by being placed among the stars. [Aega.] According to others, Amalthea was a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, Helios, Haemonius, or of the Cretan king Melisseus, who fed Zeus with the milk of a goat When this goat broke off one of her horns, Amalthea filled it with fresh herbs and gave it to Zeus, who placed it among the stars. According to other accounts Zeus himself broke off one of the horns of the goat Amalthea, and gave it to the daughters of Melisseus, and endowed it with the wonderful power of becoming filled with whatever the possessor might wish. This is the story about the origin of the celebrated horn of Amalthea, commonly called the horn of plenty or cornucopia, which was used in later times as the symbol of plenty in general. — 2. One of the Sibyls, identified with the Cumaean Sibyl, who sold to king Tarquinius the celebrated Sibylline books.

Amalthēum or Amalthēa, a villa of Atticus on the river Thyamis in Epirus, was perhaps originally a shrine of the nymph Amalthea, which Atticus adorned with statues and bas-reliefs, and converted into a beautiful summer retreat. Cicero, in imitation, constructed a similar retreat on his estate at Arpīnum.

Amantĭa (Ἀμαντία: Amantīnus, Amantiānus, or Amantes, pl.: Nivitza), a Greek town and district in Illyricum: the town, said to have been founded by the Abantes of Euboea, lay at some distance from the coast, E. of Oricum.

Amānus (ὁ Ἀμανός, τὸ Ἀμανόν: Ἀμανίτης, Amaniensis: Almadagh), a branch of Mt. Taurus, which runs from the head of the Gulf of Issus N.E. to the principal chain, dividing Syria from Cilicia and Cappadocia. There were two passes in it; the one, called the Syrian Gates (αἱ Συρίαι πύλαι, Syriae Portae: Bylan) near the sea; the other, called the Amanian Gates (Ἀμανίδες or Ἀμανικαὶ πύλαι: Amanicae Pylae, Portae Amani Montis: Demir Kapu, i. e. the Iron Gate), further to the N. The former pass was on the road from Cilicia to Antioch, the latter on that to the district Commagene; but, on account of its great difficulty, the latter pass was rarely used, until the Romans made a road through it. The inhabitants of Amanus were wild banditti.

Amardi or Mardi (Ἄμαρδοι, Μάρδοι), a powerful, warlike, and predatory tribe who dwelt on the S. shore of the Caspian Sea.

Amardus or Mardus (Ἄμαρδος, Μάρδος: Kizil Ozien), a river flowing through the country of the Mardi into the Caspian Sea.

Amarynceus (Ἀμαρυγκεύς), a chief of the Eleans, is said by some writers to have fought against Troy; but Homer only mentions his son Diores (Amaryncīdes) as taking part in the Trojan war.

Amarynthus (Ἀμάρυνθος: Ἀμαρύνθιος), a town in Euboea 7 stadia from Eretria, to which it belonged, with a celebrated temple of Artemis, who was hence called Amarynthia or Amarysia, and in whose honour there was a festival of this name both in Euboea and Attica. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Amarynthia.)

Amăsēnus (Amaseno), a river in Latium, rises in the Volscian mountains, flows by Privernum, and after being joined by the Ufens (Ufente), which flows from Setia, falls into the sea between Circeii and Terracina, though the greater part of its waters are lost in the Pontine marshes.

Amăsia or -ea (Ἀμάσεια: Ἀμασεύς: Amasiah), the capital of the kings of Pontus, was a strongly fortified city on both banks of the river Iris. It was the birthplace of Mithridates the Great and of the geographer Strabo.

Amăsis (Ἄμασις). 1. King of Egypt, B.C. 570—526, succeeded Apries, whom he dethroned. During his long reign Egypt was in a very prosperous condition; and the Greeks were brought into much closer intercourse with the Egyptians than had existed previously. Amasis married Ladice, a Cyrenaic lady, contracted an alliance with Cyrene and Polycrates of Samos, and also sent presents to several of the Greek cities. — 2. A Persian, sent in the reign of Cambyses (B. C. 525) against Cyrene, took Barca, but did not succeed in taking Cyrene.

Amastris (Ἄμαστρις, Ion. Ἀμήστρις). 1. Wife of Xerxes, and mother of Artaxerxes I., was of a cruel and vindictive character. — 2. Also called Amastrine, niece of Darius, the last king of Persia. She married, 1. Craterus; 2. Dionysius, tyrant of Heraclea in Bithynia, B. C. 322; and 3. Lysimachus, B. C. 302. Having been abandoned by Lysimachus upon his marriage with Arsinoë, she retired to Heraclea, where she reigned, and was drowned by her two sons about 288.

Amastris (Ἄμαστρις: Ἀμαστριανός: Amasera), a large and beautiful city, with two harbours, on the coast of Paphlagonia, built by Amastris after her separation from Lysimachus (about B. C. 300), on the site of the old town of Sesămus, which name the citadel retained. The new city was built and peopled by the inhabitants of Cytorus and Cromna.

Amāta, wife of king Latinus and mother of Lavinia, opposed Lavinia being given in marriage to Aeneas, because she had already promised her to Turnus. When she heard that Turnus had fallen in battle, she hung herself.

Amăthūs, -untis (Ἀμαθοῦς, -οῦντος: Ἀμαθούσιος: Limasol), an ancient town on the S. coast of Cyprus, with a celebrated temple of Aphrodite, who was hence called Amathūsia. There were copper-mines in the neighbourhood of the town (fecundam Amathunta metalli, Ov. Met. x. 220).

Amātĭus, surnamed Pseudomarius, pretended to be either the son or grandson of the great Marius, and was put to death by Antony in B. C. 44. Some call him Herophilus.

Amāzŏnes (Ἀμαζόνες), a mythical race of warlike females, are said to have come from the Caucasus, and to have settled in the country about the river Thermodon, where they founded the city Themiscȳra, in the neighbourhood of the modern Trebizond. Their country was inhabited only by the Amazons, who were governed by a queen: but in order to propagate their race, they met once a year the Gargareans in Mount Caucasus. The children of the female sex were brought up by the Amazons, and each had her right breast cut off; the male children were sent to the Gargareans or put to death. The foundation of several towns in Asia Minor and in the islands of the Aegean is ascribed to them, e. g. of Ephesus, Smyrna, Cyme, Myrina, and Paphos. The Greeks believed in their existence as a real historical race down to a late period; and hence it is said that Thalestris, the queen of the Amazons, hastened to Alexander, in order to become a mother by the conqueror of Asia. This belief of the Greeks may have arisen from the peculiar way in which the women of some of the Caucasian districts lived, and performed the duties which in other countries devolve upon men, as well as from their bravery and courage, which are noticed as remarkable even by modern travellers. Vague and obscure reports about them probably reached the inhabitants of western Asia and the Greeks, and these reports were subsequently worked out and embellished by popular tradition and poetry. The following are the chief mythical adventures with which the Amazons are connected: — they are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of Iobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophontes, who happened to be staying at the king's court. [BELLEROPHONTES; LAOMEDON.] They also invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans when Priam was a young man. The ninth among the labours imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received as a present from Ares. [HERCULES.] In the reign of Theseus they invaded Attica. [THESEUS.] Towards the end of the Trojan war, the Amazons, under their queen Penthesilēa, came to the assistance of Priam; but she was killed by Achilles. The Amazons and their battles are frequently represented in the remains of ancient Greek art.

Amāzŏnĭci or -ĭus Mons, a mountain range parallel and near to the coast of Pontus, containing the sources of the Thermodon and other streams which water the supposed country of the Amazons.

Ambarri, a people of Gaul, on the Arar (Saone) E. of the Aedui, and of the same stock as the latter.

Ambiāni, a Belgic people, between the Bellovaci and Atrebates, conquered by Caesar in B.C. 57. Their chief town was Samarobrīva afterwards called Ambiani, now Amiens.

Ambiatīnus Vicus, a place in the country of the Treviri near Coblentz, where the emperor Caligula was born.

Ambibāri, an Armoric people in Gaul, near the modern Ambières in Normandy.

Ambiliāti, a Gallic people, perhaps in Brittany.

Ambĭŏrix, a chief of the Eburones in Gaul, cut to pieces, in conjunction with Cativolcus, the Roman troops under Sabinus and Cotta, who were stationed for the winter in the territories of the Eburones, B. C. 54. He failed in taking the camp of Q. Cicero, and was defeated on the arrival of Caesar, who was unable to obtain possession of the person of Ambiorix, notwithstanding his active pursuit of the latter.

Ambivareti, the clientes or vassals of the Aedui, probably dwelt N. of the latter.

Ambivariti, a Gallic people, W. of the Maas, in the neighbourhood of Namur.

Ambĭvĭus Turpĭo. [TURPIO.]

Amblada (τὰ Ἄμβλαδα: Ἀμβλαδεύς), a town in Pisidia, on the borders of Caria; famous for its wine.

Ambrăcĭa (Ἀμπρακία, afterwards Ἀμβρακία: Ἀμβρακιώτης, Ἀμβρακιεύς, Ambraciensis: Arta), a town on the left bank of the Arachthus, 80 stadia from the coast, N. of the Ambracian gulf, was originally included in Acarnania, but afterwards in Epirus. It was colonised by the Corinthians about B. C. 660, and at an early period acquired wealth and importance. It became subject to the kings of Epirus about the time of Alexander the Great. Pyrrhus made it the capital of his kingdom, and adorned it with public buildings and statues. At a later time it joined the Aetolian League, was taken by the Romans in B. C. 189, and stripped of its works of art. Its inhabitants were transplanted to the new city of NICOPOLIS, founded by Augustus after the battle of Actium, B. C. 31. South of Ambracia on the E. of the Arachthus, and close to the sea was the fort Ambracus.

Ambracĭus Sinus (Ἀμπρακινὸς or Ἀμβρακικὸς κόλπος: G. of Arta), a gulf of the Ionian sea between Epirus and Acarnania, said by Polybius to be 300 stadia long and 100 wide, and with an entrance only 5 stadia in width. Its real length is 25 miles and its width 10: the narrowest part of the entrance is only 700 yards, but its general width is about half a mile.

Ambrōnes (Ἄμβρωνες), a Celtic people, who joined the Cimbri and Teutoni in their invasion of the Roman dominions, and were defeated by Marius near Aquae Sextiae (Aix) in B. C. 102.

Ambrŏsĭus, usually called St. Ambrose, one of the most celebrated Christian fathers, was born in A.D. 340, probably at Augusta Trevirorum (Treves). After a careful education at Rome, he practised with great success as an advocate at Milan; and about A. D. 370 was appointed prefect of the provinces of Liguria and Aemilia, whose seat of government was Milan. On the death of Auxentius, bishop of Milan, in 374, the appointment of his successor led to an open conflict between the Arians and Catholics. Ambrose exerted his influence to restore peace, and addressed the people in a conciliatory speech, at the conclusion of which a child in the further part of the crowd cried out "Ambrosius episcopus." The words were received as an oracle from heaven, and Ambrose was elected bishop by the acclamation of the whole multitude, the bishops of both parties uniting in his election. It was in vain that he adopted the strangest devices to alter the determination of the people; nothing could make them change their mind; and at length he yielded to the express command of the emperor (Valentinian I.), and was consecrated on the eighth day after his baptism, for at the time of his election he was only a catechumen. Ambrose was a man of eloquence, firmness, and ability, and distinguished himself by maintaining and enlarging the authority of the church. He was a zealous opponent of the Arians, and thus came into open conflict with Justina, the mother of Valentinian II., who demanded the use of one of the churches of Milan for the Arians. Ambrose refused to give it; he was supported by the people; and the contest was at length decided by the miracles which are reported to have attended the discovery of the reliques of two martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. Although these miracles were denied by the Arians, the impression made by them upon the people in general was so strong, that Justina thought it prudent to give way. The state of the parties was quite altered by the death of Justina in 387, when Valentinian became a Catholic, and still more completely by the victory of Theodosius over Maximus (388). This event put the whole power of the empire into the hands of a prince who was a firm Catholic, and over whom Ambrose acquired such influence, that, after the massacre at Thessalonica in 390, he refused Theodosius admission into the church of Milan for a period of 8 months, and only restored him after he had performed a public penance. The best edition of the works of Ambrose is that of the Benedictines, Paris, 1686 and 1690.

Ambrȳsus or Amphrȳsus (Ἄμβρυσος: Ἀμβρυσεύς: nr. Dhistomo), a town in Phocis strongly fortified, S. of M. Parnassus: in the neighbourhood were numerous vineyards.

Ambustus, Făbĭus. 1. M., pontifex maximus in the year that Rome was taken by the Gauls, B. C. 390. His three sons, Kaeso, Numerius, and Quintus, were sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, when the latter were besieging Clusium, and took part in a sally of the besieged against the Gauls (B. C. 391). The Gauls demanded that the Fabii should be surrendered to them for violating the law of nations; and upon the senate refusing to give up the guilty parties, they marched against Rome. The three sons were in the same year elected consular tribunes. — 2. M., consular tribune in B. C. 381 and 369, and censor in 363, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, and the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, the author of the Licinian Rogations. According to the story recorded by Livy, the younger Fabia induced her father to assist her husband in obtaining the consulship for the plebeian order, into which she had married. — 3. M., thrice consul, in B. C. 360, when he conquered the Hernici, a second time in 356, when he conquered the Falisci and Tarquinienses, and a third time in 354, when he conquered the Tiburtes. He was dictator in 351. He was the father of the celebrated Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. [MAXIMUS.]

Amĕnānus (Ἀμενανός, Dor. Ἀμένας), a river in Sicily near Catana, only flowed occasionally (nunc fluit, interdum suppressis fontibus aret, Ov. Met. xv. 280).

Amĕrĭa (Amĕrīnus: Amelia), an ancient town in Umbria, and a municipium, the birth-place of Sex. Roscius defended by Cicero, was situate in a district rich in vines (Virg. Georg. i. 265).

Amerĭŏla, a town in the land of the Sabines, destroyed by the Romans at a very early period.

Amestrătus (Amestratīnus: Mistretta), a town in the N. of Sicily not far from the coast, the same as the Myttistratum of Polybius, and the Amastra of Silius Italicus, taken by the Romans from the Carthaginians in the first Punic war.

Amestris. [AMASTRIS.]

Amīda (ἡ Ἄμιδα: Diarbekr), a town in Sophene (Armenia Major) on the upper Tigris.

Amilcar. [HAMILCAR.]

Amīnĭas (Ἀμεινίας), brother of Aeschylus, distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis (B. C. 480): he and Eumenes were judged to have been the bravest on this occasion among all the Athenians.

Amīpsĭas (Ἀμειψίας), a comic poet of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, whom he twice conquered in the dramatic contests, gaining the second prize with his Connus when Aristophanes was third with the Clouds (B. C. 423), and the first with his Comastae when Aristophanes gained the second with the Birds (B. C. 414).

Amisĭa or Amisĭus (Ems), a river in northern Germany well known to the Romans, on which Drusus had a naval engagement with the Bructeri, B. C. 12.

Amisĭa (Emden ?), a fortress on the left bank of the river of the same name.

Amisōdărus (Ἀμισώδαρος), a king of Lycia, said to have brought up the monster Chimaera: his sons Atymnius and Maris were slain at Troy by the sons of Nestor.

Amīsus (Ἀμισός: Ἀμισηνός, Amisēnus: Samsun), a large city on the coast of Pontus, on a bay of the Euxine Sea, called after it (Amisenus Sinus). Mithridates enlarged it, and made it one of his residences.

Amĭternum (Amiternīnus: Amatrica or Torre d'Amiterno), one of the most ancient towns of the Sabines, on the Aternus, the birth-place of the historian Sallust.

Ammiānus (Ἀμμιανός), a Greek epigrammatist, but probably a Roman by birth, the author of nearly 30 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Trajan and Hadrian.

Ammiānus Marcellīnus, by birth a Greek, and a native of Syrian Antioch, was admitted at an early age among the imperial body guards. He served many years under Ursicinus, one of the generals of Constantius, both in the West and East, and he subsequently attended the emperor Julian in his campaign against the Persians (A. D. 363). Eventually he established himself at Rome, where he composed his history, and was alive at least as late as 390. His history, written in Latin, extended from the accession of Nerva, A. D. 96, the point at which the histories of Tacitus terminated, to the death of Valens, A. D. 378, comprising a period of 282 years. It was divided into 31 books, of which the first 13 are lost. The remaining 18 embrace the acts of Constantius from A. D. 353, the 17th year of his reign, together with the whole career of Gallus, Julianus, Jovianus, Valentinianus, and Valens. The portion preserved was the more important part of the work, as he was a contemporary of the events described in these books. The style of Ammianus is harsh and inflated, but his accuracy, fidelity, and impartiality, deserve praise. — Editions. By Gronovius, Lugd. Bat. 1693; by Ernesti, Lips. 1773; by Wagner and Erfurdt, Lips. 1808.

Ammōn (Ἄμμων), originally an Aethiopian or Libyan, afterwards an Egyptian divinity. The real Egyptian name was Amun or Ammun; the Greeks called him Zeus Ammon, the Romans Jupiter Ammon, and the Hebrews Amon. The most ancient seat of his worship was Meroe, where he had an oracle: thence it was introduced into Egypt, where the worship took the firmest root at Thebes in Upper Egypt, which was therefore frequently called by the Greeks Diospolis, or the city of Zeus. Another famous seat of the god, with a celebrated oracle, was in the oasis of Ammonium (Siwah) in the Libyan desert; the worship was also established in Cyrenaica. The god was represented either in the form of a ram, or as a human being with the head of a ram; but there are some representations in which he appears altogether as a human being with only the horns of a ram. It seems clear that the original idea of Ammon was that of a protector and leader of the flocks. The Aethiopians were a nomad people, flocks of sheep constituted their principal wealth, and it is perfectly in accordance with the notions of the Aethiopians as well as Egyptians to worship the animal which is the leader and protector of the flock. This view is supported by the various stories related about Ammon.

Ammonĭum. [OASIS.]

Ammōnĭus (Ἀμμώνιος). 1. Grammaticus, of Alexandria, left this city on the overthrow of the heathen temples in A. D. 389, and settled at Constantinople. He wrote, in Greek, a valuable work, On the Differences of Words of like Signification (περὶ ὁμοίων καὶ διαφόρων λέξεων). — Editions. By Valckenaer, Lugd. Bat. 1739; by Schäfer, Lips. 1822. — 2. Son of Hermeas, studied at Athens under Proclus (who died A. D. 484), and was the master of Simplicius, Damascius, and others. He wrote numerous commentaries in Greek on the works of the earlier philosophers. His extant works are Commentaries on the Isagoge of Porphyry, or the Five Predicables, first published at Venice in 1500; and On the Categories of Aristotle and De Interpretatione, published by Brandis in his edition of the Scholia on Aristotle. — 3. Of Lamprae in Attica, a Peripatetic philosopher, lived in the first century of the Christian aera, and was the instructor of Plutarch. — 4. Surnamed Saccas, or sack-carrier, because his employment was carrying the corn, landed at Alexandria, as a public porter, was born of Christian parents. Some writers assert, and others deny, that he apostatized from the faith. At any rate he combined the study of philosophy with Christianity, and is regarded by those who maintain his apostasy as the founder of the later Platonic School. Among his disciples were Longinus, Herennius, Plotinus, and Origen. He died A. D. 243, at the age of more than 80 years.

Amnīsus (Ἀμνισός), a town in the N. of Crete and the harbour of Cnossus, situated on a river of the same name, the nymphs of which, called Amnīsĭădes, were in the service of Artemis.

Amor, the god of love, had no place in the religion of the Romans, who only translate the Greek name Eros into Amor. [EROS.]

Amorgus (Ἄμοργος: Ἀμοργῖνος: Amorgo), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Sporades, the birth-place of Simonides, and under the Roman emperors a place of banishment.

Amŏrĭum (Ἀμόριον), a city of Phrygia Major or Galatia, on the river Sangarius; the reputed birth-place of Aesop.

Ampē (Ἄμπη, Herod.) or Ampelōne (Plin.), a town at the mouth of the Tigris, where Darius I. planted the Milesians whom he removed from their own city after the Ionian revolt (B. C. 494).

L. Ampĕlĭus, the author of a small work, entitled Liber Memorialis, probably lived in the 2nd or 3rd century of the Christian aera. His work is a sort of common-place-book, containing a meagre summary of the most striking natural objects and of the most remarkable events, divided into 50 chapters. It is generally printed with Florus, and has been published separately by Beck, Lips. 1826.

Ampĕlus (Ἄμπελος), a promontory at the extremity of the peninsula Sithonia in Chalcidice in Macedonia near Torone.

Ampĕlūsia (Ἀμπελουσία: C. Espartel), the promontory at the W. end of the S. or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum (Straits of Gibraltar). The natives of the country called it Cotes (αἱ Κώτεις).

Amphaxītis (Ἀμφαξῖτις), a district of Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouths of the Axius and Echedorus.

Amphēa (Ἄμφεια: Ἀμφεύς), a small town of Messenia on the borders of Laconia and Messenia, conquered by the Spartans in the first Messenian war.

Amphĭărāus (Ἀμφιάραος), son of Oicles and Hypermnestra, daughter of Thestius, was descended on his father's side from the famous seer Melampus, and was himself a great prophet and a great hero at Argos. By his wife Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, he was the father of Alcmaeon, Amphilochus, Eurydice, and Demonassa. He took part in the hunt of the Calydonian boar, and in the Argonautic voyage. He also joined Adrastus in the expedition against Thebes, although he foresaw its fatal termination, through the persuasions of his wife Eriphyle, who had been induced to persuade her husband by the necklace of Harmonia which Polynices had given her. On leaving Argos, however, he enjoined his sons to punish their mother for his death. During the war against Thebes, Amphiaraus fought bravely, but could not escape his fate. Pursued by Periclymenus, he fled towards the river Ismenius, and the earth swallowed him up together with his chariot, before he was overtaken by his enemy. Zeus made him immortal, and henceforth he was worshipped as a hero, first at Oropus and afterwards in all Greece. His oracle between Potniae and Thebes, where he was said to have been swallowed up, enjoyed great celebrity. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.) His son, Alcmaeon, is called Amphiaraides.

Amphicaea or Amphiclēa (Ἀμφίκαια, Ἀμφίκλεια: Ἀμφικαιεύς: Dhadhi or Oglunitza?), a town in the N. of Phocis, with an adytum of Dionysus, was called for a long time Ophitēa (Ὀφιτεία) by command of the Amphictyons.

Amphictyon (Ἀμφικτυών), a son of Deucalion and Pyrrha. Others represent him as a king of Attica, who expelled from the kingdom his father-in-law Cranaus, ruled for 12 years, and was then in turn expelled by Erichthonius. Many writers represent him as the founder of the amphictyony of Thermopylae; in consequence of this belief a sanctuary of Amphictyon was built in the village of Anthela on the Asopus, which was the most ancient place of meeting of this amphictyony.

Amphidămas (Ἀμφιδάμας), son, or, according to others, brother of Lycurgus, one of the Argonauts.

Amphilŏchia (Ἀμφιλοχία), the country of the Amphilochi (Ἀμφίλοχοι), an Epirot race, at the E. end of the Ambracian gulf, usually included in Acarnania. Their chief town was Argos Amphilochicum.

Amphilŏchus (Ἀμφίλοχος), son of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle, and brother of Alcmaeon. He took an active part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes, assisted his brother in the murder of their mother [Alcmaeon], and afterwards fought against Troy. On his return from Troy, together with Mopsus, who was like himself a seer, he founded the town of Mallos in Cilicia. Hence he proceeded to his native place, Argos, but returned to Mallos, where he was killed in single combat by Mopsus. Others relate (Thuc. ii. 68), that after leaving Argos, Amphilochus founded Argos Amphilochium on the Ambracian gulf. He was worshipped at Mallos in Cilicia, at Oropus, and at Athens.

Amphilȳtus (Ἀμφίλυτος), a celebrated seer in the time of Pisistratus (B. C. 559), is called both an Acarnanian and an Athenian: he may have been an Acarnanian who received the franchise at Athens.

Amphimăchus (Ἀμφίμαχος). 1. Son of Cteatus, grandson of Poseidon, one of the four leaders of the Epeans against Troy, was slain by Hector. — 2. Son of Nomion, with his brother Nastes, led the Carians to the assistance of the Trojans, and was slain by Achilles.

Amphimalla (τὰ Ἀμφίμαλλα), a town on the N. coast of Crete, on a bay called after it (G. of Armiro).

Amphĭmĕdon (Ἀμφιμέδων), of Ithaca, a guest-friend of Agamemnon, and a suitor of Penelope, was slain by Telemachus.

Amphīon (Ἀμφίων). 1. Son of Zeus and Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes, and twin-brother of Zethus. (Ov. Met. vi. 110, seq.) Amphion and Zethus were born either at Eleutherae in Boeotia or on Mount Cithaeron, whither their mother had fled, and grew up among the shepherds, not knowing their descent. Hermes (according to others, Apollo, or the Muses) gave Amphion a lyre, who henceforth practised song and music, while his brother spent his time in hunting and tending the flocks. (Hor. Ep. i. 18. 41.) Having become acquainted with their origin they marched against Thebes, where Lycus reigned, the husband of their mother Antiope, whom he had repudiated, and had then married Dirce in her stead. They took the city, and as Lycus and Dirce had treated their mother with great cruelty, the two brothers killed them both. They put Dirce to death by tying her to a bull, who dragged her about till she perished; and they then threw her body into a well, which was from this time called the well of Dirce. After they had obtained possession of Thebes, they fortified it by a wall. It is said, that when Amphion played his lyre, the stones moved of their own accord and formed the wall (movit Amphion lapides canendo, Hor. Carm. iii. 11). Amphion afterwards married Niobe, who bore him many sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo. His death is differently related: some say, that he killed himself from grief at the loss of his children (Ov. Met. vi. 270), and others tell us that he was killed by Apollo because he made an assault on the Pythian temple of the god. Amphion and his brother were buried at Thebes. The punishment inflicted upon Dirce is represented in the celebrated Farnese bull, the work of Apollonius and Tauriscus, which was discovered in 1546, and placed in the palace Farnese at Rome. — 2. Son of Jasus and father of Chloris. In Homer, this Amphion, king of Orchomenos, is distinct from Amphion, the husband of Niobe; but in earlier traditions they seem to have been regarded as the same person.

Amphipŏlis (Ἀμφίπολις; Ἀμφιπολίτης: Neokhorio, in Turkish Jeni-Keui), a town in Macedonia on the left or eastern bank of the Strymon, just below its egress from the lake Cercinitis, and about 3 miles from the sea. The Strymon flowed almost round the town, nearly forming a circle, whence its name Amphi-polis. It was originally called Ἐννέα ὁδοί, "the Nine Ways," and belonged to the Edonians, a Thracian people. Aristagoras of Miletus first attempted to colonize it, but was cut off with his followers by the Edonians in B. C. 497. The Athenians made a next attempt with 10,000 colonists, but they were all destroyed by the Edonians in 465. In 437 the Athenians were more successful, and drove the Edonians out of the "Nine Ways," which was henceforth called Amphipolis. It was one of the most important of the Athenian possessions, being advantageously situated for trade on a navigable river in the midst of a fertile country, and near the gold mines of M. Pangaeus. Hence the indignation of the Athenians when it fell into the hands of Brasidas (B. C. 424) and of Philip (358). Under the Romans it was a free city, and the capital of Macedonia prima: the Via Egnatia ran through it. The port of Amphipolis was Eion.

Amphis (Ἄμφις), an Athenian comic poet, of the middle comedy, contemporary with the philosopher Plato. We have the titles of 26 of his plays, and a few fragments of them.

Amphissa (Ἄμφισσα: Ἀμφισσεύς, Ἀμφισσαῖος: Salona), one of the chief towns of the Locri Ozolae on the borders of Phocis, 7 miles from Delphi, said to have been named after Amphissa, daughter of Macareus, and beloved by Apollo. In consequence of the Sacred War declared against Amphissa by the Amphictyons, the town was destroyed by Philip, B. C. 338, but it was soon afterwards rebuilt, and under the Romans was a free state.

Amphistrătus (Ἀμφίστρατος) and his brother Rhecas, the charioteers of the Dioscuri, were said to have taken part in the expedition of Jason to Colchis, and to have occupied a part of that country which was called after them Heniochia, as heniochus (ἡνίοχος) signifies a charioteer.

Amphitrītē (Ἀμφιτρίτη), a Nereid or an Oceanid, wife of Poseidon and goddess of the sea, especially of the Mediterranean. In Homer Amphitrite is merely the name of the sea, and she first occurs as a goddess in Hesiod. Later poets again use the word as equivalent to the sea in general. She became by Poseidon the mother of Triton, Rhode or Rhodos, and Benthesicyme.

Amphitrŏpē (Ἀμφιτρόπη: Ἀμφιτροπαιεύς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Antiochis, in the neighbourhood of the silver-mines of Laurium.

Amphitryŏn or Amphitrŭo (Ἀμφιτρύων), son of Alcaeus, king of Tiryns, and Hipponome. Alcaeus had a brother Electryon, who reigned at Mycenae. Between Electryon and Pterelaus, king of the Taphians, a furious war raged, in which Electryon lost all his children except Licymnius, and was robbed of his oxen. Amphitryon recovered the oxen, but on his return to Mycenae accidentally killed his uncle Electryon. He was now expelled from Mycenae, together with Alcmene the daughter of Electryon, by Sthenelus the brother of Electryon, and went to Thebes, where he was purified by Creon. In order to win the hand of Alcmene, Amphitryon prepared to avenge the death of Alcmene's brothers on the Taphians, and conquered them, after Comaetho, the daughter of Pterelaus, through her love for Amphitryon, cut off the one golden hair on her father's head, which rendered him immortal. During the absence of Amphitryon from Thebes, Jupiter visited ALCMENE, who became by the god the mother of Hercules; the latter is called Amphitryoniades in allusion to his reputed father. Amphitryon fell in a war against Erginus, king of the Minyans. The comedy of Plautus, called Amphitruo, is a ludicrous representation of the visit of Zeus to Alcmene in the disguise of her lover Amphitryon.

Amphŏtĕrus (Ἀμφότερος). [ACARNAN.]

Amphrȳsus (Ἀμφρυσός). 1. A small river in Thessaly which flowed into the Pagasaean gulf, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus (pastor ab Amphryso, Virg. Georg. iii. 2). —2. See AMBRYSUS.

Ampsāga (Wad-el-Kabir, or Sufjimar), a river of N. Africa, which divided Numidia from Mauretania Sitifensis. It flows past the town of Cirta (Constantina).

Ampsanctus or Amsanctus Lacus (Lago d'Ansanti or Mufiti), a small lake in Samnium near Aeculanum, from which mephitic vapours arose. Near it was a chapel of the god Mephitis with a cavern from which mephitic vapours also came, and which was therefore regarded as an entrance to the lower world. (Virg. Aen. vii. 563, seq.)

Ampsivarĭi. [ANSIBARII.]

Ampȳcus (Ἄμπυκος). 1. Son of Pelias, husband of Chloris, and father of the famous seer Mopsus, who is hence called Ampicides. Pausanias calls him Ampyx. — 2. Son of Japetus, a bard and priest of Ceres, killed by Pettalus at the marriage of Perseus.

Ampyx. [AMPYCUS.]

Amūlĭus. [ROMULUS.]

Amȳclae. 1. (Ἀμύκλαι: Ἀμυκλαιεύς, Ἀμυκλαῖος: Sklavokhori or Aia Kyriaki?), an ancient town of Laconia on the Eurotas, in a beautiful country, 20 stadia S. E. of Sparta. It is mentioned in the Iliad (ii. 584), and is said to have been founded by the ancient Lacedaemonian king Amyclas, father of Hyacinthus, and to have been the abode of Tyndarus, and of Castor and Pollux, who are hence called Amyclaei Fratres. After the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the Achaeans maintained themselves in Amyclae for a long time; and it was only shortly before the first Messenian war that the town was taken and destroyed by the Lacedaemonians under Teleclus. The tale ran that the inhabitants had been so often alarmed by false reports of the approach of the enemy, that they passed a law that no one should speak of the enemy; and accordingly when the Lacedaemonians at last came, and no one dared to announce their approach, "Amyclae perished through silence:" hence arose the proverb Amyclis ipsis taciturnior. After its destruction by the Lacedaemonians Amyclae became a village, and was only memorable by the festival of the Hyacinthia (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.) celebrated at the place annually, and by the temple and colossal statue of Apollo, who was hence called Amyclaeus. —2. (Amyclanus), an ancient town of Latium, E. of Terracina, on the Sinus Amyclanus, was, according to tradition, an Achaean colony from Laconia. In the time of Augustus the town had disappeared; the inhabitants were said to have deserted it on account of its being infested by serpents; whence Virgil (Aen. x. 564) speaks of tacitae Amyclae, though some commentators suppose that he transfers to this town the epithet belonging to the Amyclae in Laconia [No. 1]. Near Amyclae was the Spelunca (Sperlonga), or natural grotto, a favourite retreat of the emperor Tiberius.

Amȳclas. [AMYCLAE.]

Amyclīdes, a name of Hyacinthus, as the son of Amyclas.

Amȳcus (Ἄμυκος), son of Poseidon and Bithynis, king of the Bebryces, was celebrated for his skill in boxing, and used to challenge strangers to box with him. When the Argonauts came to his dominions, Pollux accepted the challenge and killed him.

Amymōnē (Ἀμυμώνη), one of the daughters of Danaus and Elephantis. When Danaus arrived in Argos, the country was suffering from a drought and Danaus sent out Amymone to fetch water. She was attacked by a satyr, but was rescued from his violence by Poseidon, who appropriated her to himself, and then showed her the wells at Lerna. According to another account he bade her draw his trident from the rock, from which a threefold spring gushed forth, which was called after her the well and river of Amymone. Her son by Poseidon was called Nauplius.

Amynander (Ἀμύνανδρος), king of the Athamanes in Epirus, an ally of the Romans in their war with Philip of Macedonia, about B.C. 198, but an ally of Antiochus, B.C. 189.

Amyntas (Ἀμύντας). 1. I. King of Macedonia, reigned from about B.C. 540 to 500, and was succeeded by his son Alexander I. —2. II. King of Macedonia, son of Philip, the brother of Perdiccas II., reigned B.C. 393—369, and obtained the crown by the murder of the usurper Pausanias. Soon after his accession he was driven from Macedonia by the Illyrians, but was restored to his kingdom by the Thessalians. On his return he was engaged in war with the Olynthians, in which he was assisted by the Spartans, and by their aid Olynthus was reduced in 379. Amyntas united himself also with Jason of Pherae, and carefully cultivated the friendship of Athens. Amyntas left by his wife Eurydice three sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and the famous Philip. — 3. Grandson of Amyntas II., was excluded by Philip from the succession on the death of his father Perdiccas III. in B. C. 360. He was put to death in the first year of the reign of Alexander the Great, 336, for a plot against the king's life. — 4. A Macedonian officer in Alexander's army, son of Andromenes. He and his brothers were accused of being privy to the conspiracy of Philotas in 330, but were acquitted. Some little time after he was killed at the siege of a village. — 5. A Macedonian traitor, son of Antiochus, took refuge at the court of Darius, and became one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries. He was present at the battle of Issus (B. C. 333), and afterwards fled to Egypt, where he was put to death by Mazaces, the Persian governor. — 6. A king of Galatia, supported Antony, and fought on his side against Augustus at the battle of Actium (B. C. 31). He fell in an expedition against the town of Homonada or Homona. — 7. A Greek writer of a work entitled Stathmi (Σταθμοί), probably an account of the different halting-places of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition.

Amyntor (Ἀμύντωρ), son of Ormenus of Eleon in Thessaly, where Autolycus broke into his house, and father of PHOENIX, whom he cursed on account of unlawful intercourse with his mistress. According to Apollodorus he was a king of Ormenium, and was slain by Hercules, to whom he refused a passage through his dominions, and the hand of his daughter ASTYDAMĪA. According to Ovid (Met. xii. 364) he was king of the Dolopes.

Amyrtaeus (Ἀμυρταῖος), an Egyptian, assumed the title of king, and joined Inarus the Libyan in the revolt against the Persians in B. C. 460. They at first defeated the Persians [ACHAEMENES], but were subsequently totally defeated, 455. Amyrtaeus escaped, and maintained himself as king in the marshy districts of Lower Egypt till about 414, when the Egyptians expelled the Persians, and Amyrtaeus reigned 6 years.

Amȳrus (Ἄμυρος), a river in Thessaly, with a town of the same name upon it, flowing into the lake Boebeis: the country around was called the Ἀμυρικὸν πεδίον.

Amythāon (Ἀμυθάων), son of Cretheus and Tyro, father of Bias and of the seer Melampus, who is hence called Amythāonĭus (Virg. Georg. iii. 550). He dwelt at Pylus in Messenia, and is mentioned among those to whom the restoration of the Olympian games was ascribed.

Anābon (Ἀνάβων), a district of the Persian province of Aria, S. of Aria Proper, containing 4 towns, which still exist, Phra (Ferrah), Bis (Beest or Bost), Gari (Ghore), Nii (Neh).

Anăces (Ἄνακες). [ANAX, No. 2.]

Anacharsis (Ἀνάχαρσις), a Scythian of princely rank, left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge, and came to Athens, about B. C. 594. He became acquainted with Solon, and by his talents and acute observations, he excited general admiration. The fame of his wisdom was such, that he was even reckoned by some among the seven sages. He was killed by his brother Saulius on his return to his native country. Cicero (Tusc. Disp. v. 32) quotes from one of his letters, of which several, but spurious, are still extant.

Anacrĕon (Ἀνακρέων), a celebrated lyric poet, born at Teos, an Ionian city in Asia Minor. He removed from his native city, with the great body of its inhabitants, to Abdera, in Thrace, when Teos was taken by the Persians (about B. C. 540), but lived chiefly at Samos, under the patronage of Polycrates, in whose praise he wrote many songs. After the death of Polycrates (522), he went to Athens at the invitation of the tyrant Hipparchus, where he became acquainted with Simonides and other poets. He died at the age of 85, probably about 478, but the place of his death is uncertain. The universal tradition of antiquity represents Anacreon as a consummate voluptuary; and his poems prove the truth of the tradition. He sings of love and wine with hearty good will; and we see in him the luxury of the Ionian inflamed by the fervour of the poet. The tale that he loved Sappho is very improbable. Of his poems only a few genuine fragments have come down to us; for the "Odes" attributed to him are now admitted to be spurious.—Editions: by Fischer, Lips. 1793; Bergk, Lips. 1834.

Anactŏrium (Ἀνακτόριον; Ἀνακτόριος), a town in Acarnania, built by the Corinthians, upon a promontory of the same name (near La Madonna) at the entrance of the Ambracian gulf. Its inhabitants were removed by Augustus after the battle of Actium (B. C. 31) to Nicopolis.

Anădyŏmĕnē (Ἀναδυομένη), the goddess rising out of the sea, a surname given to Aphrodite, in allusion to the story of her being born from the foam of the sea. This surname had not much celebrity before the time of Apelles, but his famous painting of Aphrodite Anadyomene excited the emulation of other artists, painters as well as sculptors. [APELLES.]

Anagnĭa (Anagnīnus: Anagni), an ancient town of Latium, the chief town of the Hernici, and subsequently both a municipium and a Roman colony. It lay in a very beautiful and fertile country on a hill, at the foot of which the Via Lavicana and Via Praenestina united (Compitum Anagninum). In the neighbourhood Cicero had a beautiful estate, Anagninum (sc. praedium).

Anagyrūs (Ἀναγυροῦς, -οῦντος: Ἀναγυράσιος, Ἀναγυρουντόθεν: nr. Vari, Ru.), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Erectheis, not, as some say, Aeantis, S. of Athens, near the promontory Zoster.

Anaītĭca (Ἀναϊτική), a district of Armenia, in which the goddess Anaïtis was worshipped; also called Acilisene.

Anaītis (Ἀναῖτις), an Asiatic divinity, whose name is also written Anaea, Aneitis, Tanaïs, or Nanaea. Her worship prevailed in Armenia, Cappadocia, Assyria, Persis, &c., and seems to have been a part of the worship so common among the Asiatics, of the creative powers of nature, both male and female. The Greek writers sometimes identify Anaitis with Artemis, and sometimes with Aphrodite.

Anamari or -res, a Gallic people in the plain of the Po, in whose land the Romans founded Placentia.

Anănes, a Gallic people, W. of the Trebia, between the Po and the Apennines.

Ananĭus (Ἀνάνιος), a Greek iambic poet, contemporary with Hipponax, about B. C. 540.

Anăphē (Ἀνάφη: Ἀναφαῖος: Anaphi, Nanfio), a small island in the S. of the Aegean sea, E. of Thera, with a temple of Apollo Aegletes, who was hence called Anaphēus.

Anaphlystus (Ἀνάφλυστος: Ἀναφλύστιος: Anaryso), an Attic demus of the tribe Antiochis on the S. W. coast of Attica, opposite the island Eleussa, called after Anaphlystus, son of Poseidon.

Anăpus (Ἄναπος). 1. A river in Acarnania, flowing into the Achelous. — 2. (Anapo), a river in Sicily, flowing into the sea S. of Syracuse through the marshes of Lysimelīa.

Anartes or -ti, a people of Dacia, N. of the Theiss.

Anas (Ἄνας: Guadiana), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rises in Celtiberia in the mountains near Laminium, forms the boundary between Lusitania and Baetica, and flows into the ocean by two mouths (now only one).

Anatŏlĭus. 1. Bishop of Laodicea, A. D. 270, an Alexandrian by birth, was the author of several mathematical and arithmetical works, of which some fragments have been preserved. — 2. An eminent jurist, was a native of Berytus, and afterwards P. P. (praefectus praetorio) of Illyricum. He died A. D. 361. A work on agriculture, often cited in the Geoponica, and a treatise concerning Sympathies and Antipathies, are assigned by many to this Anatolius. The latter work, however, was probably written by Anatolius the philosopher, who was the master of Iamblichus, and to whom Porphyry addressed Homeric Questions. — 3. Professor of law at Berytus, is mentioned by Justinian among those who were employed in compiling the Digest. He wrote notes on the Digest, and a very concise commentary on Justinian's Code. Both of these works are cited in the Basilica. He perished A. D. 557, in an earthquake at Byzantium, whither he had removed from Berytus.

Anaurus (Ἄναυρος), a river of Thessaly flowing into the Pagasaean gulf.

Anāva (Ἄναυα), an ancient, but early decayed, city of Great Phrygia, on the salt lake of the same name, between Celaenae and Colossae (Hagee Ghioul).

Anax (Ἄναξ). 1. A giant, son of Uranus and Gaea, and father of Asterius. — 2. An epithet of the gods in general, characterising them as the rulers of the world; but the plural forms, Ἄνακες, or Ἄνακτες, or Ἄνακες παῖδες, were used to designate the Dioscuri.

Anaxăgŏras (Ἀναξαγόρας), a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, was born at Clazomenae in Ionia, B. C. 500. He gave up his property to his relations, as he intended to devote his life to higher ends, and went to Athens at the age of 20; here he remained 30 years, and became the intimate friend and teacher of the most eminent men of the time, such as Euripides and Pericles. His doctrines gave offence to the religious feelings of the Athenians; and the enemies of Pericles availed themselves of this circumstance to accuse him of impiety, B. C. 450. It was only through the eloquence of Pericles that he was not put to death; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of 5 talents and to quit Athens. He retired to Lampsacus, where he died in 428, at the age of 72. Anaxagoras was dissatisfied with the systems of his predecessors, the Ionic philosophers, and struck into a new path. The Ionic philosophers had endeavoured to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things. Anaxagoras, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this cause he considered to be nous (νοῦς), that is, mind, thought, or intelligence.

Anaxander (Ἀνάξανδρος), king of Sparta, son of Eurycrates, fought in the 2nd Messenian war, about B. C. 668.

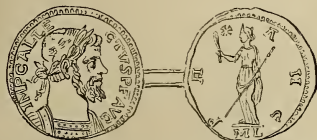
Anaxandrĭdes (Ἀναξανδρίδης). 1. Son of Theopompus, king of Sparta. — 2. King of Sparta, son of Leon, reigned from about B. C. 560 to 520. Having a barren wife whom he would not divorce, the ephors made him take with her a second. By her he had Cleomenes; and after this by his first wife Dorieus, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus. — 3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, a native of Camirus in Rhodes, began to exhibit comedies in B. C. 376. Aristotle held him in high esteem.

Anaxarchus (Ἀνάξαρχος), a philosopher of Abdera, of the school of Democritus, accompanied Alexander into Asia (B. C. 334), and gained his favour by flattery and wit. After the death of Alexander (323), Anaxarchus was thrown by shipwreck into the power of Nicocreon, king of Cyprus, to whom he had given mortal offence, and who had him pounded to death in a stone mortar.

Anaxarĕte (Ἀναξαρέτη), a maiden of Cyprus, remained unmoved by the love of Iphis, who at last, in despair, hung himself at her door. She looked with indifference at the funeral of the youth, but Venus changed her into a stone statue.

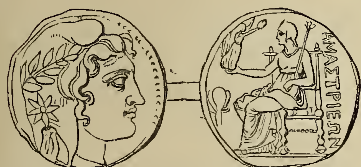
Anaxĭbĭa (Ἀναξιβία), daughter of Plisthenes, sister of Agamemnon, wife of Strophius, and mother of Pylades.

Anaxĭbĭus (Ἀναξίβιος), the Spartan admiral stationed at Byzantium on the return of the Cyrean Greeks from Asia, B. C. 400. In 389 he succeeded Dercyllidas in the command in the Aegaean, but fell in a battle against Iphicrates, near Antandrus, in 388.



Anaxidāmus (Ἀναξίδαμος), king of Sparta, son of Zeuxidamus, lived to the conclusion of the 2nd Messenian war, B. C. 668.

Anaxĭlāus (Ἀναξίλαος) or Anaxĭlas (Ἀναξίλας). 1. Tyrant of Rhegium, of Messenian origin, took possession of Zancle in Sicily about B. C. 494, peopled it with fresh inhabitants, and changed its name into Messene. He died in 476. — 2. Of Byzantium, surrendered Byzantium to the Athenians in B. C. 408. — 3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, contemporary with Plato and Demosthenes. We have a few fragments, and the titles of 19 of his comedies. — 4. A physician and Pythagorean philosopher, born at Larissa, was banished by Augustus from Italy, B. C. 28, on the charge of magic.



Anaximander (Ἀναξίμανδρος), of Miletus, was born B. C. 610 and died 547, in his 64th year. He was one of the earliest philosophers of the Ionian school, and the immediate successor of Thales, its first founder. He first used the word ἀρχὴ to denote the origin of things, or rather the material out of which they were formed: he held that this ἀρχὴ was the infinite (τὸ ἄπειρον), everlasting, and divine, though not attributing to it a spiritual or intelligent nature; and that it was the substance into which all things were resolved on their dissolution. He was a careful observer of nature, and was distinguished by his astronomical, mathematical, and geographical knowledge: he is said to have introduced the use of the Gnomon into Greece.

Anaximĕnes (Ἀναξιμένης). 1. Of Miletus, the third in the series of Ionian philosophers, flourished about B. C. 544; but as he was the teacher of Anaxagoras B. C. 480, he must have lived to a great age. He considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the other elements of the universe were resolvable.—2. Of Lampsacus, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia (B. C. 334), and wrote a history of Philip of Macedonia; a history of Alexander the Great; and a history of Greece in 12 books, from the earliest mythical ages down to the death of Epaminondas. He also enjoyed great reputation as a rhetorician, and is the author of a scientific treatise on rhetoric, the Ῥητορικὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον, usually printed among the works of Aristotle. He was an enemy of Theophrastus, and published under the name of the latter a work calumniating Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, which produced great exasperation against Theophrastus.

Anazarbus or -a (Ἀναζαρβός or -ά: Ἀναζαρβεύς, Anazarbēnus: Anasarba or Naversa, Ru.), a considerable city of Cilicia Campestris, on the left bank of the river Pyramus, at the foot of a mountain of the same name. Augustus conferred upon it the name of Caesarea (ad Anazarbum); and, on the division of Cilicia into the two provinces of Prima and Secunda, it was made the capital of the latter. It was almost destroyed by earthquakes in the reigns of Justinian and Justin.

Ancaeus (Ἀγκαῖος). 1. Son of the Arcadian Lycurgus and Creophile or Eurynome, and father of Agapenor. He was one of the Argonauts, and took part in the Calydonian hunt, in which he was killed by the boar.—2. Son of Poseidon and Astypalaea or Alta, king of the Leleges in Samos, husband of Samia, and father of Perilaus, Enodos, Samos, Alitherses, and Parthenope. He seems to have been confounded by some mythographers with Ancaeus, the son of Lycurgus. The son of Poseidon is also represented as one of the Argonauts, and is said to have become the helmsman of the ship Argo after the death of Tiphys. A well-known proverb is said to have originated with this Ancaeus. He had been told by a seer that he would not live to taste the wine of his vineyard; and when he was afterwards on the point of drinking a cup of wine, the growth of his own vineyard, he laughed at the seer, who, however, answered, πολλὰ μεταξὺ κύλικός τε καὶ χείλεων ἄκρων, "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip." At the same instant Ancaeus was informed that a wild boar was near. He put down his cup, went out against the animal, and was killed by it.

Ancalites, a people of Britain, probably a part of the ATREBATES.

Q. Anchărĭus, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 59, took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of Caesar. He was praetor in 56; and succeeded L. Piso in the province of Macedonia.

Anchesmus (Ἀγχεσμός), a hill not far from Athens, with a temple of Zeus, who was hence called Anchesmius.

Anchĭălē and -lus (Ἀγχιάλη). 1. (Akiali), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, on the borders of Moesia.—2. Also Anchialos, an ancient city of Cilicia, W. of the Cydnus near the coast, said to have been built by Sardanapalus.

Anchīses (Ἀγχίσης), son of Capys and Themis, the daughter of Ilus, king of Dardanus on Mount Ida. In beauty he equalled the immortal gods, and was beloved by Aphrodite, by whom he became the father of Aeneas, who is hence called Anchisiades. The goddess warned him never to betray the real mother of the child; but as on one occasion he boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by a flash of lightning, which according to some traditions killed, but according to others only blinded or lamed him. Virgil in his Aeneid makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Aeneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city. He further relates that Anchises died soon after the first arrival of Aeneas in Sicily, and was buried on mount Eryx. This tradition seems to have been believed in Sicily, for Anchises had a sanctuary at Egesta, and the funeral games celebrated in Sicily in his honour continued down to a late period.

Anchīsĭa (Ἀγχισία), a mountain in Arcadia, N. W. of Mantinea, where Anchises is said to have been buried, according to one tradition.

Ancon (Λευκοσύρων Ἀγκών), a harbour and town at the mouth of the river Iris (Yeshil-ermark) in Pontus.

Ancōna or Ancon (Ἀγχών: Anconitānus: Ancona), a town in Picenum on the Adriatic sea, lying in a bend of the coast between two promontories, and hence called Ancon or an "elbow." It was built by the Syracusans, who settled there about B. C. 392, discontented with the rule of the elder Dionysius; and under the Romans, who made it a colony, it became one of the most important seaports of the Adriatic. It possessed an excellent harbour, completed by Trajan, and it carried on an active trade with the opposite coast of Illyricum. The town was celebrated for its temple of Venus and its purple dye: the surrounding country produced good wine and wheat.

Ancorārĭus Mons, a mountain in Mauretania Caesariensis, S. of Caesarea, abounding in citron trees, the wood of which was used by the Romans for furniture.

Ancōre. [NICAEA.]

Ancus Marcĭus, fourth king of Rome, reigned 24 years, B. C. 640—616, and is said to have been the son of Numa's daughter. He conquered the Latins, took many Latin towns, transported the inhabitants to Rome, and gave them the Aventine to dwell on: these conquered Latins formed the original Plebs. He also founded a colony at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; built a fortress on the Janiculum as a protection against Etruria, and united it with the city by a bridge across the Tiber; dug the ditch of the Quirites, which was a defence for the open ground between the Caelian and the Palatine; and built a prison. He was succeeded by Tarquinius Priscus.

Ancȳra (Ἄγκυρα: Ἀγκυρανός, Ancyrānus). 1. (Angora), a city of Galatia in Asia Minor, in 39° 56′ N. lat. In the time of Augustus, when Galatia became a Roman province, Ancyra was the capital: it was originally the chief city of a Gallic tribe named the Tectosages, who came from the S. of France. Under the Roman empire it had the name of Sebaste, which in Greek is equivalent to Augusta in Latin. When Augustus recorded the chief events of his life on bronze tablets at Rome, the citizens of Ancyra had a copy made, which was cut on marble blocks and placed at Ancyra in a temple dedicated to Augustus and Rome. This inscription is called the Monumentum Ancyranum. The Latin inscription was first copied by Tournefort in 1701, and it has been copied several times since. One of the latest copies has been made by Mr. Hamilton, who also copied as much of the Greek inscription as is legible. — 2. A town in Phrygia Epictetus on the borders of Mysia.

Andānĭa (Ἀνδανία: Ἀνδανιεύς, Ἀνδάνιος), a town in Messenia, between Megalopolis and Messene, the capital of the kings of the race of the Leleges, abandoned by its inhabitants in the second Messenian war, and from that time only a village.

Andĕcāvi, Andĕgāvi, or Andes, a Gallic people N. of the Loire, with a town of the same name, also called Juliomagus, now Angers.

Andematunnum. [Lingones.]

Andēra (τὰ Ἄνδειρα: Ἀνδειρηνός), a city of Mysia, celebrated for its temple of Cybele surnamed Ἀνδειρηνή.

Anderītum (Anterieux), a town of the Gabali in Aquitania.

Andes. 1. See Andecavi. — 2. (Pietola), a village near Mantua, the birth-place of Virgil.

Andŏcĭdes (Ἀνδοκίδης), one of the ten Attic orators, son of Leogoras, was born at Athens in B. C. 467. He belonged to a noble family, and was a supporter of the oligarchical party at Athens. In 436 he was one of the commanders of the fleet sent by the Athenians to the assistance of the Corcyreans against the Corinthians. In 415 he became involved in the charge brought against Alcibiades for having profaned the mysteries and mutilated the Hermae, and was thrown into prison; but he recovered his liberty by promising to reveal the names of the real perpetrators of the crime. He is said to have denounced his own father among others, but to have rescued him again in the hour of danger. But as Andocides was unable to clear himself entirely, he was deprived of his rights as a citizen, and left Athens. He returned to Athens on the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred in 411, but was soon obliged to fly again. In the following year he ventured once more to return to Athens, and it was at this time that he delivered the speech still extant, On his Return, in which he petitioned for permission to reside at Athens, but in vain. He was thus driven into exile a third time, and went to reside at Elis. In 403 he again returned to Athens upon the overthrow of the tyranny of the Thirty by Thrasybulus, and the proclamation of the general amnesty. He was now allowed to remain quietly at Athens for the next 3 years, but in 400 his enemies accused him of having profaned the mysteries: he defended himself in the oration still extant, On the Mysteries, and was acquitted. In 394 he was sent as ambassador to Sparta to conclude a peace, and on his return in 393 he was accused of illegal conduct during his embassy (παραπρεσβείας); he defended himself in the extant speech On the Peace with Lacedaemon, but was found guilty, and sent into exile for the fourth time. He seems to have died soon afterwards in exile. Besides the three orations already mentioned there is a fourth against Alcibiades, said to have been delivered in 415, but which is in all probability spurious. — Editions. In the collections of the Greek orators: also separately by Baiter and Sauppe, Zürich, 1838.

Andraemon (Ἀνδραίμων). 1. Husband of Gorge, daughter of Oeneus king of Calydon, in Aetolia, whom he succeeded, and father of Thoas, who is hence called Andraemonides. — 2. Son of Oxylus, and husband of Dryope, who was mother of Amphissus by Apollo.

Andriscus (Ἀνδρίσκος), a man of low origin, who pretended to be a natural son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, was seized by Demetrius, king of Syria, and sent to Rome. He escaped from Rome, assumed the name of Philip, and obtained possession of Macedonia, B. C. 149. He defeated the praetor Juventius, but was conquered by Caecilius Metellus, and taken to Rome to adorn the triumph of the latter, 148.

Andrŏcles (Ἀνδροκλῆς), an Athenian demagogue and orator. He was an enemy of Alcibiades; and it was chiefly owing to his exertions that Alcibiades was banished. After this event, Androcles was for a time at the head of the democratical party; but in B. C. 411 he was put to death by the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred.

Androclus, the slave of a Roman consular, was sentenced to be exposed to the wild beasts in the circus; but a lion which was let loose upon him, instead of springing upon his victim, exhibited signs of recognition, and began licking him. Upon inquiry it appeared that Androclus had been compelled by the severity of his master, while in Africa, to run away from him. Having one day taken refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun, a lion entered, apparently in great pain, and seeing him, went up to him and held out his paw. Androclus found that a large thorn had pierced it, which he drew out, and the lion was soon able to use his paw again. They lived together for some time in the cave, the lion catering for his benefactor. But at last, tired of this savage life, Androclus left the cave, was apprehended by some soldiers, brought to Rome, and condemned to the wild beasts. He was pardoned, and presented with the lion, which he used to lead about the city.

Andrŏgĕōs (Ἀνδρόγεως), son of Minos and Pasiphaë, or Crete, conquered all his opponents in the games of the Panathenaea at Athens. This extraordinary good luck, however, became the cause of his destruction, though the mode of his death is related differently. According to some accounts Aegeus sent the man he dreaded to fight against the Marathonian bull, who killed him; according to others, he was assassinated by his defeated rivals on his road to Thebes, whither he was going to take part in a solemn contest. A third account related that he was assassinated by Aegeus himself. Minos made war on the Athenians in consequence of the death of his son, and imposed upon them the shameful tribute, from which they were delivered by Theseus. He was worshipped in Attica as a hero, and games were celebrated in his honour every year in the Ceramicus. (Dict. of Ant. art. Androgeonia.)

Andrŏmăchē (Ἀνδρομάχη), daughter of Eëtion, king of the Cilician Thebes, and one of the noblest and most amiable female characters in the Iliad. Her father and her 7 brothers were slain by Achilles at the taking of Thebes, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Artemis. She was married to Hector, by whom she had a son Scamandrius (Astyanax), and for whom she entertained the most tender love. On the taking of Troy her son was hurled from the wall of the city, and she herself fell to the share of Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus), the son of Achilles, who took her to Epirus, and to whom she bore 3 sons, Molossus, Pielus, and Pergamus. She afterwards married Helenus, a brother of Hector, who ruled over Chaonia, a part of Epirus, and to whom she bore Cestrinus. After the death of Helenus, she followed her son Pergamus to Asia, where an heroum was erected to her.

Andrŏmăchus (Ἀνδρόμαχος). 1. Ruler of Tauromenium in Sicily about B. C. 344, and father of the historian Timaeus.—2. Of Crete, physician to the emperor Nero, A. D. 54—68; was the first person on whom the title of Archiater was conferred, and was celebrated as the inventor of a famous compound medicine and antidote called Theriaca Andromachi, which retains its place in some foreign Pharmacopoeias to the present day. Andromachus has left the directions for making this mixture in a Greek elegiac poem, consisting of 174 lines, edited by Tidicaeus, Tiguri, 1607, and Leinker, Norimb. 1754.

Andrŏmĕda (Ἀνδρομέδη), daughter of the Aethiopian king, Cepheus and Cassiopēa. Her mother boasted that the beauty of her daughter surpassed that of the Nereids, who prevailed on Poseidon to visit the country by an inundation, and a sea-monster. The oracle of Ammon promised deliverance if Andromeda was given up to the monster; and Cepheus, obliged to yield to the wishes of his people, chained Andromeda to a rock. Here she was found and saved by Perseus, who slew the monster and obtained her as his wife. Andromeda had previously been promised to Phineus, and this gave rise to the famous fight of Phineus and Perseus at the wedding, in which the former and all his associates were slain. (Ov. Met. v. 1, seq.) After her death, she was placed among the stars.

Andronīcus (Ἀνδρονίκος). 1. Cyrrhestes, so called from his native place, Cyrrha, probably lived about B. C. 100, and built the octagonal tower at Athens, vulgarly called "the tower of the winds" (see Dict. of Ant. p. 616, 2d ed., where a drawing of the building is given). — 2. Livĭus Andronīcus, the earliest Roman poet, was a Greek, probably a native of Tarentum, and the slave of M. Livius Salinator, by whom he was manumitted, and from whom he received the Roman name Livius. He obtained at Rome a perfect knowledge of the Latin language. He wrote both tragedies and comedies in Latin, and we still possess the titles and fragments of at least 14 of his dramas, all of which were borrowed from the Greek: his first drama was acted in B. C. 240. He also wrote an Odyssey in the Saturnian verse and Hymns. (See Düntzer, Livii Andronici Fragmenta collecta, &c. Berlin, 1835.) — 3. Of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher at Rome, about B. C. 58. He published a new edition of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which formerly belonged to the library of Apellicon, and which were brought to Rome by Sulla with the rest of Apellicon's library in B. C. 84. Tyrannio commenced this task, but apparently did not do much towards it. The arrangement which Andronicus made of Aristotle's writings seems to be the one which forms the basis of our present editions. He wrote many commentaries upon the works of Aristotle; but none of these is extant, for the paraphrase of the Nicomachean Ethics, which is ascribed to Andronicus of Rhodes, was written by some one else, and may have been the work of Andronicus Callistus of Thessalonica, who was professor in Italy, in the latter half of the 15th century.

Andrŏpŏlis (Ἀνδρῶν πόλις: Chabur), a city of Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, was the capital of the Nomos Andropolites, and, under the Romans, the station of a legion.

Andros (Ἄνδρος: Ἄνδριος: Andro), the most northerly and one of the largest islands of the Cyclades, S. E. of Euboea, 21 miles long and 8 broad, early attained importance, and colonized Acanthus and Stagīra about B. C. 654. It was taken by the Persians in their invasion of Greece, was afterwards subject to the Athenians, at a later time to the Macedonians, and at length to Attalus III., king of Pergamus, on whose death (B. C. 133) it passed with the rest of his dominions to the Romans. It was celebrated for its wine, whence the whole island was regarded as sacred to Dionysus. Its chief town, also called Andros, contained a celebrated temple of Dionysus, and a harbour of the name of Gaureleon, and a fort Gaurion.

Andrŏtĭon (Ἀνδροτίων). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, against whom the latter delivered an oration, which is still extant. — 2. The author of an Atthis, or a work on the history of Attica.

Anemōrēa, afterwards Anemōlēa (Ἀνεμώρεια, Ἀνεμώλεια: Ἀνεμωριεύς), a town on a hill on the borders of Phocis and Delphi.

Anemūrium (Ἀνεμούριον: Anamur, Ru.), a town and promontory at the S. point of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus.

Angerōna or Angerōnĭa, a Roman goddess, respecting whom we have different statements, some representing her as the goddess of silence, others as the goddess of anguish and fear, that is, the goddess who not only produces this state of mind, but also relieves men from it. Her statue stood in the temple of Volupia, with her mouth bound and sealed up. Her festival, Angeronalia, was celebrated yearly on the 12th of December.

Angītes (Ἀγγίτης: Anghista), a river in Macedonia, flowing into the Strymon.

Angĭtĭa or Anguĭtĭa, a goddess worshipped by the Marsians and Marrubians, who lived about the shores of the lake Fucinus.

Angli or Anglii, a German people of the race of the Suevi, on the left bank of the Elbe, afterwards passed over with the Saxons into Britain, which was called after them England. [SAXONES.] A portion of them appear to have settled in Angeln in Schleswig.

Angrivarĭi, a German people dwelling on both sides of the Visurgis (Weser), separated from the Cherusci by an agger or mound of earth. The name is usually derived from Angern, that is, meadows. They were generally on friendly terms with the Romans, but rebelled in A. D. 16, and were subdued. Towards the end of the first century they extended their territories southwards, and in conjunction with the Chamavi, took possession of part of the territory of the Bructeri, S. and E. of the Lippe, the Angaria or Engern of the middle ages.

Anicētus, a freedman of Nero, and formerly his tutor, was employed by the emperor in the execution of many of his crimes: he was afterwards banished to Sardinia where he died.

Anĭcius Gallus. [Gallus.]

Anĭgrus (Ἄνιγρος: Mavro-Potamo), a small river in the Triphylian Elis, the Minyeïus (Μινυήϊος) of Homer (Il. xi. 721), rises in M. Lapithas, and flows into the Ionian sea near Samicum: its waters have a disagreeable smell, and its fish are not eatable. Near Samicum was a cave sacred to the Nymphs Anigrides (Ἀνιγρίδες or Ἀνιγριάδες), where persons with cutaneous diseases were cured by the waters of the river.

Anĭo, anciently Anĭen (hence Gen. Aniēnis: Teverone or l'Aniene), a river, the most celebrated of the tributaries of the Tiber, rises in the mountains of the Hernici near Treba (Trevi), flows first N.W. and then S.W. through narrow mountain-valleys, receives the brook Digentia (Licenza) above Tibur, forms at Tibur beautiful water-falls (hence praeceps Anio, Hor. Carm. i. 7. 13), and flows, forming the boundary between Latium and the land of the Sabines, into the Tiber, 3 miles above Rome, where the town of Antemnae stood. The water of the Anio was conveyed to Rome by two Aqueducts, the Anio vetus and Anio novus. (See Dict. of Ant. pp. 110, 111, 2d ed.)

Anĭus (Ἄνιος), son of Apollo by Creüsa, or Rhoeo, and priest of Apollo at Delos. By Dryope he had three daughters, Oeno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Dionysus gave the power of producing at will any quantity of wine, corn, and oil, — whence they were called Oenotrŏpae. With these necessaries they are said to have supplied the Greeks during the first 9 years of the Trojan war. After the fall of Troy, Aeneas was kindly received by Anius.

Anna, daughter of Belus and sister of Dido. After the death of the latter, she fled from Carthage to Italy, where she was kindly received by Aeneas. Here she excited the jealousy of Lavinia, and being warned in a dream by Dido, she fled and threw herself into the river Numicius. Henceforth she was worshipped as the nymph of that river under the name of Anna Perenna. There are various other stories respecting the origin of her worship. Ovid relates that she was considered by some as Luna, by others as Themis, by others as Io, daughter of Inachus, by others as the Anna of Bovillae, who supplied the plebs with food, when they seceded to the Mons Sacer. (Ov. Fast. iii. 523.) Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of March. She was in reality an old Italian divinity, who was regarded as the giver of life, health, and plenty, as the goddess whose powers were most manifest at the return of spring when her festival was celebrated. The identification of this goddess with Anna, the sister of Dido, is undoubtedly of late origin.

Anna Comnēna, daughter of Alexis I. Comnenus (reigned A. D. 1081—1118), wrote the life of her father Alexis in 15 books, which is one of the most interesting and valuable histories of the Byzantine literature. — Editions. By Possinus, Paris, 1651; by Schopen, Bonn, 1839.

Annālis, a cognomen of the Villia Gens, first acquired by L. Villius, tribune of the plebs, in B. C. 179, because he introduced a law fixing the year (annus) at which it was lawful for a person to be a candidate for each of the public offices.

M. Anneius, legate of M. Cicero during his government of Cilicia, B. C. 51.

T. Anniānus, a Roman poet, lived in the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote Fescennine verses.

Annicĕris (Ἀννίκερις), a Cyrenaic philosopher, of whom the ancients have left us contradictory accounts. Many modern writers have supposed that there were two philosophers of this name, the one contemporary with Plato, whom he is said to have ransomed for 20 minae from Dionysius of Syracuse, and the other with Alexander the Great.

Annĭus Cimber. [Cimber.]

Annĭus Milo. [Milo.]

Anser, a poet of the Augustan age, a friend of the triumvir M. Antonius, and one of the detractors of Virgil. Hence Virgil plays upon his name (Ecl. ix. 36). Ovid (Trist. ii. 435) calls him procax.

Ansibarĭi or Ampsivarĭi, a German people, originally dwelt S. of the Bructeri, between the sources of the Ems and the Weser: driven out of their country by the Chauci in the reign of Nero (A. D. 59), they asked the Romans for permission to settle in the Roman territory between the Rhine and the Yssel, but when their request was refused they wandered into the interior of the country to the Cherusci, and were at length extirpated, according to Tacitus. We find their name, however, among the Franks in the time of Julian.

Antaeŏpŏlis (Ἀνταιόπολις: nr. Gau-el-Kebir), an ancient city of Upper Egypt (the Thebaïs), on the E. side of the Nile, but at some distance from the river, was the capital of the Nomos Antaeopolites, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Osiris.

Antaeus (Ἀνταῖος), son of Poseidon and Ge, a mighty giant and wrestler in Libya, whose strength was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother earth. The strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him; the conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a house to Poseidon. Hercules discovered the source of his strength, lifted him from the earth, and crushed him in the air. The tomb of Antaeus (Antaei collis), which formed a moderate hill in the shape of a man stretched out at full length, was shown near the town of Tingis in Mauretania down to a late period.

Antagŏras (Ἀνταγόρας), of Rhodes, flourished about B. C. 270, a friend of Antigonus Gonatas and a contemporary of Aratus. He wrote an epic poem entitled Thebais, and also epigrams of which specimens are still extant.

Antalcĭdas (Ἀνταλκίδας), a Spartan, son of Leon, is chiefly known by the celebrated treaty concluded with Persia in B. C. 387, usually called the peace of Antalcidas, since it was the fruit of his diplomacy. According to this treaty all the Greek cities in Asia Minor, together with Clazomenae and Cyprus, were to belong to the Persian king: the Athenians were allowed to retain only Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros; and all the other Greek cities were to be independent.

Antander (Ἄντανδρος), brother of Agathocles, king of Syracuse, wrote the life of his brother.

Antandrus (Ἄντανδρος: Ἀντάνδριος: Antandro), a city of Great Mysia, on the Adramyttian Gulf, at the foot of Mount Ida; an Aeolian colony. Virgil represents Aeneas as touching here after leaving Troy (Aen. iii. 106).

Antărădus (Ἀντάραδος: Tortosa), a town on the N. border of Phoenicia, opposite the island of Aradus.

Antēa or Antīa (Ἄντεια), daughter of the Lycian king Iobates, wife of Proetus of Argos. She is also called Stheneboea. Respecting her love for Bellerophontes, see BELLEROPHONTES.

Antemnae (Antemnas, -atis), an ancient Sabine town at the junction of the Anio and the Tiber, destroyed by the Romans in the earliest times.

Antēnor (Ἀντήνωρ). 1. A Trojan, son of Aesyetes and Cleomestra, and husband of Theano. According to Homer, he was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy: he received Menelaus and Ulysses into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors, and advised his fellow-citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. Thus he is represented as a traitor to his country, and when sent to Agamemnon, just before the taking of Troy, to negotiate peace, he concerted a plan of delivering the city, and even the palladium, into the hands of the Greeks. On the capture of Troy Antenor was spared by the Greeks. His history after this event is related differently. Some writers relate that he founded a new kingdom at Troy; according to others, he embarked with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya, and settled at Cyrene; while a third account states that he went with the Heneti to Thrace, and thence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of Patavium and several towns is ascribed to him. The sons and descendants of Antenor were called Antēnŏrĭdae. —2. Son of Euphranor, an Athenian sculptor, made the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogīton, which the Athenians set up in the Ceramīcus, B. C. 509. These statues were carried off to Susa by Xerxes, and their place was supplied by others made either by Callias or by Praxiteles. After the conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great sent the statues back to Athens, where they were again set up in the Ceramīcus.

Antĕros. [EROS.]

Antevorta, also called Porrima or Prorsa, together with Postvorta, are described either as the two sisters or companions of the Roman goddess Carmenta; but originally they were only two attributes of the one goddess Carmenta, the former describing her knowledge of the future, and the latter that of the past, analogous to the two-headed Janus.

Anthēdōn (Ἀνθηδών: Ἀνθηδόνιος: Lukisi ?), a town of Boeotia with a harbour, on the coast of the Euboean sea, at the foot of M. Messapius, said to have derived its name from a nymph Anthedon, or from Anthedon, son of Glaucus, who was here changed into a god. (Ov. Met. vii. 232, xiii. 905.) The inhabitants chiefly lived by fishing.

Anthēmīus, emperor of the West, A. D. 467—472, was killed on the capture of Rome by Ricimer, who made Olybrius emperor.

Anthĕmūs (Ἀνθεμοῦς -οῦντος: Ἀνθεμούσιος), a Macedonian town in Chalcidice.

Anthĕmūsĭa or Anthĕmus (Ἀνθεμουσία), a city of Mesopotamia, S.W. of Edessa, and a little E. of the Euphrates. The surrounding district was called by the same name, but was generally included under the name of OSRHOENE.

Anthēnē (Ἀνθήνη), a place in Cynuria, in the Peloponnesus.

Anthylla (Ἄνθυλλα), a considerable city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of the Canopic branch of the Nile, below Naucratis, the revenues of which, under the Persians, were assigned to the wife of the satrap of Egypt, to provide her with shoes.

Antĭas, Q. Valerĭus, a Roman historian, flourished about B. C. 80, and wrote the history of Rome from the earliest times down to those of Sulla. He is frequently referred to by Livy, who speaks of him as the most lying of all the annalists, and seldom mentions his name without terms of reproach: there can be little doubt that Livy's judgment is correct.

Anticlēa (Ἀντίκλεια), daughter of Autolycus, wife of Laërtes, and mother of Ulysses, died of grief at the long absence of her son. It is said that before marrying Laërtes, she lived on intimate terms with Sisyphus; whence Euripides calls Ulysses a son of Sisyphus.

Anticlīdes (Ἀντικλείδης), of Athens, lived after the time of Alexander the Great, and was the author of several works, the most important of which was entitled Nosti (Νόστοι), containing an account of the return of the Greeks from their mythical expeditions.

Antĭcȳra, more anciently Anticirrha (Ἀντίκιῤῥα, or Ἀντίκυρα: Ἀντικυρεύς, Ἀντικυραῖος). 1. (Aspra Spitia), a town in Phocis, with a harbour on a peninsula on the W. side of the Sinus Anticyranus, a bay of the Crissaean gulf, called in ancient times Cyparissus. It continued to be a place of importance under the Romans.—2. A town in Thessaly, on the Spercheus, not far from its mouth. Both towns were celebrated for their hellebore, the chief remedy in antiquity for madness: hence the proverb, Ἀντικίῤῥας σε δεῖ, when a person acted senselessly, and Naviget Anticyram. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 166.)

Antĭgĕnes (Ἀντιγένης), a general of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained the satrapy of Susiana, and espoused the side of Eumenes. On the defeat of the latter in B. C. 316, Antigenes fell into the hands of his enemy Antigonus, and was burnt alive by him.

Antigĕnĭdas (Ἀντιγενίδας), a Theban, a celebrated flute-player, and a poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great.

Antĭgŏnē (Ἀντιγόνη), daughter of Oedipus by his mother Jocaste, and sister of Ismene, and of Eteocles and Polynīces. In the tragic story of Oedipus Antigone appears as a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Oedipus had blinded himself, and was obliged to quit Thebes, he was accompanied by Antigone, who remained with him till he died in Colonus, and then returned to Thebes. After her two brothers had killed each other in battle, and Creon, the king of Thebes, would not allow Polynices to be buried, Antigone alone defied the tyrant, and buried the body of her brother. Creon thereupon ordered her to be shut up in a subterraneous cave, where she killed herself. Haemon, the son of Creon, who was in love with her, killed himself by her side.

Antigŏnēa and -īa (Ἀντιγόνεια, Ἀντιγονία). 1. (Tepeleni), a town in Epirus (Illyricum), at the junction of a tributary with the Aous, and near a narrow pass of the Acroceraunian mountains.—2. A Macedonian town in Chalcidice.—3. See MANTINEA.—4. A town on the Orontes in Syria, founded by Antigonus as the capital of his empire (B. C. 306), but most of its inhabitants were transferred by Seleucus to ANTIOCHIA, which was built in its neighbourhood.—5. A town in Bithynia, afterwards Nicaea.—6. A town in the Troas. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 2.]

Antĭgŏnus (Ἀντίγονος). 1. King of Asia, surnamed the One-eyed, son of Philip of Elymiotis, and father of Demetrius Poliorcetes by Stratonīce. He was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and in the division of the empire after the death of the latter (B. C. 323), he received the provinces of the Greater Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia. On the death of the regent Antipater in 319, he aspired to the sovereignty of Asia. In 316 he defeated and put Eumenes to death, after a struggle of nearly 3 years. From 315 to 311 he carried on war, with varying success, against Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus. By the peace made in 311, Antigonus was allowed to have the government of all Asia; but peace did not last more than a year. After the defeat of Ptolemy's fleet in 306, Antigonus assumed the title of king, and his example was followed by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus. In the same year Antigonus invaded Egypt, but was compelled to retreat. His son Demetrius carried on the war with success against Cassander in Greece; but he was compelled to return to Asia to the assistance of his father, against whom Cassander, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, had formed a fresh confederacy. Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated by Lysimachus at the decisive battle of Ipsus in Phrygia, in 301. Antigonus fell in the battle in the 81st year of his age. — 2. Gonatas, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and grandson of the preceding. He assumed the title of king of Macedonia after his father's death in Asia in B. C. 283, but he did not obtain possession of the throne till 277. He was driven out of his kingdom by Pyrrhus of Epirus in 273, but recovered it in the following year: he was again expelled by Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus, and again recovered his dominions. He attempted to prevent the formation of the Achaean league, and died in 239. He was succeeded by Demetrius II. His surname Gonatas is usually derived from Gonnos or Gonni in Thessaly; but some think that Gonatas is a Macedonian word, signifying an iron plate protecting the knee. — 3. Doson (so called because he was always about to give but never did), son of Demetrius of Cyrene, and grandson of Demetrius Poliorcetes. On the death of Demetrius II. in B. C. 229, he was left guardian of his son Philip, but he married the widow of Demetrius, and became king of Macedonia himself. He supported Aratus and the Achaean league against Cleomenes, king of Sparta, whom he defeated at Sellasia in 221, and took Sparta. On his return to Macedonia, he defeated the Illyrians, and died a few days afterwards, 220. — 4. King of Judaea, son of Aristobulus II., was placed on the throne by the Parthians in B. C. 40, but was taken prisoner by Sosius, the lieutenant of Antony, and was put to death by the latter in 37. — 5. Of Carystus, lived at Alexandria about B. C. 250, and wrote a work still extant, entitled Historiae Mirabiles, which is only of value from its preserving extracts from other and better works. — Editions. By J. Beckmann, Lips. 1791, and by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Bruns. 1839.

Antĭlĭbănus (Ἀντιλίβανος: Jebel-es-Sheikh or Anti-Lebanon), a mountain on the confines of Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria, parallel to Libanus (Lebanon), which it exceeds in height. Its highest summit is M. Hermon (also Jebel-es-Sheikh).

Antĭlŏchus (Ἀντίλοχος), son of Nestor and Anaxibia or Eurydice, accompanied his father to Troy, and distinguished himself by his bravery He was slain before Troy by Memnon the Ethiopian, and was buried by the side of his friends Achilles and Patroclus.

Antĭmăchus (Ἀντίμαχος). 1. A Trojan, persuaded his countrymen not to surrender Helen to the Greeks. He had three sons, two of whom were put to death by Menelaus. — 2. Of Claros or Colophon, a Greek epic and elegiac poet, was probably a native of Claros, but was called a Colophonian, because Claros belonged to Colophon. (Clarius poeta, Ov. Trist. i. 6. 1.) He flourished towards the end of the Peloponnesian war; his chief work was an epic poem of great length called Thebais (Θηβαΐς). Antimachus was one of the forerunners of the poets of the Alexandrine school, who wrote more for the learned than for the public at large. The Alexandrine grammarians assigned to him the second place among the epic poets, and the emperor Hadrian preferred his works even to those of Homer. He also wrote a celebrated elegiac poem called Lyde, which was the name of his wife or mistress, as well as other works. There was likewise a tradition that he made a recension of the text of the Homeric poems.

Antinŏŏpŏlis (Ἀντινόου πόλις or Ἀντινόεια: Enseneh, Ru.), a splendid city, built by Hadrian, in memory of his favourite ANTINOUS, on the E. bank of the Nile, upon the site of the ancient Besa, in Middle Egypt (Heptanomis). It was the capital of the Nomos Antinoïtes, and had an oracle of the goddess Besa.

Antĭnŏus (Ἀντίνοος). 1. Son of Eupīthes of Ithaca, and one of the suitors of Penelope, was slain by Ulysses. — 2. A youth of extraordinary beauty, born at Claudiopolis in Bithynia, was the favourite of the emperor Hadrian, and his companion in all his journeys. He was drowned in the Nile, A. D. 122, whether accidentally or on purpose, is uncertain. The grief of the emperor knew no bounds. He enrolled Antinous amongst the gods, caused a temple to be erected to him at Mantinēa, and founded the city of ANTINOOPOLIS in honour of him. A large number of works of art of all kinds were executed in his honour, and many of them are still extant.

Antĭŏchīa and -ēa (Ἀντιόχεια: Ἀντιοχεύς and -όχειος, fem. Ἀντιοχίς and -όχισσα, Antiochēnus), the name of several cities of Asia, 16 of which are said to have been built by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his father Antiochus. 1. A. Epidaphnes, or ad Daphnem, or ad Orontem (Ἀ. ἐπὶ Δάφνῃ: so called from a neighbouring grove: Ἀ. ἐπὶ Ὀρόντῃ: Antakia, Ru.), the capital of the Greek kingdom of Syria, and long the chief city of Asia and perhaps of the world, stood on the left bank of the Orontes, about 20 miles (geog.) from the sea, in a beautiful valley, about 10 miles long and 5 or 6 broad, enclosed by the ranges of Amanus on the N.W. and Casius on the S.E. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, about B. C. 300, and peopled chiefly from the neighbouring city of ANTIGONIA. It flourished so rapidly as soon to need enlargement; and other additions were again made to it by Seleucus II. Callinicus (about B. C. 240), and Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (about B. C. 170). Hence it obtained the name of Tetrapolis (τετραπόλις, i.e. 4 cities). Besides being the capital of the greatest kingdom of the world, it had a considerable commerce, the Orontes being navigable up to the city, and the high road between Asia and Europe passing through it. Under the Romans it was the residence of the proconsuls of Syria; it was favoured and visited by emperors; and was made a colonia with the Jus Italicum by Antoninus Pius. It was one of the earliest strongholds of the Christian faith; the first place where the Christian name was used (Acts, xi. 26); the centre of missionary efforts in the Apostolic age; and the see of one of the four chief bishops, who were called Patriarchs. Though far inferior to Alexandria as a seat of learning, yet it derived some distinction in this respect from the teaching of Libanius and other sophists; and its eminence in art is attested by the beautiful gems and medals still found among its ruins. It was destroyed by the Persian king Chosroës (A. D. 540), but rebuilt by Justinian, who gave it the new name of Thĕūpŏlis (Θεουπόλις). The ancient walls which still surround the insignificant modern town are probably those built by Justinian. The name of Antiochia was also given to the surrounding district, i. e. the N.W. part of Syria, which bordered upon Cilicia. — 2. A. ad Maeandrum (Ἀ. πρὸς Μαίανδρῳ: nr. Yenishehr, Ru.), a city of Caria, on the Maeander, built by Antiochus I. Soter on the site of the old city of Pythopolis. — 3. A. Pisidiae or ad Pisidiam (Ἀ. Πισιδίας or πρὸς Πισιδίᾳ), a considerable city on the borders of Phrygia Paroreios and Pisidia; built by colonists from Magnesia; declared a free city by the Romans aftor their victory over Antiochus the Great (B. C. 189); made a colony under Augustus, and called Caesarea. It was celebrated for the worship and the great temple of Men Arcaeus (Μὴν Ἀρκαῖος, the Phrygian Moon-god), which the Romans suppressed. — 4. A. Margiāna (Ἀ. Μαργιανή: Meru Shah-Jehan ?), a city in the Persian province of Margiana, on the river Margus, founded by Alexander, and at first called Alexandria; destroyed by the barbarians, rebuilt by Antiochus I. Soter, and called Antiochia. It was beautifully situated, and was surrounded by a wall 70 stadia (about 8 miles) in circuit. Among the less important cities of the name were: (5.) A. ad Taurum in Commagene; (6.) A. ad Cragum, and (7.) A. ad Pyramum, in Cilicia. The following Antiochs are better known by other names: A. ad Sarum [ADANA]; A. Characenes [CHARAX]; A. Callirrhoë [EDESSA]; A. ad Hippum [GADARA]; A. Mygdoniae [NISIBIS]; in Cilicia [TARSUS]; in Caria or Lydia [TRALLES].

Antĭŏchus (Ἀντίοχος). I. Kings of Syria.

1. Soter (reigned B. C. 280—261), was the son of Seleucus I., the founder of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucidae. He married his stepmother Stratonīce, with whom he fell violently in love, and whom his father surrendered to him. He fell in battle against the Gauls in 261. — 2. Theos (B. C. 261—246), son and successor of No. 1. The Milesians gave him his surname of Theos, because he delivered them from their tyrant, Timarchus. He carried on war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, which was brought to a close by his putting away his wife Laodĭce, and marrying Berenīce, the daughter of Ptolemy. After the death of Ptolemy, he recalled Laodice, but in revenge for the insult she had received, she caused Antiochus and Berenice to be murdered. During the reign of Antiochus, Arsaces founded the Parthian empire (250), and Theodotus established an independent kingdom at Bactria. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus. His younger son Antiochus Hierax also assumed the crown, and carried on war some years with his brother. [SELEUCUS II.] — 3. The Great (B. C. 223—187), second son of Seleucus Callinicus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, when he was only in his 15th year. After defeating (220) Molon, satrap of Media, and his brother Alexander, satrap of Persis, who had attempted to make themselves independent, he carried on war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, in order to obtain Coele-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, but was obliged to cede these provinces to Ptolemy, in consequence of his defeat at the battle of Raphia near Gaza, in 217. He next marched against Achaeus, who had revolted in Asia Minor, and whom he put to death, when he fell into his hands in 214. [ACHAEUS.] Shortly after this he was engaged for 7 years (212—205) in an attempt to regain the E. provinces of Asia, which had revolted during the reign of Antiochus II.; but though he met with great success, he found it hopeless to effect the subjugation of the Parthian and Bactrian kingdoms, and accordingly concluded a peace with them. In 205 he renewed his war against Egypt with more success, and in 198 conquered Palestine and Coele-Syria, which he afterwards gave as a dowry with his daughter Cleopatra upon her marriage with Ptolemy Epiphanes. In 196 he crossed over into Europe, and took possession of the Thracian Chersonese. This brought him into contact with the Romans, who commanded him to restore the Chersonese to the Macedonian king; but he refused to comply with their demand; in which resolution he was strengthened by Hannibal, who arrived at his court in 195. Hannibal urged him to invade Italy without loss of time; but Antiochus did not follow his advice, and it was not till 192, that he crossed over into Greece. In 191 he was defeated by the Romans at Thermopylae, and compelled to return to Asia: his fleet was also vanquished in two engagements. In 190 he was again defeated by the Romans under L. Scipio, at Mount Sipylus, near Magnesia, and compelled to sue for peace, which was granted in 188, on condition of his ceding all his dominions E. of Mount Taurus, paying 15,000 Euboic talents within 12 years, giving up his elephants and ships of war, and surrendering the Roman enemies; but he allowed Hannibal to escape. In order to raise the money to pay the Romans, he attacked a wealthy temple in Elymais, but was killed by the people of the place (187). He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopator. — 4. Epiphanes (B. C. 175—164), son of Antiochus III., was given as a hostage to the Romans in 188, and was released from captivity in 175 through his brother Seleucus Philopator, whom he succeeded in the same year. He carried on war against Egypt from 171—168 with great success, in order to obtain Coele-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as a dowry with his sister, and he was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria in 168, when the Romans compelled him to retire. He endeavoured to root out the Jewish religion and to introduce the worship of the Greek divinities; but this attempt led to a rising of the Jewish people, under Mattathias and his heroic sons the Maccabees, which Antiochus was unable to put down. He attempted to plunder a temple in Elymais in 164, but he was repulsed, and died shortly afterwards in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes. His subjects gave him the name of Epimanes ("the madman") in parody of Epiphanes. — 5. Eupator (B. C. 164—162), son and successor of Epiphanes, was 9 years old at his father's death, and reigned under the guardianship of Lysias. He was dethroned and put to death by Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had hitherto lived at Rome as a hostage. — 6. Theos, son of Alexander Balas. He was brought forward as a claimant to the crown in 144, against Demetrius Nicator by Tryphon, but he was murdered by the latter, who ascended the throne himself in 142. — 7. Sidetes (B. C. 137—128), so called from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, younger son of Demetrius Soter, succeeded Tryphon. He married Cleopatra, wife of his elder brother Demetrius Nicator, who was a prisoner with the Parthians. He carried on war against the Parthians, at first with success, but was afterwards defeated and slain in battle in 128. — 8. Grypus, or Hook-nosed (B. C. 125 — 96), second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. He was placed upon the throne in 125 by his mother Cleopatra, who put to death his eldest brother Seleucus, because she wished to have the power in her own hands. He poisoned his mother in 120, and subsequently carried on war for some years with his half-brother A. IX. Cyzicenus. At length, in 112, the two brothers agreed to share the kingdom between them, A. Cyzicenus having Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and A. Grypus the remainder of the provinces. Grypus was assassinated in 96. — 9. Cyzicenus, from Cyzicus, where he was brought up, son of A. VII. Sidetes and Cleopatra, reigned over Coele-Syria and Phoenicia from 112 to 96, but fell in battle in 95 against Seleucus Epiphanes, son of A. VIII. Grypus. — 10. Eusebes, son of A. IX. Cyzicenus, defeated Seleucus Epiphanes, who had slain his father in battle, and maintained the throne against the brothers of Seleucus. He succeeded his father Antiochus IX. in 95. — 11. Epiphanes, son of A. VIII. Grypus and brother of Seleucus Epiphanes, carried on war against A. X. Eusebes, but was defeated by the latter, and drowned in the river Orontes. — 12. Dionysus, brother of No. 11, held the crown for a short time, but fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabians. The Syrians, worn out with the civil broils of the Seleucidae, offered the kingdom to Tigranes, king of Armenia, who united Syria to his own dominions in 83, and held it till his defeat by the Romans in 69. — 13. Asiaticus, son of A. X. Eusebes, became king of Syria on the defeat of Tigranes by Lucullus in 69; but he was deprived of it in 65 by Pompey, who reduced Syria to a Roman province. In this year the Seleucidae ceased to reign.

II. Kings of Commagene.

1. Made an alliance with the Romans, about B. C. 64. He assisted Pompey with troops in 49, and was attacked by Antony in 38. He was succeeded by Mithridates I. about 31. — 2. Succeeded Mithridates I., and was put to death at Rome by Augustus in 29. — 3. Succeeded Mithridates II., and died in A. D. 17. Upon his death, Commagene became a Roman province, and remained so till A. D. 38. — 4. Surnamed EPIPHANES, apparently a son of Antiochus III., received his paternal dominion from Caligula in A. D. 38. He was subsequently deposed by Caligula, but regained his kingdom on the accession of Claudius in 41. He was a faithful ally of the Romans, and assisted them in their wars against the Parthians under Nero, and against the Jews under Vespasian. At length in 72, he was accused of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, was deprived of his kingdom, and retired to Rome, where he passed the remainder of his life.

III. Literary.

1. Of Aegae in Cilicia, a sophist, or, as he himself pretended to be, a Cynic philosopher. He flourished about A. D. 200, during the reign of Severus and Caracalla. During the war of Caracalla against the Parthians, he deserted to the Parthians together with Tiridates. He was one of the most distinguished rhetoricians of his time, and also acquired some reputation as a writer. — 2. Of Ascalon, the founder of the fifth Academy, was a friend of Lucullus and the teacher of Cicero during his studies at Athens (B. C. 79); but he had a school at Alexandria also, as well as in Syria, where he seems to have ended his life. His principal teacher was Philo, who succeeded Plato, Arcesilas, and Carneades, as the founder of the fourth Academy. He is, however, better known as the adversary than the disciple of Philo; and Cicero mentions a treatise called Sosus, written by him against his master, in which he refutes the scepticism of the Academics. — 3. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian, lived about B. C. 423, and wrote histories of Sicily and Italy.

Antĭŏpē (Ἀντιόπη). 1. Daughter of Nycteus and Polyxo, or of the river god Asopus in Boeotia, became by Zeus the mother of Amphion and Zethus. [AMPHION.] Dionysus threw her into a state of madness on account of the vengeance which her sons had taken on Dirce. In this condition she wandered through Greece, until Phocus, the grandson of Sisyphus, cured and married her. — 2. An Amazon, sister of Hippolyte, wife of Theseus, and mother of Hippolytus.

Antĭpăter (Ἀντίπατρος). 1. The Macedonian, an officer greatly trusted by Philip and Alexander the Great, was left by the latter regent in Macedonia, when he crossed over into Asia in B. C. 334. In consequence of dissensions between Olympias and Antipater, the latter was summoned to Asia in 324, and Craterus appointed to the regency of Macedonia, but the death of Alexander in the following year prevented these arrangements from taking effect. Antipater now obtained Macedonia again, and in conjunction with Craterus, who was associated with him in the government, carried on war against the Greeks, who endeavoured to establish their independence. This war, usually called the Lamian war, from Lamia, where Antipater was besieged in 323, was terminated by Antipater's victory over the confederates at Crannon in 322. This was followed by the submission of Athens and the death of DEMOSTHENES. In 321 Antipater crossed over into Asia in order to oppose Perdiccas; but the murder of PERDICCAS in Egypt put an end to this war, and left Antipater supreme regent. Antipater died in 319, after appointing Polysperchon regent, and his own son CASSANDER to a subordinate position. — 2. Grandson of the preceding, and second son of Cassander and Thessalonīca. After the death of his elder brother Philip

IV. (B. C. 295), great dissensions ensued between Antipater and his younger brother Alexander, for the kingdom of Macedonia. Antipater, believing that Alexander was favoured by his mother, put her to death. The younger brother upon this applied for aid at once to Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes. The remaining history is related differently: but so much is certain, that both Antipater and Alexander were subsequently put to death, either by Demetrius or at his instigation, and that Demetrius became king of Macedonia. — 3. Father of Herod the Great, son of a noble Idumaean of the same name, espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against his brother Aristobulus. He ingratiated himself with the Romans, and in B. C. 47 was appointed by Caesar procurator of Judaea, which appointment he held till his death in 43, when he was carried off by poison which Malichus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer to him. — 4. Eldest son of Herod the Great by his first wife, Doris, brought about the death of his two half-brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, in B. C. 6, but was himself condemned as guilty of a conspiracy against his father's life, and was executed five days before Herod's death. — 5. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, the successor of Diogenes and the teacher of Panaetius, about B. C. 144. — 6. Of Tyre, a Stoic philosopher, died shortly before B. C. 45, and wrote a work on Duties (de Officiis). — 7. Of Sidon, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B. C. 108—100, and lived to a great age. — 8. Of Thessalonica, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the latter part of the reign of Augustus.

Antĭpăter, L. Caelĭus, a Roman jurist and historian, and a contemporary of C. Gracchus (B. C. 123) and L. Crassus, the orator, wrote Annales, which were epitomized by Brutus, and which contained a valuable account of the 2nd Punic war.

Antipatrĭa (Ἀντιπάτρια: Berat?), a town in Illyricum on the borders of Macedonia, on the left bank of the Apsus.

Antĭphănes (Ἀντιφάνης). 1. A comic poet of the middle Attic comedy, born about B. C. 404, and died 330. He wrote 365, or at the least 260 plays, which were distinguished by elegance of language. — 2. Of Berga in Thrace, a Greek writer on marvellous and incredible things. — 3. An epigrammatic poet, several of whose epigrams are still extant in the Greek Anthology, lived about the reign of Augustus.

Antĭphătes (Ἀντιφάτης), king of the mythical Laestrygones in Sicily, who are represented as giants and cannibals. They destroyed 11 of the ships of Ulysses, who escaped with only one vessel.

Antiphellus (Ἀντίφελλος: Antiphilo), a town on the coast of Lycia, between Patara and Aperlae, originally the port of Phellus.

Antiphēmus (Ἀντίφημος), the Rhodian, founder of Gela in Sicily, B. C. 690.

Antĭphĭlus (Ἀντίφιλος). 1. Of Byzantium, an epigrammatic poet, author of several excellent epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a contemporary of the emperor Nero. — 2. Of Egypt, a distinguished painter, the rival of Apelles, painted for Philip and Alexander the Great.

Antĭphon (Ἀντιφῶν). 1. The most ancient of the 10 orators in the Alexandrine canon, was a son of Sophilus the Sophist, and born at Rhamnus in Attica, in B. C. 480. He belonged to the oligarchical party at Athens, and took an active part in the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred (B. C. 411), after the overthrow of which he was brought to trial, condemned, and put to death. The oratorical powers of Antiphon are highly praised by the ancients. He introduced great improvements in public speaking, and was the first who laid down theoretical laws for practical eloquence; he opened a school in which he taught rhetoric, and the historian Thucydides is said to have been one of his pupils. The orations which he composed were written for others; and the only time that he spoke in public himself was when he was accused and condemned to death. This speech, which was considered in antiquity a master-piece of eloquence, is now lost. (Thuc. viii. 68; Cic. Brut. 12.) We still possess 15 orations of Antiphon, 3 of which were written by him for others, and the remaining 12 as specimens for his school, or exercises on fictitious cases. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators, and separately, edited by Baiter and Sauppe, Zürich, 1838, and Mätzner, Berlin, 1838. — 2. A tragic poet, whom many writers confound with the Attic orator, lived at Syracuse, at the court of the elder Dionysius, by whom he was put to death. — 3. Of Athens, a sophist and an epic poet, wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams, which is referred to by Cicero and others. He is the same person as the Antiphon who was an opponent of Socrates. (Xen. Mem. i. 6.)

Antĭphus (Ἄντιφος). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, slain by Agamemnon. — 2. Son of Thessalus, and one of the Greek heroes at Troy.

Antĭpŏlis (Ἀντίπολις: Antibes, pronounced by the inhabitants Antiboul), a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the coast, in the territory of the Deciates, a few miles W. of Nicaea, was founded by Massilia; the muria, or salt pickle made of fish, prepared at this town, was very celebrated.

Antirrhĭum (Ἀντίρριον: Castello di Romelia), a promontory on the borders of Aetolia and Locris, opposite Rhium (Castello di Morea) in Achaia, with which it formed the narrow entrance of the Corinthian gulf: the straits are sometimes called the Little Dardanelles.

Antissa (Ἄντισσα: Ἀντισσαῖος: Kalas Limneonas), a town in Lesbos with a harbour, on the W. coast between Methymna and the promontory Sigrium, was originally on a small island opposite Lesbos, which was afterwards united with Lesbos. It was destroyed by the Romans, B. C. 168, and its inhabitants removed to Methymna, because they had assisted Antiochus.

Antisthĕnes (Ἀντισθένης), an Athenian, founder of the sect of the Cynic philosophers. His mother was a Thracian. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (B. C. 426), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he never quitted, and at whose death he was present. He died at Athens, at the age of 70. He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers; whence probably his followers were called Cynics (κυνικοί), though others derive their name from their dog-like neglect of all forms and usages of society. His writings were very numerous, and chiefly dialogues; his style was pure and elegant; and he possessed considerable powers of wit and sarcasm. Two declamations of his are preserved, named Ajax and Ulysses, which are purely rhetorical. He was an enemy to all speculation, and thus was opposed to Plato, whom he attacked furiously in one of his dialogues. His philosophical system was confined almost entirely to ethics, and he taught that virtue is the sole thing necessary. He showed his contempt of all the luxuries and outward comforts of life by his mean clothing and hard fare. From his school the Stoics subsequently sprung. In one of his works entitled Physicus, he contended for the Unity of the Deity. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 13.)

Antistĭus, P., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 88, a distinguished orator, supported the party of Sulla, and was put to death by order of young Marius in 82. His daughter Antistia was married to Pompeius Magnus.

Antistĭus Labeo. [LABEO.]

Antistĭus Vĕtus. [VETUS.]

Antĭtaurus (Ἀντίταυρος: Ali-Dagh), a chain of mountains, which strikes off N.E. from the main chain of the Taurus on the S. border of Cappadocia, in the centre of which district it turns to the E. and runs parallel to the Taurus as far as the Euphrates. Its average height exceeds that of the Taurus; and one of its summits, Mount Argaeus, near Mazaca, is the loftiest mountain of Asia Minor.

Antĭum (Antias: Torre or Porto d' Anzo), a very ancient town of Latium on a rocky promontory running out some distance into the Tyrrhenian sea. It was founded by Tyrrhenians and Pelasgians, and in earlier and even later times was noted for its piracy. Although united by Tarquinius Superbus to the Latin League, it generally sided with the Volscians against Rome. It was taken by the Romans in B. C. 468, and a colony was sent thither, but it revolted, was taken a second time by the Romans in B. C. 338, was deprived of all its ships, the beaks of which (Rostra) served to ornament the platform of the speakers in the Roman forum, was forbidden to have any ships in future, and received another Roman colony. But it gradually recovered its former importance, was allowed in course of time again to be used as a seaport, and in the latter times of the republic and under the empire, became a favourite residence of many of the Roman nobles and emperors. The emperor Nero was born here, and in the remains of his palace the celebrated Apollo Belvedere was found. Antium possessed a celebrated temple of Fortune (O Diva, gratum quae regis Antium, Hor. Carm. i. 35), of Aesculapius, and at the port of Ceno, a little to the E. of Antium, a temple of Neptune, on which account the place is now called Nettuno.

Antĭus Restĭo. [RESTIO.]

Antōnĭa. 1. Major, elder daughter of M. Antonius and Octavia, husband of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and mother of Cn. Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero. Tacitus calls this Antonia the younger daughter. — 2. Minor, younger sister of the preceding, husband of Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and mother of Germanicus, the father of the emperor Caligula, of Livia or Livilla, and of the emperor Claudius. She died A. D. 38, soon after the accession of her grandson Caligula. She was celebrated for her beauty, virtue, and chastity. — 3. Daughter of the emperor Claudius, married first to Pompeius Magnus, and afterwards to Faustus Sulla. Nero wished to marry her after the death of his wife Poppaea, A. D. 66; and on her refusal he caused her to be put to death on a charge of treason.

Antōnĭa Turris, a castle on a rock at the N.W. corner of the Temple at Jerusalem, which commanded both the temple and the city. It was at first called Baris: Herod the Great changed its name in honour of M. Antonius. It contained the residence of the Procurator Judaeae.

Antōnīni Itinerārĭum, the title of an extant work, which is a very valuable itinerary of the whole Roman empire, in which both the principal and the cross-roads are described by a list of all the places and stations upon them, the distances from place to place being given in Roman miles. It is usually attributed to the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, but it appears to have been commenced by order of Julius Caesar and to have been completed in the reign of Augustus; though it is probable that it received important additions and revision under one or both of the Antonines.—Editions: by Wesseling, Amst. 1735; by Parthey and Pinder, Berlin, 1848.

Antōnīnōpŏlis (Ἀντωνινόπολις: -ίτης, ānus), a city of Mesopotamia, between Edessa and Dara, aft. Maximianopolis, and aft. Constantia.

Antōnīnus, M. Aurēlĭus. [M. AURELIUS.]

Antōnīnus Pius, Roman emperor, A. D. 138—161. His name in the early part of his life, at full length, was Titus Aurelius Fulvus Boionius Arrius Antoninus. His paternal ancestors came from Nemausus (Nismes) in Gaul; but Antoninus himself was born near Lanuvium, September 19th, A. D. 86. From an early age he gave promise of his future worth. In 120 he was consul, and subsequently proconsul of the province of Asia: on his return to Rome he lived on terms of the greatest intimacy with Hadrian, who adopted him on February 25th, 138. Henceforward he bore the name of T. Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Caesar, and on the death of Hadrian, July 2nd, 138, he ascended the throne. The senate conferred upon him the title of Pius, or the dutifully affectionate, because he persuaded them to grant to his father Hadrian the apotheosis and the other honours usually paid to deceased emperors, which they had at first refused to bestow upon Hadrian. The reign of Antoninus is almost a blank in history — a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, violence, and crime. He was one of the best princes that ever mounted a throne, and all his thoughts and energies were dedicated to the happiness of his people. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, and various insurrections among the Germans, Dacians, Jews, Moors, Egyptians, and Britons, were easily quelled by his legates. In all the relations of private life the character of Antoninus was without reproach. He was faithful to his wife Faustina, notwithstanding her profligate life, and after her death loaded her memory with honours. He died at Lorium, March 7th, 161, in his 75th year. He was succeeded by M. Aurelius, whom he had adopted, when he himself was adopted by Hadrian, and to whom he gave his daughter FAUSTINA in marriage.

Antōnīnus Lībĕrālis, a Greek grammarian, probably lived in the reign of the Antonines, about A. D. 147, and wrote a work on Metamorphoses (Μεταμορφώσεων συναγωγή) in 41 chapters, which is extant.—Editions: by Verheyk, Lugd. Bat. 1774; by Koch, Lips. 1832; by Westermann, in his Paradoxographi, Brunsv. 1839.

Antōnĭus. 1. M., the orator, born B. C. 143; quaestor in 113; praetor in 104, when he fought against the pirates in Cilicia; consul in 99; and censor in 97. He belonged to Sulla's party, and was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome in 87: his head was cut off and placed on the Rostra. Cicero mentions him and L. Crassus as the most distinguished orators of their age; and he is introduced as one of the speakers in Cicero's De Oratore. — 2. M., surnamed CRETICUS, elder son of the orator, and father of the triumvir, was praetor in 75, and received the command of the fleet and all the coasts of the Mediterranean, in order to clear the sea of pirates; but he did not succeed in his object, and used his power to plunder the provinces. He died shortly afterwards in Crete, and was called Creticus in derision. — 3. C., younger son of the orator, and uncle of the triumvir, was expelled the senate in 70, and was the colleague of Cicero in the praetorship (65) and consulship (63). He was one of Catiline's conspirators, but deserted the latter by Cicero's promising him the province of Macedonia. He had to lead an army against Catiline, but unwilling to fight against his former friend, he gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. At the conclusion of the war Antony went into his province, which he plundered shamefully; and on his return to Rome in 59 was accused both of taking part in Catiline's conspiracy and of extortion in his province. He was defended by Cicero, but was condemned, and retired to the island of Cephallenia. He was subsequently recalled, probably by Caesar, and was in Rome at the beginning of 44. — 4. M., the Triumvir, was son of No. 2. and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Caesar, consul in 64, and was born about 83. His father died while he was still young, and he was brought up by Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators: whence he became a personal enemy of Cicero. Antony indulged in his earliest youth in every kind of dissipation, and his affairs soon became deeply involved. In 58 he went to Syria, where he served with distinction under A. Gabinius. He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (57, 56), and in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt in 55. In 54 he went to Caesar in Gaul, and by the influence of the latter was elected quaestor. As quaestor (52) he returned to Gaul, and served under Caesar for the next two years (52, 51). He returned to Rome in 50, and became one of the most active partizans of Caesar. He was tribune of the plebs in 49, and in January fled to Caesar's camp in Cisalpine Gaul, after putting his veto upon the decree of the senate which deprived Caesar of his command. He accompanied Caesar in his victorious march into Italy, and was left by Caesar in the command of Italy, while the latter carried on the war in Spain. In 48 Antony was present at the battle of Pharsalia, where he commanded the left wing; and in 47 he was again left in the command of Italy during Caesar's absence in Africa. In 44 he was consul with Caesar, when he offered him the kingly diadem at the festival of the Lupercalia. After Caesar's murder on the 15th of March, Antony endeavoured to succeed to his power. He therefore used every means to appear as his representative; he pronounced the speech over Caesar's body and read his will to the people; and he also obtained the papers and private property of Caesar. But he found a new and unexpected rival in young Octavianus, the adopted son and great-nephew of the dictator, who came from Apollonia to Rome, assumed the name of Caesar, and at first joined the senate in order to crush Antony. Towards the end of the year Antony proceeded to Cisalpine Gaul, which had been previously granted him by the senate; but Dec. Brutus refused to surrender the province to Antony and threw himself into Mutina, where he was besieged by Antony. The senate approved of the conduct of Brutus, declared Antony a public enemy, and entrusted the conduct of the war against him to Octavianus. Antony was defeated at the battle of Mutina, in April 43, and was obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consuls, however, had fallen, and the senate now began to show their jealousy of Octavianus. Meantime Antony was joined by Lepidus with a powerful army: Octavianus became reconciled to Antony; and it was agreed that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Octavianus, and Lepidus, under the title of Triumviri Reipublicae Constituendae, for the next 5 years. The mutual enemies of each were proscribed, and in the numerous executions that followed, Cicero, who had attacked Antony in the most unmeasured manner in his Philippic Orations, fell a victim to Antony. In 42 Antony and Octavianus crushed the republican party by the battle of Philippi, in which Brutus and Cassius fell. Antony then went to Asia, which he had received as his share of the Roman world. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra, and followed her to Egypt, a captive to her charms. In 41 Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and his brother L. Antonius, made war upon Octavianus in Italy. Antony prepared to support his relatives, but the war was brought to a close at the beginning of 40, before Antony could reach Italy. The opportune death of Fulvia facilitated the reconciliation of Antony and Octavianus, which was cemented by Antony marrying Octavia, the sister of Octavianus. Antony remained in Italy till 39, when the triumvirs concluded a peace with Sext. Pompey, and he afterwards went to his provinces in the East. In this year and the following Ventidius, the lieutenant of Antony, defeated the Parthians. In 37 Antony crossed over to Italy, when the triumvirate was renewed for 5 years. He then returned to the East, and shortly afterwards sent Octavia back to her brother, and surrendered himself entirely to the charms of Cleopatra. In 36 he invaded Parthia, but he lost a great number of his troops, and was obliged to retreat. He was more successful in his invasion of Armenia in 34, for he obtained possession of the person of Artavasdes, the Armenian king, and carried him to Alexandria. Antony now laid aside entirely the character of a Roman citizen, and assumed the pomp and ceremony of an Eastern despot. His conduct, and the unbounded influence which Cleopatra had acquired over him, alienated many of his friends and supporters; and Octavianus thought that the time had now come for crushing his rival. The contest was decided by the memorable sea-fight off Actium, September 2nd, 31, in which Antony's fleet was completely defeated. Antony, accompanied by Cleopatra, fled to Alexandria, where he put an end to his own life in the following year (30), when Octavianus appeared before the city. — 5. C., brother of the triumvir, was praetor in Macedonia in 44, fell into the hands of M. Brutus in 43, and was put to death by Brutus in 42, to revenge the murder of Cicero. — 6. L., youngest brother of the triumvir, was consul in 41, when he engaged in war against Octavianus at the instigation of Fulvia, his brother's wife. He was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into the town of Perusia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year: hence the war is usually called that of Perusia. His life was spared, and he was afterwards appointed by Octavianus to the command of Iberia. Cicero draws a frightful picture of Lucius' character. He calls him a gladiator and a robber, and heaps upon him every term of reproach and contempt. Much of this is of course exaggeration. — 7. M., called by the Greek writers Antyllus, which is probably only a corrupt form of Antonillus (young Antonius), elder son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was executed by order of Octavianus, after the death of his father in 30. — 8. Julus, younger son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was brought up by his step-mother Octavia at Rome, and received great marks of favour from Augustus. He was consul in B. C. 10, but was put to death in 2, in consequence of his adulterous intercourse with Julia, the daughter of Augustus.

Antōnius Felix. [FELIX.]

Antōnius Musa. [MUSA.]

Antōnius Primus. [PRIMUS.]

Antron (Ἀντρών and αἱ Ἀντρῶνες: Ἀντρώνιος: Fano), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Maliacus.

Antunnacum (Andernach), a town of the Ubii on the Rhine.

Anūbis (Ἄνουβις), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the form of a human being with a dog's head. He was originally worshipped simply as the representative of the dog, which animal, like the cat, was sacred in Egypt; but his worship was subsequently mixed up with other religious systems, and Anubis thus assumed a symbolical or astronomical character, at least with the learned. His worship prevailed throughout Egypt, but he was most honoured at Cynopolis in middle Egypt. Later myths relate that Anubis was the son of Osiris and Nephthys, born after the death of his father; and that Isis brought him up, and made him her guard and companion, who thus performed to her the same service that dogs perform to men. In the temples of Egypt Anubis seems to have been represented as the guard of other gods, and the place in the front of a temple was particularly sacred to him. The Greeks identified him with their own Hermes, and thus speak of Hermanuphis in the same manner as of Zeus Ammon. His worship was introduced at Rome towards the end of the republic, and under the empire spread very widely both in Greece and at Rome.

Anxur. [TARRACINA.]

Anxūrus, an Italian divinity, who was worshipped in a grove near Anxur (Tarracina) together with Feronia. He was regarded as a youthful Jupiter, and Feronia as Juno. On coins his name appears as Axur or Anxur.

Anysis (Ἄνυσις), an ancient king of Egypt, in whose reign Egypt was invaded by the Ethiopians under their king Sabaco.

Anytē (Ἀνύτη), of Tegea, the authoress of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B. C. 700, and not 300, as is usually supposed. The epigrams are for the most part in the style of the ancient Doric choral songs.

Anўtus (Ἄνυτος), a wealthy Athenian, son of Anthemion, the most influential and formidable of the accusers of Socrates, B. C. 399 (hence Socrates is called Anyti reus, Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 3). He was a leading man of the democratical party, and took an active part, along with Thrasybulus, in the overthrow of the 30 Tyrants. The Athenians, having repented of their condemnation of Socrates, sent Anytus into banishment.

Aōn (Ἄων), son of Poseidon, and an ancient Boeotian hero, from whom the Aones, an ancient race in Boeotia, were believed to have derived their name. Aŏnĭa was the name of the part of Boeotia, near Phocis, in which were Mount Helicon and the fountain Aganippe (Aoniae aquae, Ov. Fast. iii. 456). The Muses are also called Aonides, since they frequented Helicon and the fountain of Aganippe. (Ov. Met. v. 333.)

Aŏnĭdes. [AON.]

Aorsi (Ἄορσοι) or Adorsi, a powerful people of Asiatic Sarmatia, who appear to have had their original settlements on the N.E. of the Caspian, but are chiefly found between the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azof) and the Caspian, to the S.E. of the river Tanaïs (Don), whence they spread far into European Sarmatia. They carried on a considerable traffic in Babylonian merchandise, which they fetched on camels out of Media and Armenia.

Aōus or Aeas (Ἀῷος or Αἴας: Viosa, Viussa, or Vovussa), the principal river of the Greek part of Illyricum, rises in M. Lacmon, the N. part of Pindus, and flows into the Ionian sea near Apollonia.

Apămēa or -ia (Ἀπάμεια: Ἀπαμεύς, Apamēus, -ēnus, -ensis), the name of several Asiatic cities, three of which were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his wife Apama. 1. A. ad Orontem (Famiah), the capital of the Syrian province Apamene, and, under the Romans, of Syria Secunda, was built by Seleucus Nicator on the site of the older city of PELLA, in a very strong position on the river Orontes or Axius, the citadel being on the left (W.) bank of the river, and the city on the right. It was surrounded by rich pastures, in which Seleucus kept a splendid stud of horses and 500 elephants. — 2. In Osroëne in Mesopotamia (Balasir), a town built by Seleucus Nicator on the E. bank of the Euphrates, opposite to ZEUGMA, with which it was connected by a bridge, commanded by a castle, called Seleucia. In Pliny's time (A. D. 77) it was only a ruin. — 3. A. Cibōtus or ad Maeandrum (Ἀ. ἡ Κιβωτός, or πρὸς Μαίανδρον), a great city of Phrygia, on the Maeander, close above its confluence with the Marsyas. It was built by Antiochus I. Soter, who named it in honour of his mother Apama, and peopled it with the inhabitants of the neighbouring Celaenae. It became one of the greatest cities of Asia within the Euphrates; and under the Romans it was the seat of a Conventus Juridicus. The surrounding country, watered by the Maeander and its tributaries, was called Apamēna Regio. — 4. A. Myrlēon, in Bithynia. [MYRLEA.] — 5. A town built by Antiochus Soter, in the district of Assyria called Sittacene, at the junction of the Tigris with the Royal Canal which connected the Tigris with the Euphrates, and at the N. extremity of the island called Mesene, which was formed by this canal and the 2 rivers. — 6. A. Mesenes (Korna), in Babylonia, at the S. point of the same island of Mesene, and at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. — 7. A. Rhagiana (Ἀ. ἡ πρὸς Ῥα-γαῖς), a Greek city in the district of Choarene in Parthia (formerly in Media), S. of the Caspian Gates.

Apelles (Ἀπελλῆς), the most celebrated of Grecian painters, was born, most probably, at Colophon in Ionia, though some ancient writers call him a Coan and others an Ephesian. He was the contemporary and friend of Alexander the Great (B. C. 336—323), whom he probably accompanied to Asia, and who entertained so high an opinion of him, that he was the only person whom Alexander would permit to take his portrait. After Alexander's death he appears to have travelled through the western parts of Asia. Being driven by a storm to Alexandria, after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy (B. C. 306), whose favour he had not gained while he was with Alexander, his rivals laid a plot to ruin him, which he defeated by an ingenious use of his skill in drawing. We are not told when or where he died. Throughout his life Apelles laboured to improve himself, especially in drawing, which he never spent a day without practising. Hence the proverb Nulla dies sine linea. A list of his works is given by Pliny (xxxv. 36). They are for the most part single figures, or groups of a very few figures. Of his portraits the most celebrated was that of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt; but the most admired of all his pictures was the "Venus Anadyomene" (ἡ ἀναδυομένη Ἀφροδίτη), or Venus rising out of the sea. The goddess was wringing her hair, and the falling drops of water formed a transparent silver veil around her form. He commenced another picture of Venus, which he intended should surpass the Venus Anadyomene, but which he left unfinished at his death.

Apellĭcon (Ἀπελλικῶν), of Teos, a Peripatetic philosopher and great collector of books. His valuable library at Athens, containing the autographs of Aristotle's works, was carried to Rome by Sulla (B. C. 83): Apellicon had died just before.

Apennīnus Mons (ὁ Ἀπέννινος and τὸ Ἀπέννινον ὄρος, probably from the Celtic Pen "a height"), the Apennines, a chain of mountains which runs throughout Italy from N. to S., and forms the backbone of the peninsula. It is a continuation of the Maritime Alps [ALPES], begins near Genua, and ends at the Sicilian sea, and throughout its whole course sends off numerous branches in all directions. It rises to its greatest height in the country of the Sabines, where one of its points (now Monte Corno) is 9521 feet above the sea; and further S., at the boundaries of Samnium, Apulia, and Lucania, it divides into two main branches, one of which runs E. through Apulia and Calabria, and terminates at the Salentine promontory, and the other W. through Bruttium, terminating apparently at Rhegium and the straits of Messina, but in reality continued throughout Sicily. The greater part of the Apennines is composed of limestone, abounding in numerous caverns and recesses, which in ancient as well as modern times were the resort of numerous robbers: the highest points of the mountains are covered with snow, even during most of the summer (nivali vertice se attollens Apenninus, Virg. Aen. xii. 703).

M. Aper, a Roman orator and a native of Gaul, rose by his eloquence to the rank of quaestor, tribune, and praetor, successively. He is one of the speakers in the Dialogue de Oratoribus, attributed to Tacitus.

Aper, Arrĭus, praetorian prefect, and son-in-law of the emperor Numerian, whom he was said to have murdered: he was himself put to death by Diocletian on his accession in A. D. 284.

Aperantĭa, a town and district of Aetolia near the Achelous, inhabited by the Aperantii.

Apĕsas (Ἀπέσας: Fuka ?), a mountain on the borders of Phliasia and Argolis, with a temple of Zeus, who was hence called Apesantius, and to whom Perseus here first sacrificed.

Aphăca (τὰ Ἄφακα: Afta ?), a town of Coele-Syria, between Heliopolis and Byblus, celebrated for the worship and oracle of Aphrodite Aphacītis (Ἀφακῖτις).

Aphăreus (Ἀφαρεύς), son of the Messenian king Perieres and Gorgophone, and founder of the town of Arene in Messenia, which he called after his wife. His two sons Idas and Lynceus, the Apharetidae (Apharēïa proles, Ov. Met. viii. 304), are celebrated for their fight with the Dioscuri, which is described by Pindar. (Nem. x. 111.) —2. An Athenian orator and tragic poet, flourished B. C. 369—342. After the death of his father, his mother married the orator Isocrates, who adopted Aphareus as his son. He wrote 35 or 37 tragedies, and gained 4 prizes.

Aphĕtae (Ἀφέται and Ἀφεταί: Ἀφεταῖος), a sea-port and promontory of Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Maliacus, from which the ship Argo is said to have sailed.

Aphīdas (Ἀφείδας), son of Arcas, obtained from his father Tegea and the surrounding territory. He had a son, Aleus.

Aphidna (Ἄφιδνα and Ἄφιδναι: Ἀφιδναῖος), an Attic demus not far from Decelea, originally belonged to the tribe Aeantis, afterwards to Leontis, and last to Hadrianis. It was in ancient times one of the 12 towns and districts into which Cecrops is said to have divided Attica: in it Theseus concealed Helen, but her brothers Castor and Pollux took the place and rescued their sister.

Aphrŏdīsĭas (Ἀφροδισίας· Ἀφροδισιεύς: Aphrodisiensis), the name of several places famous for the worship of Aphrodite. 1. A. Cariae (Gheira, Ru.), on the site of an old town of the Leleges, named Ninŏë: under the Romans a free city and asylum, and a flourishing school of art.—2. Veneris Oppidum (Porto Cavaliere), a town, harbour, and island, on the coast of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus.—3. A town, harbour, and island, on the coast of Cyrenaica in N. Africa.—4. See GADES.

Aphrŏdītē (Ἀφροδίτη), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, the goddess of love and beauty. In the Iliad she is represented as the daughter of Zeus and Dione, and in later traditions as a daughter of Cronos and Euonyme, or of Uranus and Hemera; but the poets most frequently relate that she was sprung from the foam (ἀφρός) of the sea, whence they derive her name. She is commonly represented as the wife of Hephaestus; but she proved faithless to her husband, and was in love with Ares, the god of war, to whom she bore Phobos, Deimos, Harmonia, and, according to later traditions, Eros and Anteros also. She also loved the gods Dionysus, Hermes, and Poseidon, and the mortals ANCHISES, ADONIS, and BUTES. She surpassed all the other goddesses in beauty, and hence received the prize of beauty from Paris. She likewise had the power of granting beauty and invincible charms to others, and whoever wore her magic girdle, immediately became an object of love and desire. In the vegetable kingdom the myrtle, rose, apple, poppy, &c., were sacred to her. The animals sacred to her, which are often mentioned as drawing her chariot or serving as her messengers, are the sparrow, the dove, the swan, the swallow, and a bird called iynx. The planet Venus and the spring-month of April were likewise sacred to her. The principal places of her worship in Greece were the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. The sacrifices offered to her consisted mostly of incense and garlands of flowers, but in some places animals were sacrificed to her. Respecting her festivals, see Dict. of Antiq. art. Adonia, Anagogia, Aphrodisia, Catagogia. Her worship was of Eastern origin, and probably introduced by the Phoenicians to the islands of Cyprus, Cythera, and others, from whence it spread all over Greece. She appears to have been originally identical with Astarte, called by the Hebrews Ashtoreth, and her connection with Adonis clearly points to Syria. Respecting the Roman goddess Venus, see VENUS.

Aphrodītŏpŏlis (Ἀφροδίτης πόλις), the name of several cities in Egypt. 1. In Lower Egypt: (1) In the Nomos Leontopolites, in the Delta, between Arthribis and Leontopolis: (2) (Chybin-el-Koum) in the Nomos Prosopites, in the Delta, on a navigable branch of the Nile, between Naucratis and Sais; probably the same as Atarbechis, which is an Egyptian name of the same meaning as the Greek Aphroditopolis. — 2. In Middle Egypt or Heptanomis, (Atfyh) a considerable city on the E. bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolites. — 3. In Upper Egypt, or the Thebaïs: (1) Veneris Oppidum (Tachta), a little way from the W. bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolis: (2) In the Nomos Hermonthites (Deir, N.W. of Esneh), on the W. bank of the Nile.

Aphthŏnĭus (Ἀφθόνιος), of Antioch, a Greek rhetorician, lived about A. D. 315, and wrote the introduction to the study of rhetoric, entitled Progymnasmata (προγυμνάσματα). It was constructed on the basis of the Progymnasmata of Hermogenes, and became so popular that it was used as the common school-book in this branch of education for several centuries. On the revival of letters it recovered its ancient popularity, and during the 16th and 17th centuries was used everywhere, but more especially in Germany, as the text-book for rhetoric. The number of editions and translations which were published during that period is greater than that of any other ancient writer. The best edition is in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. i. Aphthonius also wrote some Aesopic fables, which are extant.

Aphȳtis (Ἀφυτις: Athyto), a town in the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Jupiter Ammon.

Apĭa (Ἀπία, sc. γῆ), the Apian land, an ancient name of Peloponnesus, especially Argolis, said to have been so called from Apis, a mythical king of Argos.

Apicāta, wife of Sejanus, was divorced by him, A. D. 23, after she had borne him three children, and put an end to her own life on the execution of Sejanus in 31.

Apĭcĭus, the name of three notorious gluttons. — 1. The first lived in the time of Sulla, and is said to have procured the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, B. C. 92. — 2. The second and most renowned, M. Gabius Apicius, flourished under Tiberius. After squandering upwards of 800,000 pounds upon his stomach, he found that little more than 80,000 remained; upon which, despairing of being able to satisfy the cravings of hunger from such a pittance, he forthwith hanged himself. But he was not forgotten. Sundry cakes (Apicia) and sauces long kept alive his memory; Apion, the grammarian, composed a work upon his luxurious labours, and his name passed into a proverb in all matters connected with the pleasures of the table. — 3. A contemporary of Trajan, sent to this emperor, when he was in Parthia, fresh oysters, preserved by a skilful process of his own. — The treatise we now possess, bearing the title CAELII APICII de Opsoniis et Condimentis, sive de Re Culinaria, Libri decem, is a sort of Cook and Confectioner's Manual, containing a multitude of receipts for cookery. It was probably compiled at a late period by some one who prefixed the name of Apicius, in order to insure the circulation of his book.—Editions. By Almeloveen, Amstelod. 1709, and by Bernhold, Ansbach. 1800.

Apidănus (Ἀπιδανός, Ion. Ἠπιδανός), a river in Thessaly, which flows into the Enipeus near Pharsalus.

Apiŏlae, a town of Latium, destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus.

Apĭon (Ἀπίων), a Greek grammarian, and a native of Oasis in Egypt, studied at Alexandria, and taught rhetoric at Rome in the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius. In the reign of Caligula he left Rome, and in A. D. 38 he was sent by the inhabitants of Alexandria at the head of an embassy to Caligula to bring forward complaints against the Jews residing in their city. Apion was the author of many works, all of which are now lost. Of these the most celebrated were upon the Homeric poems. He is said not only to have made the best recension of the text of the poems, but to have written explanations of phrases and words in the form of a Dictionary (λέξεις Ὁμηρικαί). He also wrote a work on Egypt in 5 books, and a work against the Jews, to which Josephus replied in his treatise Against Apion.

Apĭon, Ptolemaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS, APION.]

Apis (Ἆπις). 1. Son of Phoroneus and Laodice, king of Argos, from whom Peloponnesus was called APIA: he ruled tyrannically, and was killed by Thelxion and Telchis. — 2. The Bull of Memphis, worshipped with the greatest reverence as a god among the Egyptians. The Egyptians believed that he was the offspring of a young cow, fructified by a ray from heaven. There were certain signs by which he was recognised to be the god. It was requisite that he should be quite black, have a white square mark on the forehead, on his back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in his tail, and on his tongue a knot resembling an insect called cantharus. When all these signs were discovered, the animal was consecrated with great pomp, and was conveyed to Memphis, where he had a splendid residence, containing extensive walks and courts for his amusement. His birthday, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival; it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years, probably 25. If he had not died before the expiration of that period, he was killed and buried in a sacred well, the place of which was unknown except to the initiated.

But if he died a natural death, he was buried publicly and solemnly; and as his birth filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning. The worship of Apis was originally nothing but the simple worship of the bull; but in the course of time the bull, like other animals, was regarded as a symbol, and Apis is hence identified with Osiris or the Sun.

Apis (Ἆπις), a city of Egypt, on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the border of the country towards Libya, about 10 stadia W. of Paraetonium; celebrated for the worship of the god Apis.

Apobathmi (Ἀποβαθμοί), a place in Argolis on the sea not far from Thyrea, where Danaus is said to have landed.

Apodoti and Apodeotae (Ἀπόδωτοι and Ἀποδοτοί), a people in the S.E. of Aetolia, between the Evenus and Hylaethus.

Apollināris, Sidōnius. [Sidonius.]

Apollĭnis Pr. (Ἀπόλλωνος ἄκρον: C. Zibeeb or C. Farina), a promontory of Zeugitana in N. Africa, forming the W. point of the Gulf of Carthage.

Apollo (Ἀπόλλων), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, son of Zeus and Leto and twin brother of Artemis, was born in the island of Delos, whither Leto had fled from the jealous Hera. [Leto.] After 9 days' labour, the god was born under a palm or olive tree at the foot of mount Cynthus, and was fed by Themis with ambrosia and nectar. The powers ascribed to Apollo are apparently of different kinds, but all are connected with one another, and may be said to be only ramifications of one and the same, as will be seen from the following classification. He is — 1. The god who punishes, whence some of the ancients derived his name from ἀπόλλυμι, destroy. (Aesch. Agam. 1081.) As the god who punishes he is represented with bow and arrows, the gift of Hephaestus; whence his epithets, ἕκατος, ἑκάεργος, ἑκατηβόλος, κλυτότοξος, and ἀργυρότοξος, arcitenens, &c. All sudden deaths were believed to be the effect of the arrows of Apollo; and with them he sent the plague into the camp of the Greeks. — 2. The god who affords help and wards off evil. As he had the power of punishing men, so he was also able to deliver men, if duly propitiated: hence his epithets, ἀκέσιος, ἀκέστωρ, ἀλεξίκακος, σωτήρ, ἀποτρόπαιος, ἐπικούριος, ἰατρομάντις, opifer, salutifer, &c. From his being the god who afforded help, he is the father of Aesculapius, the god of the healing art, and was also identified in later times with Paeëon, the god of the healing art in Homer. [Paeeon.] — 3. The god of prophecy. Apollo exercised this power in his numerous oracles, and especially in that of Delphi. (Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.) He had also the power of communicating the gift of prophecy both to gods and men, and all the ancient seers and prophets are placed in some relationship to him. — 4. The god of song and music. We find him in the Iliad (i. 603) delighting the immortal gods with his phorminx; and the Homeric bards derived their art of song either from Apollo or the Muses. Later traditions ascribed to Apollo even the invention of the flute and lyre, while it is more commonly related that he received the lyre from Hermes. Respecting his musical contests, see Marsyas, Midas. — 5. The god who protects the flocks and cattle (νόμιος θεός, from νομός or νομή, a meadow or pasture land). There are in Homer only a few allusions to this feature in the character of Apollo, but in later writers it assumes a very prominent form, and in the story of Apollo tending the flocks of Admetus at Pherae in Thessaly, the idea reaches its height. — 6. The god who delights in the foundation of towns and the establishment of civil constitutions. Hence a town or a colony was never founded by the Greeks without consulting an oracle of Apollo, so that in every case he became, as it were, their spiritual leader.—7. The god of the Sun. In Homer, Apollo and Helios, or the Sun, are perfectly distinct, and his identification with the Sun, though almost universal among later writers, was the result of later speculations and of foreign, chiefly Egyptian, influence. — Apollo had more influence upon the Greeks than any other god. It may safely be asserted, that the Greeks would never have become what they were, without the worship of Apollo: in him the brightest side of the Grecian mind is reflected. Respecting his festivals, see Dict. of Ant. art. Apollonia, Thargelia, and others. — In the religion of the early Romans there is no trace of the worship of Apollo. The Romans became acquainted with this divinity through the Greeks, and adopted all their notions and ideas about him from the latter people. There is no doubt that the Romans knew of his worship among the Greeks at a very early time, and tradition says that they consulted his oracle at Delphi even before the expulsion of the kings. But the first time that we hear of his worship at Rome is in B.C. 430, when, for the purpose of averting a plague, a temple was raised to him, and soon after dedicated by the consul, C. Julius. A second temple was built to him in 350. During the second Punic war, in 212, the ludi Apollinares were instituted in his honour. (Dict. of Ant. art. Ludi Apollinares.) His worship, however, did not form a very prominent part in the religion of the Romans till the time of Augustus, who, after the battle of Actium, dedicated to him a portion of the spoils, built or embellished his temple at Actium, and founded a new one at Rome on the Palatine, and instituted quinquennial games at Actium. — The most beautiful and celebrated among the extant representations of Apollo are the Apollo Belvedere at Rome, which was discovered in 1503 at Rettuno and the Apollino at Florence. In the Apollo Belvedere, the god is represented with commanding but serene majesty; sublime intellect and physical beauty are combined in the most wonderful manner.

Apollŏcrătes (Ἀπολλοκράτης), elder son of Dionysius, the Younger, was left by his father in command of the island and citadel of Syracuse, but was compelled by famine to surrender them to Dion, about B.C. 354.

Apollŏdōrus (Ἀπολλόδωρος). — 1. Of Amphipolis, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, was intrusted in B.C. 331, together with Menes, with the administration of Babylon and of all the satrapies as far as Cilicia. — 2. Tyrant of Cassandrea (formerly Potidaea) in the peninsula of Pallene, obtained the supreme power in B.C. 379, and exercised it with the utmost cruelty. He was conquered and put to death by Antigonus Gonatas. — 3. Of Carystus, a comic poet, probably lived B.C. 300—260, and was one of the most distinguished of the poets of the new Attic comedy. It was from him that Terence took his Hecyra and Phormio. — 4. Of Gela in Sicily, a comic poet and a contemporary of Menander, lived B.C. 340—290. He is frequently confounded with Apollodo-rus of Carystus. — 5. A Grammarian of Athens, son of Asclepiades, and pupil of Aristarchus and Panaetius, flourished about B. C. 140. He wrote a great number of works, all of which have perished with the exception of his Bibliotheca. This work consists of 3 books, and is by far the best among the extant works of the kind. It contains a well-arranged account of the mythology and the heroic age of Greece: it begins with the origin of the gods, and goes down to the time of Theseus, when the work suddenly breaks off. — Editions. By Heyne, Göttingen, 1803, 2d ed.; by Clavier, Paris, 1805, with a French translation; and by Westermann in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843. Of the many other works of Apollodorus, one of the most important was a chronicle in iambic verses, comprising the history of 1040 years, from the destruction of Troy (1184) down to his own time, B. C. 143.—6. Of Pergamus, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Apollonia in his advanced age, and had as a pupil the young Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus. —7. A painter of Athens, flourished about B. C. 408, with whom commenced a new period in the history of the art. He made a great advance in colouring, and invented chiaroscuro. — 8. An architect of Damascus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, by the latter of whom he was put to death.

Apollōnĭa (Ἀπολλωνία: Ἀπολλωνιάτης). 1. (Pollina or Pollona), an important town in Illyria or New Epirus, not far from the mouth of the Aous, and 60 stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Corinthians and Corcyraeans, and was equally celebrated as a place of commerce and of learning; many distinguished Romans, among others the young Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus, pursued their studies here. Persons travelling from Italy to Greece and the E., usually landed either at Apollonia or Dyrrhachium; and the Via Egnatia, the great high road to the East, commenced at Apollonia or, according to others, at Dyrrhachium. [EGNATIA VIA.] — 2. (Polina), a town in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, between Thessalonica and Amphipolis, and S. of the lake of Bolbe. — 3. (Sizeboli), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, with two harbours, a colony of Miletus, afterwards called Sozopolis, whence its modern name: it had a celebrated temple of Apollo, from which Lucullus carried away a colossus of this god, and erected it on the Capitol at Rome. — 4. A castle or fortified town of the Locri Ozolae, near Naupactus. — 5. A town in Sicily, on the N. coast, of uncertain site. — 6. (Abullionte), a town in Bithynia on the lake Apolloniatis, through which the river Rhyndacus flows. — 7. A town on the borders of Mysia and Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis. — 8. A town in Palestina, between Caesarĕa and Joppa. — 9. A town in Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, through which the Delas or Durus (Diala) flows. —10. (Marza Susa), a town in Cyrenaica and the harbour of Cyrene, one of the 5 towns of the Pentapolis in Libya: it was the birthplace of Eratosthenes.

Apollōnis (Ἀπολλωνίς), a city in Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis, named after Apollonis, the mother of king Eumenes. It was one of the 12 cities of Asia, which were destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius (A. D. 17).

Apollōnĭus (Ἀπολλώνιος). 1. Of Alabanda in Caria, a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes, about B. C. 100. He was a very distinguished teacher of rhetoric, and used to ridicule and despise philosophy. He was surnamed ὁ Μαλακός, and must be distinguished from the following. — 2. Of Alabanda, surnamed Molo, likewise a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes, and also distinguished himself as a pleader in the courts of justice. In B. C. 81, when Sulla was dictator, Apollonius came to Rome as ambassador of the Rhodians, on which occasion Cicero heard him; Cicero also received instruction from Apollonius at Rhodes a few years later. — 3. Son of Archebulus, a grammarian of Alexandria, in the first century of the Christian aera, and a pupil of Didymus. He wrote an Homeric Lexicon, which is still extant, and though much interpolated, is a work of great value. — Editions. By Villoison, Paris, 1773; by H. Tollius, Lugd. Bat. 1788; and by Bekker, Berlin, 1833. — 4. Surnamed Dyscolus, "the ill-tempered," a grammarian at Alexandria, in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius (A. D. 117—161), taught at Rome as well as Alexandria. He and his son HERODIANUS are called by Priscian the greatest of all grammarians. Apollonius was the first who reduced grammar to any thing like a system. Of his numerous works only 4 are extant. 1. Περὶ συντάξεως τοῦ λόγου μερῶν, "de Constructione Orationis," or "de Ordinatione sive Constructione Dictionum," in 4 books; edited by Fr. Sylburg, Frankf. 1590, and by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1817. 2. Περὶ ἀντωνυμίας, "de Pronomine;" edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1814. 3. Περὶ συνδέσμων, "de Conjunctionibus," and 4. Περὶ ἐπιῤῥημάτων, "de Adverbiis," printed in Bekker's Anecdot. ii. p. 477, &c. Among the works ascribed to Apollonius by Suidas there is one περὶ κατεψευσμένης ἱστορίας, on fictitious or forged histories: this has been erroneously supposed to be the same as the extant work Ἱστορίαι θαυμασίαι, which purports to be written by an Apollonius (published by Westermann, Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839); but it is now admitted that the latter work was written by an Apollonius who is otherwise unknown. — 5. Pergaeus, from Perga in Pamphylia, one of the greatest mathematicians of antiquity, commonly called the "Great Geometer," was educated at Alexandria under the successors of Euclid, and flourished about B. C. 250—220. His most important work was a treatise on Conic Sections in 8 books, of which the first 4, with the commentary of Eutocius, are extant in Greek; and all but the eighth in Arabic. We have also introductory lemmata to all the 8, by Pappus. Edited by Halley, "Apoll. Perg. Conic. lib. viii., &c.," Oxon. 1710, fol. The eighth book is a conjectural restoration founded on the introductory lemmata of Pappus. — 6. Rhodius, a poet and grammarian, son of Silleus or Illeus and Rhode, was born at Alexandria, or, according to one statement, at Naucratis, and flourished in the reigns of Ptolemy Philopator and Ptolemy Epiphanes (B. C. 222—181). In his youth he was instructed by Callimachus; but they afterwards became bitter enemies. Their tastes were entirely different; for Apollonius admired and imitated the simplicity of the ancient epic poets, and disliked and despised the artificial and learned poetry of Callimachus. When Apollonius read at Alexandria his poem on the Argonautic expedition (Argonautica), it did not meet with the approbation of the audience: he attributed its failure to the intrigues of Callimachus, and revenged himself by writing a bitter epigram on Callimachus which is still extant. (Anth. Graec. xi. 275.) Callimachus in return attacked Apollonius in his Ibis, which was imitated by Ovid in a poem of the same name. Apollonius now left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, where he taught rhetoric with so much success, that the Rhodians honoured him with their franchise: hence he was called the "Rhodian." He afterwards returned to Alexandria, where he read a revised edition of his Argonautica with great applause. He succeeded Eratosthenes as chief librarian at Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes, about B. C. 194, and appears to have held this office till his death. The Argonautica, which consists of 4 books, and is still extant, gives a straightforward and simple description of the adventures of the Argonauts: it is a close imitation of the Homeric language and style, but exhibits marks of art and labour, and thus forms, notwithstanding its many resemblances, a contrast with the natural and easy flow of the Homeric poems. Among the Romans the work was much read, and P. Terentius Varro Atacinus acquired great reputation by his translation of it. The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus is only a free imitation of it. — Editions. By Brunck, Argentorat. 1780; by G. Schaefer, Lips. 1810—13; by Wellauer, Lips. 1828. Apollonius wrote several other works which are now lost. — 7. Tyanensis or Tyanaeus, i. e. of Tyăna in Cappadocia, a Pythagorean philosopher, was born about 4 years before the Christian aera. At a period when there was a general belief in magical powers, it would appear that Apollonius obtained great influence by pretending to them; and we may believe that his Life by Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts, and absurd in its marvels. Apollonius, according to Philostratus, was of noble ancestry, and studied first under Euthydemus, of Tarsus; but, being disgusted at the luxury of the inhabitants, he retired to the neighbouring town of Aegae, where he studied the whole circle of the Platonic, Sceptic, Epicurean, and Peripatetic philosophy, and ended by giving his preference to the Pythagorean. He devoted himself to the strictest asceticism, and subsequently travelled throughout the East, visiting Nineveh, Babylon, and India. On his return to Asia Minor, we first hear of his pretensions to miraculous power, founded, as it would seem, on the possession of some divine knowledge derived from the East. From Ionia he crossed over into Greece, and from thence to Rome, where he arrived just after an edict against magicians had been issued by Nero. He accordingly remained only a short time at Rome, and next went to Spain and Africa; at Alexandria he was of assistance to Vespasian, who was preparing to seize the empire. The last journey of Apollonius was to Ethiopia, whence he returned to settle in the Ionian cities. On the accession of Domitian, Apollonius was accused of exciting an insurrection against the tyrant: he voluntarily surrendered himself and appeared at Rome before the emperor: but as his destruction seemed impending, he escaped by the exertion of his supernatural powers. The last years of his life were spent at Ephesus, where he is said to have proclaimed the death of the tyrant Domitian at the instant it took place. Many of the wonders, which Philostratus relates in connection with Apollonius, curiously coincide with the Christian miracles. The proclamation of the birth of Apollonius to his mother by Proteus, and the incarnation of Proteus himself, the chorus of swans which sang for joy on the occasion, the casting out of devils, raising the dead, and healing the sick, the sudden disappearances and reappearances of Apollonius, his adventures in the cave of Trophonius, and the sacred voice which called him at his death, to which may be added his claim as a teacher having authority to reform the world — cannot fail to suggest the parallel passages in the Gospel history. We know, too, that Apollonius was one among many rivals set up by the Eclectics to our Saviour, an attempt renewed by the English freethinkers Blount and Lord Herbert. Still it must be allowed that the resemblances are very general, and on the whole it seems probable that the life of Apollonius was not written with a controversial aim, as the resemblances, although real, only indicate that a few things were borrowed, and exhibit no trace of a systematic parallel. [PHILOSTRATUS.] — 8. Of Tyre, a Stoic philosopher, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Auletes, wrote a history of the Stoic philosophy from the time of Zeno. — 9. Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles, were two brothers, and the sculptors of the group which is commonly known as the Farnese bull, representing the punishment of Dirce by Zethus and Amphion. [DIRCE.] It was taken from Rhodes to Rome by Asinius Pollio, and afterwards placed in the baths of Caracalla, where it was dug up in the sixteenth century, and deposited in the Farnese palace. It is now at Naples. Apollonius and Tauriscus probably flourished in the first century of the Christian aera.

Apollŏphănes (Ἀπολλοφάνης), a poet of the old Attic comedy, of whose comedies a few fragments are extant, lived about B. C. 400.

Apōnus or Apōni Fons (Abano), warm medicinal springs, near Patavium, hence called Aquae Patavinae, were much frequented by the sick.

Appĭa or Apĭa (Ἀππία, Ἀπία), a city of Phrygia Pacatiana.

Appĭa Via, the most celebrated of the Roman roads (regina viarum, Stat. Silv. ii. 2. 12), was commenced by Ap. Claudius Caecus, when censor, B. C. 312, and was the great line of communication between Rome and southern Italy. It issued from the Porta Capena, and passing through Aricia, Tres Tabernae, Appii Forum, Tarracina, Fundi, Formiae, Minturnae, Sinuessa, and Casilinum, terminated at Capua, but was eventually extended through Calatia and Caudium to Beneventum, and finally thence through Venusia, Tarentum, and Uria, to Brundusium.

Appiānus (Ἀππιανός), the Roman historian, was born at Alexandria, and lived at Rome during the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius. He wrote a Roman history (Ῥωμαϊκά, or Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία), in 24 books, arranged not synchronistically, but ethnographically, that is, he did not relate the history of the Roman empire as a whole in chronological order; but he gave a separate account of the affairs of each country, till it was finally incorporated in the Roman empire. The subjects of the different books were: 1. The kingly period. 2. Italy. 3. The Samnites. 4. The Gauls or Celts. 5. Sicily and the other islands. 6. Spain. 7. Hannibal's wars. 8. Libya, Carthage, and Numidia. 9. Macedonia. 10. Greece and the Greek states in Asia Minor. 11. Syria and Parthia. 12. The war with Mithridates. 13—21. The civil wars, in 9 books, from those of Marius and Sulla to the battle of Actium. 22. Ἑκατονταετία, comprised the history of a hundred years, from the battle of Actium to the beginning of Vespasian's reign. 23. The wars with Illyria. 24. Those with Arabia. We possess only 11 of these complete; namely, the 6th, 7th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 23rd: there are fragments of several of the others. The Parthian history, which has come down to us as part of the 11th book, is not a work of Appian, but merely a compilation from Plutarch's Lives of Antony and Crassus. Appian's work is a compilation. His style is clear and simple; but he possesses few merits as an historian, and he frequently makes the most absurd blunders. Thus, for instance, he places Saguntum on the N. of the Iberus, and states that it takes only half a day to sail from Spain to Britain. The best edition is that of Schweighäuser, Lips. 1785.

Appĭas, a nymph of the Appian well, which was situated near the temple of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Julius Caesar. It was surrounded by statues of nymphs, called Appiades.

Appĭi Forum. [Forum Appii.]

Appŭlēius or Apŭlēius, of Madura in Africa, was born about A. D. 130, of respectable parents. He received the first rudiments of education at Carthage, and afterwards studied the Platonic philosophy at Athens. He next travelled extensively, visiting Italy, Greece, and Asia, and becoming initiated in most mysteries. At length he returned home, but soon afterwards undertook a new journey to Alexandria. On his way thither he was taken ill at the town of Oea, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sicinius Pontianus, whose mother, a very rich widow of the name of Pudentilla, he married. Her relatives, being indignant that so much wealth should pass out of the family, impeached Appuleius of gaining the affections of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. The cause was heard at Sabrata before Claudius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, A. D. 173, and the defence spoken by Appuleius is still extant. Of his subsequent career we know little: he occasionally declaimed in public with great applause. The most important of the extant works of Appuleius are: I. Metamorphoseon seu de Asino Aureo Libri XI. This celebrated romance, together with the Asinus of Lucian, is said to have been founded upon a work bearing the same title by a certain Lucius of Patrae. It seems to have been intended simply as a satire upon the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain orders of priests, the frauds of juggling pretenders to supernatural powers, and the general profligacy of public morals. There are some, however, who discover a more recondite meaning, and especially bishop Warburton, in his Divine Legation of Moses, who has at great length endeavoured to prove, that the Golden Ass was written with the view of recommending the Pagan religion in opposition to Christianity, and especially of inculcating the importance of initiation into the purer mysteries. The well-known and beautiful episode of Cupid and Psyche is introduced in the 4th, 5th, and 6th books. This, whatever opinion we may form of the principal narrative, is evidently an allegory, and is generally understood to shadow forth the progress of the soul to perfection. II. Floridorum Libri IV. An Anthology, containing select extracts from various orations and dissertations, collected probably by some admirer. III. De Deo Socratis Liber. IV. De Dogmate Platonis Libri tres. The first book contains some account of the speculative doctrines of Plato, the second of his morals, the third of his logic. V. De Mundo Liber. A translation of the work περὶ κόσμου, at one time ascribed to Aristotle. VI. Apologia sive De Magia Liber. The oration described above, delivered before Claudius Maximus. The best edition of the whole works of Appuleius is by Hildebrand, Lips. 1842.

Appŭlēius Saturnīnus. [Saturninus.]

Aprĭēs (Ἀπρίης, Ἀπρίας), a king of Egypt, the Pharaoh-Hophra of Scripture, succeeded his father Psammis, and reigned B. C. 595—570. After an unsuccessful attack against Cyrene he was dethroned and put to death by Amasis.

Aprōnĭus. 1. Q., one of the worst instruments of Verres in oppressing the Sicilians.—2. L., served under Drusus (A. D. 14) and Germanicus (15) in Germany. In 20 he was proconsul of Africa, and praetor of Lower Germany, where he lost his life in a war against the Frisii. Apronius had two daughters: one of whom was married to Plautius Silvanus; the other to Lentulus Gaetulicus, consul in 26.

Apsilae (Ἀψίλαι), a Scythian people in Colchis, N. of the river Phasis.

Apsīnes (Ἀψίνης), of Gadara in Phoenicia, a Greek sophist and rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Athens about A. D. 235. Two of his works are extant: Περὶ τῶν μέρων τοῦ πολιτικοῦ λόγου τέχνη, which is much interpolated; and Περὶ τῶν ἐσχηματισμένων προβλημάτων, both of which are printed in Walz. Rhetor. Graec.

Apsus (Crevasta), a river in Illyria (Nova Epirus), which flows into the Ionian sea.

Apsyrtus. [Absyrtus.]

Apta Julĭa (Apt), chief town of the Vulgientes in Gallia Narbonensis, and a Roman colony.

Aptĕra (Ἄπτερα: Ἀπτεραῖος: Palaeokastron on the G. of Suda), a town on the W. coast of Crete, 80 stadia from Cydonia.

Apuāni, a Ligurian people on the Macra, were subdued by the Romans after a long resistance and transplanted to Samnium, B. C. 180.

Apuleius. [Appuleius.]

Apūlĭa (Apulus), included, in its widest signification, the whole of the S.E. of Italy from the river Frento to the promontory Iapygium, and was bounded on the N. by the Frentani, on the E. by the Adriatic, on the S. by the Tarentine gulf, and on the W. by Samnium and Lucania, thus including the modern provinces of Bari, Otranto, and Capitanata, in the kingdom of Naples. Apulia in its narrower sense was the country E. of Samnium on both sides of the Aufidus, the Daunia and Peucetia of the Greeks: the whole of the S.E. part was called Calabria by the Romans. The Greeks gave the name of Daunia to the N. part of the country from the Frento to the Aufidus, of Peucetia to the country from the Aufidus to Tarentum and Brundusium, and of Iapygia or Messapia to the whole of the remaining S. part: though they sometimes included under Iapygia all Apulia in its widest meaning. The N.W. of Apulia is a plain, but the S. part is traversed by the E. branch of the Apennines, and has only a small tract of land on the coast on each side of the mountains. The country was very fertile, especially in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, and the mountains afforded excellent pasturage. The population was of a mixed nature: they were for the most part of Illyrian origin, and are said to have settled in the country under the guidance of Iapyx, Daunius, and Peucetius, three sons of an Illyrian king, Lycaon. Subsequently many towns were founded by Greek colonists. The Apulians joined the Samnites against the Romans, and became subject to the latter on the conquest of the Samnites.

Aquae, the name given by the Romans to many medicinal springs and bathing-places: — 1. Aureliae or Colonia Aurelia Aquensis (Baden-Baden). 2. Calidae or Solis (Bath) in Britain. 3. Cutiliae, mineral springs in Samnium near the ancient town of Cutilia, which perished in early times, and E. of Reāte. There was a celebrated lake in its neighbourhood with a floating island, which was regarded as the umbilicus or centre of Italy. Vespasian died at this place. 4. Mattiacae or Fontes Mattiaci (Wiesbaden), in the land of the Mattiaci in Germany. 5. Patavinae [Aponi Fons]. 6. Sextiae (Aix), a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis, founded by Sextius Calvinus, B. C. 122; its mineral waters were long celebrated, but were thought to have lost much of their efficacy in the time of Augustus. Near this place Marius defeated the Teutoni, B. C. 102. 7. Statiellae (Acqui), a town of the Statielli in Liguria, celebrated for its warm baths.

Aquae, in Africa. 1. (Meriga, Ru.), in the interior of Mauretania Caesariensis. — 2. Calidae (Gurbos or Hammam l'Enf), on the gulf of Carthage. — 3. Regiae (Hammam Truzza), in the N. part of Byzacena. — 4. Tacapitanae (Hammat-el-Khabs), at the S. extremity of Byzacena, close to the large city of Tacape (Khabs).

Aquĭla. 1. Of Pontus, translated the Old Testament into Greek, in the reign of Hadrian, probably about A. D. 130. Only a few fragments remain, which have been published in the editions of the Hexapla of Origen. — 2. Julius Aquila, a Roman jurist quoted in the Digest, probably lived under or before the reign of Septimius Severus, A. D. 193—198. — 3. L. Pontius Aquila, a friend of Cicero, and one of Caesar's murderers, was killed at the battle of Mutina, B. C. 43. — 4. Aquila Romanus, a rhetorician, who probably lived in the third century after Christ, wrote a small work entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which is usually printed with Rutilius Lupus. — Editions. By Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1768, reprinted with additional notes by Frotscher, Lips. 1831.

Aquĭlārĭa (Alhowareah), a town on the coast of Zeugitana in Africa, on the W. side of Hermaeum Pr. (C. Bon), the E. extremity of the Gulf of Carthage. It was a good landing-place in summer.

Aquĭlēĭa (Aquileiensis: Aquileia or Aglar), a town in Gallia Transpadana at the very top of the Adriatic, between the rivers Sontius and Natiso, about 60 stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Romans in B. C. 182 as a bulwark against the N. barbarians, and is said to have derived its name from the favourable omen of an eagle (aquila) appearing to the colonists. As it was the key of Italy on the N.E., it was made one of the strongest fortresses of the Romans. From its position it became also a most flourishing place of commerce: the Via Aemilia was continued to this town, and from it all the roads to Rhaetia, Noricum, Pannonia, Istria, and Dalmatia branched off. It was taken and completely destroyed by Attila in A. D. 452: its inhabitants escaped to the Lagoons, where Venice was afterwards built.

Aquillĭa Via, began at Capua, and ran S. through Nola and Nuceria to Salernum; from thence it ran through the very heart of Lucania and Bruttii, passing Nerulum, Interamnia, Cosentia, Vibo, and Medma, and terminated at Rhegium.

Aquillĭus or Aquilĭus. 1. M'., consul B. C. 129, finished the war against Aristonicus, son of Eumenes of Pergamus. On his return to Rome he was accused of maladministration in his province, but was acquitted by bribing the judges. — 2. M'., consul in B. C. 101, conquered the slaves in Sicily, who had revolted under Athenion. In 98 he was accused of maladministration in Sicily, but was acquitted. In 88 he went into Asia as one of the consular legates in the Mithridatic war: he was defeated and handed over by the inhabitants of Mytilene to Mithridates, who put him to death by pouring molten gold down his throat.

Aquillĭus Gallus. [Gallus.]

Aquilōnĭa (Aquilōnus), a town of Samnium, E. of Bovianum, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars.

Aquīnum (Aquinas: Aquino), a town of the Volscians, E. of the river Melpis, in a fertile country; a Roman municipium and afterwards a colony; the birth-place of Juvenal; celebrated for its purple dye. (Hor. Ep. i. 10. 27.)

Aquītānĭa. 1. The country of the Aquitani, extended from the Garumna (Garonne) to the Pyrenees, and from the ocean to Gallia Narbonensis: it was first conquered by Caesar's legates, and again upon a revolt of the inhabitants in the time of Augustus. — 2. The Roman province of Aquitania, formed in the reign of Augustus, was of much wider extent, and was bounded on the N. by the Ligeris (Loire), on the W. by the ocean, on the S. by the Pyrenees, and on the E. by the Mons Cevenna, which separated it from Gallia Narbonensis. — The Aquitani were one of the three races which inhabited Gaul; they were of Iberian or Spanish origin, and differed from the Gauls and Belgians in language, customs, and physical peculiarity.

Ara Ubĭōrum, a place in the neighbourhood of Bonn in Germany, perhaps Godesberg: others suppose it to be another name of Colonia Agrippina (Cologne).

Ărăbĭa (ἡ Ἀραβία: Ἄραψ, pl. Ἄραβες, Ἄραβοι, Arabs, Arăbŭs, pl. Arăbēs, Arăbī: Arabia), a country at the S.W. extremity of Asia, forming a large peninsula, of a sort of hatchet shape, bounded on the W. by the Arabicus Sinus (Red Sea), on the S. and S.E. by the Erythraeum Mare (Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb and Indian Ocean), and on the N.E. by the Persicus Sinus (Persian Gulf). On the N. or land side its boundaries were somewhat indefinite, but it seems to have included the whole of the desert country between Egypt and Syria, on the one side, and the banks of the Euphrates on the other; and it was often considered to extend even further on both sides, so as to include, on the E., the S. part of Mesopotamia along the left bank of the Euphrates, and, on the W., the part of Palestine E. of the Jordan, and the part of Egypt between the Red Sea and the E. margin of the Nile valley, which, even as a part of Egypt, was called Arabiae Nomos. In the stricter sense of the name, which confines it to the peninsula itself, Arabia may be considered as bounded on the N. by a line from the head of the Red Sea

(at Suez) to the mouth of the Tigris (Shat-el-Arab) which just about coincides with the parallel of 30° N. lat. It was divided into 3 parts: (1) Arabia Petraea (ἡ πετραία Ἀραβία: N.W. part of El-Hejaz), including the triangular piece of land between the two heads of the Red Sea (the peninsula of M. Sinai) and the country immediately to the N. and N. E.; and called from its capital Petra, while the literal signification of the name "Rocky Arabia" agrees also with the nature of the country: (2) Arabia Deserta (El-Jebel), including the great Syrian Desert and a portion of the interior of the Arabian peninsula: (3) Arabia Felix (El-Nejed, El-Hejaz, El-Yemen, El-Hadramaut, Oman, and El-Hejer) consisted of the whole country not included in the other two divisions; the ignorance of the ancients respecting the interior of the peninsula leading them to class it with Arabia Felix, although it properly belongs to Arabia Deserta, for it consists, so far as it is known, of a sandy desert of steppes and table land, interspersed with Oases (Wadis), and fringed with mountains, between which and the sea, especially on the W. coast, lies a belt of low land (called Tehāmah), intersected by numerous mountain torrents, which irrigate the strips of land on their banks, and produce that fertility which caused the ancients to apply the epithet of Felix to the whole peninsula. The width of the Tehamah is, in some places on the W. coast, as much as from one to two days' journey, but on the other sides it is very narrow, except at the E. end of the peninsula (about Muskat in Oman) where for a small space its width is again a day's journey.—The inhabitants of Arabia were of the race called Semitic or Aramaean, and closely related to the Israelites. The N.W. district (Arabia Petraea) was inhabited by the various tribes which constantly appear in Jewish history: the Amalekites, Midianites, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. The Greeks and Romans called the inhabitants by the name of NABATHAEI, whose capital was Petra. The people of Arabia Deserta were called Arabes Scenītae (Σκηνῖται), from their dwelling in tents, and Arabes Nomadae (Νομάδες), from their mode of life, which was that of wandering herdsmen, who supported themselves partly by their cattle, and to a great extent also by the plunder of caravans, as their unchanged descendants, the Bedouins or Bedawee, still do. The people of the Tehamah were (and are) of the same race; but their position led them at an early period to cultivate both agriculture and commerce, and to build considerable cities. Their chief tribes were known by the following names, beginning S. of the Nabathaei, on the W. coast: the Thamydēni and Minaei (in the S. part of Hejaz) in the neighbourhood of Macoraba (Mecca); the Sabaei and Homerītae in the S. W. part of the peninsula (Yemen); on the S. E. coast, the Chatramolītae and Adramītae (in El-Hadramaut, a country very little known, even to the present day); on the E. and and N. E. coast the Omanītae and Darachēni (in Oman, and El-Ahsa or El-Hejer). — From the earliest known period a considerable traffic was carried on by the people in the N. (especially the Nabathaei) by means of caravans, and by those on the S. and E. coast by sea, in the productions of their own country (chiefly gums, spices, and precious stones), and in those of India and Arabia. Besides this peaceful intercourse with the neighbouring countries, they seem to have made military expeditions at an early period, for there can be no doubt that the Hyksos or "Shepherd-kings," who for some time ruled over Lower Egypt, were Arabians. On the other hand, they have successfully resisted all attempts to subjugate them. The alledged conquests of some of the Assyrian kings could only have affected small portions of the country on the N. Of the Persian empire we are expressly told that they were independent. Alexander the Great died too soon even to attempt his contemplated scheme of circumnavigating the peninsula and subduing the inhabitants. The Greek kings of Syria made unsuccessful attacks upon the Nabathaei. Under Augustus, Aelius Gallus, assisted by the Nabathaei, made an expedition into Arabia Felix, but was compelled to retreat into Egypt to save his army from famine and the climate. Under Trajan, Arabia Petraea was conquered by A. Cornelius Palma (A. D. 107), and the country of the Nabathaei became a Roman province. Some partial and temporary footing was gained at a much later period, on the S.W. coast by the Ethiopians; and both in this direction and from the N. Christianity was early introduced into the country, where it spread to a great extent, and continued to exist side by side with the old religion (which was Sabaeism, or the worship of heavenly bodies), and with some admixture of Judaism, until the total revolution produced by the rise of Mohammedanism in 622. While maintaining their independence, the Arabs of the Desert have also preserved to this day their ancient form of government, which is strictly patriarchal, under the heads of tribes and families (Emirs and Sheiks). In the more settled districts, the patriarchal authority passed into the hands of kings; and the people were divided into the several castes of scholars, warriors, agriculturists, merchants, and mechanics. The Mohammedan revolution lies beyond our limits.

Arăbĭcus Sinus (ὁ Ἀραβικὸς κόλπος: Red Sea), a long narrow gulf between Africa and Arabia, connected on the S. with the Indian Ocean by the Angustiae Divae (Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb), and on the N. divided into two heads by the peninsula of Arabia Petraea (Penins. of Sinai), the E. of which was called Sinus Aelanites or Aelaniticus (Gulf of Akaba), and the W. Sinus Heroopolites or Heroopoliticus (Gulf of Suez). The upper part of the sea was known at a very early period; but it was not explored in its whole extent till the maritime expeditions of the Ptolemies. Respecting its other name see ERYTHRAEUM MARE.

Arăbĭs (Ἄραβις, also Ἀράβιος, Ἄρβις, Ἄρταβις, and Ἀρτάβιος: Poorally or Agbor), a river of Gedrosia, falling into the Indian Ocean 1000 stadia (100 geog. miles) W. of the mouth of the Indus, and dividing the Orītae on its W. from the Arabītae or Arbĭes on its E., who had a city named Arbis on its E. bank.

Arabītae. [ARABIS.]

Arachnaeum (Ἀραχναῖον), a mountain forming the boundary between Argolis and Corinthia.

Arachnē, a Lydian maiden, daughter of Idmon of Colophon, a famous dyer in purple. Arachne excelled in the art of weaving, and, proud of her talent, ventured to challenge Athena to compete with her. Arachne produced a piece of cloth in which the amours of the gods were woven, and as Athena could find no fault with it, she tore the work to pieces. Arachne in despair hung herself: the goddess loosened the rope and saved her life, but the rope was changed into a cobweb and Arachne herself into a spider (ἀράχνη), the animal most odious to Athena. (Ov. Met. vi. 1, seq.) This fable seems to suggest the idea that man learnt the art of weaving from the spider, and that it was invented in Lydia.

Arăchōsĭă (Ἀραχωσία: Ἀραχωτοί or -ῶται: S. E. part of Afghanistan and N. E. part of Beloochistan), one of the extreme E. provinces of the Persian (and afterwards of the Parthian) Empire, bounded on the E. by the Indus, on the N. by the Paropamisadae, on the W. by Drangiana, and on the S. by Gedrosia. It was a fertile country, watered by the river Arachotus (Ἀράχωτος), some distance from which stood a city of the same name, Arachotus, which was said to have been built by Semiramis, and which was the capital of the province until the foundation of ALEXANDRIA. The shortest road from Persia to India passed through Arachosia.

Arăchōtus. [ARACHOSIA.]

Arachthus or Aretho (Ἄραχθος or Ἀρέθων: Arta), a river of Epirus, rises in M. Lacmon or the Tymphean mountains, and flows into the Ambracian gulf, S. of Ambracia: it is deep and difficult to cross, and navigable up to Ambracia.

Aracynthus (Ἀράκυνθος: Zigos), a mountain on the S.W. coast of Aetolia near Pleuron, sometimes placed in Acarnania. Later writers erroneously make it a mountain between Boeotia and Attica, and hence mention it in connection with Amphion, the Boeotian hero. (Propert. iii. 13. 41; Actaeo (i. e. Attico) Aracyntho, Virg. Ecl. ii. 24.)

Arădus (Ἄραδος: Ἀράδιος, Arădius: in O. T. Arvad: Ruad), an island off the coast of Phoenicia, at the distance of 20 stadia (2 geog. miles), with a city which occupied the whole surface of the island, 7 stadia in circumference, which was said to have been founded by exiles from Sidon, and which was a very flourishing place under its own kings, under the Seleucidae, and under the Romans. It possessed a harbour on the mainland, called ANTARADUS.

Arae Philaenorum. [PHILAENORUM ARAE.]

Araethyrēa (Ἀραιθυρέα), daughter of Aras, an autochthon who was believed to have built Arantea, the most ancient town in Phliasia. After her death, her brother Aoris called the country of Phliasia Araethyrea, in honour of his sister.

Araphēn (Ἀραφήν: Ἀραφήνιος, Ἀραφήνοθεν: Rafina), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Aegaeis, on the E. of Attica, N. of the river Erasinus, not far from its mouth.

Arar or Arăris (Saône), a river of Gaul, rises in the Vosges, receives the Dubis (Doubs) from the E., after which it becomes navigable, and flows with a quiet stream into the Rhone at Lugdunum (Lyon). In the time of Ammianus (A. D. 370) it was also called Sauconna, and in the middle ages Sangona, whence its modern name Saône.

Ararōs (Ἀραρώς), an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, son of Aristophanes, flourished B.C. 375.

Aras. [ARAETHYREA.]

Araspes (Ἀράσπης), a Mede, and a friend of the elder Cyrus, is one of the characters in Xenophon's Cyropaedia. He contends with Cyrus that love has no power over him, but shortly afterwards refutes himself by falling in love with Panthea, whom Cyrus had committed to his charge. [ABRADATAS.]

Arātus (Ἄρατος). 1. The celebrated general of the Achaeans, son of Clinias, was born at Sicyon, B.C. 271. On the murder of his father by ABANTIDAS, Aratus, who was then a child, was conveyed to Argos, where he was brought up. When he had reached the age of 20 he gained possession of his native city, B.C. 251, deprived the usurper Nicocles of his power, and united Sicyon to the Achaean league, which gained in consequence a great accession of power. [ACHAEI.] In 245 he was elected general of the league, which office he frequently held in subsequent years. Through his influence a great number of the Greek cities joined the league; but he excelled more in negotiation than in war, and in his war with the Aetolians and Spartans he was often defeated. In order to resist these enemies he cultivated the friendship of Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and of his successor Philip; but as Philip was evidently anxious to make himself master of all Greece, dissensions arose between him and Aratus, and the latter was eventually poisoned in 213 by the king's order. Divine honours were paid to him by his countrymen, and an annual festival (Ἀράτεια, see Dict of Antiq.) established. Aratus wrote Commentaries, being a history of his own times down to B.C. 220: at which point POLYBIUS commenced his history. — 2. Of Soli, afterwards Pompeiopolis, in Cilicia, or (according to one authority) of Tarsus, flourished B. C. 270, and spent all the latter part of his life at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. He wrote two astronomical poems, entitled Phaenomena (Φαινόμενα), consisting of 732 verses, and Diosemeia (Διοσημεῖα), of 422. The design of the Phaenomena is to give an introduction to the knowledge of the constellations, with the rules for their risings and settings. The Diosemeia consists of prognostics of the weather from astronomical phaenomena, with an account of its effects upon animals. It appears to be an imitation of Hesiod, and to have been imitated by Virgil in some parts of the Georgics. The style of these two poems is distinguished by elegance and accuracy; but it wants originality and poetic elevation. That they became very popular both in the Grecian and Roman world (cum sole et luna semper Aratus erit, Ov. Am. i. 15. 16), is proved by the number of commentaries and Latin translations. Parts of three poetical Latin translations are preserved. One written by Cicero when very young, one by Caesar Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus, and one by Festus Avienus. — Editions. By Voss, Heidelb. 1824, with a German poetical version; by Buttmann, Berol. 1826; and by Bekker, Berol. 1828.

Arauris (Herault), erroneously Rauraris in Strabo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in M. Cevenna, and flows into the Mediterranean.

Arausĭo (Orange), a town of the Cavari or Cavares, and a Roman colony, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Arelate to Vienna: it still contains remains of an amphitheatre, circus, aqueduct, triumphal arch, &c.

Araxes (Ἀράξης), the name of several rivers. — 1. In Armenia Major (Eraskh or Aras), rises in M. Aba or Abus (nr. Erzeroum), from the opposite side of which the Euphrates flows; and, after a great bend S.E. and then N.E., joins the Cyrus (Kour), which flows down from the Caucasus, and falls with it into the Caspian by two mouths, in about 39° 20′ N. Lat. The lower part, past Artaxata, flows through a plain, which was called τὸ Ἀραξηνὸν πεδίον. The Araxes was proverbial for the force of its current; and hence Virgil (Aen. viii. 728), says pontem indignatus Araxes, with special reference to the failure of both Xerxes and Alexander in throwing a bridge over it. It seems to be the Phasis of Xenophon. — 2. In Mesopotamia. [Aborrhas.] — 3. In Persis (Bend-Emir), the river on which Persepolis stood, rises in the mountains E. of the head of the Persian Gulf, and flows S.E. into a salt lake (Bakhtegan) not far below Persepolis. — 4. It is doubtful whether the Araxes of Herodotus is the same as the Oxus, Jaxartes, or Volga. — 5. The Peneus, in Thessaly, was called Araxes from the violence of its torrent (fr. ἀράσσω)

Araxus (Ἄραξος: C. Papa), a promontory of Achaia near the confines of Elis.

Arbaces (Ἀρβάκης), the founder of the Median empire, according to Ctesias, is said to have taken Nineveh in conjunction with Belesis, the Babylonian, and to have destroyed the old Assyrian empire under the reign of Sardanapalus, B. C. 876. Ctesias assigns 28 years to the reign of Arbaces, B. C. 876—848, and makes his dynasty consist of 8 kings. This account differs from that of Herodotus, who makes Deioces the first king of Media, and assigns only 4 kings to his dynasty.

Arbēla (τὰ Ἄρβηλα: Erbille), a city of Adiabene in Assyria, between the rivers Lycus and Caprus; celebrated as the head-quarters of Darius Codomannus, before the last battle in which he was overthrown by Alexander (B. C. 331), which is hence frequently called the battle of Arbela, though it was really fought near Gaugamela, about 50 miles W. of Arbela. The district about Arbela was called Arbelītis (Ἀρβηλῖτις).

Arbis. [Arabis.]

Arbucăla or Arbocăla (Villa Fasila ?), the chief town of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis, taken by Hannibal after a long resistance.

Arbuscŭla, a celebrated female actor in pantomimes in the time of Cicero.

Arca or -ae (Ἄρκη, or -αι: Tell-Arka), a very ancient city in the N. of Phoenicia, not far from the sea-coast, at the foot of M. Lebanon: a colony under the Romans, named Arca Caesarea or Caesarea Libani: the birthplace of the emperor Alexander Severus.

Arcădĭa (Ἀρκαδία: Ἄρκας, pl. Ἀρκάδες), a country in the middle of Peloponnesus, was bounded on the E. by Argolis, on the N. by Achaia, on the W. by Elis, and on the S. by Messenia and Laconica. Next to Laconica it was the largest country in the Peloponnesus: its greatest length was about 50 miles, its breadth from 35 to 41 miles. It was surrounded on all sides by mountains, which likewise traversed it in every direction, and it may be regarded as the Switzerland of Greece. Its principal mountains were Cyllene and Erymanthus in the N., Artemisius in the E., and Parthenius, Maenalus, and Lycaeus in the S. and S.W. The Achelous, the greatest river of Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia, and flows through a considerable part of the country, receiving numerous affluents. The N. and E. parts of the country were barren and unproductive; the W. and S. were more fertile, with numerous valleys where corn was grown. The Arcadians, said to be descended from the eponymous hero Arcas, regarded themselves as the most ancient people in Greece: the Greek writers call them indigenous (αὐτόχθονες) and Pelasgians. In consequence of the physical peculiarity of the country, they were chiefly employed in hunting and the tending of cattle, whence their worship of Pan, who was especially the god of Arcadia, and of Artemis. They were a people simple in their habits and moderate in their desires: they were passionately fond of music, and cultivated it with great success (soli cantare periti Arcades, Virg. Ecl. x. 32), which circumstance was supposed to soften the natural roughness of their character. The Arcadians experienced fewer changes than any other people in Greece, and retained possession of their country upon the conquest of the rest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. Like the other Greek peoples, they were originally governed by kings, but are said to have abolished monarchy towards the close of the second Messenian war, and to have stoned to death their last king Aristocrates, because he betrayed his allies the Messenians. The different towns then became independent republics, of which the most important were Mantinea, Tegea, Orchomenus, Psophis, and Pheneos. Like the Swiss, the Arcadians frequently served as mercenaries, and in the Peloponnesian war, they were found in the armies of both the Lacedaemonians and Athenians. The Lacedaemonians made many attempts to obtain possession of parts of Arcadia, but these attempts were finally frustrated by the battle of Leuctra (B. C. 371); and in order to resist all future aggressions on the part of Sparta, the Arcadians, upon the advice of Epaminondas, built the city of Megalopolis, and instituted a general assembly of the whole nation, called the Myrii (Μύριοι, Dict. of Antiq. s. v.). They subsequently joined the Achaean League, and finally became subject to the Romans.

Arcădĭus, emperor of the East (A. D. 395—408), elder son of Theodosius I., was born in Spain, A. D. 383. On the death of Theodosius, he became emperor of the East, while the West was given to his younger brother Honorius. Arcadius possessed neither physical nor intellectual vigour, and was entirely governed by unworthy favourites. At first he was ruled by Rufinus, the praefect of the East; and on the murder of the latter soon after the accession of Arcadius, the government fell into the hands of the eunuch Eutropius. Eutropius was put to death in 399, and his power now devolved upon Gainas, the Goth; but upon his revolt and death in 401 Arcadius became entirely dependent upon his wife Eudoxia, and it was through her influence that St. Chrysostom was exiled in 404. Arcadius died on the 1st of May, 408, leaving the empire to his son Theodosius II., who was a minor.

Arcānum. [Arpinum.]

Arcas (Ἄρκας), king and eponymous hero of the Arcadians, son of Zeus and Callisto, grandson of Lycaon and father of Aphīdas and Elatus. Arcas was the boy whose flesh his grandfather Lycaon placed before Zeus, to try his divine character. Zeus upset the table (τράπεζα) which bore the dish, and destroyed the house of Lycaon by lightning, but restored Arcas to life. When Arcas had grown up, he built on the site of his father's house the town of Trapezus. Arcas and his mother were placed by Zeus among the stars.

Arcĕsĭlāus or Arcĕsĭlas (Ἀρκεσίλαος, Ἀρκεσίλας), a Greek philosopher, son of Seuthes or Scythes, was born at Pitane in Aeolis, and flourished about B. C. 250. He studied at first in his native town under Autolycus, a mathematician, and afterwards went to Athens, where he became the disciple first of Theophrastus and next of Polemo and of Crantor. He succeeded Crates about B. C. 241 in the chair of the Academy, and became the founder of the second or middle (μέση) Academy. He is said to have died in his 76th year from a fit of drunkenness. His philosophy was of a sceptical character, though it did not go so far as that of the followers of Pyrrhon. He did not doubt the existence of truth in itself, only our capacities for obtaining it, and he combated most strongly the dogmatism of the Stoics.

Arcĕsĭlāus (Ἀρκεσίλαος). 1. Son of Lycus and Theobule, leader of the Boeotians in the Trojan war, slain by Hector. — 2. The name of four kings of Cyrene. [BATTUS and BATTIADAE.]

Arcēsĭus (Ἀρκείσιος), son of Zeus and Euryodia, father of Laërtes, and grandfather of Ulysses. Hence both Laërtes and Ulysses are called Arcesiades (Ἀρκεισιάδης).

Archaeŏpŏlis (Ἀρχαιόπολις), the later capital of Colchis; near the river Phasis.

Archandrŏpŏlis (Ἀρχάνδρου πόλις), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Nile, between Canopus and Cercasorus.

Archĕdēmus (Ἀρχέδημος; Dor. Ἀρχέδαμος). 1. A popular leader at Athens, took the first step against the generals who had gained the battle of Arginusae, B. C. 406. The comic poets called him "blear-eyed" (γλάμων), and said that he was a foreigner, and had obtained the franchise by fraud. — 2. An Aetolian (called Archidamus by Livy), commanded the Aetolian troops which assisted the Romans in their war with Philip (B. C. 199—197). He afterwards took an active part against the Romans, and eventually joined Perseus, whom he accompanied in his flight after his defeat in 168. — 3. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, mentioned by Cicero, Seneca, and other ancient writers.

Archĕdĭcus (Ἀρχέδικος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, supported Antipater and the Macedonian party.

Archĕgĕtes (Ἀρχηγέτης), a surname of Apollo, probably in reference to his being a leader of colonies. It was also a surname of other gods.

Archĕlāïs (Ἀρχελαΐς). 1. In Cappadocia (Aksarai), on the Cappadox, a tributary of the Halys, a city founded by Archelaus, the last king of Cappadocia, and made a Roman colony by the emperor Claudius. — 2. A town of Palestine, near Jericho, founded by Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great.

Archĕlāus (Ἀρχέλαος). 1. Son of HEROD the Great, was appointed by his father as his successor, and received from Augustus Judaea, Samaria, and Idumaea, with the title of ethnarch. In consequence of his tyrannical government, the Jews accused him before Augustus in the 10th year of his reign (A. D. 7): Augustus banished him to Vienna in Gaul, where he died. — 2. King of MACEDONIA (B. C. 413—399), an illegitimate son of Perdiccas II., obtained the throne by the murder of his half-brother. He improved the internal condition of his kingdom, and was a warm patron of art and literature. His palace was adorned with magnificent paintings by Zeuxis; and Euripides, Agathon, and other men of eminence, were among his guests. According to some accounts Archelaus was accidentally slain in a hunting party by his favourite, Craterus or Crateuas; but according to other accounts he was murdered by Craterus. — 3. A distinguished general of MITHRIDATES. In B. C. 87 he was sent into Greece by Mithridates with a large fleet and army; at first he met with considerable success, but was twice defeated by Sulla in 86, near Chaeronea and Orchomenos in Boeotia, with immense loss. Thereupon he was commissioned by Mithridates to sue for peace, which he obtained: but subsequently being suspected of treachery by the king, he deserted to the Romans just before the commencement of the second Mithridatic war, B. C. 81. — 4. Son of the preceding, was raised by Pompey, in B. C. 63, to the dignity of priest of the goddess (Enyo or Bellona) at Comana in Pontus or Cappadocia. In 56 or 55 Archelaus became king of Egypt by marrying Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who after the expulsion of her father had obtained the sovereignty of Egypt. Archelaus, however, was king of Egypt only for 6 months, for Gabinius marched with an army into Egypt in order to restore Ptolemy Auletes, and in the battle which ensued, Archelaus perished. — 5. Son of No. 4, and his successor in the office of high-priest of Comana, was deprived of his dignity by Julius Caesar in 47. — 6. Son of No. 5., received from Antony, in B. C. 36, the kingdom of Cappadocia — a favour which he owed to the charms of his mother Glaphyra. After the battle of Actium Octavianus not only left Archelaus in the possession of his kingdom, but subsequently added to it a part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. But having incurred the enmity of Tiberius by the attention which he had paid to C. Caesar, he was summoned to Rome soon after the accession of Tiberius and accused of treason. His life was spared, but he was obliged to remain at Rome, where he died soon after, A. D. 17. Cappadocia was then made a Roman province. — 7. A philosopher, probably born at Athens, though others make him a native of Miletus, flourished about B. C. 450. The philosophical system of Archelaus is remarkable, as forming a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece. As a pupil of Anaxagoras he belonged to the Ionian school, but he added to the physical system of his teacher some attempts at moral speculation. — 8. A Greek poet, in Egypt, lived under the Ptolemies, and wrote epigrams, some of which are still extant in the Greek Anthology. — 9. A sculptor of Priene, son of Apollonius, made the marble bas-relief representing the Apotheosis of Homer, which formerly belonged to the Colonna family at Rome, and is now in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum. He probably lived in the reign of Claudius.

Archĕmŏrus (Ἀρχέμορος), or OPHELTES, son of the Nemean king Lycurgus and Eurydice. When the Seven heroes on their expedition against Thebes stopped at Nemea to obtain water, Hypsipyle, the nurse of the child Opheltes, while showing the way to the Seven, left the child alone. In the meantime, the child was killed by a dragon, and buried by the Seven. But as Amphiaraus saw in this accident an omen boding destruction to him and his companions, they called the child Archemorus, that is, "Forerunner of Death," and instituted the Nemean games in honour of him.

Archestrătus (Ἀρχέστρατος), of Gela or Syracuse, about B. C. 350, wrote a poem on the Art of Cookery, which was imitated or translated by Ennius in his Carmina Hedypathetica or Hedypathica (from ἡδυπάθεια).

Archĭas (Ἀρχίας). 1. An Heraclid of Corinth, left his country in consequence of the death of Actaeon, and founded Syracuse, B. C. 734, by command of the Delphic oracle.—2. A. Licinius Archias, a Greek poet, born at Antioch in Syria, about B. C. 120, very early obtained celebrity by his verses. In 102 he came to Rome, and was received in the most friendly way by many of the Roman nobles, especially by the Luculli, from whom he afterwards obtained the gentile name of Licinius. After a short stay at Rome he accompanied L. Lucullus, the elder, to Sicily, and followed him, in the banishment to which he was sentenced for his management of the slave war in that island, to Heraclea in Lucania, in which town Archias was enrolled as a citizen; and as this town was a state united with Rome by a foedus, he subsequently obtained the Roman franchise in accordance with the lex Plautia Papiria passed in B. C. 89. At a later time he accompanied L. Lucullus the younger to the Mithridatic war. Soon after his return, a charge was brought against him in 61 of assuming the citizenship illegally, and the trial came on before Q. Cicero, who was praetor this year. He was defended by his friend M. Cicero in the extant speech Pro Archia, in which the orator, after briefly discussing the legal points of the case, rests the defence of his client upon his surpassing merits as a poet, which entitled him to the Roman citizenship. We may presume that Archias was acquitted, though we have no formal statement of the fact. Archias wrote a poem on the Cimbric war in honour of Marius; another on the Mithridatic war in honour of Lucullus; and at the time of his trial was engaged on a poem in honour of Cicero's consulship. No fragments of these works are extant; and it is doubtful whether the epigrams preserved under the name of Archias in the Greek Anthology were really written by him.

Archĭdāmus (Ἀρχίδαμος), the name of 5 kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Anaxidamus, contemporary with the Tegeatan war, which followed soon after the second Messenian, B. C. 668.—2. Son of Zeuxidamus, succeeded his grandfather Leotychides, and reigned B. C. 469—427. During his reign, B. C. 464, Sparta was made a heap of ruins by a tremendous earthquake; and for the next 10 years he was engaged in war against the revolted Helots and Messenians. Towards the end of his reign the Peloponnesian war broke out: he recommended his countrymen not rashly to embark in the war, and he appears to have taken a more correct view of the real strength of Athens than any other Spartan. After the war had been declared (B. C. 431) he invaded Attica, and held the supreme command of the Peloponnesian forces till his death in 429.—3. Grandson of No. 2, and son of Agesilaus II., reigned B. C. 361—338. During the lifetime of his father he took an active part in resisting the Thebans and the various other enemies of Sparta, and in 367 he defeated the Arcadians and Argives in the "Tearless Battle," so called because he had won it without losing a man. In 362 he defended Sparta against Epaminondas. In the third Sacred war (B. C. 356—346) he assisted the Phocians. In 338 he went to Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians, and there fell in battle.—4. Grandson of No. 3, and son of Eudamidas I., was king in B. C. 296, when he was defeated by Demetrius Poliorcetes.—5. Son of Eudamidas II., and the brother of Agis IV. On the murder of Agis, in B. C. 240, Archidamus fled from Sparta, but afterwards obtained the throne by means of Aratus. He was, however, slain almost immediately after his return to Sparta. He was the last king of the Eurypontid race.

Archĭgĕnes (Ἀρχιγένης), an eminent Greek physician, born at Apamea in Syria, practised at Rome in the time of Trajan, A. D. 98—117. He published a treatise on the pulse, on which Galen wrote a Commentary. He was the most eminent physician of the sect of the Eclectici, and is mentioned by Juvenal as well as by other writers. Only a few fragments of his works remain.

Archĭlŏchus (Ἀρχίλοχος), of Paros, was one of the earliest Ionian lyric poets, and the first Greek poet who composed Iambic verses according to fixed rules. He flourished about B. C. 714—676. He was descended from a noble family, who held the priesthood in Paros. His grandfather was Tellis, his father Telesicles, and his mother a slave, named Enipo. In the flower of his age (between B. C. 710 and 700), Archilochus went from Paros to Thasos with a colony, of which one account makes him the leader. The motive for this emigration can only be conjectured. It was most probably the result of a political change, to which cause was added, in the case of Archilochus, a sense of personal wrongs. He had been a suitor to Neobule, one of the daughters of Lycambes, who first promised and afterwards refused to give his daughter to the poet. Enraged at this treatment, Archilochus attacked the whole family in an Iambic poem, accusing Lycambes of perjury, and his daughters of the most abandoned lives. The verses were recited at the festival of Demeter, and produced such an effect, that the daughters of Lycambes are said to have hung themselves through shame. The bitterness which he expresses in his poems towards his native island seems to have arisen in part also from the low estimation in which he was held, as being the son of a slave. Neither was he more happy at Thasos. He draws the most melancholy picture of his adopted country, which he at length quitted in disgust. While at Thasos, he incurred the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but, instead of being ashamed of the disaster, he recorded it in his verse. At length he returned to Paros, and in a war between the Parians and the people of Naxos, he fell by the hand of a Naxian named Calondas or Corax. Archilochus shared with his contemporaries, Thaletas and Terpander, in the honour of establishing lyric poetry throughout Greece. The invention of the elegy is ascribed to him, as well as to Callinus; but it was on his satiric Iambic poetry that his fame was founded. His Iambics expressed the strongest feelings in the most unmeasured language. The licence of Ionian democracy and the bitterness of a disappointed man were united with the highest degree of poetical power to give them force and point. The emotion accounted most conspicuous in his verses was "rage," "Archilochum proprio rabies armavit iambo." (Hor. Ar. Poët. 79.) The fragments of Archilochus are collected in Bergk's Poet. Lyrici Graec., and by Liebel, Archilochi Reliquiae, Lips. 1812, 8vo.

Archimēdes (Ἀρχιμήδης), of Syracuse, the most famous of ancient mathematicians, was born B. C. 287. He was a friend, if not a kinsman, of Hiero, though his actual condition in life does not seem to have been elevated. In the early part of his life he travelled into Egypt, where he studied under Conon the Samian, a mathematician and astronomer. After visiting other countries, he returned to Syracuse. Here he constructed for Hiero various engines of war, which, many years afterwards, were so far effectual in the defence of Syracuse against Marcellus, as to convert the siege into a blockade, and delay the taking of the city for a considerable time. The accounts of the performances of these engines are evidently exaggerated; and the story of the burning of the Roman ships by the reflected rays of the sun, though very current in later times, is probably a fiction. He superintended the building of a ship of extraordinary size for Hiero, of which a description is given in Athenaeus (v. p. 206, d.), where he is also said to have moved it to the sea by the help of a screw. He invented a machine called, from its form, Cochlea, and now known as the water-screw of Archimedes, for pumping the water out of the hold of this vessel. His most celebrated performance was the construction of a sphere; a kind of orrery, representing the movements of the heavenly bodies. When Syracuse was taken (B. C. 212), Archimedes was killed by the Roman soldiers, being at the time intent upon a mathematical problem. Upon his tomb was placed the figure of a sphere inscribed in a cylinder. When Cicero was quaestor in Sicily (75) he found this tomb near one of the gates of the city, almost hid amongst briars, and forgotten by the Syracusans. The intellect of Archimedes was of the very highest order. He possessed, in a degree never exceeded, unless by Newton, the inventive genius which discovers new provinces of inquiry, and finds new points of view for old and familiar objects; the clearness of conception which is essential to the resolution of complex phaenomena into their constituent elements; and the power and habit of intense and persevering thought, without which other intellectual gifts are comparatively fruitless. The following works of Archimedes have come down to us: 1. On Equiponderants and Centres of Gravity. 2. The Quadrature of the Parabola. 3. On the Sphere and Cylinder. 4. On Dimension of the Circle. 5. On Spirals. 6. On Conoids and Spheroids. 7. The Arenarius. 8. On Floating Bodies. 9. Lemmata. The best edition of his works is by Torelli, Oxon. 1792. There is a French translation of his works, with notes, by F. Peyrard, Paris, 1808, and an English translation of the Arenarius by G. Anderson, London, 1784.

Archīnus (Ἀρχῖνος), one of the leading Athenians, who, with Thrasybulus and Anytus, overthrew the government of the Thirty, B. C. 403.

Archippus (Ἄρχιππος), an Athenian poet of the old comedy, about B. C. 415.

Archȳtas (Ἀρχύτας). 1. Of Amphissa, a Greek epic poet, flourished about B. C. 300. — 2. Of Tarentum, a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman, probably lived about B. C. 400, and onwards, so that he was contemporary with Plato, whose life he is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius. He was 7 times the general of his city, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. After a life which secured to him a place among the very greatest men of antiquity, he was drowned while upon a voyage on the Adriatic. (Hor. Carm. i. 28.) As a philosopher, he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and he appears to have been himself the founder of a new sect. Like the Pythagoreans in general, he paid much attention to mathematics. Horace calls him maris et terrae numeroque carentis arenae Mensorem. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanician, and constructed various machines and automatons, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. He also applied mathematics with success to musical science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. His influence as a philosopher was so great, that Plato was undoubtedly indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed the idea of his categories, as well as some of his ethical principles, from Archytas.

Arconnēsus (Ἀρκόννησος: Ἀρκοννήσιος). 1. An island off the coast of Ionia, near Lebedus, also called Aspis and Macris. — 2. (Orak Ada), an island off the coast of Caria, opposite Halicarnassus, of which it formed the harbour.

Arctīnus (Ἀρκτῖνος), of Miletus, the most distinguished among the cyclic poets, probably lived about B. C. 776. Two epic poems were attributed to him. 1. The Aethiopis, which was a kind of continuation of Homer's Iliad: its chief heroes were Memnon, king of the Ethiopians, and Achilles, who slew him. 2. The Destruction of Ilion, which contained a description of the destruction of Troy, and the subsequent events until the departure of the Greeks.

Arctophȳlax. [ARCTOS.]

Arctos (Ἄρκτος), "the Bear," two constellations near the N. Pole. 1. THE GREAT BEAR (Ἄρκτος μεγάλη: Ursa Major), also called the Waggon (ἅμαξα: plaustrum). The ancient Italian name of this constellation was Septem Triones, that is, the Seven Ploughing Oxen, also Septentrio, and with the epithet Major to distinguish it from the Septentrio Minor, or Lesser Bear: hence Virgil (Aen. iii. 356) speaks of geminosque Triones. The Great Bear was also called Helice (ἑλίκη) from its sweeping round in a curve. — 2. THE LESSER or LITTLE BEAR (Ἄρκτος μικρά: Ursa Minor), likewise called the Waggon, was first added to the Greek catalogues by Thales, by whom it was probably imported from the East. It was also called Phoenice (Φοινίκη), from the circumstance that it was selected by the Phoenicians as the guide by which they shaped their course at sea, the Greek mariners with less judgment employing the Great Bear for the purpose; and Cynosura (Κυνόσουρα), dog's tail, from the resemblance of the constellation to the upturned curl of a dog's tail. The constellation before the Great Bear was called Boötes (Βοώτης), Arctophylax (Ἀρκτοφύλαξ), or Arcturus (Ἀρκτοῦρος from οὖρος, guard); the two latter names suppose the constellation to represent a man upon the watch, and denote simply the position of the figure in reference to the Great Bear, while Boötes, which is found in Homer, refers to the Waggon, the imaginary figure of Boötes being fancied to occupy the place of the driver of the team. At a later time Arctophylax became the general name of the constellation, and the word Arcturus was confined to the chief star in it. All these constellations are connected in mythology with the Arcadian nymph CALLISTO, the daughter of Lycaon. Metamorphosed by Zeus upon the earth into a she-bear, Callisto was pursued by her son Arcas in the chase, and when he was on the point of killing her, Zeus placed them both among the stars, Callisto becoming the Great Bear and Arcas the Little Bear or Boötes. In the poets the epithets of these stars have constant reference to the family and country of Callisto: thus we find them called Lycaonis Arctos: Maenalia Arctos and Maenalis Ursa (from M. Maenalus in Arcadia): Erymanthis Ursa (from M. Erymanthus in Arcadia): Parrhasides stellae (from the Arcadian town Parrhasia). — Though most traditions identified Boötes with Arcas, others pronounced him to be Icarus or his daughter Erigone. Hence the Septentriones are called Boves Icarii. (See Dict. of Antiq. pp. 147, 148, 159, 2nd ed.)

Arctūrus. [Arctos.]

Ardĕa (Ardeas, -ātis: Ardea). 1. The chief town of the Rutuli in Latium, a little to the left of the river Numicus, 3 miles from the sea, was situated on a rock surrounded by marshes, in an unhealthy district. It was one of the most ancient places in Italy, and was said to have been the capital of Turnus. It was conquered and colonized by the Romans, B. C. 442, from which time its importance declined. In its neighbourhood was the Latin Aphrodisium or temple of Venus, which was under the superintendence of the Ardeates. — 2. (Ardekân ?), an important town in Persis, S.W. of Persepolis.

Arduenna Silva, the Ardennes, a vast forest, in the N.W. of Gaul, extended from the Rhine and the Treviri to the Nervii and Remi, and N. as far as the Scheldt: there are still considerable remains of this forest, though the greater part of it has disappeared.

Ardys (Ἄρδυς), son of Gyges, king of Lydia, reigned B. C. 678—629: he took Priene and made war against Miletus.

Arĕă or Arĕtĭăs (Ἄρεια or Ἀρητίας νῆσος, i. e. the island of Ares: Kerasunt Ada), also called Chalcerĭtis, an island off the coast of Pontus, close to Pharnacēa, celebrated in the legend of the Argonauts.

Arēïthŏus (Ἀρηΐθοος), king of Arne in Boeotia, and husband of Philomedusa, is called in the Iliad (vii. 8) κορυνήτης, because he fought with a club: he fell by the hand of the Arcadian Lycurgus.

Arelāte, Arĕlas, or Arelātum (Arelatensis: Arles), a town in Gallia Narbonensis at the head of the delta of the Rhone on the left bank, and a Roman colony founded by the soldiers of the sixth legion, Colonia Arelate Sextanorum. It is first mentioned by Caesar, and under the emperors it became one of the most flourishing towns on this side of the Alps. Constantine the Great built an extensive suburb on the right bank, which he connected with the original city by a bridge. The Roman remains at Arles attest the greatness of the ancient city: there are still to be seen an obelisk of granite, and the ruins of an aqueduct, theatre, amphitheatre, palace of Constantine, and a large Roman cemetery.

Aremŏrĭca. [Armorica.]

Arenacum (Arnheim or Aert ?), a town of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica.

Arēŏpăgus. [Athenae.]

Ares (Ἄρης), the Greek god of war and one of the great Olympian gods, is represented as the son of Zeus and Hera. The character of Ares in Greek mythology will be best understood by comparing it with that of other divinities who are likewise in some way connected with war. Athena represents thoughtfulness and wisdom in the affairs of war, and protects men and their habitations during its ravages. Ares, on the other hand, is nothing but the personification of bold force and strength, and not so much the god of war as of its tumult, confusion, and horrors. His sister Eris calls forth war, Zeus directs its course, but Ares loves war for its own sake, and delights in the din and roar of battles, in the slaughter of men, and the destruction of towns. He is not even influenced by party-spirit, but sometimes assists the one and sometimes the other side, just as his inclination may dictate; whence Zeus calls him ἀλλοπρόσαλλος. (Il. v. 889.) This savage and sanguinary character of Ares makes him hated by the other gods and by his own parents. It was contrary to the spirit of the Greeks to represent a being like Ares, with all his overwhelming physical strength, as always victorious; and when he comes in contact with higher powers, he is usually conquered. He was wounded by Diomedes, who was assisted by Athena, and in his fall he roared like ten thousand warriors. The gigantic Aloïdae had likewise conquered him, and kept him a prisoner for 13 months, until he was delivered by Hermes. He was also conquered by Hercules, with whom he fought on account of his son Cycnus, and was obliged to return to Olympus. This fierce and gigantic, but withal handsome god loved and was beloved by Aphrodite. [Aphrodite.] When Aphrodite loved Adonis, Ares in his jealousy metamorphosed himself into a bear, and killed his rival. [Adonis.] According to a late tradition, Ares slew Halirrhothius, the son of Poseidon, when he was on the point of violating Alcippe, the daughter of Ares. Hereupon Poseidon accused Ares in the Areopagus, where the Olympian gods were assembled in court. Ares was acquitted, and this event was believed to have given rise to the name Areopagus. The warlike character of the tribes of Thrace led to the belief that the god's residence was in that country, and here and in Scythia were the principal seats of his worship. In Scythia he was worshipped under the form of a sword, to which not only horses and other cattle, but men also were sacrificed. In Greece itself the worship of Ares was not very general. All the stories about Ares and his worship in the countries N. of Greece seem to indicate that his worship was introduced into the latter country from Thrace. The Romans identified their god Mars with the Greek Ares. [Mars.]

Arestor (Ἀρέστωρ), father of Argus, the guardian of Io, who is therefore called Arestorides.

Arĕtaeus (Ἀρεταῖος), the Cappadocian, one of the most celebrated of the ancient Greek physicians, probably lived in the reign of Vespasian. He wrote in Ionic Greek a general treatise on diseases in 8 books, which is still extant. The best edition is by C. G. Kühn, Lips. 1828.

Arĕtas (Ἀρέτας), the name of several kings of Arabia Petraea. 1. A contemporary of Pompey, invaded Judaea in B. C. 65, in order to place Hyrcanus on the throne, but was driven back by the Romans, who espoused the cause of Aristobulus. His dominions were subsequently invaded by Scaurus, the lieutenant of Pompey. — 2. The father-in-law of Herod Antipas, invaded Judaea, because Herod had dismissed the daughter of Aretas in consequence of his connection with Herodias. This Aretas seems to have been the same who had possession of Damascus at the time of the conversion of the Apostle Paul, A. D. 31.

Arĕtē (Ἀρήτη). 1. Wife of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, received Ulysses with hospitality. — 2. Daughter of the elder Dionysius and Aristomache, wife of Thearides, and after his death of her uncle Dion. After Dion had fled from Syracuse, Arete was compelled by her brother to marry Timocrates, one of his friends; but she was again received by Dion as his wife, when he had obtained possession of Syracuse and expelled the younger Dionysius. After the assassination of Dion in 353, she was drowned by his enemies. — 3. Daughter of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, was instructed by him in the principles of his system, which she transmitted to her son the younger Aristippus.

Arethūsa (Ἀρέθουσα), one of the Nereids, and the nymph of the famous fountain of Arethusa in the island of Ortygia near Syracuse. For details, see ALPHEUS. Virgil (Eclog. iv. 1, x. 1) reckons her among the Sicilian nymphs, and as the divinity who inspired pastoral poetry.—There were several other fountains in Greece, which bore the name of Arethusa, of which the most important was one in Ithaca, now Lebado, and another in Euboea near Chalcis.

Arĕthūsa (Ἀρέθουσα: Er-Restun), a town and fortress on the Orontes, in Syria: in Strabo's time the seat of a petty Arabian principality.

Arĕtias. [AREA.]

Arĕtium. [ARRETIUM.]

Areus (Ἀρεύς), two kings of Sparta. 1. Succeeded his grandfather, Cleomenes II., since his father Acrotatus had died before him, and reigned B. C. 309—265. He made several unsuccessful attempts to deliver Greece from the dominion of Antigonus Gonatas, and at length fell in battle against the Macedonians in 265, and was succeeded by his son Acrotatus. — 2. Grandson of No. 2, reigned as a child for 8 years under the guardianship of his uncle Leonidas II., who succeeded him about B. C. 256.

Arēvăcae or Arēvăci, the most powerful tribe of the Celtiberians in Spain, near the sources of the Tagus, derived their name from the river Areva (Arlanzo), a tributary of the Durius (Duero).

Argaeus (Ἀργαῖος). 1. King of Macedonia, son and successor of Perdiccas I., the founder of the dynasty. — 2. A pretender to the Macedonian crown, dethroned Perdiccas II. and reigned 2 years Argaeus Mons (Ἀργαῖος: Erdjish), a lofty snow-capped mountain nearly in the centre of Cappadocia; an offset of the Anti-Taurus. At its foot stood the celebrated city of Mazaca or Caesarea.

Arganthōnius (Ἀργανθώνιος), king of Tartessus in Spain, in the 6th century B. C., is said to have reigned 80 years, and to have lived 120.

Arganthōnius or Arganthus Mons (τὸ Ἀργανθώνιον ὄρος: Katirli), a mountain in Bithynia, running out into the Propontis, forming the Prom. Posidium (C. Bouz), and separating the bays of Cios and Astacus.

Argennum or Argīnum (Ἄργεννον, Ἀργῖνον: C. Blanco), a promontory on the Ionian coast, opposite to Chios.

Argentĕus, a small river in Gallia Narbonensis, which flows into the Mediterranean near Forum Julii.

Argentorātum or -tus (Strassburg), an important town on the Rhine in Gallia Belgica, the head-quarters of the 8th legion, and a Roman municipium. In its neighbourhood Julian gained a brilliant victory over the Alemanni, A. D. 357. It was subsequently called Strateburgum and Stratisburgum, whence its modern name.

Arges. [CYCLOPES.]

Argīa (Ἀργεία), daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, and wife of Polynices.

Argīa (Ἀργεία). [ARGOS.]

Argilētum, a district in Rome, which extended from the S. of the Quirinal to the Capitoline and the Forum. It was chiefly inhabited by mechanics and booksellers. The origin of the name is uncertain: the most obvious derivation is from argilla "potter's clay;" but the more common explanation in antiquity was Argi letum, "death of Argus," from a hero Argus who was buried there.

Argīlus (Ἄργιλος: Ἀργίλιος), a town in Bisaltia, the E. part of Mygdonia in Macedonia, between Amphipolis and Bromiscus, a colony of Andros.

Arginūsae (Ἀργινοῦσαι or Ἀργινοῦσσαι), 3 small islands off the coast of Aeolis, opposite Mytilene in Lesbos, celebrated for the naval victory of the Athenians over the Lacedaemonians under Callicratidas, B. C. 406.

Argīphontes (Ἀργειφόντης), "the slayer of Argus," a surname of HERMES.

Argippaei (Ἀργιππαῖοι), a Scythian tribe in Sarmatia Asiatica, who appear, from the description of them by Herodotus (iv. 23), to have been of the Calmuck race.

Argissa. [ARGURA.]

Argithĕa, the chief town of Athamania in Epirus.

Argīva, a surname of Hera or Juno from Argos, where, as well as in the whole of Peloponnesus, she was especially honoured. [ARGOS.]

Argīvi. [ARGOS.]

Argo. [ARGONAUTAE.]

Argŏlis. [ARGOS.]

Argŏnautae (Ἀργοναῦται), the Argonauts, "the sailors of the Argo," were the heroes who sailed to Aea (afterwards called Colchis) for the purpose of fetching the golden fleece. The story of the Argonauts is variously related by the ancient writers, but the common tale ran as follows. In Iolcus in Thessaly reigned Pelias, who had deprived his half-brother AESON of the sovereignty. In order to get rid of JASON the son of Aeson, PELIAS persuaded Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was suspended on an oak-tree in the grove of Ares in Colchis, and was guarded day and night by a dragon. Jason willingly undertook the enterprize, and commanded Argus, the son of Phrixus, to build a ship with 50 oars; which was called Argo (Ἀργώ) after the name of the builder. Jason was accompanied by all the great heroes of the age, and their number is usually said to have been 50. Among these were Hercules, Castor and Pollux, Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, the singer Orpheus, the seer Mopsus, Philammon, Tydeus, Theseus, Amphiaraus, Peleus, Nestor, Admetus, &c. After leaving Iolcus they first landed at Lemnos, where they united themselves with the women of the island, who had just before murdered their fathers and husbands. From Lemnos they sailed to the Doliones at Cyzicus, where king Cyzicus received them hospitably. They left the country during the night, and being thrown back on the coast by a contrary wind, they were taken for Pelasgians, the enemies of the Doliones, and a struggle ensued, in which Cyzicus was slain; but being recognised by the Argonauts, they buried him and mourned over his fate. They next landed in Mysia, where they left behind Hercules and Polyphemus, who had gone into the country in search of Hylas, whom a nymph had carried off while he was fetching water for his companions. In the country of the Bebryces, king Amycus challenged the Argonauts to fight with him; and when Pollux was killed by him, the Argonauts in revenge slew many of the Bebryces, and sailed to Salmydessus in Thrace, where the seer Phineus was tormented by the Harpies. When the Argonauts consulted him about their voyage, he promised his advice on condition of their delivering him from the Harpies. This was done by Zetes and Calais, two sons of Boreas; and Phineus now advised them, before sailing through the Symplegades, to mark the flight of a dove, and to judge from its fate what they themselves would have to do. When they approached the Symplegades, they sent out a dove, which in its rapid flight between the rocks lost only the end of its tail. The Argonauts now, with the assistance of Hera, followed the example of the dove, sailed quickly between the rocks, and succeeded in passing without injury to their ship, with the exception of some ornaments at the stern. Henceforth the Symplegades stood immoveable in the sea. On their arrival at the Mariandyni, the Argonauts were kindly received by their king, Lycus. The seer Idmon and the helmsman Tiphys died here, and the place of the latter was supplied by Ancaeus. They now sailed along the coast until they arrived at the mouth of the river Phasis. The Colchian king Aeëtes promised to give up the golden fleece, if Jason alone would yoke to a plough two fire-breathing oxen with brazen feet, and sow the teeth of the dragon which had not been used by Cadmus at Thebes, and which he had received from Athena. The love of Medea furnished Jason with means to resist fire and steel, on condition of his taking her as his wife; and she taught him how he was to kill the warriors that were to spring up from the teeth of the dragon. While Jason was engaged upon his task, Aeëtes formed plans for burning the ship Argo and for killing all the Greek heroes. But Medea's magic powers sent to sleep the dragon who guarded the golden fleece; and after Jason had taken possession of the treasure, he and his Argonauts, together with Medea and her young brother Absyrtus, embarked by night and sailed away. Aeëtes pursued them, but before he overtook them, Medea murdered her brother, cut him into pieces, and threw his limbs overboard, that her father might be detained in his pursuit by collecting the limbs of his child. Aeëtes at last returned home, but sent out a great number of Colchians, threatening them with the punishment intended for Medea, if they returned without her. While the Colchians were dispersed in all directions, the Argonauts had already reached the mouth of the river Eridanus. But Zeus, angry at the murder of Absyrtus, raised a storm which cast the ship from its course. When driven on the Absyrtian islands, the ship began to speak, and declared that the anger of Zeus would not cease, unless they sailed towards Ausonia, and got purified by Circe. They now sailed along the coasts of the Ligyans and Celts, and through the sea of Sardinia, and continuing their course along the coast of Tyrrhenia, they arrived in the island of Aeaea, where Circe purified them. When they were passing by the Sirens, Orpheus sang to prevent the Argonauts being allured by them. Butes, however, swam to them, but Aphrodite carried him to Lilybaeum. Thetis and the Nereids conducted them through Scylla and Charybdis and between the whirling rocks (πέτραι πλαγκταί); and sailing by the Trinacian island with its oxen of Helios, they came to the Phaeacian island of Corcyra, where they were received by Alcinous. In the meantime, some of the Colchians, not being able to discover the Argonauts, had settled at the foot of the Ceraunian mountains; others occupied the Absyrtian islands near the coast of Illyricum; and a third band overtook the Argonauts in the island of the Phaeacians. But as their hopes of recovering Medea were deceived by Arete, the queen of Alcinous, they settled in the island, and the Argonauts continued their voyage. During the night they were overtaken by a storm; but Apollo sent brilliant flashes of lightning which enabled them to discover a neighbouring island, which they called Anaphe. Here they erected an altar to Apollo, and solemn rites were instituted, which continued to be observed down to very late times. Their attempt to land in Crete was prevented by Talus, who guarded the island, but was killed by the artifices of Medea. From Crete they sailed to Aegina, and from thence between Euboea and Locris to Iolcus. Respecting the events subsequent to their arrival in Iolcus, see Aeson, Medea, Jason, Pelias. The story of the Argonauts probably arose out of accounts of commercial enterprises which the wealthy Minyans, who lived in the neighbourhood of Iolcus, made to the coasts of the Euxine. The expedition of the Argonauts is related by Pindar in the 4th Pythian ode, by Apollonius Rhodius in his Argonautica, and by his Roman imitator Valerius Flaccus.

Argos (τὸ Ἄργος, -εος), is said by Strabo (p. 372) to have signified a plain in the language of the Macedonians and Thessalians, and it may therefore contain the same root as the Latin word ager. In Homer we find mention of the Pelasgic Argos, that is, a town or district of Thessaly, and of the Achaean Argos, by which he means sometimes the whole Peloponnesus, sometimes Agamemnon's kingdom of Argos of which Mycenae was the capital, and sometimes the town of Argos. As Argos frequently signifies the whole Peloponnesus, the most important part of Greece, so the Ἀργεῖοι often occur in Homer as a name of the whole body of the Greeks, in which sense the Roman poets also use Argivi. — 1. Argos, a district of Peloponnesus, called Argolis (ἡ Ἀργολίς) by Herodotus, but more frequently by other Greek writers either Argos, Argīa (ἡ Ἀργεία), or Argolice (ἡ Ἀργολική). Under the Romans Argolis became the usual name of the country, while the word Argos or Argi was confined to the town. Argolis under the Romans signified the country bounded on the N. by the Corinthian territory, on the W. by Arcadia, on the S. by Laconia, and included towards the E. the whole Acte or peninsula between the Saronic and Argolic gulfs: but during the time of Grecian independence Argolis or Argos was only the country lying round the Argolic gulf, bounded on the W. by the Arcadian mountains, and separated on the N. by a range of mountains from Corinth, Cleonae, and Phlius. Argolis, as understood by the Romans, was for the most part a mountainous and unproductive country: the only extensive plain adapted for agriculture was in the neighbourhood of the city of Argos. Its rivers were insignificant and mostly dry in summer: the most important was the Inachus. The country was divided into the districts of Argīa or Argos proper, Epidauria, Troezenia, and Hermionis. The original inhabitants of the country were, according to mythology, the Cynurii; but the main part of the population consisted of Pelasgi and Achaei, to whom Dorians were added after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. See below, No. 2. — 2. Argos, or Argi, -orum, in the Latin writers, now Argo, the capital of Argolis, and, next to Sparta, the most important town in Peloponnesus, situated in a level plain a little to the W. of the Inachus. It had an ancient Pelasgic citadel, called Larissa, and another built subsequently on another height (duas arces habent Argi, Liv. xxxiv. 25). It possessed numerous temples, and was particularly celebrated for the worship of Hera, whose great temple, Heraeum, lay between Argos and Mycenae. The remains of the Cyclopian walls of Argos are still to be seen. The city is said to have been built by Inachus or his son Phoroneus, or grandson Argus. The descendants of Inachus, who may be regarded as the Pelasgian kings, reigned over the country for 9 generations, but were at length deprived of the sovereignty by Danaus, who is said to have come from Egypt. The descendants of Danaus were in their time obliged to submit to the Achaean race of the Pelopidae. Under the rule of the Pelopidae Mycenae became the capital of the kingdom, and Argos was a dependent state. Thus Mycenae was the royal residence of Atreus and of his son Agamemnon; but under Orestes Argos again recovered its supremacy. Upon the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians Argos fell to the share of Temenus, whose descendants ruled over the country; but the great bulk of the population continued to be Achaean. All these events belong to mythology; and Argos first appears in history about B. C. 750, as the chief state of Peloponnesus, under its ruler Phidon. After the time of Phidon its power declined, and it was not even able to maintain its supremacy over the other towns of Argolis. Its power was greatly weakened by its wars with Sparta. The two states long contended for the district of Cynuria, which lay between Argolis and Laconia, and which the Spartans at length obtained by the victory of their 300 champions, about B. C. 550. In B. C. 524 Cleomenes, the Spartan king, defeated the Argives with such loss near Tiryns, that Sparta was left without a rival in Peloponnesus. In consequence of its weakness and of its jealousy of Sparta, Argos took no part in the Persian war. In order to strengthen itself, Argos attacked the neighbouring towns of Tiryns, Mycenae, &c., destroyed them, and transplanted their inhabitants to Argos. The introduction of so many new citizens was followed by the abolition of royalty and of Doric institutions, and by the establishment of a democracy, which continued to be the form of government till later times, when the city fell under the power of tyrants. In the Peloponnesian war Argos sided with Athens against Sparta. In B. C. 243 it joined the Achaean League, and on the conquest of the latter by the Romans, 146, it became a part of the Roman province of Achaia. At an early time Argos was distinguished by its cultivation of music and poetry [Sacadas; Telesilla]; but at the time of the intellectual greatness of Athens, literature and science seem to have been entirely neglected at Argos. It produced some great sculptors, of whom Ageladas and Polycletus are the most celebrated.

Argos Amphilŏchĭcum (Ἄργος τὸ Ἀμφιλοχικὸν), the chief town of Amphilochia in Acarnania, situated on the Ambracian gulf, and founded by the Argive Amphilochus.

Argos Hippĭum. [Arpi.]

Argōus Portus (Porto Ferraio), a town and harbour in the island of Ilva (Elba).

Argūra (Ἄργουρα), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, called Argissa by Homer (Il. ii. 738).

Argus (Ἄργος). 1. Son of Zeus and Niobe, 3rd king of Argos, from whom Argos derived its name. — 2. Surnamed Panoptes, "the all-seeing," because he had a hundred eyes, son of Agenor, Arestor, Inachus, or Argus. Hera appointed him guardian of the cow into which Io had been metamorphosed; but Hermes, at the command of Zeus, put Argus to death, either by stoning him, or by cutting off his head after sending him to sleep by the sweet notes of his flute. Hera transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favourite bird. — 3. The builder of the Argo, son of Phrixus, Arestor, or Polybus, was sent by Aeëtes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his inheritance in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, was found by Jason in the island of Aretias, and carried back to Colchis.

Argȳra (Ἀργυρᾶ), a town in Achaia near Patrae, with a fountain of the same name.

Argȳrĭpa. [Arpi.]

Aria (Ἀρεία, Ἀρία: Ἄρειος, Ἄριος: the E. part of Khorassan, and the W. and N.W. part of Afghanistan), the most important of the E. provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, was bounded on the E. by the Paropamisadae, on the N. by Margiana and Hyrcania, on the W. by Parthia, and on the S. by the great desert of Carmania. It was a vast plain, bordered on the N. and E. by mountains, and on the W. and S. by sandy deserts; and, though forming a part of the great sandy tableland, now called the Desert of Iran, it contained several very fertile oases, especially in its N. part, along the base of the Sarĭphi (Kohistan and Hazarah) mountains, which was watered by the river Arius or -as (Herirood), on which stood the later capital Alexandria (Herat). The river is lost in the sand. The lower course of the great river Etymandrus (Helmund) also belonged to Aria, and the lake into which it falls was called Aria Lacus (Zurrah). From Aria was derived the name under which all the E. provinces were included. [Ariana.]

Aria Lacus. [Aria.]

Ariabignes (Ἀριαβίγνης), son of Darius Hystaspis, one of the commanders of the fleet of Xerxes, fell in the battle of Salamis, B. C. 480.

Arĭadnē (Ἀριάδνη), daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë or Creta, fell in love with Theseus, when he was sent by his father to convey the tribute of the Athenians to Minotaurus, and gave him the clue of thread by means of which he found his way out of the Labyrinth, and which she herself had received from Hephaestus. Theseus in return promised to marry her, and she accordingly left Crete with him; but on their arrival in the island of Dia (Naxos), she was killed by Artemis. This is the Homeric account (Od. xi. 322); but the more common tradition related that Theseus left Ariadne in Naxos alive, either because he was forced by Dionysus to leave her, or because he was ashamed to bring a foreign wife to Athens. Dionysus found her at Naxos, made her his wife, and placed among the stars the crown which he gave her at their marriage. There are several circumstances in the story of Ariadne which offered the happiest subjects for works of art, and some of the finest ancient works, on gems as well as paintings, are still extant, of which Ariadne is the subject.

Ariaeus (Ἀριαῖος) or Aridaeus (Ἀριδαῖος), the friend of Cyrus, commanded the left wing of the army at the battle of Cunaxa, B.C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he purchased his pardon from Artaxerxes by deserting the Greeks.

Ariamnes (Ἀριάμνης), the name of two kings of Cappadocia, one the father of Ariarathes I., and the other the son and successor of Ariarathes II.

Ariāna (Ἀριανή: Iran), derived from ARIA, from the specific sense of which it must be carefully distinguished, was the general name of the E. provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, and included the portion of Asia bounded on the W. by an imaginary line drawn from the Caspian to the mouth of the Persian Gulf, on the S. by the Indian Ocean, on the E. by the Indus, and on the N. by the great chain of mountains called by the general name of the Indian Caucasus, embracing the provinces of Parthia, Aria, the Paropamisadae, Arachosia, Drangiana, Gedrosia, and Carmania (Khorassan, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Kirman). But the name was often extended to the country as far W. as the margin of the Tigris-valley, so as to include Media and Persis, and also to the provinces N. of the Indian Caucasus, namely Bactria and Sogdiana (Bokhara). The knowledge of the ancients respecting the greater part of this region was confined to what was picked up in the expeditions of Alexander and the wars of the Greek kings of Syria, and what was learned from merchant caravans.

Ariarāthes (Ἀριαράθης), the name of several kings of Cappadocia.—1. Son of Ariamnes I., assisted Ochus in the recovery of Egypt, B.C. 350. Ariarathes was defeated by Perdiccas, and crucified, 322. Eumenes then obtained possession of Cappadocia.—2. Son of Holophernes, and nephew of Ariarathes I., recovered Cappadocia after the death of Eumenes, B.C. 315. He was succeeded by Ariamnes II.—3. Son of Ariamnes II., and grandson of No. 2, married Stratonīce, daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria.—4. Son of No. 3, reigned B.C. 220—162. He married Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus III., king of Syria, and assisted Antiochus in his war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus, Ariarathes sued for peace in 188, which he obtained on favourable terms. In 183—179, he assisted Eumenes in his war against Pharnaces.—5. Son of No. 4, previously called Mithridates, reigned B.C. 163—130. He was surnamed Philopator, and was distinguished by the excellence of his character and his cultivation of philosophy and the liberal arts. He assisted the Romans in their war against Aristonicus of Pergamus, and fell in this war, 130.—6. Son of No. 5, reigned B.C. 130—96. He married Laodice, sister of Mithridates VI., king of Pontus, and was put to death by Mithridates by means of Gordius. On his death the kingdom was seized by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who married Laodice, the widow of the late king. But Nicomedes was soon expelled by Mithridates, who placed upon the throne,—7. Son of No. 6. He was, however, also murdered by Mithridates in a short time, who now took possession of his kingdom. The Cappadocians rebelled against Mithridates, and placed upon the throne,—8. Second son of No. 6; but he was speedily driven out of the kingdom by Mithridates, and shortly afterwards died. Both Mithridates and Nicomedes attempted to give a king to the Cappadocians; but the Romans allowed the people to choose whom they pleased, and their choice fell upon Ariobarzanes.—9. Son of Ariobarzanes II., reigned B.C. 42—36. He was deposed and put to death by Antony, who appointed Archelaus as his successor.

Ariaspae or Agriaspae (Ἀριάσπαι, Ἀγριάσπαι), a people in the S. part of the Persian province of Drangiana, on the very borders of Gedrosia, with a capital city, Ariaspe (Ἀριάσπη). In return for the services which they rendered to the army of Cyrus the Great, when he marched through the desert of Carmania, they were honoured with the name of Εὐεργέται, and were allowed by the Persians to retain their independence, which was confirmed to them by Alexander as the reward of similar services to himself.

Arīcia (Aricīnus: Ariccia or Riccia), an ancient town of Latium at the foot of the Alban Mount, on the Appian Way, 16 miles from Rome. It was a member of the Latin confederacy, was subdued by the Romans, with the other Latin towns, in B.C. 338, and received the Roman franchise. In its neighbourhood was the celebrated grove and temple of Diana Aricīna, on the borders of the Lacus Nemorensis (Nemi). Diana was worshipped here with barbarous customs: her priest, called rex nemorensis, was always a run-away slave, who obtained his office by killing his predecessor in single combat. The priest was obliged to fight with any slave who succeeded in breaking off a branch of a certain tree in the sacred grove.

Aridaeus. [ARIAEUS; ARRHIDAEUS.]

Arii, is the name applied to the inhabitants of the province of ARIA, but it is probably also a form of the generic name of the whole Persian race, derived from the root ar, which means noble, and which forms the first syllable of a great number of Persian names. [Comp. ARTAEI.]

Arīmaspi (Ἀριμασποί), a people in the N. of Scythia, of whom a fabulous account is given by Herodotus (iv. 27). The germ of the fable is perhaps to be recognised in the fact that the Ural Mountains abound in gold.

Arimāzes (Ἀριμάζης) or Ariomāzes (Ἀριομάζης), a chief in Sogdiana, whose fortress was taken by Alexander in B.C. 328. In it Alexander found Roxana, the daughter of the Bactrian chief, Oxyartes, whom he made his wife.

Arīmi (Ἄριμοι) and Arīmă (τὰ Ἄριμα sc. ὄρη), the names of a mythical people, district, and range of mountains in Asia Minor, which the old Greek poets made the scene of the punishment of the monster Typhoeus. Virgil (Aen. ix. 716) has misunderstood the εἰν Ἀρίμοις of Homer (Il. ii. 783), and made Typhoeus lie beneath Inarime, an island off the coast of Italy, namely, Pithecusa or Aenaria (Ischia).

Arīminum (Ariminensis: Rimini), a town in Umbria on the coast at the mouth of the little river Ariminus (Marocchia). It was originally inhabited by Umbrians and Pelasgians, was afterwards in the possession of the Senones, and was colonised by the Romans in B. C. 268, from which time it appears as a flourishing place. After leaving Cisalpine Gaul, it was the first town which a person arrived at in the N. E. of Italia proper.

Ariobarzānes (Ἀριοβαρζάνης). I. Kings or Satraps of Pontus.—1. Betrayed by his son Mithridates to the Persian king, about B. C. 400.—2. Son of Mithridates I., reigned B. C. 363—337. He revolted from Artaxerxes in 362, and may be regarded as the founder of the kingdom of Pontus.—3. Son of Mithridates III., reigned 266—240, and was succeeded by Mithridates IV.—II. Kings of Cappadocia.—1. Surnamed Philoromaeus, reigned B. C. 93—63, and was elected king by the Cappadocians, under the direction of the Romans. He was several times expelled from his kingdom by Mithridates, but was finally restored by Pompey in 63, shortly before his death.—2. Surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father in 63. The time of his death is not known; but it must have been before 51, in which year his son was reigning.—3. Surnamed Eusebes and Philoromaeus, son of No. 2, whom he succeeded about 51. He assisted Pompey against Caesar in 48, but was nevertheless pardoned by Caesar, who even enlarged his territories. He was slain in 42 by Cassius, because he was plotting against him in Asia.

Arīon (Ἀρίων). 1. Of Methymna in Lesbos, an ancient Greek bard and a celebrated player on the cithara, is called the inventor of the dithyrambic poetry, and of the name dithyramb. He lived about B. C. 625, and spent a great part of his life at the court of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Of his life scarcely any thing is known beyond the beautiful story of his escape from the sailors with whom he sailed from Sicily to Corinth. On one occasion, thus runs the story, Arion went to Sicily to take part in some musical contest. He won the prize, and, laden with presents, he embarked in a Corinthian ship to return to his friend Periander. The rude sailors coveted his treasures, and meditated his murder. After trying in vain to save his life, he at length obtained permission once more to play on the cithara. In festal attire he placed himself in the prow of the ship and invoked the gods in inspired strains, and then threw himself into the sea. But many song-loving dolphins had assembled round the vessel, and one of them now took the bard on its back and carried him to Taenărus, from whence he returned to Corinth in safety, and related his adventure to Periander. Upon the arrival of the Corinthian vessel Periander inquired of the sailors after Arion, who replied that he had remained behind at Tarentum; but when Arion, at the bidding of Periander, came forward, the sailors owned their guilt, and were punished according to their desert. In the time of Herodotus and Pausanias there existed at Taenarus a brass monument, representing Arion riding on a dolphin. Arion and his cithara (lyre) were placed among the stars. A fragment of a hymn to Poseidon, ascribed to Arion, is contained in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 566, &c.—2. A fabulous horse, which Poseidon begot by Demeter; for, in order to escape from the pursuit of Poseidon, the goddess had metamorphosed herself into a mare, and Poseidon deceived her by assuming the figure of a horse. There were many other traditions respecting the origin of this horse, but all make Poseidon its father, though its mother is different in the various legends.

Ariovistus, a German chief, who crossed the Rhine at the request of the Sequani, when they were hard pressed by the Aedui. He subdued the Aedui, but appropriated to himself part of the territory of the Sequani, and threatened to take still more. The Sequani now united with the Aedui in imploring the help of Caesar, who defeated Ariovistus about 50 miles from the Rhine, B. C. 58. Ariovistus escaped across the river in a small boat.

Aristaenĕtus (Ἀρισταίνετος), the reputed author of 2 books of Love-Letters, taken almost entirely from Plato, Lucian, Philostratus, and Plutarch. Of the author nothing is known. The best edition is by Boissonade, Paris, 1822.

Aristaenus (Ἀρίσταινος), of Megalopolis, sometimes called Aristaenetus, was frequently strategus or general of the Achaean league from B. C. 198 to 185. He was the political opponent of Philopoemen, and a friend of the Romans.

Aristaeus (Ἀρισταῖος), a divinity worshipped in various parts of Greece, was once a mortal, who became a god through the benefits he had conferred upon mankind. The different accounts about him seem to have arisen in different places and independently of one another, so that they referred to several distinct beings, who were subsequently identified and united into one. He is described either as a son of Uranus and Ge, or, according to a more general tradition, as the son of Apollo and Cyrene. His mother Cyrene had been carried off by Apollo from mount Pelion to Libya, where she gave birth to Aristaeus. Aristaeus subsequently went to Thebes in Boeotia; but after the unfortunate death of his son Actaeon, he left Thebes and visited almost all the Greek colonies on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Finally he went to Thrace, and after dwelling for some time near mount Haemus, where he founded the town of Aristaeon, he disappeared. Aristaeus is one of the most beneficent divinities in ancient mythology: he was worshipped as the protector of flocks and shepherds, of vine and olive plantations; he taught men to keep bees, and averted from the fields the burning heat of the sun and other causes of destruction.

Aristagŏras (Ἀρισταγόρας), of Miletus, brother-in-law of Histiaeus, was left by the latter during his stay at the Persian court, in charge of the government of Miletus. Having failed in an attempt upon Naxos (B. C. 501), which he had promised to subdue for the Persians, and fearing the consequences of his failure, he induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. He applied for assistance to the Spartans and Athenians: the former refused, but the latter sent him 20 ships and some troops. In 499 his army captured and burnt Sardis, but was finally chased back to the coast. The Athenians now departed; the Persians conquered most of the Ionian cities; and Aristagoras in despair fled to Thrace where he was slain by the Edonians in 497.

Aristander (Ἀρίστανδρος), the most celebrated soothsayer of Alexander the Great, wrote a work on prodigies.

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος). 1. An Athenian, one of the leaders in the revolution of the "Four Hundred," B. C. 411. He was afterwards put to death by the Athenians, not later than 406.—2

A Lacedaemonian, succeeded Cleander as harmost of Byzantium in 400, and in various ways ill treated the Cyrean Greeks, who had recently returned from Asia. — 3. Of Tegea, a tragic poet at Athens, contemporary with Euripides, flourished about B. C. 454, and wrote 70 tragedies. — 4. Of Samos, an eminent mathematician and astronomer at Alexandria, flourished between B. C. 280 and 264. He employed himself in the determination of some of the most important elements of astronomy; but none of his works remain, except a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon (περὶ μεγεθῶν καὶ ἀποστημάτων ἡλίου καὶ σελήνης). Edited by Wallis, Oxon, 1688, and reprinted in vol. iii. of his works. There is a French translation, and an edition of the text, Paris, 1810. — 5. Of Samothrace, the celebrated grammarian, flourished B. C. 156. He was educated in the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, at Alexandria, where he himself founded a grammatical and critical school. At an advanced age he left Alexandria, and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of 72, of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. Aristarchus was the greatest critic of antiquity. His labours were chiefly devoted to the Greek poets, but more especially to the Homeric poems, of which he published a recension, which has been the basis of the text from his time to the present day. The great object of his critical labours was to restore the genuine text of the Homeric poems, and to clear it of all later interpolations and corruptions. He marked those verses which he thought spurious with an obelos, and those which he considered as particularly beautiful with an asterisk. He divided the Iliad and Odyssey into 24 books each. He did not confine himself to a recension of the text, but also explained and interpreted the poems: he opposed the allegorical interpretation which was then beginning to find favour, and which at a later time became very general. His grammatical principles were attacked by many of his contemporaries: the most eminent of his opponents was Crates of Mallus.

Aristēas (Ἀριστέας), of Proconnesus, an epic poet of whose life we have only fabulous accounts. His date is quite uncertain: some place him in the time of Croesus and Cyrus; but other traditions make him earlier than Homer, or a contemporary and teacher of Homer. The ancient writers represent him as a magician, who rose after his death, and whose soul could leave and re-enter its body according to its pleasure. He was connected with the worship of Apollo, which he was said to have introduced at Metapontum. He is said to have travelled through the countries N. and E. of the Euxine, and to have visited the Issedones, Arimaspae, Cimmerii, Hyperborei, and other mythical nations, and after his return to have written an epic poem in 3 books, called The Arismaspēa (τὰ Ἀριμάσπεια). This work is frequently mentioned by the ancients, but it is impossible to say who was the real author of it.

Aristēas or Aristaeus, an officer of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B. C. 285—247), the reputed author of a Greek work, giving an account of the manner in which the translation of the Septuagint was executed, but which is generally admitted by the best critics to be spurious. Printed at Oxford, 1692, 8vo.

Aristīdes (Ἀριστείδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Lysimachus, surnamed the "Just," was of an ancient and noble family. He was the political disciple of Clisthenes, and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. Aristides fought as the commander of his tribe at the battle of Marathon, B. C. 490; and next year, 489, he was archon. In 483 or 482 he suffered ostracism, probably in consequence of the triumph of the maritime and democratic policy of his rival. He was still in exile in 480 at the battle of Salamis, where he did good service by dislodging the enemy, with a band raised and armed by himself, from the islet of Psyttaleia. He was recalled from banishment after the battle, was appointed general in the following year (479), and commanded the Athenians at the battle of Plataea. In 477, when the allies had become disgusted with the conduct of Pausanias and the Spartans, he and his colleague Cimon had the glory of obtaining for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy: and to Aristides was by general consent entrusted the task of drawing up its laws and fixing its assessments. This first tribute (φόρος) of 460 talents, paid into a common treasury at Delos, bore his name, and was regarded by the allies in after times, as marking their Saturnian age. This is his last recorded act. He died after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely in 468. He died so poor that he did not leave enough to pay for his funeral: his daughters were portioned by the state, and his son Lysimachus received a grant of land and of money. — 2. The author of a work entitled Milesiaca, which was probably a romance, having Miletus for its scene. It was written in prose, and was of a licentious character. It was translated into Latin by L. Cornelius Sisenna, a contemporary of Sulla, and it seems to have become popular with the Romans. Aristides is reckoned as the inventor of the Greek romance, and the title of his work gave rise to the term Milesian, as applied to works of fiction. His age and country are unknown, but the title of his work is thought to favour the conjecture that he was a native of Miletus. — 3. Of Thebes, a celebrated Greek painter, flourished about B. C. 360—330. The point in which he most excelled was in depicting the feelings, expressions, and passions which may be observed in common life. His pictures were so much valued that long after his death Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered 600,000 sesterces for one of them. — 4. P. Aelius Aristides, surnamed Theodorus, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, was born at Adriani in Mysia, in A. D. 117. He studied under Herodes Atticus at Athens, and subsequently travelled through Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The fame of his talents and acquirements was so great that monuments were erected to his honour in several towns which he had honoured with his presence. Shortly before his return he was attacked by an illness which lasted for 13 years, but this did not prevent him from prosecuting his studies. He subsequently settled at Smyrna, and when this city was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 178, he used his influence with the emperor M. Aurelius to induce him to assist in rebuilding the town. The Smyrnaeans showed their gratitude to Aristides by offering him various honours and distinctions, most of which he refused: he accepted only the office of priest of Asclepius, which he held until his death, about A. D. 180. The works of Aristides which have come down to us, are 55 orations and declamations, and 2 treatises on rhetorical subjects of little value. His orations are much superior to those of the rhetoricians of his time. His admirers compared him to Demosthenes, and even Aristides did not think himself much inferior. This vanity and self-sufficiency made him enemies and opponents; but the number of his admirers was far greater, and several learned grammarians wrote commentaries on his orations, some of which are extant. The best edition of Aristides is by W. Dindorf, Lips. 1829. — 5. Quintilianus Aristides, the author of a treatise in 3 books on music, probably lived in the 1st century after Christ. His work is perhaps the most valuable of all the ancient musical treatises: it is printed in the collection of Meibomius entitled Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652.

Aristīon (Ἀριστίων), a philosopher either of the Epicurean or Peripatetic school, made himself tyrant of Athens through the influence of Mithridates. He held out against Sulla in B. C. 87; and when the city was taken by storm, he was put to death by Sulla's orders.

Aristippus (Ἀρίστιππος). 1. Son of Aritades, born at Cyrene, and founder of the Cyrenaic school of Philosophy, flourished about B. C. 370. The fame of Socrates brought him to Athens, and he remained with the latter almost up to the time of his execution, B. C. 399. Though a disciple of Socrates, he wandered both in principle and practice very far from the teaching and example of his great master. He was luxurious in his mode of living: he indulged in sensual gratifications and the society of the notorious Lais; and he took money for his teaching (being the first of the disciples of Socrates who did so). He passed part of his life at the court of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse; but he appears at last to have returned to Cyrene, and there to have spent his old age. The anecdotes which are told of him, however, do not give us the notion of a person who was the mere slave of his passions, but rather of one who took a pride in extracting enjoyment from all circumstances of every kind, and in controlling adversity and prosperity alike. They illustrate and confirm the two statements of Horace (Ep. i. 1. 18), that to observe the precepts of Aristippus is mihi res, non me rebus subjungere, and (i. 17. 23) that, omnis Aristippum decuit color et status et res. Thus when reproached for his love of bodily indulgences, he answered, that there was no shame in enjoying them, but that it would be disgraceful if he could not at any time give them up. To Xenophon and Plato he was very obnoxious, as we see from the Memorabilia (ii. 1.) where he maintains an odious discussion against Socrates in defence of voluptuous enjoyment, and from the Phaedo, where his absence at the death of Socrates, though he was only at Aegina, 200 stadia from Athens, is doubtless mentioned as a reproach. He imparted his doctrine to his daughter Arete, by whom it was communicated to her son, the younger Aristippus. — 2. Two tyrants of Argos, in the time of Antigonus Gonatas. See ARISTOMACHUS, Nos. 3 and 4.

Aristo, T., a distinguished Roman jurist, lived under the emperor Trajan, and was a friend of the Younger Pliny. His works are occasionally mentioned in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from any of them in that compilation. He wrote notes on the Libri Posteriorum of Labeo, on Cassius, whose pupil he had been, and on Sabinus.

Aristo. [ARISTON.]

Aristobūlus (Ἀριστόβουλος), princes of Judaea. 1. Eldest son of Joannes Hyrcanus, assumed the title of king of Judaea, on the death of his father in B. C. 107. He put to death his brother Antigonus, in order to secure his power, but died in the following year, 106. — 2. Younger son of Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra. After the death of his mother in B. C. 70, there was a civil war for some years between Aristobulus and his brother Hyrcanus, for the possession of the crown. At length in B. C. 63, Aristobulus was deprived of the sovereignty by Pompey and carried away as a prisoner to Rome. In 57, he escaped from his confinement at Rome, with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judaea, renewed the war; but he was taken prisoner, and sent back to Rome by Gabinius. In 49, he was released by Julius Caesar, who sent him into Judaea, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party. — 3. Grandson of No. 2, son of Alexander and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. He was made high-priest by Herod, when he was only 17 years old, but was afterwards drowned at Jericho, by order of Herod, B. C. 35. — 4. Son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, was put to death in B. C. 6, with his brother Alexander, by order of their father, whose suspicions had been excited against them by their brother ANTIPATER. — 5. Surnamed "the Younger," son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with his two brothers, Agrippa I. and Herod the future king of Chalcis. He died, as he had lived, in a private station. — 6. Son of Herod king of Chalcis, grandson of No. 4, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In A. D. 55, Nero made him king of Armenia Minor, and in 61 added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia which had been given to Tigranes. He joined the Romans in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in 73.

Aristŏbūlus. 1. Of Cassandrea, served under Alexander the Great in Asia, and wrote a history of Alexander, which was one of the chief sources used by Arrian in the composition of his work. — 2. An Alexandrine Jew, and a Peripatetic philosopher, lived B. C. 170, under Ptolemy VI. Philometor. He is said to have been the author of commentaries upon the books of Moses, the object of which was to prove that the Greek philosophy was taken from the books of Moses; but it is now admitted that this work was written by a later writer, whose object was to induce the Greeks to pay respect to the Jewish literature.

Aristŏcles (Ἀριστοκλῆς). 1. Of Rhodes, a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, a contemporary of Strabo. — 2. Of Pergamus, a sophist and rhetorician, and a pupil of Herodes Atticus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian. — 3. Of Messene, a Peripatetic philosopher, probably lived about the beginning of the 3rd century after Christ. He wrote a work on philosophy, some fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius. — 4. Sculptors. There were two sculptors of this name: Aristocles the elder, who is called both a Cydonian and a Sicyonian, probably because he was born at Cydonia and practised his art in Sicyon; and Aristocles the younger, of Sicyon, grandson of the former, son of Cleoetas, and brother of Canachus. These artists founded a school of sculpture at Sicyon, which secured an hereditary reputation, and of which we have the heads for 7 generations, namely, Aristocles, Cleoetas, Aristocles and Canachus, Synnoön, Ptolichus, Sostratus, and Pantias. The elder Aristocles probably lived about B.C. 600—568 ; the younger about 540—508.

Aristŏcrătes (Ἀριστοκράτης). 1. Last king of Arcadia, was the leader of the Arcadians in the 2nd Messenian war, when they assisted the Messenians against the Spartans. Having been bribed by the Spartans, he betrayed the Messenians, and was in consequence stoned to death by the Arcadians, about B.C. 668, who now abolished the kingly office.—2. An Athenian of wealth and influence, son of Scellias, was one of the Athenian generals at the battle of Arginusae, B.C. 406, and on his return to Athens was brought to trial and executed.

Aristŏdēmus (Ἀριστόδημος). 1. A descendant of Hercules, son of Aristomachus, and father of Eurysthenes and Procles. According to some traditions Aristodemus was killed at Naupactus by a flash of lightning, just as he was setting out on his expedition into Peloponnesus ; but a Lacedaemonian tradition related, that Aristodemus himself came to Sparta, was the first king of his race, and died a natural death.—2. A Messenian, one of the chief heroes in the first Messenian war. As the Delphic oracle had declared that the preservation of the Messenian state demanded that a maiden of the house of the Aepytids should be sacrificed, Aristodemus offered his own daughter. In order to save her life, her lover declared that she was with child by him, but Aristodemus, enraged at this assertion, murdered his daughter and opened her body to refute the calumny. Aristodemus was afterwards elected king in place of Euphaes, who had fallen in battle against the Spartans. He continued the war against the Spartans, till at length, finding further resistance hopeless, he put an end to his life on the tomb of his daughter, about B.C. 723.—3. Tyrant of Cumae in Campania, at whose court Tarquinius Superbus died, B.C. 496.—4. One of the 300 Spartans at Thermopylae (B.C. 480), was not present at the battle in which his comrades fell, either in consequence of sickness, or because he had been sent on an errand from the camp. The Spartans punished him with Atimia, or civil degradation. Stung with this treatment he met his death at Plataea in the following year (479), after performing the wildest feats of valour.—5. A tragic actor of Athens in the time of Demosthenes, took a prominent part in the political affairs of his time, and advocated peace with Macedonia. He was employed by the Athenians in their negotiations with Philip, with whom he was a great favourite.—6. Of Miletus, a friend and flatterer of Antigonus, king of Asia, who sent him into Greece in B.C. 315, in order to promote his interests there.—7. There were many literary persons of this name referred to by the ancient grammarians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from one another. Two were natives of Nysa in Caria, both grammarians, one a teacher of Pompey, and the other of Strabo. There was also an Aristodemus of Elis, and another of Thebes, who are quoted as writers.

Aristŏgīton (Ἀριστογείτων). 1. The conspirator against the sons of Pisistratus. See HARMODIUS.—2. An Athenian orator and adversary of Demosthenes, Hyperīdes, and Dinarchus. He was often accused by Demosthenes and others, and defended himself in a number of orations which are lost. Among the extant speeches of Demosthenes there are 2 against Aristogiton, and among those of Dinarchus there is one.

Aristŏmăchē (Ἀριστομάχη), daughter of Hipparīnus of Syracuse, sister of Dion, and wife of the elder Dionysius, who married her and Doris of Locri on the same day. She afterwards perished with her daughter ARETE.

Aristŏmăchus (Ἀριστόμαχος). 1. Son of Talaus and brother of Adrastus.—2. Son of Cleodemus or Cleodaeus, grandson of Hyllus, great-grandson of Hercules, and father of Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus. He fell in battle when he invaded Peloponnesus ; but his three sons were more successful and conquered Peloponnesus.—3. Tyrant of Argos, under the patronage of Antigonus Gonatas, was assassinated, and succeeded by Aristippus II.—4. Tyrant of Argos, succeeded Aristippus II.: he resigned his power upon the death of Demetrius in B.C. 229, and induced Argos to join the Achaean league. He afterwards deserted the Achaeans, and again assumed the tyranny of Argos ; but the city having been taken by Antigonus Doson, Aristomachus fell into the hands of the Achaeans, and was by them put to death.

Aristŏmĕnes (Ἀριστομένης). 1. The Messenian, the hero of the 2nd war with Sparta, belongs more to legend than to history. He was a native of Andania, and was sprung from the royal line of Aepytus. Tired of the yoke of Sparta, he began the war in B.C. 685, 39 years after the end of the 1st war. Soon after its commencement he so distinguished himself by his valour, that he was offered the throne, but refused it, and received the office of supreme commander. After the defeat of the Messenians in the 3rd year of the war, through the treachery of Aristocrates, the Arcadian leader, Aristomenes retreated to the mountain fortress of Ira, and there maintained the war for 11 years, constantly ravaging the land of Laconia. In one of his incursions, however, the Spartans overpowered him with superior numbers, and carrying him with 50 of his comrades to Sparta, cast them into the pit (κεάδας) where condemned criminals were thrown. The rest perished ; not so Aristomenes, the favourite of the gods ; for legends told how an eagle bore him up on its wings as he fell, and a fox guided him on the 3rd day from the cavern. But having incurred the anger of the Twin Brothers, his country was destined to ruin. The city of Ira, which he had so long successfully defended, fell into the hands of the Spartans ; Aristomenes, after performing prodigies of valour, was obliged to leave his country, which was again compelled to submit to the Spartans, B.C. 668. He afterwards settled at Ialysus in Rhodes, where he died. Damagetus, king of Ialysus, had been enjoined by the Delphic oracle "to marry the daughter of the best of the Greeks," and he therefore took to wife the daughter of Aristomenes, who accompanied him to Rhodes. The Rhodians honoured Aristomenes as a hero, and from him were descended the illustrious family of the Diagoridae.—2. An Acarnanian, who governed Egypt with justice and wisdom during the minority of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, but was put to death by Ptolemy in 192.—3. A comic poet of Athens, flourished during the Peloponnesian war.

Ariston (Ἀρίστων). 1. Of Chios, a Stoic philosopher, and a disciple of Zeno, flourished about B.C. 260. Though he professed himself a Stoic, yet he differed from Zeno in several points, and became the founder of a small school. He is said to have died of a coup de soleil. — 2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Julis in the island of Ceos, succeeded Lycon as head of the Peripatetic school, about B. C. 230. He wrote several philosophical works which are lost. — 3. Of Alexandria, a Peripatetic philosopher and a contemporary of Strabo, wrote a work on the Nile.

Aristŏnautae (Ἀριστοναῦται), a town in Achaia, the harbour of Pallene.

Aristŏnīcus (Ἀριστόνικος). 1. A natural son of Eumenes II. of Pergamus. Upon the death of his brother Attalus III., B. C. 133, who left his kingdom to the Romans, Aristonicus laid claim to the crown. At first he met with considerable success. He defeated in 131 the consul P. Licinius Crassus; but in 130 he was defeated and taken prisoner by M. Perperna, was carried to Rome by M'. Aquillius in 129, and was there put to death. — 2. An Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Strabo, and the author of several works, most of which related to the Homeric poems.

Aristŏnȳmus (Ἀριστώνυμος), a comic poet and contemporary of Aristophanes and Amipsias.

Aristŏphănes (Ἀριστοφάνης). 1. The celebrated comic poet, was born about B. C. 444 and probably at Athens. His father Philippus had possessions in Aegina, and may originally have come from that island, whence a question arose whether Aristophanes was a genuine Athenian citizen: his enemy Cleon brought against him more than one accusation to deprive him of his civic rights (ξενίας γραφαί), but without success. He had three sons, Philippus, Araros, and Nicostratus, but of his private history we know nothing. He probably died about B. C. 380. The comedies of Aristophanes are of the highest historical interest, containing as they do an admirable series of caricatures on the leading men of the day, and a contemporary commentary on the evils existing at Athens. Indeed, the caricature is the only feature in modern social life which at all resembles them. Aristophanes was a bold and often a wise patriot. He had the strongest affection for Athens, and longed to see her restored to the state in which she was flourishing in the previous generation, and almost in his own childhood, before Pericles became the head of the government, and when the age of Miltiades and Aristides had but just passed away. The first great evil of his own time against which he inveighs, is the Peloponnesian war, which he regards as the work of Pericles. To this fatal war, among a host of evils, he ascribes the influence of demagogues like Cleon at Athens. Another great object of his indignation was the recently adopted system of education which had been introduced by the Sophists, acting on the speculative and inquiring turn given to the Athenian mind by the Ionian and Eleatic philosophers, and the extraordinary intellectual development of the age following the Persian war. The new theories introduced by the Sophists threatened to overthrow the foundations of morality, by making persuasion and not truth the object of man in his intercourse with his fellows, and to substitute a universal scepticism for the religious creed of the people. The worst effects of such a system were seen in Alcibiades, who combined all the elements which Aristophanes most disliked, heading the war party in politics, and protecting the sophistical school in philosophy and also in literature. Of this latter school — the literary and poetical Sophists — Euripides was the chief, whose works are full of that μετεωροσοφία which contrasts so offensively with the moral dignity of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and for which Aristophanes introduces him as soaring in the air to write his tragedies. Another feature of the times was the excessive love for litigation at Athens, the consequent importance of the dicasts, and disgraceful abuse of their power; all of which enormities are made by Aristophanes objects of continual attack. But though he saw what were the evils of his time, he had not wisdom to find a remedy for them, except the hopeless and undesirable one of a movement backwards; and therefore, though we allow him to have been honest and bold, we must deny him the epithet of great. The following is a list of his extant comedies, with the year in which they were performed:—425. Acharnians. Produced in the name of Callistratus. First prize.—424. Ἱππεῖς, Knights or Horsemen. The first play produced in the name of Aristophanes himself. First prize; second Cratinus. — 423. Clouds. First prize, Cratinus; second, Amipsias. —422. Wasps. Second prize. — Clouds (second edition), failed in obtaining a prize. Some writers place this B. C. 411, and the whole subject is very uncertain. — 419. Peace. Second prize; Eupolis first. — Birds. Second prize; Amipsias, first; Phrynichus, third. — 411. Lysistrata. — Thesmophoriazusae. During the Oligarchy.—408. First Plutus. — 405. Frogs. First prize; Phrynichus, second; Plato, third. Death of Sophocles.—392. Ecclesiazusae. — 388. Second edition of the Plutus. — The last two comedies of Aristophanes were the Aeolosicon and Cocalus, produced about B. C. 387 (date of the peace of Antalcidas) by Araros, one of his sons. — Suidas tells us, that Aristophanes was the author, in all, of 54 plays. As a poet Aristophanes possessed merits of the highest order. His works contain snatches of lyric poetry which are quite noble, and some of his chorusses, particularly one in the Knights, in which the horses are represented as rowing triremes in an expedition against Corinth, are written with a spirit and humour unrivalled in Greek, and are not very dissimilar to English ballads. He was a complete master of the Attic dialect, and in his hands the perfection of that glorious language is wonderfully shown. No flights are too bold for the range of his fancy: animals of every kind are pressed into his service; frogs chaunt chorusses, a dog is tried for stealing a cheese, and an iambic verse is composed of the grunts of a pig. — Editions. The best of the collective plays are by Invernizzi, completed by Beck and Dindorf, 13 vols. Lips. 1794—1826, and by Bekker, 5 vols. 8vo., London, 1829. — 2. Of Byzantium, son of Apelles, and one of the most eminent Greek grammarians at Alexandria. He was a pupil of Zenodotus and Eratosthenes, and teacher of the celebrated Aristarchus. He lived about B. C. 264, in the reign of Ptolemy II. and Ptolemy III., and had the supreme management of the library at Alexandria. Aristophanes was the first who introduced the use of accents in the Greek language. He devoted himself chiefly to the criticism and interpretation of the Greek poets, and more especially of Homer, of whose works he made a new and critical edition (διόρθωσις). The philosophers Plato and Aristotle likewise engaged his attention, and of the former, as of several of the poets, he made new and critical editions.

All we possess of his numerous works consists of fragments scattered through the Scholia on the poets, some argumenta to the plays of the tragic poets and of Aristophanes, and a part of his Λέξεις, which is printed in Boissonade's edition of Herodian's Partitiones, London, 1819, pp. 283—289.

Aristŏphon (Ἀριστόφων). 1. Of the demus of Azenia in Attica, one of the most distinguished Athenian orators about the close of the Peloponnesian war. The number of laws which he proposed may be inferred from his own statement, as preserved by Aeschines, that he was accused 75 times of having made illegal proposals, but that he had always come off victorious. In B. C. 354 he accused Iphicrates and Timotheus, and in the same year he came forward in the assembly to defend the law of Leptines against Demosthenes. The latter treats him with great respect, and reckons him among the most eloquent orators. — 2. Of the demus of Colyttus, a contemporary of Demosthenes, and an orator of great distinction and influence. It was this Aristophon whom Aeschines served as a clerk, and in whose service he was trained for his public career. [AESCHINES.] — 3. A comic poet of the middle comedy. — 4. A painter of some distinction, son and pupil of Aglaophon, and brother of Polygnotus.

Aristŏtĕles (Ἀριστοτέλης), the philosopher, was born at Stagīra, a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, B. C. 384. His father, Nicomachus, was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with natural science: his mother, Phaestis (or Phaestias), was descended from a Chalcidian family. The studies and occupation of his father account for the early inclination manifested by Aristotle for the investigation of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout his whole life. He lost his father before he had attained his 17th year, and he was entrusted to the guardianship of one Proxenus of Atarneus in Mysia, who was settled in Stagīra. In 367, he went to Athens to pursue his studies, and there became a pupil of Plato upon the return of the latter from Sicily about 365. Plato soon distinguished him above all his other disciples. He named him the "intellect of his school," and his house, the house of the "reader." Aristotle lived at Athens for 20 years, till 347. During the whole of this period the good understanding which subsisted between teacher and scholar continued, with some trifling exceptions, undisturbed; for the stories of the disrespect and ingratitude of the latter towards the former are nothing but calumnies invented by his enemies. During the last 10 years of his first residence at Athens, Aristotle gave instruction in rhetoric, and distinguished himself by his opposition to Isocrates. It was at this time that he published his first rhetorical writings. Upon the death of Plato (347) Aristotle left Athens, perhaps he was offended by Plato having appointed Speusippus as his successor in the Academy. He first repaired to his friend Hermīas at Atarneus, where he married Pythias, the adoptive daughter of the prince. On the death of HERMIAS, who was killed by the Persians (344), Aristotle fled from Atarneus to Mytilene. Two years afterwards (342) he accepted an invitation from Philip of Macedonia, to undertake the instruction of his son Alexander, then 13 years of age. Here Aristotle was treated with the most marked respect. His native city, Stagira, which had been destroyed by Philip, was rebuilt at his request, and Philip caused a gymnasium (called Nymphaeum) to be built there in a pleasant grove expressly for Aristotle and his pupils. Several of the youths of the Macedonian nobles were educated by Aristotle along with Alexander. Aristotle spent 7 years in Macedonia; but Alexander enjoyed his instruction without interruption for only 4. Still with such a pupil even this short period was sufficient for a teacher like Aristotle to fulfil the highest purposes of education, and to create in his pupil that sense of the noble and great, which distinguishes Alexander from all those conquerors who have only swept like a hurricane through the world. On Alexander's accession to the throne in 335, Aristotle returned to Athens. Here he found his friend Xenocrates president of the Academy. He himself had the Lycēum, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lyceus, assigned to him by the state. He soon assembled round him a large number of distinguished scholars, to whom he delivered lectures on philosophy in the shady walks (περίπατοι) which surrounded the Lyceum, while walking up and down (περιπατῶν), and not sitting, which was the general practice of the philosophers. From one or other of these circumstances the name Peripatetic is derived, which was afterwards given to his school. He gave two different courses of lectures every day. Those which he delivered in the morning (ἑωθινὸς περίπατος) to a narrower circle of chosen (esoteric) hearers, and which were called acroamatic or acroatic, embraced subjects connected with the more abstruse philosophy (theology), physics, and dialectics. Those which he delivered in the afternoon (δειλινὸς περίπατος) and intended for a more promiscuous circle (which accordingly he called exoteric), extended to rhetoric, sophistics, and politics. He appears to have taught not so much in the way of conversation, as in regular lectures. His school soon became the most celebrated at Athens, and he continued to preside over it for 13 years (335—323). During this time he also composed the greater part of his works. In these labours he was assisted by the truly kingly liberality of his former pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, but also caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for one of his most excellent works, the History of Animals. Meanwhile various causes contributed to throw a cloud over the latter years of the philosopher's life. In the first place, he felt deeply the death of his wife Pythias, who left behind her a daughter of the same name: he lived subsequently with a friend of his wife's, the slave Herpyllis, who bore him a son, Nicomachus. But a source of still greater grief was an interruption of the friendly relation in which he had hitherto stood to his royal pupil. This was occasioned by the conduct of CALLISTHENES, the nephew and pupil of Aristotle, who had vehemently and injudiciously opposed the changes in the conduct and policy of Alexander. Still Alexander refrained from any expression of hostility towards his former instructor, although their former cordial connection no longer subsisted undisturbed. The story that Aristotle had a share in poisoning the king, is a fabrication of a later age; and moreover it is certain that Alexander died a natural death. After the death of Alexander (323) Aristotle was looked upon with suspicion at Athens as a friend of Macedonia; but as it was not easy to bring any political accusation against him, he was accused of impiety (ἀσεβείας) by the hierophant Eurymedon. He withdrew from Athens before his trial, and escaped in the beginning of 322 to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died in the course of the same year, in the 63rd year of his age, of a chronic disease of the stomach. His body was transported to his native city Stagira, and his memory was honoured there, like that of a hero, by yearly festivals. He bequeathed to Theophrastus his well-stored library and the originals of his writings. In person Aristotle was short and of slender make, with small eyes, and a lisp in his pronunciation, using L for R, and with a sort of sarcastic expression in his countenance. He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. He is described as having been of weak health, which, considering the astonishing extent of his studies, shows all the more the energy of his mind. — The numerous works of Aristotle may be divided into the following classes according to the subjects of which they treat: we only mention the most important in each class. I. Dialectics and Logic. — The extant logical writings are comprehended as a whole under the title Organon (Ὄργανον, i. e. instrument of science). They are occupied with the investigation of the method by which man arrives at knowledge. An insight into the nature and formation of conclusions and of proof by means of conclusions, is the common aim and centre of all the separate 6 works composing the Organon: these separate works are, 1. Κατηγορίαι, Praedicamenta, in which Aristotle treats of the (10) comprehensive generic ideas, under which all the attributes of things may be subordinated as species. 2. Περὶ ἑρμηνείας, De Interpretatione, concerning the expression of thought by means of speech. 3, 4. Ἀναλυτικὰ πρότερα and ὕστερα, Analytica, each in 2 books, on the theory of conclusions, so called from the resolution of the conclusion into its fundamental component parts. 5. Τοπικὰ, De Locis, in 8 books, of the general points of view (τόποι), from which conclusions may be drawn. 6. Περὶ σοφιστικῶν ἐλέγχων, concerning the fallacies which only apparently prove something. The best edition of the Organon is by Waitz, Lips. 1844. — II. Theoretical Philosophy, consisting of Metaphysics, Mathematics, and Physics, on all of which Aristotle wrote works. 1. The Metaphysics, in 14 books (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά), originally consisted of distinct treatises, independent of one another, and were put together as one work after Aristotle's death. The title also is of late origin, and was given to the work from its being placed after (μετὰ) the Physics (τὰ φυσικὰ). The best edition is by Brandis, Berol. 1823. — 2. In Mathematics we have 2 treatises by Aristotle: (1.) Περὶ ἀτόμων γραμμῶν, i. e. concerning indivisible lines; 2. Μηχανικὰ προβλήματα, Mechanical Problems. — 3. In Physics, we have, — (1). Physics (φυσικὴ ἀκρόασις, called also by others περὶ ἀρχῶν), in 8 books. In these Aristotle develops the general principles of natural science. (Cosmology.) (2.) Concerning the Heaven (περὶ οὐρανοῦ), in 4 books. (3.) On Production and Destruction (περὶ γενέσεως καὶ φθορᾶς, de Generatione et Corruptione), in 2 books, develop the general laws of production and destruction. (4.) On Meteorology (μετεωρολογικά, de Meteoris), in 4 books. (5.) On the Universe (περὶ κόσμου, de Mundo), a letter to Alexander, treats the subject of the last 2 works in a popular tone and a rhetorical style altogether foreign to Aristotle. The whole is probably a translation of a work with the same title by Appuleius. (6.) The History of Animals (περὶ ζώων ἱστορία), in 9 books, treats of all the peculiarities of this division of the natural kingdom, according to genera, classes, and species; especially giving all the characteristics of each animal according to its external and internal vital functions; according to the manner of its copulation, its mode of life, and its character. The best edition is by Schneider, Lips. 1811. The observations in this work are the triumph of ancient sagacity, and have been confirmed by the results of the most recent investigations. (Cuvier.) (7.) On the parts of Animals (περὶ ζώων μορίων), in 4 books, in which Aristotle, after describing the phaenomena in each species, develops the causes of these phaenomena by means of the idea to be formed of the purpose which is manifested in the formation of the animal. (8.) On the Generation of Animals (περὶ ζώων γενέσεως), in 5 books, treats of the generation of animals and the organs of generation. (9.) De Incessu Animalium (περὶ ζώων πορείας). (10.) Three books on the Soul (περὶ ψυχῆς). Aristotle defines the soul to be "the internal formative principle of a body which may be perceived by the senses, and is capable of life." Best edition by Trendelenburg, Jenae, 1833. Several anatomical works of Aristotle have been lost. He was the first person who in any especial manner advocated anatomical investigations, and showed the necessity of them for the study of the natural sciences. He frequently refers to investigations of his own on the subject. — III. Practical Philosophy or Politics. — All that falls within the sphere of practical philosophy is comprehended in three principal works: the Ethics, the Politics, and the Oeconomics. 1. The Nicomachean Ethics (Ἠθικὰ Νικομάχεια), in 10 books. Aristotle here begins with the highest and most universal end of life, for the individual as well as for the community in the state. This is happiness (εὐδαιμονία); and its conditions are, on the one hand, perfect virtue exhibiting itself in the actor, and on the other hand, corresponding bodily advantages and favourable external circumstances. Virtue is the readiness to act constantly and consciously according to the laws of the rational nature of man (ὀρθὸς λόγος). The nature of virtue shows itself in its appearing as the medium between two extremes. In accordance with this, the several virtues are enumerated and characterized. Best editions by Zell, Heidelb. 1820; Corais, Paris, 1822; Cardwell, Oxon. 1828; Michelet, Berol. 1828. — 2. The Eudemean Ethics (Ἠθικὰ Εὐδήμεια), in 7 books, of which only books i. ii. iii. and vii. are independent, while the remaining books iv. v. and vi. agree word for word with books v. vi. and vii. of the Nicomachean Ethics. This ethical work is perhaps a recension of Aristotle's lectures, edited by Eudemus. — 3. Ἠθικὰ Μέγαλα, in 2 books. — 4. Politics (Πολιτικά), in 8 books. The Ethics conduct us to the Politics. The connection between the two works is so close, that in the Ethics by the word ὕστερον reference is made by Aristotle to the Politics, and in the latter by πρότερον to the Ethics. The Politics show how happiness is to be attained for the human community in the state; for the object of the state is not merely the external preservation of life, but "happy life, as it is attained by means of virtue" (ἀρετή, perfect development of the whole man). Hence also ethics form the first and most general foundation of political life, because the state cannot attain its highest object, if morality does not prevail among its citizens. The house, the family, is the element of the state. Accordingly Aristotle begins with the doctrine of domestic economy, then proceeds to a description of the different forms of government, after which he gives a delineation of the most important Hellenic constitutions, and then investigates which of the constitutions is the best (the ideal of a state). The doctrine concerning education, as the most important condition of this best state, forms the conclusion. Best editions, by Schneider. Francof. ad Viadr. 1809; Corais, Paris, 1821; Göttling, Jenae, 1824; Stahr, with a German translation, Lips. 1837; Barthélemy St. Hilaire, with a French translation, Paris. 1837.—5. Oeconomics (οἰκονομικά), in 2 books, of which only the first is genuine.—IV. Works on Art, which have for their subject the exercise of the creative faculty, or Art. To these belong the Poetics and Rhetoric. 1. The Poetics (Περὶ ποιητικῆς). Aristotle penetrated deeper than any of the ancients into the essence of Hellenic art. He is the father of the aesthetics of poetry, as he is the completer of Greek rhetoric as a science. The greatest part of the treatise contains a theory of Tragedy; nothing else is treated of, with the exception of the epos; comedy is merely alluded to. Best editions by Tyrwhitt, Oxon. 1794; Hermann, Lips. 1802; Gräfenhan, Lips. 1821; Bekker, Berol. 1832; Ritter, Colon. 1839.—2. The Rhetoric (τέχνη ῥητορική), in 3 books. Rhetoric, as a science, according to Aristotle, stands side by side with Dialectics. The only thing which makes a scientific treatment of rhetoric possible is the argumentation which awakens conviction: he therefore directs his chief attention to the theory of oratorical argumentation. The second main division of the work treats of the production of that favourable disposition in the hearer, in consequence of which the orator appears to him to be worthy of credit. The third part treats of oratorical expression and arrangement.—According to a story current in antiquity Aristotle bequeathed his library and MSS. to Theophrastus, his successor in the Academy. On the death of Theophrastus, the libraries and MSS. both of Aristotle and Theophrastus are said to have come into the hands of his relation and disciple, Neleus of Scepsis. This Neleus sold both libraries to Ptolemy II., king of Egypt, for the Alexandrine library; but he retained for himself, as an heirloom, the original MSS. of the works of these two philosophers. The descendants of Neleus, who were subjects of the king of Pergamus, knew of no other way of securing them from the search of the Attali, who wished to rival the Ptolemies in forming a large library, than concealing them in a cellar, where for a couple of centuries they were exposed to the ravages of damp and worms. It was not till the beginning of the century before the birth of Christ that a wealthy book-collector, the Athenian Apellicon of Teos, traced out these valuable relics, bought them from the ignorant heirs, and prepared from them a new edition of Aristotle's works. After the capture of Athens, Sulla conveyed Apellicon's library to Rome, B.C. 84. [Apellicon.] From this story an error arose, which has been handed down from the time of Strabo to the present day. It was concluded from this account, that neither Aristotle nor Theophrastus had published their writings, with the exception of some exoteric works, which had no important bearing on their system; and that it was not till 200 years later that they were brought to light by the above-mentioned Apellicon, and published to the philosophical world. That, however, was by no means the case. Aristotle indeed did not prepare a complete edition, as we call it, of his writings. Nay, it is certain that death overtook him before he could finish some of his works and put the finishing hand to others. Nevertheless it cannot be denied that Aristotle destined all his works for publication, and published several in his life-time. This is indisputably certain with regard to the exoteric writings Those which had not been published by Aristotle himself, were given to the world by Theophrastus and his disciples in a complete form.—Editions. The best edition of the complete works of Aristotle is by Bekker, Berlin, 1831—1840, 4to. text, 2 vols., and a Latin translation in one volume. This edition has been reprinted at Oxford in 11 vols. 8vo. There is a stereotyped edition published by Tauchnitz, Leipzig, 1832, 16mo. in 16 vols., and another edition of the text by Weise, in one volume, Leipzig, 1843.

Aristŏxĕnus (Ἀριστόξενος), of Tarentum, a Peripatetic philosopher and a musician, flourished about B.C. 318. He was a disciple of Aristotle, whom he appears to have rivalled in the variety of his studies. According to Suidas, he produced works to the number of 453 upon music, philosophy, history, in short every department of literature. We know nothing of his philosophical opinions, except that he held the soul to be a harmony of the body (Cic. Tusc. i. 10), a doctrine which had been already discussed by Plato in the Phaedo. Of his numerous works the only one extant is his Elements of Harmony (ἁρμονικὰ στοιχεῖα), in 3 books: edited by Meibomius, in the Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652.

Aristus (Ἄριστος). 1. Of Salamis in Cyprus, wrote a history of Alexander the Great.—2. An Academic philosopher, a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and teacher of M. Brutus.

Arius, river. [Aria.]

Ariūsĭa (ἡ Ἀριουσία χώρα), a district on the N. coast of Chios, where the best wine in the island was grown (Ariusium Vinum, Virg. Ecl. v. 71).

Armenē (Ἀρμένη, or -ήνη: Akliman), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, where the 10,000 Greeks, during their retreat, rested 5 days, entertained by the people of Sinope, a little to the W. of which Armene stood.

Armĕnĭa (Ἀρμενία: Ἀρμένιος, Armenius: Armenia), a country of Asia, lying between Asia Minor and the Caspian, is a lofty table-land, backed by the chain of the Caucasus, watered by the rivers Cyrus and Araxes, containing the sources also of the Tigris and of the Euphrates, the latter of which divides the country into 2 unequal parts, which were called Major and Minor. 1. Armenia Major or Propria (Ἀ. ἡ μεγάλη or ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη: Erzeroum, Kars, Van, and Erivan), was bounded on the N.E. and N. by the Cyrus (Kur), which divided it from Albania and Iberia; on the N.W. and W. by the Moschici mountains (the prolongation of the chain of the Anti-Taurus), and the Euphrates (Frat), which divided it from Colchis and Armenia Minor; and on the S. and S.E.

by the mountains called Masius, Niphates, and Gordiaei (the prolongation of the Taurus), and the lower course of the ARAXES, which divided it from Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Media: on the E. the country comes to a point at the confluence of the Cyrus and Araxes. It is intersected by chains of mountains, between which run the two great rivers ARAXES, flowing E. into the Caspian, and the Arsanias or S. branch of the Euphrates (Murad), flowing W. into the main stream (Frat) just above M. Masius. The E. extremity of the chain of mountains which separates the basins of these two rivers, and which is an offshoot of the Anti-Taurus, forms the Ararat of Scripture. In the S. of the country is the great lake of Van, Arsissa Palus, enclosed by mountain chains which connect Ararat with the S. range of mountains. — 2. Armenia Minor (Ἀ. μικρά or βραχυτέρα), was bounded on the E. by the Euphrates, which divided it from Armenia Major, on the N. and N.W. by the mountains Scodīses, Paryadres, and Anti-Taurus, dividing it from Pontus and Cappadocia, and on the S. by the Taurus, dividing it from Commagene in N. Syria, so that it contained the country E. and S. of the city of Siwas (the ancient Cabira or Sebaste) as far as the Euphrates and the Taurus. The boundaries between Armenia Minor and Cappadocia varied at different times; and indeed the whole country up to the Euphrates is sometimes called Cappadocia, and, on the other hand, the whole of Asia Minor E. of the Halys seems at one time to have been included under the name of Armenia.—The people of Armenia claimed to be aboriginal; and there can be little doubt that they were one of the most ancient families of that branch of the human race which is called Caucasian. Their language, though possessing some remarkable peculiarities of its own, was nearly allied to the Indo-Germanic family; and their manners and religious ideas were similar to those of the Medes and Persians, but with a greater tendency to the personification of the powers of nature, as in the goddess Anaïtis, whose worship was peculiar to Armenia. They had commercial dealings with Assyria and Phoenicia. In the time of Xenophon they had preserved a great degree of primitive simplicity, but 400 years later Tacitus gives an unfavourable view of their character. — The earliest Armenian traditions represent the country as governed by native kings, who had perpetually to maintain their independence against attacks from Assyria. They were said to have been conquered by Semiramis, but again threw off the yoke at the time of the Median and Babylonian revolt. Their relations to the Medes and Persians seem to have varied between successful resistance, unwilling subjection, and friendly alliance. A body of Armenians formed a part of the army which Xerxes led against Greece; and they assisted Darius Codomannus against Alexander, and in this war they lost their king, and became subject to the Macedonian empire (B.C. 328). After another interval of successful revolt (B.C. 317—274), they submitted to the Greek kings of Syria; but when Antiochus the Great was defeated by the Romans (B.C. 190), the country again regained its independence, and it was at this period that it was divided into the two kingdoms of Armenia Major and Minor, under two different dynasties, founded respectively by the nobles who headed the revolt, Artaxias and Zariadras. Ultimately, Armenia Minor was made a Roman province by Trajan; and Armenia Major, after being a perpetual object of contention between the Romans and the Parthians, was subjected to the revived Persian empire by its first king Artaxerxes (Ardeshir) in A. D. 226

Armenĭus Mons (τὸ Ἀρμένιον ὄρος), a branch of the Anti-Taurus chain in Armenia Minor.

Arminĭus (the Latinized form of Hermann, "the chieftain"), son of Sigimer, "the conqueror," and chief of the tribe of the Cherusci, who inhabited the country to the north of the Hartz mountains, now forming the S. of Hanover and Brunswick. He was born in B. C. 18; and in his youth, he led the warriors of his tribe as auxiliaries of the Roman legions in Germany, where he learnt the language and military discipline of Rome, and was admitted to the freedom of the city, and enrolled amongst the equites. In A. D. 9, Arminius, who was now 27 years old, and had succeeded his father as chief of his tribe, persuaded his countrymen to rise against the Romans, who were now masters of this part of Germany, and which seemed destined to become, like Gaul, a Roman province. His attempt was crowned with success. Quintilius Varus, who was stationed in the country with 3 legions, was destroyed with almost all his troops [VARUS]; and the Romans had to relinquish all their possessions beyond the Rhine. In 14, Arminius had to defend his country against Germanicus. At first he was successful; the Romans were defeated, and Germanicus withdrew towards the Rhine, followed by Arminius. But having been compelled by his uncle, Inguiomer, against his own wishes, to attack the Romans in their entrenched camp, his army was routed, and the Romans made good their retreat to the Rhine. It was in the course of this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved with the infant boy to whom she soon after gave birth in her captivity, to adorn the triumph of Germanicus at Rome. In 16, Arminius was again called upon to resist Germanicus, but he was defeated, and his country was probably only saved from subjection by the jealousy of Tiberius, who recalled Germanicus in the following year. At length Arminius aimed at absolute power, and was in consequence cut off by his own relations in the 37th year of his age, A. D. 19.

Armorĭca or Aremorica, the name of the N.W. coast of Gaul from the Ligeris (Loire) to the Sequana (Seine), derived from the Celtic ar, air, "upon," and muir, mōr, "the sea." The Armoricae civitates are enumerated by Caesar (B. G. vii. 75).

Arna (Arnas, -ātis: Civitella d'Arno), a town in Umbria near Perusia.

Arnae (Ἄρναι), a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, S. of Aulon and Bromiscus.

Arnē (Ἄρνη), a town in Boeotia mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 507), supposed by Pausanias to be the same as Chaeronēa, but placed by others near Acraephium on the E. of the lake Copais.

Arnissa (Ἄρνισσα: Ostrova ?), a town in Eordaea in Macedonia.

Arnŏbĭus. 1. The elder, a native of Africa, lived about A. D. 300, in the reign of Diocletian. He was at first a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa, but afterwards embraced Christianity; and to remove all doubts as to the reality of his conversion, he wrote, while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work against the Pagans, in 7 books (Libri septem adversus Gentes), which we still possess. The best edition is by Orelli, Lips. 1816. — 2. The Younger, lived about A. D. 460, and was probably a bishop or presbyter in Gaul. He wrote a commentary on the Psalms, still extant, which shows that he was a Semi-Pelagian.

Arnōn (Ἄρνων: Wad-el Mojib), a considerable river of E. Palestine, rising in the Arabian Desert, and flowing W. through a rocky valley into the Lacus Asphaltites (Dead Sea). The surrounding district was called Arnonas; and in it the Romans had a military station, called Castra Arnonensia.

Arnus (Arno), the chief river of Etruria, rises in the Apennines, flows by Pisae, and falls into the Tyrrhenian sea. It gave the name to the Tribus Arniensis, formed B. C. 387.

Arŏa (Ἀρόα or Ἀρόη), the ancient name of PATRAE.

Arōmătă (τὰ Ἀρώματα, Ἀρωμάτων ἄκρον: Cape Guardafui), the E.-most promontory of Africa, at the S. extremity of the Arabian Gulf: also the surrounding district was called Aromata or Aromatophora Regio, with a town Ἀρωμάτων ἐμπόριον: so named from the abundance of spices which the district produced.

Arpi (Arpānus: Arpi), an inland town in the Daunian Apulia, founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes, who called it Ἄργος ἵππιον, from which its later names of Argyrippa or Argўrīpa and Arpi are said to have arisen (Ille (Diomedes) urbem Argyripam, patriae cognomine gentis, Virg. Aen. xi. 246). During the time of its independence it was a flourishing commercial town, using Salapia as its harbour. It was friendly to the Romans in the Samnite wars, but revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216: it was taken by the Romans in 213, deprived of its independence, and never recovered its former prosperity.

Arpīnum (Arpīnas, -ātis: Arpino), a town of Latium on the small river Fibrenus (Fibreno), originally belonging to the Volscians and afterwards to the Samnites, from whom the Romans wrested it, was a Roman municipium, and received the jus suffragii, or right of voting in the Roman comitia, B. C. 188. It was the birthplace of Marius and Cicero, the latter of whom was born in his father's villa, situated on a small island formed by the river Fibrenus. Cicero's brother Quintus had an estate S. of Arpinum, called Arcanum.

Arrētĭum or Arētĭum (Arretīnus: Arezzo), one of the most important of the 12 cities of Etruria, was situated in the N. E. of the country at the foot of the Apennines, and possessed a fertile territory near the sources of the Arnus and the Tiber, producing good wine and corn. It was thrice colonised by the Romans, whence we read of Arretini Veteres, Fidenates, Julienses. It was particularly celebrated for its pottery, which was of red ware. The Cilnii, from whom Maecenas was descended, were a noble family of Arretium. The ruins of a city 2 or 3 miles to the S. E. of Arezzo, on a height called Poggio di San Cornelio, or Castel Secco, are probably the remains of the ancient Arretium.

Arrhapachītis (Ἀῤῥαπαχῖτις), a district of Assyria, between the rivers Lycus and Choatras.

Arrhibaeus (Ἀῤῥιβαῖος), chieftain of the Macedonians of Lyncus, revolted against king Perdiccas in the Peloponnesian war. It was to reduce him that Perdiccas sent for Brasidas (B. C. 424), and against him took place the unsuccessful joint expedition, in which Perdiccas deserted Brasidas, and Brasidas effected his bold and skilful retreat.

Arrhidaeus (Ἀῤῥιδαῖος) or Aridaeus (Ἀριδαῖος). 1. A half-brother of Alexander the Great, son of Philip and a female dancer, Philinna of Larissa, was of imbecile understanding. He was at Babylon at the time of Alexander's death, B. C. 323, and was elected king under the name of Philip. The young Alexander, the infant son of Roxana, was associated with him in the government. In 322, Arrhidaeus married Eurydice. On their return to Macedonia, Eurydice attempted to obtain the supreme power in opposition to Polysperchon; but Arrhidaeus and Eurydice were made prisoners, and put to death by order of Olympias, 317. — 2. One of Alexander's generals, obtained the province of the Hellespontine Phrygia, at the division of the provinces in 321 at Triparadisus, but was deprived of it by Antigonus in 319.

Arrĭa. 1. Wife of Caecina Paetus. When her husband was ordered by the emperor Claudius to put an end to his life, A. D. 42, and hesitated to do so, Arria stabbed herself, handed the dagger to her husband, and said, "Paetus, it does not pain me." — 2. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of Thrasea.

Arriānus (Ἀῤῥιανός). 1. Of Nicomedia in Bithynia, born about A. D. 90, was a pupil and friend of Epictetus, and first attracted attention as a philosopher by publishng at Athens the lectures of his master. In 124, he gained the friendship of Hadrian during his stay in Greece, and received from the emperor the Roman citizenship; from this time he assumed the name of Flavius. In 136, he was appointed praefect of Cappadocia, which was invaded the year after by the Alani or Massagetae, whom he defeated. Under Antoninus Pius, in 146, Arrian was consul; and about 150 he withdrew from public life, and from this time lived in his native town of Nicomedia, as priest of Demeter and Persephone. He died at an advanced age in the reign of M. Aurelius. Arrian was one of the most active and best writers of his time. He was a close imitator of Xenophon both in the subjects of his works and in the style in which they were written. He regarded his relation to Epictetus as similar to that of Xenophon to Socrates; and it was his endeavour to carry out that resemblance. With this view he published, 1. the philosophical lectures of his master (Διατριβαὶ Ἐπικτήτου) in 8 books, the first half of which is still extant. Edited in Schweighäuser's Epicteteae Philosophiae Monumenta, vol. iii., and in Coraes' Πάρεργα Ἑλλην. Βιβλιοθ. vol. viii. — 2. An abstract of the practical philosophy of Epictetus (Ἐγχειρίδιον Ἐπικτήτου), which is still extant. This celebrated work maintained its authority for many centuries, both with Christians and Pagans. The best editions are those of Schweighäuser and Coraes, in the collections above referred to. He also published other works relating to Epictetus, which are now lost. His original works are: — 3. A treatise on the chase (Κυνηγητικός), which forms a kind of supplement to Xenophon's work on the same subject, and is printed in most editions of Xenophon's works. — 4. The History of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander the Great (Ἀνάβασις Ἀλεξάνδρου), in 7 books, the most important of Arrian's works. This great work reminds the reader of Xenophon's Anabasis, not only by its title, but also by the ease and clearness of its style. It is also of great value for its historical accuracy, being based upon the most trustworthy histories written by the contemporaries of Alexander, especially those of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and of Aristobulus, the son of Aristobulus. — 5. On India (Ἰνδική or τὰ Ἰνδικά), which may be regarded as a continuation of the Anabasis, at the end of which it is usually printed. This work is written in the Ionic dialect, probably in imitation of Ctesias of Cnidus, whose work on the same subject Arrian wished to supplant by a more trustworthy and correct account. The best editions of the Anabasis are by Ellendt, Regimontii, 1832, and by C. W. Krüger, Berlin, 1835; of the Indica by Schmieder, Halle, 1798. — 6. A description of a voyage round the coasts of the Euxine (περίπλους πόντου Εὐξείνου), which had undoubtedly been made by Arrian himself during his government of Cappadocia. This Periplus has come down to us together with a Periplus of the Erythraean, and a Periplus of the Euxine and the Palus Maeotis, both of which also bear the name of Arrian, but they belong undoubtedly to a later period. The best editions are in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i., and in Gail's and Hoffmann's collections of the minor Geographers. — 7. A work on Tactics (λόγος τακτικὸς or τέχνη τακτική), of which we possess at present only a fragment: printed in Blancard's collection of the minor works of Arrian. Arrian also wrote numerous other works, all of which are now lost. — 2. A Roman jurisconsult, probably lived under Trajan, and is perhaps the same person with the orator Arrianus, who corresponded with the younger Pliny. He wrote a treatise de Interdictis, of which the 2d book is quoted in the Digest.

Arrĭbas, Arrȳbas, Arymbas, or Tharrytas (Ἀρρίβας, Ἀρρύβας, Ἀρύμβας, or Θαρρύτας), a descendant of Achilles, and one of the early kings of the Molossians in Epirus. He is said to have been educated at Athens, and on his return to his native country to have framed for the Molossians a code of laws, and established a regular constitution.

Q. Arrĭus. 1. Praetor, B. C. 72, defeated Crixus, the leader of the runaway slaves, but was afterwards conquered by Spartacus. In 71, Arrius was to have succeeded Verres as propraetor in Sicily, but died on his way to Sicily. — 2. A son of the preceding, was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, B. C. 59. He was an intimate friend of Cicero.

Arrĭus Aper. [Aper.]

L. Arruntĭus. 1. Proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, but escaped to Sext. Pompey in Sicily, and was restored to the state with Pompey. He subsequently commanded the left wing of the fleet of Octavianus at the battle of Actium, 31, and was consul in 22. — 2. Son of the preceding, consul A. D. 6. Augustus declared in his last illness, that Arruntius was not unworthy of the empire, and would have boldness enough to seize it, if an opportunity presented. This rendered him an object of suspicion to Tiberius. He was charged in A. D. 37, as an accomplice in the crimes of Albucilla, and put an end to his own life.

Arsa (Azunga), a town in Hispania Baetica.

Arsăces (Ἀρσάκης), the name of the founder of the Parthian empire, which was also borne by all his successors, who were hence called the Arsacidae. 1. He was of obscure origin, and seems to have come from the neighbourhood of the Ochus. He induced the Parthians to revolt from the Syrian empire of the Seleucidae, and he became the first monarch of the Parthians. This event probably took place about B. C. 250, in the reign of Antiochus II.; but the history of the revolt, as well as of the events which immediately followed, is stated very differently by different historians. Arsaces reigned only 2 years, and was succeeded by his brother Tiridates. — 2. Tiridātes, reigned 37 years, B. C. 248—211, and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the successor of Antiochus II. — 3. Artabānus I., son of the preceding, was attacked by Antiochus III. (the Great), who, however, was unable to subdue his country, and at length recognised him as king, about 210. — 4. Priapatius, son of the preceding, reigned 15 years, and left 3 sons, Phraates, Mithridates, and Artabanus. — 5. Phraātes I., subdued the Mardi, and, though he had many sons, left the kingdom to his brother Mithridates. — 6. Mithridātes I., son of Arsaces IV., greatly enlarged the Parthian empire by his conquests. He defeated Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, and took him prisoner in 138. Mithridates treated Demetrius with respect, and gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Mithridates died during the captivity of Demetrius, between 138 and 130. — 7. Phraātes II., son of the preceding, carried on war against Antiochus VII. Sidetes, whom Phraates defeated and slew in battle, B. C. 128. Phraates himself was shortly after killed in battle by the Scythians, who had been invited by Antiochus to assist him against Phraates, but who did not arrive till after the fall of the former. — 8. Artabānus II., youngest brother of Arsaces VI., and youngest son of Arsaces IV., fell in battle against the Thogarii or Tochari, apparently after a short reign. — 9. Mithridātes II., son of the preceding, prosecuted many wars with success, and added many nations to the Parthian empire, whence he obtained the surname of Great. It was in his reign that the Romans first had any official communication with Parthia. Mithridates sent an ambassador to Sulla, who had come into Asia B. C. 92, and requested alliance with the Romans. — 10. (Mnascires?) Nothing is known of the successor of Arsaces IX. Even his name is uncertain. — 11. Sanatroces, reigned 7 years, and died about B.C. 70. — 12. Phraātes III., son of the preceding. He lived at the time of the war between the Romans and Mithridates of Pontus, by both of whom he was courted. He contracted an alliance with the Romans, but he took no part in the war. At a later period misunderstandings arose between Pompey and Phraates, but Pompey thought it more prudent to avoid a war with the Parthians, although Phraates had invaded Armenia, and Tigranes, the Armenian king, implored Pompey's assistance. Phraates was murdered soon afterwards by his 2 sons, Mithridates and Orodes. — 13. Mithridātes III., son of the preceding, succeeded his father during the Armenian war. On his return from Armenia, Mithridates was expelled from the throne, on account of his cruelty, and was succeeded by his brother Orodes. Mithridates afterwards made war upon his brother, but was taken prisoner and put to death. — 14. Orōdes I., brother of the preceding, was the Parthian king, whose general Surenas defeated Crassus and the Romans, B. C. 53. [Crassus.] After the death of Crassus,

Orodes gave the command of the army to his son Pacorus, who entered Syria in 51 with a small force, but was driven back by Cassius. In 50 Pacorus again crossed the Euphrates with a much larger army, and advanced as far as Antioch, but was defeated near Antigonēa by Cassius. The Parthians now remained quiet for some years. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates again, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus, the son of T. Labienus. They overran Syria and part of Asia Minor, but were defeated in 39 by Ventidius Bassus, one of Antony's legates: Labienus was slain in the flight, and the Parthians retired to their own dominions. In 38, Pacorus again invaded Syria, but was completely defeated and fell in the battle. This defeat was a severe blow to the aged king Orodes, who shortly afterwards surrendered the crown to his son, Phraates, during his life-time. — 15. Phraātes IV., commenced his reign by murdering his father, his 30 brothers, and his own son, who was grown up, that there might be none of the royal family whom the Parthians could place upon the throne in his stead. In consequence of his cruelty many of the Parthian nobles fled to Antony (37), who invaded Parthia in 36, but was obliged to retreat after losing a great part of his army. A few years afterwards the cruelties of Phraates produced a rebellion against him; he was driven out of the country, and Tiridates proclaimed king in his stead. Phraates, however, was soon restored by the Scythians, and Tiridates fled to Augustus, carrying with him the youngest son of Phraates. Augustus restored his son to Phraates, on condition of his surrendering the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the war with Crassus and Antony. They were given up in 20: their restoration caused universal joy at Rome, and was celebrated not only by the poets, but by festivals and commemorative monuments. Phraates also sent to Augustus as hostages his 4 sons, with their wives and children, who were carried to Rome. In A. D. 2, Phraates was poisoned by his wife Thermusa, and her son Phraataces. — 16. Phraataces, reigned only a short time, as he was expelled by his subjects on account of his crimes. The Parthian nobles then elected as king Orodes, who was of the family of the Arsacidae. — 17. Orōdes II., also reigned only a short time, as he was killed by the Parthians on account of his cruelty. Upon his death the Parthians applied to the Romans for Vonones, one of the sons of Phraates IV., who was accordingly granted to them. — 18. Vonōnes I., son of Phraates IV., was also disliked by his subjects, who therefore invited Artabanus, king of Media, to take possession of the kingdom. Artabanus drove Vonones out of Parthia, who resided first in Armenia, next in Syria, and subsequently in Cilicia. He was put to death in A. D. 19, according to some accounts by order of Tiberius on account of his great wealth. — 19. Artabānus III., obtained the Parthian kingdom soon after the expulsion of Vonones, about A. D. 16. Artabanus placed Arsaces, one of his sons, over Armenia, and assumed a hostile attitude towards the Romans. His subjects, whom he oppressed, despatched an embassy to Tiberius to beg him to send to Parthia Phraates, one of the sons of Phraates IV. Tiberius willingly complied with the request; but Phraates upon arriving in Syria was carried off by a disease, A. D. 35. As soon as Tiberius heard of his death, he set up Tiridates, another of the Arsacidae, as a claimant to the Parthian throne: Artabanus was obliged to leave his kingdom, and to fly for refuge to the Hyrcanians and Carmanians. Hereupon Vitellius, the governor of Syria, crossed the Euphrates, and placed Tiridates on the throne. Artabanus was, however, recalled next year (36) by his fickle subjects. He was once more expelled by his subjects, and once more restored. He died soon after his last restoration, leaving two sons, Bardanes and Gotarzes, whose civil wars are related differently by Josephus and Tacitus. — 20. Gotarzes, succeeded his father, Artabanus III., but was defeated by his brother Bardanes and retired into Hyrcania. — 21. Bardanes, brother of the preceding, was put to death by his subjects in 47, whereupon Gotarzes again obtained the crown. But as he ruled with cruelty, the Parthians secretly begged the emperor Claudius to send them from Rome Meherdates, grandson of Phraates IV. . Claudius complied with their request, and commanded the governor of Syria to assist Meherdates, but the latter was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes. — 22. Vonōnes II., succeeded Gotarzes about 50. His reign was short. — 23. Vologēses I., son of Vonones II. or Artabanus III. Soon after his accession, he conquered Armenia, which he gave to his brother Tiridates. In 55 he gave up Armenia to the Romans, but in 58 he again placed his brother over Armenia and declared war against the Romans. This war terminated in favour of the Romans: the Parthians were repeatedly defeated by Domitius Corbulo, and Tiridates was driven out of Armenia. At length, in 62, peace was concluded between Vologeses and the Romans on condition that Nero would surrender Armenia to Tiridates, provided the latter would come to Rome and receive it as a gift from the Roman emperor. Tiridates came to Rome in 63, where he was received with extraordinary splendour, and obtained from Nero the Armenian crown. Vologeses afterwards maintained friendly relations with Vespasian, and seems to have lived till the reign of Domitian. — 24. Pacŏrus, succeeded his father, Vologeses I., and was a contemporary of Domitian and Trajan. — 25. Chosrōes or Osrōes, succeeded his brother Pacorus during the reign of Trajan. His conquest of Armenia occasioned the invasion of Parthia by Trajan, who stripped it of many of its provinces, and made the Parthians for a time subject to Rome. [TRAJANUS.] Upon the death of Trajan in A. D. 117, the Parthians expelled Parthamaspates whom Trajan had placed upon the throne, and recalled their former king, Chosroes. Hadrian relinquished the conquests of Trajan, and made the Euphrates, as before, the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. Chosroes died during the reign of Hadrian. — 26. Vologēses II., succeeded his father Chosroes, and reigned from about 122 to 149. — 27. Vologēses III., began to reign in 149. He invaded Syria in 162, but the generals of the emperor Verus drove him back into his own dominions, invaded Mesopotamia and Assyria, and took Seleucia and Ctesiphon; and Vologeses was obliged to purchase peace by ceding Mesopotamia to the Romans. From this time to the downfall of the Parthian empire, there is great confusion in the list of kings. — 28. Vologēses IV., probably ascended the throne in the reign of Commodus. His dominions were invaded by Septimius Severus, who took Ctesiphon in 199. On the death of Vologeses IV., at the beginning of the reign of Caracalla, Parthia was torn asunder by contests for the crown between the sons of Vologeses. — 29. Vologēses V., son of Vologeses IV., was attacked by Caracalla in 215, and about the same time was dethroned by his brother Artabanus. — 30. Artabānus IV., the last king of Parthia. The war commenced by Caracalla against Vologeses, was continued against Artabanus; but Macrinus, the successor of Caracalla, concluded peace with the Parthians. In this war Artabanus had lost the best of his troops, and the Persians seized the opportunity of recovering their long-lost independence. They were led by Artaxerxes (Ardshir), the son of Sassan, and defeated the Parthians in three great battles, in the last of which Artabanus was taken prisoner and killed, A. D. 226. Thus ended the Parthian empire of the Arsacidae, after it had existed 476 years. The Parthians were now obliged to submit to Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidae, which continued to reign till A. D. 651.

Arsacĭa (Ἀρσακία: Ru. S.E. of Teheran), a great city of Media, S. of the Caspiae Portae, originally named Rhagae (Ῥαγαί); rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator, and called Europus (Εὔρωπός); again destroyed in the Parthian Wars and rebuilt by Arsaces, who named it after himself.

Arsacĭdae, the name of a dynasty of Parthian kings. [ARSACES.] It was also the name of a dynasty of Armenian kings, who reigned in Armenia from B. C. 149 to A. D. 428. This dynasty was founded by ARTAXIAS I., who was related to the Parthian Arsacidae.

Arsamōsătă (Ἀρσαμώσατα, also wrongly abbrev. Ἀρμώσατα: Shemshat), a town and strong fortress in Armenia Major, between the Euphrates and the sources of the Tigris, near the most frequented pass of the Taurus.

Arsanĭas, -ius, or -us (Ἀρσανίας, &c.), the name of two rivers of Great Armenia. — 1. (Murad), the S. arm of the Euphrates. [ARMENIA.] — 2. (Arslan ?), a small stream rising near the sources of the Tigris, and flowing W. into the Euphrates near Melitene.

Arsēnārĭa, or -enn- (Ἀρσηναρία: Arzaw, Ru.), a town in Mauretania Caesariensis, 3 miles (Rom.) from the sea: a Roman colony.

Arsēnē. [ARZANENE.]

Arses, Narses, or Oarses (Ἄρσης, Νάρσης, or Οάρσης), youngest son of king Artaxerxes III. Ochus, was raised to the Persian throne by the eunuch Bagoas after he had poisoned Artaxerxes, B. C. 339, but he was murdered by Bagoas in the 3rd year of his reign, when he attempted to free himself from the bondage in which he was kept. After the death of Arses, Bagoas made Darius III. king.

Arsĭa (Arsa), a river in Istria, forming the boundary between Upper Italy and Illyricum, with a town of the same name upon it.

Arsĭa Silva, a wood in Etruria celebrated for the battle between the Tarquins and the Romans.

Arsĭnŏē (Ἀρσινόη). I. Mythological. 1. Daughter of Phegeus, and wife of Alcmaeon. As she disapproved of the murder of Alcmaeon, the sons of Phegeus put her into a chest and carried her to Agapenor at Tegea, where they accused her of having killed Alcmaeon. [ALCMAEON, AGENOR.] — 2. Nurse of Orestes, saved the latter from the hands of Clytemnestra, and carried him to Strophius, father of Pylades. Some accounts call her Laodamīa. — 3. Daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, became by Apollo mother of Eriopis and Aesculapius. — II. Historical. 1. Mother of Ptolemy I., was a concubine of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and married Lagus, while she was pregnant with Ptolemy. — 2. Daughter of Ptolemy I. and Berenice, married Lysimachus, king of Thrace, in B. C. 300; after the death of Lysimachus in 281, she married her half-brother, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who murdered her children by Lysimachus; and, lastly, in 279, she married her own brother Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. Though Arsinoë bore Ptolemy no children, she was exceedingly beloved by him; he gave her name to several cities, called a district (νομός) of Egypt Arsinoïtes after her, and honoured her memory in various ways. — 3. Daughter of Lysimachus, married Ptolemy II. Philadelphus soon after his accession, B. C. 285. In consequence of her plotting against her namesake [No. 2], when Ptolemy fell in love with her, she was banished to Coptos in Upper Egypt. She had by Ptolemy three children, Ptolemy III. Evergetes, Lysimachus, and Berenice. — 4. Also called Eurydice and Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy III. Evergetes, wife of her brother Ptolemy IV. Philopator, and mother of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes. She was killed by Philammon by order of her husband. — 5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, escaped from Caesar, when he was besieging Alexandria in B. C. 47, and was recognised as queen by the Alexandrians. After the capture of Alexandria she was carried to Rome by Caesar, and led in triumph by him in 46. She was afterwards dismissed by Caesar, and returned to Alexandria; but her sister Cleopatra persuaded Antony to have her put to death in 41.

Arsĭnŏē (Ἀρσινόη: Ἀρσινοεύς, or -οήτης), the name of several cities of the times of the successors of Alexander, each called after one or other of the persons of the same name (see above). — 1. In Aetolia, formerly Κωνώπα. — 2. On the N. coast of Cyprus, on the site of the older city of Marium (Μάριον), which Ptolemy I. had destroyed. — 3 A port on the W. coast of Cyprus. — 4. (Famagosta), on the S.E. coast of Cyprus, between Salamis and Leucolla. — 5. In Cilicia, E. of Anemurium. — 6. (Ajeroud or Suez), in the Nomos Heroöpolites in Lower Egypt, near or upon the head of the Sinus Heroöpolites or W. branch of the Red Sea (Gulf of Suez). It was afterwards called Cleopatris. — 7. (Medinet-el-Faioum, Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Arsinoïtes in the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt [AEGYPTUS, p. 15, b.]; formerly called Crŏcŏdīlŏpŏlis (Κροκοδείλων πόλις), and the district Nomos Crocodilopolites, from its being the chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the crocodile. This nomos also contained the Lake Moeris and the labyrinth. — 8. In Cyrenaica, also called Taucheira. — 9. On the coast of the Troglodytae on the Red Sea, E. of Egypt. Its probable position is a little below the parallel of Thebes. — Some other cities called Arsinoë are better known by other names, such as EPHESUS in Ionia and PATARA in Lycia.

Arsissa or Mantiāna (Ἀρσίσσα, ἡ Μαντιανή: Van), a great lake, abounding in fish, in the S. of Armenia Major. [ARMENIA.]

Artabānus (Ἀρτάβανος). 1. Son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius, is frequently mentioned in the reign of his nephew Xerxes, as a wise and frank counsellor. — 2. An Hyrcanian, commander of the body-guard of Xerxes, assassinated this king in B. C. 465, with the view of setting himself upon the throne of Persia, but was shortly afterwards killed by Artaxerxes.—3. I. II. III. IV., kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, III. VIII. XIX. XXXI.]

Artabāzus (Ἀρτάβαζος). 1. A Mede, acts a prominent part in Xenophon's account of Cyrus the Elder.—2. A distinguished Persian, a son of Pharnaces, commanded the Parthians and Choasmians, in the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, B. C. 480. He served under Mardonius in 479, and after the defeat of the Persians at Plataea, he fled with 40,000 men, and reached Asia in safety.—3. A general of Artaxerxes I., fought against Inarus in Egypt, B. C. 462.—4. A Persian general, fought under Artaxerxes II., against Datames, satrap of Cappadocia, B. C. 362. Under Artaxerxes III., Artabazus, who was then satrap of W. Asia, revolted in B. C. 356, but was defeated and obliged to take refuge with Philip of Macedonia. He was afterwards pardoned by Artaxerxes, and returned to Persia; and he was one of the most faithful adherents of Darius III. Codomannus, who raised him to high honours. On the death of Darius (330) Artabazus received from Alexander the satrapy of Bactria. One of his daughters, Barsine, became by Alexander the mother of Hercules; a second, Artocama, married Ptolemy son of Lagus; and a third, Artonis, married Eumenes.

Artabri, afterwards Arotrĕbae, a Celtic people in the N. W. of Spain, near the Promontory Nerium or Celticum, also called Artabrum after them (C. Finisterre).

Artacē (Ἀρτάκη: Artaki), a sea-port town of the peninsula of Cyzicus, in the Propontis: also a mountain in the same peninsula.

Artachaees (Ἀρταχαίης), a distinguished Persian in the army of Xerxes, died while Xerxes was at Athos. The mound which the king raised over him is still in existence.

Artăcŏānă (Ἀρτακόανα, or -κάννα: Sekhvan ?), the ancient capital of ARIA, not far from the site of the later capital, ALEXANDRIA.

Artaei (Ἀρταῖοι), was, according to Herodotus (vi. 61), the old native name of the Persians. It signifies noble, and appears, in the form Αρτα, as the first part of a large number of Persian proper names. [Comp. ARII.]

Artānes (Ἀρτάνης). 1. A river in Thrace, falling into the Ister.—2. A river in Bithynia.

Artaphernes (Ἀρταφέρνης). 1. Son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius. He was satrap of Sardis at the time of the Ionian revolt, B. C. 500. See ARISTAGORAS.—2. Son of the former, commanded, along with Datis, the Persian army of Darius, which was defeated at the battle of Marathon, B. C. 490. Artaphernes commanded the Lydians and Mysians in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes in 480.

Artaunum (Salburg near Homburg ?), a Roman fortress in Germany on M. Taunus, built by Drusus and restored by Germanicus.

Artavasdes (Ἀρταουάσδης or Ἀρταβάσδης) or Artabāzes (Ἀρταβάζης). 1. King of the Greater Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes. In the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, B. C. 54, Artavasdes was an ally of the Romans; but after the defeat of the latter, he concluded a peace with the Parthian king. In 36 he joined Antony in his campaign against the Parthians, and persuaded him to invade Media, because he was at enmity with his namesake Artavasdes, king of Media; but he treacherously deserted Antony in the middle of the campaign. Antony accordingly invaded Armenia in 34, contrived to entice Artavasdes into his camp, where he was immediately seized, carried him to Alexandria, and led him in triumph. He remained in captivity till 30, when Cleopatra had him killed after the battle of Actium, and sent his head to his old enemy, Artavasdes of Media, in hopes of obtaining assistance from the latter. This Artavasdes was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote tragedies, speeches, and historical works. —2. King of Armenia, probably a grandson of No. 1, was placed upon the throne by Augustus, but was deposed by the Armenians.—3. King of Media Atropatene, and an enemy of Artavasdes I., king of Armenia. Antony invaded his country in 36, at the instigation of the Armenian king, but he was obliged to retire with great loss. Artavasdes afterwards concluded a peace with Antony, and gave his daughter Iotape in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. Artavasdes was subsequently engaged in wars with the Parthians and Armenians. He died shortly before 20.

Artaxăta or -ae (τὰ Ἀρτάξατα, or -ξίατα: Ru. above Nakshivan), the later capital of Great Armenia, built by ARTAXIAS, under the advice of Hannibal, on a peninsula, surrounded by the river Araxes. After being burnt by the Romans under Corbulo (A. D. 58), it was restored by Tiridates, and called Neroniana. It was still standing in the 4th century.

Artaxerxes or Artoxerxes (Ἀρταξέρξης or Ἀρτοξέρξης), the name of 4 Persian kings, is compounded of Arta, which means "honoured," and Xerxes, which is the same as the Zend, ksathra, "a king:" consequently Artaxerxes means "the honoured king."—1. Surnamed Longĭmānus, from the circumstance of his right hand being longer than his left, reigned B. C. 465—425. He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I., had been murdered by Artabanus, and after he himself had put to death his brother Darius on the instigation of Artabanus. His reign was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps. The Egyptians also revolted in 460, under Inarus, who was supported by the Athenians. The first army which Artaxerxes sent under his brother Achaemenes was defeated and Achaemenes slain. The second army which he sent, under Artabazus and Megabyzus, was more successful. Inarus was defeated in 456 or 455, but Amyrtaeus, another chief of the insurgents, maintained himself in the marshes of Lower Egypt. At a later period (449) the Athenians under Cimon sent assistance to Amyrtaeus; and even after the death of Cimon, the Athenians gained two victories over the Persians, one by land and the other by sea, in the neighbourhood of Salamis in Cyprus. After this defeat Artaxerxes is said to have concluded peace with the Greeks on terms very advantageous to the latter. Artaxerxes was succeeded by his son Xerxes II.—2. Surnamed Mnēmon, from his good memory, succeeded his father, Darius II., and reigned B. C. 405—359. Cyrus, the younger brother of Artaxerxes, who was satrap of W. Asia, revolted against his brother, and, supported by Greek mercenaries, invaded Upper Asia. In the neighbourhood of Cunaxa, near Babylon, a battle was fought between the armies of the two brothers, in which Cyrus fell, B. C. 401. [CYRUS.] Tissaphernes was appointed satrap of

W. Asia in the place of Cyrus, and was actively engaged in wars with the Greeks. [THIMBRON; DERCYLLIDAS; AGESILAUS.] Notwithstanding these perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself by the disunion among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented and kept up by Persian money. The peace of Antalcidas, in B. C. 388, gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they had possessed before. [ANTALCIDAS.] But the empire was suffering from internal disturbances, and Artaxerxes had to carry on frequent wars with tributary princes and satraps, who endeavoured to make themselves independent. Thus he maintained a long struggle against Evagoras of Cyprus, from 385 to 376; he also had to carry on war against the Cardusians, on the shores of the Caspian sea; and his attempts to recover Egypt were unsuccessful. Towards the end of his reign he put to death his eldest son Darius, who had formed a plot to assassinate him. His last days were still further embittered by the unnatural conduct of his son Ochus, who caused the destruction of two of his brothers, in order to secure the succession for himself. Artaxerxes was succeeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne under the name of Artaxerxes III. — 3. Also called Ochus, reigned B. C. 359—338. In order to secure his throne, he began his reign with a merciless extirpation of the members of his family. He himself was a cowardly and reckless despot; and the great advantages which the Persian arms gained during his reign, were owing only to his Greek generals and mercenaries. These advantages consisted in the conquest of the revolted satrap Artabazus [ARTABAZUS, No. 4], and in the reduction of Phoenicia, of several revolted towns in Cyprus, and of Egypt, 350. The reins of government were entirely in the hands of the eunuch Bagoas, and of Mentor the Rhodian. At last he was poisoned by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son, ARSES. — 4. The founder of the dynasty of the SASSANIDAE.

Artaxias (Ἀρταξίας) or Artaxes (Ἀρτάξης), the name of 3 kings of Armenia. — 1. The founder of the Armenian kingdom, was one of the generals of Antiochus the Great, but revolted from him about B. C. 188, and became an independent sovereign. Hannibal took refuge at the court of Artaxias, and he superintended the building of ARTAXATA, the capital of Armenia. Artaxias was conquered and taken prisoner by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, about 165. — 2. Son of Artavasdes, was made king by the Armenians when his father was taken prisoner by Antony in 34. In 20 Augustus, at the request of the Armenians, sent Tiberius into Armenia, in order to depose Artaxias and place Tigranes on the throne, but Artaxias was put to death before Tiberius reached the country. Tiberius, however, took the credit to himself of a successful expedition: whence Horace (Epist. i. 12. 26) says, Claudi virtute Neronis Armenius cecidit. — 3. Son of Polemon, king of Pontus, was proclaimed king of Armenia by Germanicus, in A. D. 18. He died about 35.

Artayctes (Ἀρταΰκτης), Persian governor of Sestus on the Hellespont, when the town was taken by the Greeks in B. C. 478, met with an ignominious death on account of the sacrilegious acts which he had committed against the tomb of the hero Protesilaus.

Artĕmīdōrus (Ἀρτεμίδωρος). 1. Surnamed Aristophanius, from his being a disciple of the celebrated grammarian Aristophanes, was himself a grammarian, and the author of several works now lost. — 2. Of Cnidus, a friend of Julius Caesar, was a rhetorician, and taught the Greek language at Rome. — 3. Daldianus, a native of Ephesus, but called Daldianus, from Daldis in Lydia, his mother's birth-place, to distinguish him from the geographer Artemidorus. He lived at Rome in the reigns of Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius (A. D. 138—180), and wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams (Ὀνειροκριτικά), in 5 books, which is still extant. The object of the work is to prove, that the future is revealed to man in dreams, and to clear the science of interpreting them from the abuses with which the fashion of the time had surrounded it. The style is simple, correct, and elegant. The best edition is by Reiff, Lips. 1805. — 4. Of Ephesus, a Greek geographer, lived about B. C. 100. He made voyages round the coasts of the Mediterranean, in the Red Sea, and apparently even in the S. ocean. He also visited Iberia and Gaul. The work, in which he gave the results of his investigations, consisted of 11 books, of which Marcianus afterwards made an abridgement. The original work is lost; but we possess fragments of Marcianus' abridgement, which contain the periplus of the Pontus Euxinus, and accounts of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. These fragments are printed in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i.

Artĕmis (Ἄρτεμις), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. According to the most ancient account, she was the daughter of Zeus and Leto, and the twin-sister of Apollo, born with him in the island of Delos. She was regarded in various points of view by the Greeks, which must be carefully distinguished. — 1. Artemis as the sister of Apollo, is a kind of female Apollo, that is, she as a female divinity represented the same idea that Apollo did as a male divinity. As sister of Apollo, Artemis is like her brother armed with a bow, quiver, and arrows, and sends plagues and death among men and animals. Sudden deaths, but more especially those of women, are described as the effect of her arrows. As Apollo was not only a destructive god, but also averted evils, so Artemis likewise cured and alleviated the sufferings of mortals. In the Trojan war she sided, like Apollo, with the Trojans. She was more especially the protectress of the young; and from her watching over the young of females, she came to be regarded as the goddess of the flocks and the chase. In this manner she also became the huntress among the immortals. Artemis, like Apollo, is unmarried; she is a maiden-divinity never conquered by love. She slew ORION with her arrows, according to one account, because he made an attempt upon her chastity; and she changed ACTAEON into a stag, simply because he had seen her bathing. With her brother Apollo, she slew the children of NIOBE, who had deemed herself superior to Leto. When Apollo was regarded as identical with the sun or Helios, nothing was more natural than that his sister should be regarded as Selene or the moon, and accordingly the Greek Artemis is, at least in later times, the goddess of the moon. Hence Artemis is represented in love with the fair youth ENDYMION, whom she kissed in his sleep, but this legend properly relates to Selene or the Moon, and is foreign to the character of Artemis, who, as we have observed, was a goddess unmoved by love. — 2. The Arcadian Artemis is a goddess of the nymphs, and was worshipped as such in Arcadia in very early times. She hunted with her nymphs on the Arcadian mountains, and her chariot was drawn by 4 stags with golden antlers. There was no connection between the Arcadian Artemis and Apollo. — 3. The Taurian Artemis. The worship of this goddess was connected, at least in early times, with human sacrifices. According to the Greek legend there was in Tauris a goddess, whom the Greeks for some reason identified with their own Artemis, and to whom all strangers thrown on the coast of Tauris were sacrificed. Iphigenīa and Orestes brought her image from thence, and landed at Brauron in Attica, whence the goddess derived the name of Brauronia. The Brauronian Artemis was worshipped at Athens and Sparta, and in the latter place the boys were scourged at her altar till it was besprinkled with their blood. This cruel ceremony was believed to have been introduced by Lycurgus, instead of the human sacrifices which had until then been offered to her. Iphigenia, who was at first to have been sacrificed to Artemis, and who then became her priestess, was afterwards identified with the goddess, who was worshipped in some parts of Greece, as at Hermione, under the name of Iphigenia. Some traditions stated that Artemis made Iphigenia immortal, in the character of Hecate, the goddess of the moon. — 4. The Ephesian Artemis, was a divinity totally distinct from the Greek goddess of the same name. She seems to have been the personification of the fructifying and all-nourishing powers of nature. She was an ancient Asiatic divinity whose worship the Greeks found established in Ionia, when they settled there, and to whom they gave the name of Artemis. Her original character is sufficiently clear from the fact, that her priests were eunuchs, and that her image in the magnificent temple of Ephesus represented her with many breasts (πολυμαστὸς). The representations of the Greek Artemis in works of art are different according as she is represented either as a huntress, or as the goddess of the moon. As the huntress, she is tall, nimble, and has small hips; her forehead is high, her eyes glancing freely about, and her hair tied up, with a few locks floating down her neck; her breast is covered, and the legs up to the knees are naked, the rest being covered by the chlamys. Her attributes are the bow, quiver, and arrows, or a spear, stags, and dogs. As the goddess of the moon, she wears a long robe which reaches down to her feet, a veil covers her head, and above her forehead rises the crescent of the moon. In her hand she often appears holding a torch. The Romans identified their goddess DIANA with the Greek Artemis.

Artĕmĭsĭa (Ἀρτεμισία). 1. Daughter of Lygdamis, and queen of Halicarnassus in Caria, accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, with 5 ships, and in the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480) greatly distinguished herself by her prudence and courage, for which she was afterwards highly honoured by the Persian king. — 2. Daughter of Hecatomnus, and sister, wife, and successor of the Carian prince Mausolus, reigned B.C. 352—350. She is renowned in history for her extraordinary grief at the death of her husband Mausolus. She is said to have mixed his ashes in her daily drink; and to perpetuate his memory she built at Halicarnassus the celebrated monument, Mausoleum, which was regarded as one of the 7 wonders of the world, and whose name subsequently became the generic term for any splendid sepulchral monument.

Artĕmĭsĭum (Ἀρτεμίσιον), properly a temple of Artemis. 1. A tract of country on the N. coast of Euboea, opposite Magnesia, so called from the temple of Artemis belonging to the town of Hestiaea: off this coast the Greeks defeated the fleet of Xerxes, B.C. 480. — 2. A promontory of Caria near the gulf Glaucus, so called from the temple of Artemis in its neighbourhood.

Artĕmīta (Ἀρτεμίτα). — 1. (Shereban?) a city on the Sillas, in the district of Apolloniatis in Assyria. — 2. A city of Great Armenia, S. of the lake Arsissa.

Artĕmōn (Ἀρτέμων), a Lacedaemonian, built the military engines for Pericles in his war against Samos in B.C. 441. — There were also several writers of this name, whose works are lost.

M. Artōrĭus, a physician at Rome, was the friend and physician of Augustus, whom he attended in his campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. He was drowned at sea shortly after the battle of Actium, 31.

Arverni, a Gallic people in Aquitania in the country of the M. Cebenna, in the modern Auvergne. In early times they were the most powerful people in the S. of Gaul: they were defeated by Domitius Ahenobarbus and Fabius Maximus in B.C. 121, but still possessed considerable power in the time of Caesar (58). Their capital was Nemossus, also named Augustonemetum or Arverni on the Elăver (Allier), with a citadel, called at least in the middle ages Clarus Mons, whence the name of the modern town, Clermont.

Arvīna, a cognomen of the Cornelia gens, borne by several of the Cornelii, of whom the most important was A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina, consul B.C. 343 and 322, and dictator 320. He commanded the Roman armies against the Samnites, whom he defeated in several battles.

Aruns, an Etruscan word, was regarded by the Romans as a proper name, but perhaps signified a younger son in general. — 1. Younger brother of Lucumo, i. e. L. Tarquinius Priscus. — 2. Younger brother of L. Tarquinius Superbus, was murdered by his wife. — 3. Younger son of Tarquinius Superbus, fell in combat with Brutus. — 4. Son of Porsena, fell in battle before Aricia. — 5. Of Clusium, invited the Gauls across the Alps.

Aruntĭus. [ARRUNTIUS.]

Arusiānus, Messus or Messĭus, a Roman grammarian, lived about A.D. 450, and wrote a Latin phrase-book, entitled Quadriga, vel Exempla Elocutionum ex Virgilio, Sallustio, Terentio, et Cicerone per literas digesta. It is called Quadriga from its being composed from 4 authors. The best edition is by Lindemann, in his Corpus Grammaticorum Latin. vol. i. p. 199.

Arxăta (Ἀρξάτα: Nakshivan), the capital of Great Armenia, before the building of Artaxata, lay lower down upon the Araxes, on the confines of Media.

Aryandes (Ἀρυάνδης), a Persian, who was appointed by Cambyses governor of Egypt, but was put to death by Darius, because he coined silver money of the purest metal, in imitation of the gold money of that monarch.

Arycanda (Ἀρύκανδα), a small town of Lycia, E. of Xanthus, on the river Arycandus, a tributary of the Limyrus.

Arzānēne (Ἀρζανηνή), a district of Armenia Major, bounded on the S. by the Tigris, on the W. by the Nymphius, and containing in it the lake Arsēne (Ἀρσηνή: Erzen). It formed part of Gordyene.

Arzēn or -ēs, or Atrauutzin (Ἀρζήν, Ἄρζες, Ἀτράνουτζιν: Erzeroum), a strong fortress in Great Armenia, near the sources of the Euphrates and the Araxes, founded in the 5th century.

Asaei (Ἀσαῖοι), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, near the mouth of the Tanaïs (Don).

Asander (Ἄσανδρος). 1. Son of Philotas, brother of Parmenion, and one of the generals of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander in 323 he obtained Caria for his satrapy, and took an active part in the wars which followed. He joined Ptolemy and Cassander in their league against Antigonus, but was defeated by Antigonus in 313. — 2. A general of Pharnaces II., king of Bosporus. He put Pharnaces to death in 47, after the defeat of the latter by Julius Caesar, in hopes of obtaining the kingdom. But Caesar conferred the kingdom upon Mithridates of Pergamus, with whom Asander carried on war. Augustus afterwards confirmed Asander in the sovereignty.

Asbystae (Ἀσβύσται), a Libyan people, in the N. of Cyrenaica. Their country was called Ἀσβυστίς.

Asca (Ἄσκα), a city of Arabia Felix.

Ascalăbus, son of Misme, respecting whom the same story is told, which we also find related of Abas, son of Metanīra. [Abas. No. 1.]

Ascalăphus (Ἀσκάλαφος). 1. Son of Ares and Astyoche, led, with his brother Ialmenus, the Minyans of Orchomenos against Troy, and was slain by Deïphobus. — 2. Son of Acheron and Gorgyra or Orphne. When Persephone was in the lower world, and Pluto gave her permission to return to the upper, provided she had not eaten anything, Ascalaphus declared that she had eaten part of a pomegranate. Demeter punished him by burying him under a huge stone, and when this stone was subsequently removed by Hercules, Persephone changed him into an owl (ἀσκάλαφος), by sprinkling him with water from the river Phlegethon.

Ascălon (Ἀσκάλων: Ἀσκαλωνείτης: Askalân), one of the chief cities of the Philistines, on the coast of Palestine, between Azotus and Gaza.

Ascānia (ἡ Ἀσκανία λίμνη). 1. (Lake of Iznik), in Bithynia, a great fresh-water lake, at the E. end of which stood the city of Nicaea (Iznik). The surrounding district was also called Ascania. — 2. (Lake of Burdur), a salt-water lake on the borders of Phrygia and Pisidia, which supplied the neighbouring country with salt.

Ascānius (Ἀσκάνιος), son of Aeneas by Creusa. According to some traditions, Ascanius remained in Asia after the fall of Troy, and reigned either at Troy itself or at some other town in the neighbourhood. According to other accounts he accompanied his father to Italy. Other traditions again gave the name of Ascanius to the son of Aeneas and Lavinia. Livy states that on the death of his father Ascanius was too young to undertake the government, and that after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Lavinium in the hands of his mother, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. Some writers relate that Ascanius was also called Ilus or Julus. The gens Julia at Rome traced its origin from Iulus or Ascanius.

Ascĭburgĭum (Asburg near Mörs), an ancient place on the left bank of the Rhine, founded, according to fable, by Ulysses.

Ascĭi (ἄσκιοι, i. e. shadowless), a term applied to the people living about the Equator, between the tropics, who have, at certain times of the year, the sun in their zenith at noon, when consequently erect objects can cast no shadow.

Asclēpĭădae, the reputed descendants of Aesculapius. [Aesculapius.]

Asclēpĭădes (Ἀσκληπιάδης). 1. A lyric poet, who is said to have invented the metre called after him (Metrum Asclepiadēum), but of whose life no particulars are recorded. — 2. Of Tragilus in Thrace, a contemporary and disciple of Isocrates, about B. C. 360, wrote a work called Τραγῳδούμενα in 6 books, being an explanation of the subjects of the Greek tragedies. — 3. Of Myrlēa in Bithynia, in the middle of the first century B. C., wrote several grammatical works. — 4. There were a great many physicians of this name, the most celebrated of whom was a native of Bithynia, who came to Rome in the middle of the first century B. C., where he acquired a great reputation by his successful cures. Nothing remains of his writings but a few fragments published by Gumpert, Asclepiadis Bithyni Fragmenta, Vinar. 1794.

Asclēpĭŏdōrus (Ἀσκληπιόδωρος). 1. A general of Alexander the Great, afterwards made satrap of Persia by Antigonus, B. C. 317. — 2. A celebrated Athenian painter, a contemporary of Apelles.

Asclēpĭus. [Aesculapius.]

Q. Ascōnĭus Pediānus, a Roman grammarian, born at Patavium (Padua), about B. C. 2, lost his sight in his 73rd year in the reign of Vespasian, and died in his 85th year in the reign of Domitian. His most important work was a Commentary on the speeches of Cicero, and we still possess fragments of his Commentaries on the Divinatio, the first 2 speeches against Verres, and a portion of the third, the speeches for Cornelius (i. ii.), the speech In toga candida, for Scaurus, against Piso, and for Milo. They are written in very pure language, and refer chiefly to points of history and antiquities, great pains being bestowed on the illustration of those constitutional forms of the senate, the popular assemblies, and the courts of justice, which were fast falling into oblivion under the empire. This character, however, does not apply to the notes on the Verrine orations, which were probably written by a later grammarian. Edited in the 5th volume of Cicero's works by Orelli and Baiter. There is a valuable essay on Asconius by Madvig, Hafniae, 1828.

Ascordus, a river in Macedonia, which rises in M. Olympus and flows between Agassa and Dium into the Thermaic gulf.

Ascra (Ἄσκρα: Ἀσκραῖος), a town in Boeotia on M. Helicon, where Hesiod resided, who had removed thither with his father from Cyme in Aeolis, and who is therefore called Ascraeus.

Ascŭlum. 1. Picēnum (Asculānus: Ascoli), the chief town of Picenum and a Roman municipium, was destroyed by the Romans in the Social War (B. C. 89), but was afterwards rebuilt. — 2. Apŭlum (Asculīnus: Ascoli di Satriano), a town of Apulia in Daunia on the confines of Samnium, near which the Romans were defeated by Pyrrhus, B. C. 279.

Ascūris (Ezero), a lake in M. Olympus in Perrhaebia in Thessaly, near Lapathus

Asdrŭbal. [HASDRUBAL.]

Asēa (ἡ Ἀσέα), a town in Arcadia, not far from Megalopolis.

Asellĭo, P. Semprōnĭus, tribune of the soldiers under P. Scipio Africanus at Numantia, B. C. 133, wrote a Roman history from the Punic wars inclusive to the times of the Gracchi.

Asellus, Tib. Claudĭus, a Roman eques, was deprived of his horse by Scipio Africanus Minor, when censor, B. C. 142, and in his tribuneship of the plebs in 139 accused Scipio Africanus before the people.

Asĭa (Ἀσία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Iapetus, and mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. According to some traditions, the continent of Asia derived its name from her.

Asĭa (Ἀσία: Ἀσιεύς, -ιανός, -ιάτης, -ατικός: Asia), also in the poets Asis (ἀσίς), one of the 3 great divisions which the ancients made of the known world. It is doubtful whether the name is of Greek or Eastern origin; but, in either case, it seems to have been first used by the Greeks for the W. part of Asia Minor, especially the plains watered by the river Caÿster, where the Ionian colonists first settled; and thence, as their geographical knowledge advanced, they extended it to the whole country E., N.E., and S.E. The first knowledge which the Greeks possessed of the opposite shores of the Aegean Sea dates before the earliest historical records. The legends respecting the Argonautic and the Trojan expeditions, and other mythical stories, on the one hand, and the allusions to commercial and other intercourse with the people of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, on the other hand, indicate a certain degree of knowledge of the coast from the mouth of the Phasis, at the E. extremity of the Black Sea, to the mouth of the Nile. This knowledge was improved and increased by the colonization of the W., N., and S. coasts of Asia Minor, and by the relations into which these Greek colonies were brought, first with the Lydian, and then with the Persian empires, so that, in the middle of the 5th century B. C., Herodotus was able to give a pretty complete description of the Persian empire, and some imperfect accounts of the parts beyond it; while some knowledge of S. Asia was obtained by way of Egypt; and its N. regions, with their wandering tribes, formed the subject of marvellous stories which the traveller heard from the Greek colonists on the N. shores of the Black Sea. The conquests of Alexander, besides the personal acquaintance which they enabled the Greeks to form with those provinces of the Persian empire hitherto only known to them by report, extended their knowledge over the regions watered by the Indus and its 4 great tributaries (the Punjab and Scinde); the lower course of the Indus and the shores between its mouth and the head of the Persian Gulf were explored by Nearchus; and some further knowledge was gained of the nomad tribes which roamed (as they still do) over the vast steppes of Central Asia by the attempt of Alexander to penetrate on the N.E. beyond the Jaxartes (Sihoun); while, on all points, the Greeks were placed in advanced positions from which to acquire further information, especially at Alexandria, whither voyagers constantly brought accounts of the shores of Arabia and India, as far as the island of Taprobane, and even beyond this, to the Malay peninsula and the coasts of Cochin China. On the E. and N. the wars and commerce of the Greek kingdom of Syria carried Greek knowledge of Asia no further, except in the direction of India to a small extent, but of course more acquaintance was gained with the countries already subdued, until the conquests of the Parthians shut out the Greeks from the country E. of the Tigris-valley; a limit which the Romans, in their turn, were never able to pass. They pushed their arms, however, further N. than the Greeks had done, into the mountains of Armenia, and they gained information of a great caravan route between India and the shores of the Caspian, through Bactria, and of another commercial track leading over Central Asia to the distant regions of the Seres. This brief sketch will show that all the accurate knowledge of the Greeks and Romans respecting Asia was confined to the countries which slope down S.-wards from the great mountain-chain formed by the Caucasus and its prolongation beyond the Caspian to the Himalayas: of the vast elevated steppes between these mountains and the central range of the Altai (from which the N. regions of Siberia again slope down to the Arctic Ocean) they only knew that they were inhabited by nomad tribes, except the country directly N. of Ariana, where the Persian empire had extended beyond the mountain-chain, and where the Greek kingdom of Bactria had been subsequently established. — The notions of the ancients respecting the size and form of Asia were such as might be inferred from what has been stated. Distances computed from the accounts of travellers are always exaggerated; and hence the S. part of the continent was supposed to extend much further to the E. than it really does (about 60° of long. too much, according to Ptolemy), while to the N. and N.E. parts, which were quite unknown, much too small an extent was assigned. However, all the ancient geographers, except Pliny, agreed in considering it the largest of the 3 divisions of the world, and all believed it to be surrounded by the ocean, with the curious exception of Ptolemy, who recurred to the early notion, which we find in the poets, that the E. parts of Asia and the S.E. parts of Africa were united by land which enclosed the Indian Ocean on the E. and S. The different opinions about the boundaries of Asia on the side of Africa are mentioned under AFRICA: on the side of Europe the boundary was formed by the river Tanais (Don), the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azof), Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), Propontis (Sea of Marmora), and the Aegean (Archipelago). — The most general division of Asia was into 2 parts, which were different at different times, and known by different names. To the earliest Greek colonists the river Halys, the E. boundary of the Lydian kingdom, formed a natural division between Upper and Lower Asia (ἡ ἄνω Ἀ., or τὰ ἄνω Ἀσίης, and ἡ κάτω Ἀ., or τὰ κάτω τῆς Ἀσίης, or Ἀ. ἡ ἐντὸς Ἅλυος ποταμοῦ); and afterwards the Euphrates was adopted as a more natural boundary. Another division was made by the Taurus into A. intra Taurum, i. e. the part of Asia N. and N.W. of the Taurus, and A. extra Taurum, all the rest of the continent (Ἀ. ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου, and Ἀ. ἐκτὸς τοῦ Ταύρου). The division ultimately adopted, but apparently not till the 4th century of our era, was that of A. Major and A. Minor. —1. Asia Major (Ἀ. ἡ μεγάλη) was the part of the continent E. of the Tanais, the Euxine, an imaginary line drawn from the Euxine at Trapezus (Trebizond) to the Gulf of Issus, and the Mediterranean: thus it included the countries of Sarmatica Asiatica with all the Scythian tribes to the E., Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Armenia, Syria, Arabia, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persis, Ariana, Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, Sogdiana, India, the land of the Sinae and Serica; respecting which, see the several articles. — 2. Asia Minor (Ἀσία ἡ μικρά: Anatolia), was the peninsula on the extreme W. of Asia, bounded by the Euxine, Aegean, and Mediterranean on the N., W., and S.; and on the E. by the mountains on the W. of the upper course of the Euphrates. It was for the most part a fertile country, intersected with mountains and rivers, abounding in minerals, possessing excellent harbours, and peopled, from the earliest known period, by a variety of tribes from Asia and from Europe. For particulars respecting the country, the reader is referred to the separate articles upon the parts into which it was divided by the later Greeks, namely, Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, on the W., Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia, on the S.; Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, on the E.; and Phrygia, Pisidia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, in the centre: see also the articles TROAS, AEOLIA, IONIA, DORIA, LYCAONIA, PERGAMUS, HALYS, SANGARIUS, TAURUS, &c. — 3. Asia Propria (Ἀ. ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη), or simply Asia, the Roman province, formed out of the kingdom of Pergamus, which was bequeathed to the Romans by ATTALUS III. (B. C. 130), and the Greek cities on the W. coast, and the adjacent islands, with Rhodes. It included the districts of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia; and was governed at first by propraetors, afterwards by proconsuls. Under Constantine the Great, a new division was made, and Asia only extended along the coast from the Prom. Lectum to the mouth of the Maeander.

Asinărus (Ἀσίναρος: Fiume di Noto or Freddo ?), a river on the E. side of Sicily, on which the Athenians were defeated by the Syracusans, B. C. 413: the Syracusans celebrated here an annual festival called Asinaria.

Asĭnē (Ἀσίνη: Ἀσιναῖος). 1. A town in Laconica on the coast between Taenarum and Gythium. — 2. A town in Argolis, W. of Hermione, was built by the Dryopes, who were driven out of the town by the Argives after the first Messenian war, and built No. 3. — 3. (Saratza?), an important town in Messenia, near the Promontory Acritas, on the Messenian gulf, which was hence also called the Asinaean gulf.

Asĭnĭa Gens, plebeian, came from Teate, the chief town of the Marrucini; and the first person of the name mentioned is Herius Asinius, the leader of the Marrucini in the Marsic war, B. C. 90. The Asinii are given under their surnames, GALLUS and POLLIO.

Asĭus (Ἄσιος). 1. Son of Hyrtacus of Arisbe, and father of Acamas and Phaenops, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Idomeneus. — 2. Son of Dymas and brother of Hecuba, whose form Apollo assumed when he roused Hector to fight against Patroclus. — 3. Of Samos, one of the earliest Greek poets, lived probably about B. C. 700. He wrote epic and elegiac poems, which have perished with the exception of a few fragments.

Asmiraea, a district and city of Serica in the N. of Asia, near mountains called Asmiraei Montes, which are supposed to be the Altai range, and the city to be Khamil, in the centre of Chinese Tartary.

Asōpus (Ἀσωπός). 1. (Basilikos), a river in Peloponnesus rises near Phlius, and flows through the Sicyonian territory into the Corinthian gulf. Asopus, the god of this river, was son of Oceanus and Tethys, husband of Metope, and father of Evadne, Euboea, and Aegina, each of whom was therefore called Asopis (Ἀσωπίς). When Zeus carried off Aegina, Aesopus attempted to fight with him, but he was smitten by the thunderbolt of Zeus, and from that time the bed of the river contained pieces of charcoal. By Aegina Asopus became the grandfather of Aeacus, who is therefore called Asopiades. — 2. (Asopo), a river in Boeotia, forms the N. boundary of the territory of Plataeae, flows through the S. of Boeotia, and falls into the Euboean sea near Delphinium in Attica. — 3. A river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, rises in M. Oeta, and flows into the Maliac gulf near Thermopylae. — 4. A river in Phrygia, flows past Laodicēa into the Lycus. — 5. A town in Laconica on the E. side of the Laconian gulf.

Aspadāna (Ἀσπαδάνα: Ispahan?), a town of the district Paraetacene in Persis.

Asparagĭum (Iscarpar), a town in the territory of Dyrrhachium in Illyria.

Aspăsĭa (Ἀσπασία). 1. The elder, of Miletus, daughter of Axiochus, the most celebrated of the Greek Hetaerae (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.), came to reside at Athens, and there gained and fixed the affections of Pericles, not more by her beauty than by her high mental accomplishments. Having parted with his wife, Pericles attached himself to Aspasia during the rest of his life as closely as was allowed by the law, which forbade marriage with a foreign woman under severe penalties. The enemies of Pericles accused Aspasia of impiety (ἀσέβεια), and it required all the personal influence of Pericles, who defended her, and his most earnest entreaties and tears, to procure her acquittal. The house of Aspasia was the centre of the best literary and philosophical society of Athens, and was frequented even by Socrates. On the death of Pericles (B. C. 429), Aspasia is said to have attached herself to one Lysicles, a dealer in cattle, and to have made him by her instructions a first-rate orator. The son of Pericles by Aspasia was legitimated by a special decree of the people, and took his father's name. — 2. The Younger, a Phocaean, daughter of Hermotimus, was the favourite concubine of Cyrus the Younger, who called her Aspasia after the mistress of Pericles, her previous name having been Milto. After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (B. C. 401), she fell into the hands of Artaxerxes, who likewise became deeply enamoured of her. When Darius, son of Artaxerxes, was appointed successor to the throne, he asked his father to surrender Aspasia to him. The request could not be refused as coming from the king elect; Artaxerxes, therefore, gave her up; but he soon after took her away again, and made her a priestess of a temple at Ecbatana, where strict celibacy was requisite.

Aspasĭi. [ASPII.]

Aspasĭus (Ἀσπάσιος). 1. A peripatetic philosopher, lived about A. D. 80, and wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle. A portion of his commentaries on the Nicomachean Ethics is still preserved. — 2. Of Byblus, a Greek sophist, lived about A. D. 180, and wrote commentaries on Demosthenes and Aeschines, of which a few extracts are preserved.

Aspendus (Ἄσπενδος: Ἀσπένδιος, Aspendius: Dashashkehr or Manaugat), a strong and flourishing city of Pamphylia, on the small navigable river Eurymedon, 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) from its mouth: said to have been a colony of the Argives.

Asper, Aemilius, a Roman grammarian, who wrote commentaries on Terence and Virgil, must be distinguished from another grammarian, usually called Asper Junior, the author of a small work entitled Ars Grammatica, printed in the Grammat. Lat. Auctores, by Putschius, Hanov. 1605.

Asphaltītes Lacus or Mare Mortuum (Ἀσφαλτῖτις or Σοδομῖτις λίμνη, or ἡ θάλασσα ἡ νέκρα), the great salt and bituminous lake in the S.E. of Palestine, which receives the water of the Jordan. It has no visible outlet, and its surface is considerably below the level of the Mediterranean. The tales about fish not living in it and birds dropping down dead as they fly over it, are now proved to be fabulous.

Aspĭi or Aspasĭi (Ἄσπιοι, Ἀσπάσιοι), an Indian tribe, in the district of the Paropamisadae, between the rivers Choes (Kama) and Indus, in the N.E. of Afghanistan and the N.W. of the Punjab.

Aspis (Ἀσπίς). 1. Clypea (Klibiah), a city on a promontory of the same name, near the N.E. point of the Carthaginian territory, founded by Agathocles, and taken in the first Punic War by the Romans, who called it Clypea, the translation of Ἀσπίς. — 2. (Marsa-Zaffran? Ru.), in the African Tripolitana, the best harbour on the coast of the Great Syrtis. — 3. [ARCONNESUS.]

Asplēdon (Ἀσπληδών: Ἀσπληδόνιος), or Spledon, a town of the Minyae in Boeotia on the river Melas, near Orchomenus; built by the mythical Aspledon, son of Poseidon and Midēa.

Assa (Ἄσσα: Ἀσσαῖος), a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Singitic gulf.

Assacēni (Ἀσσακηνοί), an Indian tribe, in the district of the Paropamisadae, between the rivers Cophen (Cabool) and Indus, in the N.W. of the Punjab.

Assărăcus (Ἀσσάρακος), king of Troy, son of Tros, father of Capys, grandfather of Anchises, and great-grandfather of Aeneas. Hence the Romans, as descendants of Aeneas, are called domus Assaraci (Virg. Aen. i. 284).

Assēsus (Ἀσσησός), a town of Ionia near Miletus, with a temple of Athena surnamed Ἀσσησία.

Assōrus (Ἀσσωρός or Ἀσσώριον: Ἀσσωρῖνος: Asaro), a small town in Sicily between Enna and Agyrium.

Assus (Ἄσσος: Ἄσσιος, Ἀσσεύς: Asso, Ru., near Berani), a flourishing city in the Troad, on the Adramyttian Gulf, opposite to Lesbos: afterwards called Apollonia: the birthplace of Cleanthes the Stoic.

Assȳrĭa (Ἀσσυρία: Ἀσσύριος, Assyrius: Kurdistan). 1. The country properly so called, in the narrowest sense, was a district of W. Asia, extending along the E. side of the Tigris, which divided it on the W. and N.W. from Mesopotamia and Babylonia, and bounded on the N. and E. by M. Niphates and M. Zagrus, which separated it from Armenia and Media, and on the S.E. by Susiana. It was watered by several streams, flowing into the Tigris from the E.; two of which, the Lycus or Zabatus (Great Zab), and the Caprus or Zabas or Anzabas (Little Zab), divided the country into three parts: that between the Upper Tigris and the Lycus was called Aturia (a mere dialectic variety of Assyria), was probably the most ancient seat of the monarchy, and contained the capital, Nineveh or NINUS: that between the Lycus and the Caprus was called Adiabene: and the part S.E. of the Caprus contained the districts of Apolloniatis and Sittacene. Another division into districts, given by Ptolemy, is the following: Arrhapachitis, Calacine, Adiabene, Arbelitis, Apolloniatis and Sittacene. — 2. In a wider sense the name was applied to the whole country watered by the Euphrates and the Tigris, between the mountains of Armenia on the N., those of Kurdistan on the E., and the Arabian Desert on the W., so as to include, besides Assyria Proper, Mesopotamia and Babylonia; nay, there is sometimes an apparent confusion between Assyria and Syria, which gives ground for the supposition that the terms were originally identical. — 3. By a further extension the word is used to designate the Assyrian Empire in its widest sense. The early history of this great monarchy is too obscure to be given here in any detail; and indeed it is only just now that new means of investigating it are being acquired. The germ of this empire was one of the first great states of which we have any record, and was probably a powerful and civilized kingdom as early as Egypt. Its reputed founder was Ninus, the builder of the capital city; and in its widest extent it included the countries just mentioned, with Media, Persis, and portions of the countries to the E. and N.E., Armenia, Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, except the kingdom of Judah; and, beyond these limits, some of the Assyrian kings made incursions into Arabia and Egypt. The fruitless expedition of Sennacherib against the latter country and the miraculous destruction of his army before Jerusalem (B. C. 714), so weakened the empire, that the Medes revolted and formed a separate kingdom, and at last, in B. C. 606, the governor of Babylonia united with Cyaxares, the king of Media, to conquer Assyria, which was divided between them, Assyria Proper falling to the share of Media, and the rest of the empire to Babylon. The Assyrian king and all his family perished, and the city of Ninus was rased to the ground. [Comp. BABYLON and MEDIA.] It must be noticed as a caution, that some writers confound the Assyrian and Babylonian empires under the former name.

Asta (Astensis). 1. (Asti in Piedmont), an inland town of Liguria on the Tanarus, a Roman colony. — 2. (Mesa de Asta), a town in Hispania Baetica, near Gades, a Roman colony with the surname Regia.

Astăbŏras (Ἀσταβόρας: Atbarah or Tacazza) and Astăpus (Ἀστάπους, Bahr-el-Azak or Blue Nile), two rivers of Aethiopia, having their sources in the highlands of Abyssinia, and uniting in about 17° N. Lat. to form the Nile. The land enclosed by them was the island of MEROË.

Astăcus (Ἄστακος), father of Ismarus, Leades, Asphodicus, and Melanippus.

Astăcus (Ἄστακος: Ἀστακηνός). 1. (Dragomestre), a city of Acarnania, on the Achelous. — 2. A celebrated city of Bithynia, at the S.E. corner of the Sinus Astacenus (Ἀστακηνὸς κόλπος), a bay of the Propontis, was a colony from Megara, but afterwards received fresh colonists from Athens, who called the place Olbia (Ὀλβία). It was destroyed by Lysimachus, but rebuilt on a neighbouring site, at the N.E. corner of the gulf, by Nicomedes I., who named his new city NICOMEDIA.

Astăpa (Estepa), a town in Hispania Baetica.

Astăpus. [ASTABORAS.]

Astartē. [APHRODITE and SYRIA DEA.]

Astĕlĕphus (Ἀστέλεφος), a river of Colchis, 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) S. of Sebastopolis.

Astĕrĭa (Ἀστερία), daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phoebe, sister of Leto (Latona), wife of Perses, and mother of Hecate. In order to escape the embraces of Zeus, she is said to have taken the form of a quail (ortyx, ὄρτυξ), and to have thrown herself down from heaven into the sea, where she was metamorphosed into the island Asteria (the island which had fallen from heaven like a star), or Ortygia, afterwards called Delos.

Astĕrĭon or Astĕrĭus (Ἀστερίων or Ἀστέριος). 1. Son of Teutamus, and king of the Cretans, married Europa after she had been carried to Crete by Zeus, and brought up the three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthys, whom she had by the father of the gods. — 2. Son of Cometes, Pyremus, or Priscus, by Antigone, daughter of Pheres, was one of the Argonauts.

Astĕris or Astĕrĭa (Ἀστερίς, Ἀστερία), a small island between Ithaca and Cephallenia.

Astĕrĭum (Ἀστέριον), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly.

Astĕrŏpaeus (Ἀστεροπαῖος), son of Pelegon, leader of the Paeonians, and an ally of the Trojans, was slain by Achilles.

Astigi, a town in Hispania Baetica on the river Singulis, a Roman colony with the surname Augusta Firma.

Astraea (Ἀστραῖα), daughter of Zeus and Themis, or, according to others, of Astraeus and Eos. During the golden age, this star-bright maiden lived on earth and among men, whom she blessed; but when that age had passed away, Astraea, who tarried longest amongst men, withdrew, and was placed among the stars, where she was called Παρθένος or Virgo. Her sister Αἰδώς or Pudicitia, left the earth along with her (ad superos Astraea recessit, hac (Pudicitia) comite, Juv. vi. 19).

Astraeus (Ἀστραῖος), a Titan, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Eos (Aurora), and father of the winds Zephyrus, Boreas, and Notus, Eosphorus (the morning star) and all the stars of heaven. Ovid (Met. xiv. 545) calls the winds Astraei (adj.) fratres, the "Astraean brothers."

Astūra. 1. (La Stura), a river in Latium, rises in the Alban mountains, and flows between Antium and Circeii into the Tyrrhenian sea. At its mouth it formed a small island with a town upon it, also called Astura (Torre d' Astura): here Cicero had an estate. — 2. (Ezla), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the Durius.

Astūres, a people in the N. W. of Spain, bounded on the E. by the Cantabri and Vaccaei, on the W. by the Gallaeci, on the N. by the Ocean, and on the S. by the Vettones, thus inhabiting the modern Asturias and the northern part of Leon and Valladolid. They contained 22 tribes and 240,000 freemen, and were divided into the Augustani and Transmontani, the former of whom dwelt S. of the mountains as far as the Durius, and the latter N. of the mountains down to the sea-coast. The country of the Astures was mountainous, rich in minerals and celebrated for its horses: the people themselves were rude and warlike. Their chief town was Asturica Augusta (Astorga).

Astyăges (Ἀστυάγης), son of Cyaxares, last king of Media, reigned B. C. 594—559. Alarmed by a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyses, a Persian of good family. Another dream induced him to send Harpagus to destroy the offspring of this marriage. The child, the future conqueror of the Medes, was given to a herdsman to expose, but he brought it up as his own. Years afterwards, circumstances occurred which brought the young Cyrus under the notice of Astyages, who, on inquiry, discovered his parentage. He inflicted a cruel punishment on Harpagus, who waited his time for revenge. When Cyrus had grown up to man's estate, Harpagus induced him to instigate the Persians to revolt, and, having been appointed general of the Median forces, he deserted with the greater part of them to Cyrus. Astyages was taken prisoner, and Cyrus mounted the throne. He treated the captive monarch with mildness, but kept him in confinement till his death. This is the account of Herodotus, and is to be preferred to that of Xenophon, who makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says, that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyaxares II., on whose death Cyrus succeeded peaceably to the vacant throne.

Astyănax (Ἀστυάναξ), son of Hector and Andromache: his proper name was Scamandrius, but he was called Astyanax or "lord of the city" by the Trojans, on account of the services of his father. After the taking of Troy the Greeks hurled him down from the walls, that he might not restore the kingdom of Troy.

Astўdămas (Ἀστυδάμας), a tragic poet, son of Morsimus and of a sister of the poet Aeschylus, and a pupil of Isocrates, wrote 240 tragedies, and gained the prize 15 times. His first tragedy was acted B. C. 399.

Astўdămīa (Ἀστυδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Amyntor and mother of Tlepolemus by Hercules. — 2. Wife of ACASTUS.

Astўnŏmē (Ἀστυνόμη), daughter of Chryses, better known under her patronymic CHRYSEIS.

Astўŏchē or Astўŏchīa (Ἀστυόχη or Ἀστυόχεια). 1. Daughter of Actor, by whom Ares begot Ascalaphus and Ialmenus. — 2. Daughter of Phylas, king of Ephyra in Thesprotia, became by Hercules the mother of Tlepolemus.

Astўŏchus (Ἀστύοχος), the Lacedaemonian admiral in B. C. 412, commanded on the coast of Asia Minor, where he was bribed by the Persians to remain inactive.

Astўpălaea (Ἀστυπάλαια: Ἀστυπαλαιεύς, Ἀστυπαλαιάτης: Stampalia), one of the Sporades in the S. part of the Grecian archipelago, with a town of the same name, founded by the Megarians, which was under the Romans a libera civitas. (Astypalēia regna, i. e. Astypalaea, Ov. Met. vii. 461.) The inhabitants worshipped Achilles.

Astўra (τὰ Ἄστυρα), a town of Mysia, N.W. of Adramyttium, on a marsh connected with the sea, with a grove sacred to Artemis surnamed Ἀστυρίνη or -ηνή.

Asychis (Ἄσυχις), an ancient king of Egypt, succeeded Mycerinus.

Ătăbŭlus, the name in Apulia of the parching S. E. wind, the Sirocco, which is at present called Altino in Apulia.

Atăbўris or Atabўrium (Ἀταβύριον), the highest mountain in Rhodes on the S.W. of that island, on which was a celebrated temple of Zeus Atabyrius, said to have been founded by Althaemenes, the grandson of Minos.

Atăgis. [ATHESIS.]

Atălanta (Ἀταλάντη). 1. The Arcadian Atalanta, was a daughter of Iasus (Iasion or Iasius) and Clymene. Her father, who had wished for a son, was disappointed at her birth, and exposed her on the Parthenian (virgin) hill, where she was suckled by a she-bear, the symbol of Artemis. After she had grown up she lived in pure maidenhood, slew the centaurs who pursued her, and took part in the Calydonian hunt. Her father subsequently recognised her as his daughter; and when he desired her to marry, she required every suitor who wanted to win her, to contend with her first in the foot-race. If he conquered her, he was to be rewarded with her hand, if not, he was to be put to death. This she did because she was the most swift-footed of mortals, and because the Delphic oracle had cautioned her against marriage. She conquered many suitors, but was at length overcome by Mīlanīon with the assistance of Aphrodite. The goddess had given him 3 golden apples, and during the race he dropped them one after the other: their beauty charmed Atalanta so much, that she could not abstain from gathering them, and Milanion thus gained the goal before her. She accordingly became his wife. They were subsequently both metamorphosed into lions, because they had profaned by their embraces the sacred grove of Zeus. — 2. The Boeotian Atalanta. The same stories are related of her as of the Arcadian Atalanta, except that her parentage and the localities are described differently. Thus she is said to have been a daughter of Schoenus, and to have been married to Hippomenes. Her foot-race is transferred to the Boeotian Onchestus, and the sanctuary which the newly married couple profaned by their love, was a temple of Cybele, who metamorphosed them into lions, and yoked them to her chariot.

Atalantē (Ἀταλάντη: Ἀταλανταῖος). 1. A small island in the Euripus, on the coast of the Opuntian Locri, with a small town of the same name. — 2. A town of Macedonia on the Axius, in the neighbourhood of Gortynia and Idomene.

Atărantes (Ἀτάραντες), a people in the E. of Libya, described by Herodotus (iv. 184).

Atarbēchis. [APHRODITOPOLIS.]

Atarneus (Ἀταρνεύς: Dikeli), a city on M. Cane, on the coast of Mysia, opposite to Lesbos: a colony of the Chians: the residence of the tyrant Hermias, with whom Aristotle resided some time: destroyed before the time of Pliny.

Ataulphus, Athaulphus, Adaulphus (i.e. Athaulf, "sworn helper," the same name as that which appears in later history under the form of Adolf or Adolphus), brother of Alaric's wife. He assisted Alaric in his invasion of Italy, and on the death of that monarch in A. D. 410, he was elected king of the Visigoths. He then made a peace with the Romans, married Placidia, sister of Honorius, retired with his nation into the S. of Gaul, and finally withdrew into Spain, where he was murdered at Barcelona.

Atax (Aude), originally called Narbo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Pyrenees, and flows by Narbo Martius into the Lacus Rubresus or Rubrensis, which is connected with the sea. From this river the poet P. Terentius Varro obtained the surname Atacinus. [VARRO.]

Atē (Ἄτη), daughter of Eris or Zeus, was an ancient Greek divinity, who led both gods and men into rash and inconsiderate actions. She once even induced Zeus, at the birth of Hercules, to take an oath by which Hera was afterwards enabled to give to Eurystheus the power which had been destined for Hercules. When Zeus discovered his rashness, he hurled Ate from Olympus and banished her for ever from the abodes of the gods. In the tragic writers Ate appears in a different light: she avenges evil deeds and inflicts just punishments upon the offenders and their posterity, so that her character is almost the same as that of Nemesis and Erinnys. She appears most prominent in the dramas of Aeschylus, and least in those of Euripides, with whom the idea of Dike (justice) is more fully developed.

Atēius, surnamed Praetextatus, and Philologus, a celebrated grammarian at Rome, about B. C. 40, and a friend of Sallust, for whom he drew up an Epitome (Breviarium) of Roman History. After the death of Sallust Ateius lived on intimate terms with Asinius Pollio, whom he assisted in his literary pursuits.

Atēius Căpīto. [CAPITO.]

Atella (Atellānus; Aversa), a town in Campania between Capua and Neapolis, originally inhabited by the Oscans, afterwards a Roman municipium and a colony. It revolted to Hannibal (B. C. 216) after the battle of Cannae, and the Romans in consequence transplanted its inhabitants to Calatia, and peopled the town by new citizens from Nuceria. Atella owes its celebrity to the Atellanae Fabulae or Oscan farces, which took their name from this town. (Dict. of Antiq. p. 347, 2d ed.)

Aternum (Pescara), a town in central Italy on the Adriatic, at the mouth of the river Aternus (Pescara), was the common harbour of the Vestini, Marrucini, and Peligni.

Aternus. [ATERNUM.]

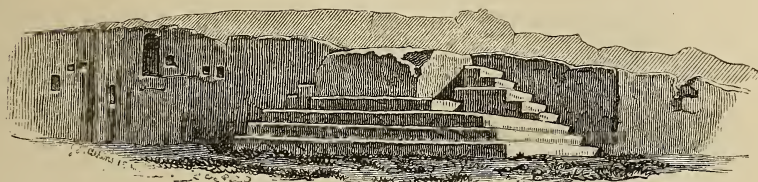
Atestē (Atestīnus: Este), a Roman colony in the country of the Veneti in Upper Italy.

Athăcus, a town in Lyncestis in Macedonia.

Athamānia (Ἀθαμανία: Ἀθαμάν, -ᾶνος), a mountainous country in the S. of Epirus, on the W. side of Pindus, of which Argithea was the chief town. The Athamānes were a Thessalian people, who had been driven out of Thessaly by the Lapithae. They were governed by independent princes, the last of whom was AMYNANDER.

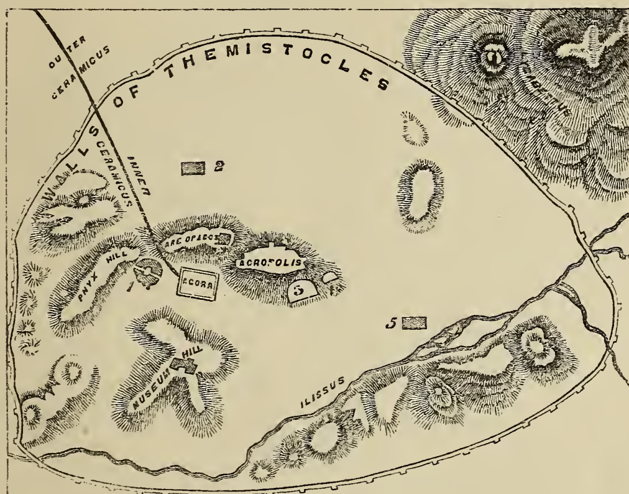
Athămas (Ἀθάμας), son of Aeolus and Enarete, and king of Orchomenus in Boeotia. At the command of Hera, Athamas married Nephele, by whom he became the father of PHRIXUS and Helle. But he was secretly in love with the mortal Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he begot Learchus and Melicertes; and Nephele, on discovering that Ino had a greater hold on his affections than herself, disappeared in anger. Having thus incurred the anger both of Hera and of Nephele, Athamas was seized with madness, and in this state killed his own son, Learchus: Ino threw herself with Melicertes into the sea, and both were changed into marine deities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palaemon. Athamas, as the murderer of his son, was obliged to flee from Boeotia, and settled in Thessaly. — Hence we have Athamantiădes, son of Athamas, i. e. Palaemon; and Athamantis, daughter of Athamas, i. e. Helle.

Athanagīa (Agramunt?), the chief town of the Ilergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis.



Athanarīcus, king of the Visi-Goths during their stay in Dacia. In A. D. 367—369 he carried on war with the emperor Valens, with whom he finally concluded a peace. In 374 Athanaric was defeated by the Huns, and, after defending himself for some time in a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia, was compelled to fly in 380, and take refuge in the Roman territory. He died in 381.

Athanasīus (Ἀθανάσιος), St., one of the most celebrated of the Christian fathers, was born at Alexandria about A. D. 296, and was elected archbishop of the city on the death of Alexander in 326. The history of his episcopate is full of stirring incidents and strange transitions of fortune. He was the great champion of the orthodox faith, as it had been expounded at the council of Nice in 325, and was therefore exposed to persecution whenever the Arians got the upper hand in the state. He was thrice driven from his see into exile, and thrice recalled. He died in 373. The Athanasian creed was not composed by Athanasius: its real author is unknown. The best edition of his works is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1698, reprinted at Padua, 1777.



Athēnā (Ἀθήνη or Ἀθηνᾶ), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. Homer calls her a daughter of Zeus, without any allusion to the manner of her birth; but later traditions related that she was born from the head of Zeus, and some added that she sprang forth with a mighty war-shout and in complete armour. The most ancient tradition, as preserved by Hesiod, stated that Metis, the first wife of Zeus, was the mother of Athena, but that Metis, when pregnant with her, was, on the advice of Gaea and Uranus, swallowed up by Zeus, and that Zeus afterwards gave birth himself to Athena, who sprang from his head. Another set of traditions regarded her as the daughter of Pallas, the winged giant, whom she afterwards killed on account of his attempting to violate her chastity; and a third set carried her to Libya, and called her a daughter of Poseidon and Tritonis. These various traditions about Athena arose, as in most other cases, from local legends and from identifications of the Greek Athena with other divinities. But according to the general belief of the Greeks, she was the daughter of Zeus; and if we take Metis to have been her mother, we have at once the clue to the character which she bears in the religion of Greece; for, as her father was the most powerful and her mother the wisest among the gods, so Athena was a combination of the two, a goddess in whom power and wisdom were harmoniously blended. From this fundamental idea may be derived the various aspects under which she appears in the ancient writers. She seems to have been a divinity of a purely ethical character; her power and wisdom appear in her being the preserver of the state and of everything which gives to the state strength and prosperity.—As the protectress of agriculture, Athena is represented as inventing the plough and rake: she created the olive tree (see below), taught the people to yoke oxen to the plough, took care of the breeding of horses, and instructed men how to tame them by the bridle, her own invention. Allusions to this feature of her character are contained in the epithets βούδεια, βοαρμία, ἀγρίφα, ἱππία, or χαλινῖτις. She is also represented as the patron of various kinds of science, industry, and art, and as inventing numbers, the trumpet, the chariot and navigation. She was further believed to have invented nearly every kind of work in which women were employed, and she herself was skilled in such work. Hence we have the tale of the Lydian maiden Arachne, who ventured to compete with Athena in the art of weaving. [ARACHNE.] Athena is in fact the patroness of both the useful and elegant arts. Hence she is called ἐργάνη, and later writers make her the goddess of all wisdom, knowledge, and art, and represent her as sitting on the right hand of her father Zeus, and supporting him with her counsel. She is therefore characterized by various epithets and surnames, expressing the keenness of her sight or the vigour of her intellect, such as ὀπτιλέτις, ὀφθαλμῖτις, ὀξυδερκής, γλαυκῶπις, πολύβουλος, πολύμητις, and μηχανῖτις.—As the patron divinity of the state, she was at Athens the protectress of the phratries and houses which formed the basis of the state. The festival of the Apaturia had a direct reference to this particular point in the character of the goddess. (Dict. of Ant. art. Apaturia.) She also maintained the authority of the law, justice, and order in the courts and the assembly of the people. This notion was as ancient as the Homeric poems, in which she is described as assisting Ulysses against the lawless conduct of the suitors. (Od. xiii. 394.) She was believed to have instituted the ancient court of the Areopagus, and in cases where the votes of the judges were equally divided, she gave the casting one in favour of the accused. The epithets which have reference to this part of the goddess's character are ἀξιόποινος, the avenger, βουλαῖα, and ἀγυραῖα.—As Athena promoted the internal prosperity of the state, so she also protected the state from outward enemies, and thus assumes the character of a warlike divinity, though in a very different sense from Ares, Eris, or Enyo. According to Homer she does not even keep arms, but borrows them from Zeus; she preserves men from slaughter when prudence demands it, and repels Ares's savage love of war, and conquers him. The epithets which she derives from her warlike character are ἀγελεία, λαφρία, ἀλκιμάχη, λαόσσοος, and others. In times of war, towns, fortresses, and harbours, are under her especial care, whence she is designated as ἐρυσίπτολις, ἀλαλκομενηΐς, πολιάς, πολιοῦχος, ἀκραῖα, ἀκρία, κληδοῦχος, πυλαῖτις, προμαχόρμα, and the like. In the war of Zeus against the giants, she assisted her father and Hercules with her counsel, and also took an active part in it, for she buried Enceladus under the island of Sicily, and slew Pallas. In the Trojan war she sided with the Greeks, though on their return home she visited them with storms, on account of the manner in which the Locrian Ajax had treated Cassandra in her temple. As a goddess of war and the protectress of heroes, Athena usually appears in armour, with the aegis and a golden staff. — The character of Athena, as we have here traced it, holds a middle place between the male and female, whence she is a virgin divinity, whose heart is inaccessible to the passion of love. Tiresias was deprived of sight for having seen her in the bath; and Hephaestus, who had made an attempt upon her chastity, was obliged to take to flight. For this reason, the ancient traditions always describe the goddess as dressed; and when Ovid makes her appear naked before Paris, he abandons the genuine story. — Athena was worshipped in all parts of Greece. Her worship was introduced from the ancient towns on the lake Copais at a very early period into Attica, where she became the great national divinity of the city and the country. Here she was regarded as the θεὰ σώτειρα, ὑγίεια, and παιωνία. The tale ran that in the reign of Cecrops both Poseidon and Athena contended for the possession of Athens. The gods resolved that whichever of them produced a gift most useful to mortals should have possession of the land. Poseidon struck the ground with his trident and straightway a horse appeared. Athena then planted the olive. The gods thereupon decreed that the olive was more useful to man than the horse, and gave the city to the goddess, from whom it was call Athenae. At Athens the magnificent festival of the Panathenaea was celebrated in honour of the goddess. At this festival took place the grand procession, which was represented on the frieze of the Parthenon. (Dict. of Ant. art. Panathenaea.) At Lindus in Rhodes her worship was likewise very ancient. Respecting its introduction into Italy, and the modifications which her character underwent there, see MINERVA. Among the things sacred to her we may mention the owl, serpent, cock, and olive-tree, which she was said to have created in her contest with Poseidon about the possession of Attica. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of bulls, rams, and cows. Athena was frequently represented in works of art, in which we generally find some of the following characteristics: — 1. The helmet, which she usually wears on her head, but in a few instances carries in her hand. It is generally ornamented in the most beautiful manner with griffins, heads of rams, horses, and sphinxes. 2. The aegis, which is represented on works of art, not as a shield, but as a goat-skin, covered with scales, set with the appalling Gorgon's head, and surrounded with tassels. (Dict. of Ant. art. Aegis.) 3. The round Argolic shield, in the centre of which the head of Medusa likewise appears. 4. Objects sacred to her, such as an olive branch, a serpent, an owl, a cock, and a lance. Her garment is usually the Spartan tunic without sleeves, and over it she wears a cloak, the peplus, or, though rarely, the chlamys.

Athēnae (Ἀθῆναι, also Ἀθήνη in Homer: Ἀθηναῖος, ἡ Ἀθηναία, Athēniensis: Athens), the capital of Attica, about 30 stadia from the sea, on the S.W. slope of Mount Lycabettus, between the small rivers Cephissus on the W. and Ilissus on the E., the latter of which flowed through the town. The most ancient part of it, the Acropolis, is said to have been built by the mythical Cecrops, but the city itself is said to have owed its origin to Theseus, who united the 12 independent states or townships of Attica into one state, and made Athens their capital. The city was burnt by Xerxes in B.C. 480, but was soon rebuilt under the administration of Themistocles, and was adorned with public buildings by Cimon and especially by Pericles, in whose time (B.C. 460—429) it reached its greatest splendour. Its beauty was chiefly owing to its public buildings, for the private houses were mostly insignificant, and its streets badly laid out. Towards the end of the Peloponnesian war, it contained 10,000 houses (Xen. Mem. iii. 6. § 14), which at the rate of 12 inhabitants to a house would give a population of 120,000, though some writers make the inhabitants as many as 180,000. Under the Romans Athens continued to be a great and flourishing city, and retained many privileges and immunities when S. Greece was formed into the Roman province of Achaia. It suffered greatly on its capture by Sulla, B.C. 86, and was deprived of many of its privileges. It was at that time, and also during the early centuries of the Christian aera, one of the chief seats of learning, and the Romans were accustomed to send their sons to Athens, as to an University, for the completion of their education. Hadrian, who was very partial to Athens and frequently resided in the city (A.D. 122, 128), adorned it with many new buildings, and his example was followed by Herodes Atticus, who spent large sums of money upon beautifying the city in the reign of M. Aurelius. — Athens consisted of 2 distinct parts: I. The City (τὸ ἄστυ), properly so called, divided into, 1. The Upper City or Acropolis (ἡ ἄνω πόλις, ἀκρόπολις), and, 2. The Lower City (ἡ κάτω πόλις), surrounded with walls by Themistocles. II. The 3 harbour-towns of Piraeus, Munychia, and Phalērum, also surrounded with walls by Themistocles, and connected with the city by means of the long walls (τὰ μακρὰ τείχη), built under the administration of Pericles. The long walls consisted of the wall to Phalērum on the E., 35 stadia long (about 4 miles), and of the wall to Piraeus on the W., 40 stadia long (about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles); between these two, at a short distance from the latter and parallel to it, another wall was erected, thus making 2 walls leading to the Piraeus (sometimes called τὰ σκέλη), with a narrow passage between them. There were therefore 3 long walls in all; but the name of Long Walls seems to have been confined to the two leading to the Piraeus, while the one leading to Phalerum was distinguished by the name of the Phalerian Wall (τὸ Φαληρικὸν τεῖχος). The entire circuit of the walls was $174\frac{1}{2}$ stadia (nearly 22 miles), of which 43 stadia (nearly $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles) belonged to the city, 75 stadia ($9\frac{1}{2}$ miles) to the long walls, and $56\frac{1}{2}$ (7 miles) to Piraeus, Munychia, and Phalerum. — 1. Topography of the Acropolis or Upper City. The Acropolis, also called Cecropia from its reputed founder, was a steep rock in the middle of the city, about 150 feet high, 1150 feet long, and 500 broad: its sides were naturally scarped on all sides except the W. end. It was originally surrounded by an ancient Cyclopian wall said to have been built by the Pelasgians; at the time of the Peloponnesian war only the N. part of this wall remained, and this portion was still called the Pelasgic Wall; while the S. part, which had been rebuilt by Cimon, was called the Cimonian Wall. On the W. end of the Acropolis, where access is alone practicable, were the magnificent PROPYLAEA, "the Entrances," built by Pericles, before the right wing of which was the small temple of Νίκη Ἄπτερος. The summit of the Acropolis was covered with temples, statues of bronze and marble, and various other works of art. Of the temples, the grandest was the PARTHENON, sacred to the "Virgin" goddess Athena; and N. of the Parthenon was the magnificent ERECHTHEUM, containing 3 separate temples, one of Athena Polias (Πολιάς), or the "Protectress of the State," the Erechthēum proper, or sanctuary of Erechtheus, and the Pandrosium, or sanctuary of Pandrosos, the daughter of Cecrops. Between the Parthĕnon and Erechthēum was the colossal statue of Athena Promachos (Πρόμαχος), or the "Fighter in the Front," whose helmet and spear was the first object on the Acropolis visible from the sea. — 2. Topography of the Lower City. — The lower city was built in the plain round the Acropolis, but this plain also contained several hills, especially in the S.W. part. — Walls. The ancient walls embraced a much greater circuit than the modern ones. On the W. they included the hill of the Nymphs and the Pnyx, on the S. they extended a little beyond the Ilissus, and on the E. they crossed the Ilissus, near the Lyceum, which was outside the walls. — Gates. Their number is unknown, and the position of many of them is uncertain; but the following list contains the most important. On the W. side were: — 1. Dipylum (Δίπυλον, more anciently Θριασίαι or Κεραμικαί), the most frequented gate of the city, leading from the inner Ceramīcus to the outer Ceramicus, and to the Academy. — 2. The Sacred Gate (αἱ Ἱεραὶ Πύλαι), where the sacred road to Eleusis began. — 3. The Knight's Gate (αἱ Ἱππάδες π.), probably between the hill of the Nymphs and the Pnyx. — 4. The Piraean Gate (ἡ Πειραϊκὴ π.), between the Pnyx and the Museum, leading to the carriage road (ἁμάξιτος) between the Long Walls to the Piraeus. — 5. The Melitian Gate (αἱ Μελιτίδες π.), so called because it led to the demus Melite, within the city. On the S. side, going from W. to E.:—6. The Gate of the Dead (αἱ Ἠρίαι π.) in the neighbourhood of the Museum, placed by many authorities on the N. side.—7. The Itonian Gate (αἱ Ιτωνίαι π.), near the Ilissus, where the road to Phalērum began. On the E. side, going from S. to N.: — 8. The Gate of Diochares (αἱ Διοχάρους π.), leading to the Lyceum. — 9. The Diomēan Gate (ἡ Διόμεια π.), leading to Cynosarges and the demus Diomea. On the N. side.—10. The Acharnian Gate (αἱ Ἀχαρνικαὶ π.), leading to the demus Acharnae.—Chief Districts. The inner Ceramīcus (Κεραμεικός), or "Potter's Quarter," in the W. of the city, extending N. as far as the gate Dipylum, by which it was separated from the outer Ceramīcus; the S. part of the inner Ceramicus contained the Agora (ἀγορὰ), or "market-place," the only one in the city (for there were not 2 market-places, as some suppose), lying S.W. of the Acropolis, and between the Acropolis, the Areopagus, the Pnyx, and the Museum. The demus Melite, S. of the inner Ceramicus, and perhaps embracing the hill of the Museum. The demus Scambonidae, W. of the inner Ceramicus, between the Pnyx and the hill of the Nymphs. The Collytus, S. of Melite. Coele, a district S. of Collytus and the Museum, along the Ilissus, in which were the graves of Cimon and Thucydides. Limnae, a district E. of Melite and Collytus, between the Acropolis and the Ilissus. Diomea, a district in the E. of the city, near the gate of the same name and the Cynosarges. Agrae, a district S. of Diomea. — Hills. The Arēopăgus (Ἀρείου πάγος or Ἄρειος πάγος), the "Hill of Ares," W. of the Acropolis, which gave its name to the celebrated council that held its sittings there (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), was accessible on the S. side by a flight of steps cut out of the rock. The Hill of the Nymphs, N.W. of the Areopagus. The Pnyx (Πνύξ), a semicircular hill, S.W. of the Areopagus, where the assemblies of the people were held in earlier times, for afterwards the people usually met in the Theatre of Dionysus. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 440, b, 2d ed.) The Musēum, S. of the Pnyx and the Areopagus, on which was the monument of Philopappus, and where the Macedonians built a fortress. — Streets. Of these we have little information. We read of the Piraean Street, which led from the Piraean gate to the Agora; of the Street of the Hermae, which ran along the Agora between the Stoa Basilēos and Stoa Poecile; of the Street of the Tripods, on the E. of the Acropolis, &c. — Public Buildings. 1. Temples. Of these the most important was the Olympiēum (Ὀλυμπίειον), or Temple of the Olympian Zeus, S. E. of the Acropolis, near the Ilissus and the fountain Callirrhoë, which was long unfinished, and was first completed by Hadrian. Thesēum (Θησεῖον) or Temple of Theseus, on a hill N. of the Areopagus, now converted into the Museum of Athens. The Temple of Ares, S. of the Areopagus and W. of the Acropolis. Metrōum (Μητρῷον), or temple of the mother of the gods, E. of the Agora, and S. of the Acropolis, near the Senate House, and the Odeum of Herodes Atticus. Besides these, there was a vast number of other temples in all parts of the city. — 2. The Senate House (βουλευτήριον), at the S. end of the Agora. — 3. The Tholus (θόλος), a round building close to the Senate House, which served as the new Prytanēum, in which the Prytanes took their meals and offered their sacrifices. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) — 4. The Prytanēum (Πρυτανεῖον), at the N.E. foot of the Acropolis, where the Prytanes used more anciently to take their meals, and where the laws of Solon were preserved. — 5. Stoae (στοαί), or Halls, supported by pillars, and used as places of resort in the heat of the day, of which there were several in Athens. (Dict. of Ant. p. 944, 2d ed.) In the Agora there were 3; the Stoa Basilēus (στοὰ βασίλειος), the court of the King-Archon, on the W. side of the Agora; the Stoa Poecĭlē (στοὰ ποικίλη), so called because it was adorned with fresco painting of the battle of Marathon by Polygnotus; and the Stoa Eleutherius (στοὰ ἐλευθέριος), or Hall of Zeus Eleutherius, both on the S. side of the Agora. — 6. Theatres The Theatre of Dionysus, on the S.E. slope of the Acropolis, was the great theatre of the state (Dict. of Ant. p. 1120, 2d ed.); besides this there were three Odēa (ᾠδεῖα), for contests in vocal and instrumental music (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), an ancient one near the fountain Callirrhoë, a second built by Pericles, close to the theatre of Dionysus, on the S.E. slope of the Acropolis, and a third built by Herodes Atticus, in honour of his wife Regilla, on the S.W. slope of the Acropolis, of which there are still considerable remains. — 7. Stadium (τὸ Στάδιον), S. of the Ilissus, in the district Agrae.— 8. Monuments. The Monument of Andronicus Cyrrhestes, formerly called the Tower of the Winds, an octagonal building N. of the Acropolis, still extant, was an horologium. (Dict. of Ant. p. 616, 2d ed.) The Choragic Monument of Lysicrates, frequently but erroneously called the Lantern of Demosthenes, still extant, in the Street of the Tripods. The Monument of Harmodius and Aristogīton in the Agora, just before the ascent to the Acropolis. — Suburbs. The Outer Ceramīcus (ὁ ἔξω καλούμενος), N.W. of the city, was the finest suburb of Athens: here were buried the Athenians who had fallen in war, and at the further end of it was the ACADEMIA, 6 stadia from the city. Cynosarges (τὸ Κυνόσαργες), E. of the city, before the gate Diomea, a gymnasium sacred to Hercules, where Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school, taught. Lycēum (τὸ Λύκειον), S. E. of the Cynosarges, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lycēus, where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught Athēnae (Ἀθῆναι: Atenah), a seaport town of Pontus, named from its temple of Athena.

Athēnaeum (Ἀθήναιον), in general a temple of Athena, or any place consecrated to this goddess. The name was specially given to a school founded by the emperor Hadrian at Rome about A. D. 133, for the promotion of literary and scientific studies. It was in the neighbourhood of the forum, and at the foot of the Aventine Hill: it had a staff of professors paid by the government, and continued in repute till the 5th century of our era. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) — Athenaeum was also the name of a town in Arcadia, not far from Megalopolis, and of a place in Athamania in Epirus.

Athēnaeus (Ἀθήναιος). 1. A contemporary of Archimedes, the author of an extant work Περὶ Μηχανημάτων (on warlike engines), addressed to Marcellus (probably the conqueror of Syracuse); printed in Thevenot's Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693. — 2. A learned Greek grammarian, of Naucratis in Egypt, lived about A. D. 230, first at Alexandria and afterwards at Rome. His extant work is entitled the Deipnosophistae (Δειπνοσοφισταί), i.e. the Banquet of the Learned, in 15 books, of which the first 2 books, and parts of the 3rd, 11th, and 15th, exist only in an Epitome. The work may be considered one of the earliest collections of what are called Ana, being an immense mass of anecdotes, extracts from the writings of poets, historians, dramatists, philosophers, orators, and physicians, of facts in natural history, criticisms, and discussions on almost every conceivable subject, especially on Gastronomy. Athenaeus represents himself as describing to his friend Timocrates, a full account of the conversation at a banquet at Rome, at which Galen, the physician, and Ulpian, the jurist, were among the guests. — Editions. By Casaubon, Genev. 1597; by Schweighäuser, Argentorati, 1801–1807; and by W. Dindorf, Lips. 1827. — 3. A celebrated physician, founder of the medical sect of the Pneumatici, was born at Attalīa in Cilicia, and practised at Rome about A. D. 50.

Athēnăgŏras (Ἀθηναγόρας), an Athenian philosopher, converted to the Christian religion in the 2d century of our aera, is the author of two extant works, An Apology for Christians, addressed to the emperors M. Aurelius and his son Commodus, and a treatise in defence of the tenet of the resurrection. — Editions. By Fell, Oxon. 1682; Rechenberg, Lips. 1684–85; Dechair, Oxon. 1706.

Athēnāïs (Ἀθηναΐς). 1. Surnamed Philostorgus, wife of Ariobarzanes II., king of Cappadocia, and mother of Ariobarzanes III. — 2. Daughter of Leontius, afterwards named Eudocia.

Athēnĭon (Ἀθηνίων), a Cilician, one of the commanders of the slaves in the 2nd servile war in Sicily, maintained his ground for some time successfully, and defeated L. Licinius Lucullus, but was at length conquered and killed in B. C. 101 by the consul M'. Aquillius.

Athēnŏdōrus (Ἀθηνόδωρος). 1. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher surnamed Cordylio, was the keeper of the library at Pergamus, and afterwards removed to Rome, where he lived with M. Cato, at whose house he died. — 2. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, surnamed Cananites, from Cana in Cilicia, the birthplace of his father, whose name was Sandon. He was a pupil of Posidonius at Rhodes, and afterwards taught at Apollonia in Epirus, where the young Octavius (subsequently the emperor Augustus) was one of his disciples. He accompanied the latter to Rome, and became one of his intimate friends and advisers. In his old age he returned to Tarsus, where he died at the age of 82. He was the author of several works which are not extant. — 3. A sculptor, the son and pupil of Agesander of Rhodes, whom he assisted in executing the group of Laocoon. [Agesander.]

Athĕsis (Adige or Etsch), rises in the Rhaetian Alps, receives the Atăgis (Eisach), flows through Upper Italy past Verona, and falls into the Adriatic by many mouths.

Athmŏne (Ἀθμονή, also Ἀθμονία and Ἄθμονον: Ἀθμονεύς, fem. Ἀθμονίς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Cecropis, afterwards to the tribe Attalis.

Āthōs (Ἄθως, also Ἄθων: Ἀθωΐτης: Haghion Oros, Monte Santo, i. e. Holy Mountain), the mountainous peninsula, also called Acte, which projects from Chalcidice in Macedonia. At the extremity of the peninsula the mountain rises abruptly from the sea to a height of 6349 feet; there is no anchorage for ships at its base, and the voyage round it was so dreaded by mariners, that Xerxes had a canal cut through the isthmus, which connects the peninsula with the mainland, to afford a passage to his fleet. The isthmus is about 1½ mile across; and there are most distinct traces of the canal to be seen in the present day; so that we must not imitate the scepticism of Juvenal (x. 174), and of many modern writers, who refused to believe that the canal was ever cut. The peninsula contained several flourishing cities in antiquity, and is now studded with numerous monasteries, cloisters, and chapels, whence it derives its modern name. In these monasteries some valuable MSS. of ancient authors have been discovered.

Athrībis (Ἄθριβις), a city in the Delta of Egypt; capital of the Nomos Athribītes.

Ātĭa, mother of Augustus.

Atĭlĭa or Atillĭa Gens, the principal members of which are given under their surnames Calatinus, Regulus, and Serranus.

Atilicīnus, a Roman jurist, who probably lived about A. D. 50, is referred to in the Digest.

Atĭlĭus. 1. L., one of the earliest of the Roman jurists who gave public instruction in law, probably lived about B. C. 100. He wrote commentaries on the laws of the Twelve Tables. — 2. M., one of the early Roman poets, wrote both tragedies and comedies, but apparently a greater number of the latter than of the former.

Atīna (Atīnas, -ātis: Atina), a town of the Volsci in Latium, afterwards a Roman colony.

Atintānes (Ἀτιντᾶνες), an Epirot people in Illyria, on the borders of Macedonia; their country, Atintania, was reckoned part of Macedonia.

Atlantis (Ἀτλαντίς, sc. νῆσος), according to an ancient tradition, a great island W. of the Pillars of Hercules in the Ocean, opposite Mount Atlas: it possessed a numerous population, and was adorned with every beauty; its powerful princes invaded Africa and Europe, but were defeated by the Athenians and their allies: its inhabitants afterwards became wicked and impious, and the island was in consequence swallowed up in the ocean in a day and a night. This legend is given by Plato in the Timaeus, and is said to have been related to Solon by the Egyptian priests. The Canary Islands, or the Azores, which perhaps were visited by the Phoenicians, may have given rise to the legend; but some modern writers regard it as indicative of a vague belief in antiquity in the existence of the W. hemisphere.

Atlas (Ἄτλας), son of Iapetus and Clymene, and brother of Prometheus and Epimetheus. He made war with the other Titans upon Zeus, and being conquered, was condemned to bear heaven on his head and hands: according to Homer Atlas bears the long columns which keep asunder heaven and earth. The myth seems to have arisen from the idea that lofty mountains supported the heaven. Later traditions distort the original idea still more, by making Atlas a man who was metamorphosed into a mountain. Thus Ovid (Met. iv. 626, seq.) relates that Perseus came to Atlas and asked for shelter, which was refused, whereupon Perseus, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into M. Atlas, on which rested heaven with all its stars. Others go still further, and represent Atlas as a powerful king, who possessed great knowledge of the courses of the stars, and who was the first who taught men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as a merely figurative mode of speaking. At first, the story of Atlas referred to one mountain only, which was believed to exist on the extreme boundary of the earth; but, as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was transferred to other places, and thus we read of a Mauretanian, Italian, Arcadian, and even of a Caucasian, Atlas. The common opinion, however, was, that the heaven-bearing Atlas was in the N.W. of Africa. See below. Atlas was the father of the Pleiades by Pleione or by Hesperis; of the Hyades and Hesperides by Aethra; and of Oenomaus and Maia by Sterope. Dione and Calypso, Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. — Atlantĭădes, a descendant of Atlas, especially Mercury, his grandson by Maia (comp. Mercuri facunde nepos Atlantis, Hor. Carm. i. 10), and Hermaphroditus, son of Mercury. — Atlantias and Atlantis, a female descendant of Atlas, especially the Pleiads and Hyads.

Atlas Mons (Ἄτλας: Atlas), was the general name of the great mountain range which covers the surface of N. Africa between the Mediterranean and Great Desert (Sahara), on the N. and S., and the Atlantic and the Lesser Syrtis on the W. and E.; the mountain chains S.E. of the Lesser Syrtis, though connected with the Atlas, do not properly belong to it, and were called by other names. The N. and S. ranges of this system were distinguished by the names of Atlas Minor and Atlas Major, and a distinction was made between the 3 regions into which they divided the country. [AFRICA, p. 23, a.]

Atossa (Ἄτοσσα), daughter of Cyrus, and wife successively of her brother Cambyses, of Smerdis the Magian, and of Darius Hystaspis, over whom she possessed great influence. She bore Darius 4 sons, Xerxes, Masistes, Achaemenes, and Hystaspes.

Atrae or Hatra (Ἄτραι, τὰ Ἄτρα: Ἀτρηνός, Atrēnus: Hadr, S.W. of Mosul), a strongly fortified city on a high mountain in Mesopotamia, inhabited by people of the Arab race.

Sempronĭus, Atratīnus. 1. A., consul B.C. 497 and 491. — 2. L., consul 444 and censor 443. — 3. C., consul 423, fought unsuccessfully against the Volscians, and was in consequence condemned to pay a heavy fine. — 4. L., accused M. Caelius Rufus, whom Cicero defended, 57.

Atrax (Ἄτραξ: Ἀτράκιος), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, inhabited by the Perrhaebi, so called from the mythical Atrax, son of Penēus and Bura, and father of Hippodamīa and Caenis.

Atrĕbătes, a people in Gallia Belgica, in the modern Artois, which is a corruption of their name. In Caesar's time (B.C. 57) they numbered 15,000 warriors: their capital was NEMETOCENNA. Part of them crossed over to Britain, where they dwelt in the upper valley of the Thames, Oxfordshire and Berkshire.

Atreus (Ἀτρεύς), son of Pelops and Hippodamīa, grandson of Tantalus, and brother of Thyestes and Nicippe. [PELOPS.] He was first married to Cleola, by whom he became the father of Plīsthenes; then to Aërope, the widow of his son Plisthenes, who was the mother of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia, either by Plisthenes or by Atreus [AGAMEMNON]; and lastly to Pelopia, the daughter of his brother Thyestes. The tragic fate of the house of Tantalus afforded ample materials to the tragic poets of Greece, who relate the details in various ways. In consequence of the murder of their half-brother Chrysippus, Atreus and Thyestes were obliged to take to flight; they were hospitably received at Mycenae; and, after the death of Eurystheus, Atreus became king of Mycenae. Thyestes seduced Aërope, the wife of Atreus, and was in consequence banished by his brother: from his place of exile he sent Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, whom he had brought up as his own child, in order to slay Atreus; but Plisthenes fell by the hands of Atreus, who did not know that he was his own son. In order to take revenge, Atreus, pretending to be reconciled to Thyestes, recalled him to Mycenae, killed his 2 sons, and placed their flesh before their father at a banquet, who unwittingly partook of the horrid meal. Thyestes fled with horror, and the gods cursed Atreus and his house. The kingdom of Atreus was now visited by famine, and the oracle advised Atreus to call back Thyestes. Atreus, who went out in search of him, came to king Thesprotus, and as he did not find him there, he married his third wife, Pelopia, the daughter of Thyestes, whom Atreus believed to be a daughter of Thesprotus. Pelopia was at the time with child by her own father. This child, Aegisthus, afterwards slew Atreus because the latter had commanded him to slay his own father Thyestes. [AEGISTHUS.] The treasury of Atreus and his sons at Mycenae, which is mentioned by Pausanias, is believed by some to exist still; but the ruins which remain are above ground, whereas Pausanias speaks of the building as underground.

Atrĭa. [ADRIA.]

Atrīdes (Ἀτρείδης), a descendant of Atreus, especially Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Atrŏpătēnē (Ἀτροπατηνή), or Media Atropatia (Ἀτροπατία or -ος Μηδία), the N.W. part of Media, adjacent to Armenia, named after Atropătes, a native of the country, who, having been made its governor by Alexander, founded there a kingdom, which long remained independent alike of the Seleucidae, the Parthians, and the Romans, but was at last subdued by the Parthians.

Atropătes (Ἀτροπάτης), a Persian satrap, fought at the battle of Gaugamela, B.C. 331, and after the death of Darius, was made satrap of Media by Alexander. His daughter was married to Perdiccas in 324; and he received from his father-in-law, after Alexander's death, the province of the Greater Media. In the N.W. of the country, called after him Media Atropatēne, he established an independent kingdom, which continued to exist down to the time of the emperor Augustus.

Atrŏpos. [Moirae.]

Atta, T. Quintĭus, a Roman comic poet, died B.C. 78. His surname Atta was given him from a defect in his feet, to which circumstance Horace probably alludes (Ep. ii. 1. 79). His plays were very popular, and were acted even in the time of Augustus.

Attagīnus (Ἀτταγῖνος), son of Phrynon, a Theban, betrayed Thebes to Xerxes, B.C. 480. After the battle of Plataeae (479) the other Greeks required Attaginus to be delivered up to them, but he made his escape.

Attălīa (Ἀττάλεια, Ἀτταλεώτης or -ατής).— 1. A city of Lydia, formerly called Agroïra (Ἀγρόειρα).— 2. (Laara), a city on the coast of Pamphylia, near the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, founded by Attalus II. Philadelphus, and subdued by the Romans under P. Servilius Isauricus.

Attălus (Ἄτταλος). 1. A Macedonian, uncle of Cleopatra, whom Philip married in B.C. 337. At the nuptials of his niece, Attalus offered an insult to Alexander, and, on the accession of the latter, was put to death by his order in Asia Minor, whither Philip had previously sent him to secure the Greek cities to his cause.— 2. Son of Andromenes the Stymphaean, and one of Alexander's officers; after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he served under Perdiccas, whose sister, Atalante, he had married; and after the death of Perdiccas (321), he joined Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas; but their united forces were defeated in Pisidia by Antigonus in 320.— 3. Kings of Pergamus.—(I.) Son of Attalus, a brother of Philetaerus, succeeded his cousin, Eumenes I., and reigned B.C. 241—197. He took part with the Romans against Philip and the Achaeans. He was a wise and just prince, and was distinguished by his patronage of literature.— (II.) Surnamed Philadelphus. 2nd son of Attalus I., succeeded his brother Eumenes II., and reigned 159—138. Like his father he was an ally of the Romans, and he also encouraged the arts and sciences.—(III.) Surnamed Philometor, son of Eumenes II. and Stratonice, succeeded his uncle Attalus II., and reigned 138—133. He is known to us chiefly for the extravagance of his conduct and the murder of his relations and friends. In his will, he made the Romans his heirs; but his kingdom was claimed by Aristonicus. [Aristonicus.]— 4. Roman emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by Alaric, but was deposed by the latter, after a reign of one year (A.D. 409, 410), on account of his acting without Alaric's advice.— 5. A Stoic philosopher in the reign of Tiberius, was one of the teachers of the philosopher Seneca, who speaks of him in the highest terms.

Attegŭa, a town in Hispania Baetica, of uncertain site.

Atthis or Attis (Ἄτθις or Ἄττις), daughter of Cranaus, from whom Attica was believed to have derived its name. The two birds into which Philomele and her sister Procne were metamorphosed, were likewise called Attis.

Attĭca (ἡ Ἀττική, sc. γῆ), a division of Greece, has the form of a triangle, two sides of which are washed by the Aegaean sea, while the third is separated from Boeotia on the N. by the mountains Cithaeron and Parnes. Megaris, which bounds it on the N.W., was formerly a part of Attica. In ancient times it was called Acte and Actice (Ἀκτή and Ἀκτική), or the "coastland" [Acte], from which the later form Attica is said to have been derived: but according to traditions it derived its name from Atthis, the daughter of the mythical king Cranaus; and it is not impossible that Att-ica may contain the root Att or Ath, which we find in Atthis and Athenae. Attica is divided by many ancient writers into 3 districts. 1. The Highlands (ἡ διακρία, also ὀρεινὴ Ἀττική), the N.E. of the country, containing the range of Parnes and extending S. to the promontory Cynosura: the only level part of this district was the small plain of Marathon opening to the sea. 2. The Plain (ἡ πεδίας, τὸ πέδιον), the N.W. of the country, included both the plain round Athens and the plain round Eleusis, and extended S. to the promontory Zoster. 3. The Sea-coast District (ἡ παραλία), the S. part of the country, terminating in the promontory Sunium. Besides these 3 divisions we also read of a 4th, The Midland District (μεσόγαια), still called Mesogia, an undulating plain in the middle of the country, bounded by M. Pentelicus on the N., M. Hymettus on the W., and the sea on the E. The soil of Attica is not very fertile: the greater part of it is not adapted for growing corn; but it produces olives, figs, and grapes, especially the 2 former, in great perfection. The country is dry: the chief river is the Cephissus, which rises in Parnes and flows through the Athenian plain. The abundance of wild flowers in the country made the honey of M. Hymettus very celebrated in antiquity. Excellent marble was obtained from the quarries of Pentelicus, N.E. of Athens, and a considerable supply of silver from the mines of Laurium near Sunium. The area of Attica, including the island of Salamis, which belonged to it, contained between 700 and 800 square miles; and its population in its flourishing period was probably about 500,000, of which nearly 4-5ths were slaves. Attica is said to have been originally inhabited by Pelasgians. Its most ancient political division was into 12 independent states, attributed to Cecrops, who according to some legends came from Egypt. Subsequently Ion, the grandson of Hellen, divided the people into 4 tribes, Geleontes, Hopletes, Argades, and Aegicores; and Theseus, who united the 12 independent states of Attica into one political body, and made Athens the capital, again divided the nation into 3 classes, the Eupatridae, Geomori, and Demiurgi. Clisthenes (B.C. 510) abolished the old tribes and created 10 new ones, according to a geographical division: these tribes were subdivided into 174 demi or townships. (For details, see Dict. of Ant. art. Tribus.)

Attĭcus Herōdes, Tibĕrius Claudĭus, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, born about A.D. 104, at Marathon in Attica. He taught rhetoric both at Athens and at Rome, and his school was frequented by the most distinguished men of the age. The future emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus were among his pupils, and Antoninus Pius raised him to the consulship in 143. He possessed immense wealth, a great part of which he spent in embellishing Athens. He died at the age of 76, in 180.

He wrote numerous works, none of which have come down to us, with the exception of an oration, entitled Περὶ πολιτείας, the genuineness of which, however, is very doubtful. It is printed in the collections of the Greek orators, and by Fiorillo, in Herodis Attici quae supersunt, Lips. 1801.

Attĭcus, T. Pompōnĭus, a Roman eques, born at Rome, B. C. 109. His proper name after his adoption by Q. Caecilius, the brother of his mother, was Q. Caecilius Pomponianus Atticus. His surname, Atticus, was given him on account of his long residence in Athens and his intimate acquaintance with the Greek language and literature. He was educated along with L. Torquatus, the younger C. Marius, and M. Cicero. Soon after the breaking out of the civil war between Marius and Sulla, he resolved to take no part in the contest, and accordingly removed to Athens. During the remainder of his life, he kept aloof from all political affairs, and thus lived on the most intimate terms with the most distinguished men of all parties. He was equally the friend of Caesar and Pompey, of Brutus and Cassius, of Antony and Augustus; but his most intimate friend was Cicero, whose correspondence with him, beginning in 68 and continued down to Cicero's death, is one of the most valuable remains of antiquity. He purchased an estate at Buthrotum in Epirus, in which place, as well as at Athens and Rome, he spent the greater part of his time, engaged in literary pursuits and commercial undertakings. He died in 32, at the age of 77, of voluntary starvation, when he found that he was attacked by an incurable illness. His wife Pilia, to whom he was married in 56, when he was 53 years of age, bore him only one child, a daughter, Pomponia or Caecilia, whom Cicero sometimes calls Attica and Atticula. She was married in the life-time of her father to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. The sister of Atticus, Pomponia, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator. The life of Atticus by Cornelius Nepos is to be regarded rather as a panegyric upon an intimate friend, than strictly speaking a biography. In philosophy Atticus belonged to the Epicurean sect. He was thoroughly acquainted with the whole circle of Greek and Roman literature. So high an opinion was entertained of his taste and critical acumen, that many of his friends, especially Cicero, were accustomed to send him their works for revision and correction. None of his own writings have come down to us.

Attĭla (Ἀττήλας or Ἀττίλας, German, Etzel, Hungarian, Ethele), king of the Huns, attained in A. D. 434, with his brother Bleda (in German Blödel), to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China, and to the command of an army of at least 500,000 barbarians. He gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of "the Scourge of God." His career divides itself into two parts. The first (A. D. 445—450) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic and the negotiations with Theodosius II., which followed upon it. They were ended by a treaty which ceded to Attila a large territory S. of the Danube and an annual tribute. The second part of his career was the invasion of the Western empire (450—452). He crossed the Rhine at Strassburg, but was defeated at Chalons by Aëtius, and Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, in 451. He then crossed the Alps, and took Aquileia in 452, after a siege of 3 months, but he did not attack Rome, in consequence, it is said, of his interview with Pope Leo the Great. He recrossed the Alps towards the end of the year, and died in 453, on the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, Mycolth, by the bursting of a blood-vessel. In person Attila was, like the Mongolian race in general, a short thickset man, of stately gait, with a large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald with the exception of a few white hairs, his eyes small, but of great brilliancy and quickness.

Attĭlĭus. [ATILIUS.]

Attĭus. [ACCIUS.]

Attĭus or Attus Navĭus. [NAVIUS.]

Attĭus Tullĭus. [TULLIUS.]

Atūrĭa (Ἀτουρία). [ASSYRIA.]

Atūrus (Adour), a river in Aquitania, rises in the Pyrenees and flows through the territory of the Tarbelli into the ocean.

Atymnĭus (Ἀτύμνιος or Ἄτυμνος), son of Zeus and Cassiopēa, a beautiful boy, beloved by Sarpedon. Others call him son of Phoenix.

Atys, Attys, Attes, Attis, or Attin (Ἄτυς, Ἄττυς, Ἄττης, Ἄττις, or Ἄττιν). 1. Son of Nana, and a beautiful shepherd of the Phrygian town, Celaenae. He was beloved by Cybele, but as he proved unfaithful to her, he was thrown by her into a state of madness, in which he unmanned himself. Cybele thereupon changed him into a fir-tree, which henceforth became sacred to her, and she commanded that, in future, her priests should be eunuchs. Such is the account in Ovid (Fast. iv. 221), but his story is related differently by other writers. Atys was worshipped in the temples of Cybele in common with this goddess. His worship appears to have been introduced into Greece at a comparatively late period. It is probable that the mythus of Atys represents the two-fold character of nature, the male and female concentrated in one. — 2. Son of Manes, king of the Maeonians, from whose son Lydus, his son and successor, the Maeonians were afterwards called Lydians. — 3. A Latin chief, son of Alba, and father of Capys, from whom the Atia Gens derived its origin, and from whom Augustus was believed to be descended on his mother's side. — 4. Son of Croesus, slain by ADRASTUS.

Aufĭdēna (Aufidēnas, -ātis: Alfidena), a town in Samnium on the river Sagrus.

Aufĭdĭus. 1. Cn., a learned historian, celebrated by Cicero for the equanimity with which he bore blindness, was quaestor B. C. 119, tribunus plebis, 114, and finally praetor 108. — 2. T., a jurist, quaestor B. C. 86, and afterwards propraetor in Asia. — 3. Bassus. [BASSUS.] — 4. Lurco. [LURCO.] — 5. Orestes. [ORESTES.]

Aufĭdus (Ofanto), the principal river of Apulia, rises in the Apennines in the territory of the Hirpini in Samnium, flows at first with a rapid current (hence violens and acer, Hor. Carm. iii. 30. 10, Sat. i. 1. 58), and then more slowly (stagna Aufida, Sil. Ital. x. 171) into the Adriatic. Venusia, the birth-place of Horace, was on the Aufidus.

Augărus. [ACBARUS.]

Augē or Augīa (Αὔγη or Αὐγεία), daughter of Aleus and Neaera, was a priestess of Athena, and mother by Hercules of TELEPHUS. She afterwards married Teuthras, king of the Mysians.

Augēas or Augīas (Αὐγέας or Αὐγείας), son of Phorbas or Helios (the Sun), and king of the Epēans in Elis. He had a herd of 3000 oxen, whose stalls had not been cleansed for 30 years. It was one of the labours imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus to cleanse these stalls in one day. As a reward the hero was to receive the tenth part of the oxen; but when he had accomplished his task by leading the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stables, Augeas refused to keep his promise. Hercules thereupon killed him and his sons, with the exception of Phyleus, who was placed on the throne of his father. Another tradition represents Augeas as dying a natural death at an advanced age, and as receiving heroic honours from Oxylus.

Augīla (τὰ Αὔγιλα: Aujilah), an oasis in the Great Desert of Africa, about 3½° S. of Cyrene, and 10 days' journey W. of the Oasis of Ammon, abounding in date palms, to gather the fruit of which a tribe of the Nasamones, called Augīlae (Αὐγίλαι), resorted to the Oasis, which at other times was uninhabited.

Augurīnus, Genucīus. 1. T., consul B.C. 451, and a member of the first decemvirate in the same year. — 2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 445.

Augurīnus, Minucīus. 1. M., consul B.C. 497 and 491. He took an active part in the defence of Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in 491, but was unable to obtain his acquittal. — 2. L., consul 458, carried on war against the Aequians, and was surrounded by the enemy on Mt. Algidus, but was delivered by the dictator Cincinnatus. — 3. L., was appointed praefect of the corn-market (praefectus annonae) 439, as the people were suffering from grievous famine. The ferment occasioned by the assassination of Sp. Maelius in this year was appeased by Augurinus, who is said to have gone over to the plebs from the patricians, and to have been chosen by the tribunes one of their body. Augurinus lowered the price of corn in 3 market days, fixing as the maximum an as for a modius. The people in their gratitude presented him with an ox having its horns gilt, and erected a statue to his honour outside the Porta Trigemina, for which every body subscribed an ounce of brass.

Augusta, the name of several towns founded or colonised by Augustus. 1. A. Asturīca. [ASTURES.] — 2. A. Emerīta (Merida), in Lusitania on the Anas (Guadiana), colonised by Augustus with the veterans (emeriti) of the 5th and 10th legions, was a place of considerable importance. — 3. A. Firma. [ASTIGI.] — 4. A. Praetorīa (Aosta), a town of the Salassi in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Graian and Pennine Alps, colonised by Augustus with soldiers of the praetorian cohorts. The modern town still contains many Roman remains: the most important of which are the town gates and a triumphal arch. — 5. A. Rauracorum (Augst), the capital of the Rauraci, colonised by Munatius Plancus under Augustus, was on the left of the Rhine near the modern Basle: the ruins of a Roman amphitheatre are still to be seen. — 6. A. Suessonum (Soissons), the capital of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the Noviodūnum of Caesar. — 7. A. Taurinorum (Turin), more anciently called Taurasia, the capital of the Taurini on the Po, was an important town in the time of Hannibal, and was colonised by Augustus. — 8. Trevirorum. [TREVIRI.] — 9. Tricastinorum (Aouste), the capital of the Tricastīni in Gallia Narbonensis. — 10. A. Vindelīcorum (Augsburg), capital of Vindelicia or Rhaetia Secunda on the Licus (Lech), colonised by Drusus under Augustus, after the conquest of Rhaetia, about B.C. 14.

Augustīnus, Aurelīus, usually called St. Augustine, the most illustrious of the Latin fathers, was born A.D. 354, at Tagaste, an inland town in Numidia. His mother was a sincere Christian, who exerted herself in training up her son in the practice of piety, but for a long time without effect. He studied rhetoric at Carthage, where he embraced the Manichaean heresy, to which he adhered for 9 years. He afterwards became a teacher of rhetoric at Carthage, but in 383 he went to Italy, and in Milan was led by the preaching and conversation of Ambrose to abandon his Manichaean errors and embrace Christianity. He was baptized by Ambrose in 387, and then returned to Africa, where he passed the next 3 years in seclusion, devoting himself to religious exercises. In 391 he was ordained a priest by Valerius, then bishop of Hippo, and in 395 he was ordained bishop of Hippo. His history, from the time of his elevation to the see of Hippo, is so closely implicated with the Donatistic and Pelagian controversies, that it would be impracticable to pursue its details within our limits. He died at Hippo in 430, when the city was besieged by the Vandals. Of his numerous works the 2 most interesting are: 1. His Confessions, in 13 books, written in 397, containing an account of his early life. 2. De Civitate Dei, in 22 books, commenced about 413, and not finished before 426. The first 10 books contain a refutation of the various systems of false religion, the last 12 present a systematic view of the true religion. — The best edition of the collected works of Augustine is the Benedictine, 11 vols. fol. Paris, 1679—1700.

Augustobōna (Troyes), afterwards called Tricassae, the capital of the Tricasii or Tricasses in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Augustodūnum. [BIBRACTE.]

Augustonemētum. [ARVERNI.]

Augustorītum. [LEMOVICES.]

Augustus, the first Roman emperor, was born on the 23rd of September, B.C. 63, and was the son of C. Octavius by Atia, a daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar. His original name was C. Octavius, and, after his adoption by his great-uncle, C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, but for the sake of brevity we shall call him Augustus, though this was only a title given him by the senate and the people in 27, to express their veneration for him. Augustus lost his father at 4 years of age, but his education was conducted with great care by his grandmother Julia, and by his mother and step-father, L. Marcius Philippus, whom his mother married soon after his father's death. C. Julius Caesar, who had no male issue, also watched over his education with solicitude. He joined his uncle in Spain in 45, in the campaign against the sons of Pompey, and in the course of the same year was sent by Caesar to Apollonia in Illyricum, where some legions were stationed, that he might acquire a more thorough practical training in military affairs, and at the same time prosecute his studies. He was at Apollonia, when the news reached him of his uncle's murder at Rome in March 44, and he forthwith set out for Italy, accompanied by Agrippa and a few other friends.

On landing near Brundusium at the beginning of April, he heard that Caesar had adopted him in his testament and made him his heir. He now assumed the name of Caesar, and was so saluted by the troops. On reaching Rome about the beginning of May he demanded nothing but the private property which Caesar had left him, but declared that he was resolved to avenge the murder of his benefactor. The state of parties at Rome was most perplexing; and one cannot but admire the extraordinary tact and prudence which Augustus displayed, and the skill with which a youth of barely 20 contrived to blind the most experienced statesmen in Rome, and eventually to carry all his designs into effect. Augustus had to contend against the republican party as well as against Antony; for the latter foresaw that Augustus would stand in the way of his views, and had therefore attempted, though without success, to prevent Augustus from accepting the inheritance which his uncle had left him. Augustus, therefore, resolved to crush Antony first as the more dangerous of his two enemies, and accordingly made overtures to the republican party. These were so well received, especially when 2 legions went over to him, that the senate conferred upon him the title of praetor, and sent him with the 2 consuls of the year, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius, to attack Antony, who was besieging D. Brutus in Mutina. Antony was defeated and obliged to fly across the Alps; and the death of the 2 consuls gave Augustus the command of all their troops. The senate now became alarmed, and determined to prevent Augustus from acquiring further power. But he soon showed that he did not intend to become the senate's servant. Supported by his troops he marched upon Rome and demanded the consulship, which the terrified senate was obliged to give him. He was elected to the office along with Q. Pedius, and the murderers of the dictator were outlawed. He now marched into the N. of Italy, professedly against Antony, who had been joined by Lepidus, and who was descending from the Alps along with the latter at the head of 17 legions. Augustus and Antony now became reconciled; and it was agreed that the empire should be divided between Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus, under the title of triumviri rei publicae constituendae, and that this arrangement should last for the next 5 years. They published a proscriptio or list of all their enemies, whose lives were to be sacrificed and their property confiscated: upwards of 2000 equites and 300 senators were put to death, among whom was Cicero. Soon afterwards Augustus and Antony crossed over to Greece, and defeated Brutus and Cassius at the decisive battle of Philippi in 42, by which the hopes of the republican party were ruined. The triumvirs thereupon made a new division of the provinces. Lepidus obtained Africa, and Augustus returned to Italy to reward his veterans with the lands he had promised them. Here a new war awaited him (41), excited by Fulvia, the wife of Antony. She was supported by L. Antonius, the consul and brother of the triumvir, who threw himself into the fortified town of Perusia, which Augustus succeeded in taking in 40. Antony now made preparations for war, but the opportune death of Fulvia led to a reconciliation between the triumvirs, who concluded a peace at Brundusium. A new division of the provinces was again made: Augustus obtained all the parts of the empire W. of the town of Scodra in Illyricum, and Antony the E. provinces, while Italy was to belong to them in common. Antony married Octavia, the sister of Augustus, in order to cement their alliance. In 39 Augustus concluded a peace with Sex. Pompey, whose fleet gave him the command of the sea, and enabled him to prevent corn from reaching Rome. But this peace was only transitory. As long as Pompey was independent, Augustus could not hope to obtain the dominion of the West, and he therefore eagerly availed himself of the pretext that Pompey allowed piracy to go on in the Mediterranean, for the purpose of declaring war against him. In 36 the contest came to a final issue. The fleet of Augustus, under the command of M. Agrippa, gained a decisive victory over that of Pompey, who abandoned Sicily and fled to Asia. Lepidus, who had landed in Sicily to support Augustus, was impatient of the subordinate part which he had hitherto played, and claimed the island for himself; but he was easily subdued by Augustus, stripped of his power, and sent to Rome, where he resided for the remainder of his life, being allowed to retain the dignity of pontifex maximus. In 35 and 34 Augustus was engaged in war with the Illyrians and Dalmatians. Meantime, Antony had repudiated Octavia, and had alienated the minds of the Roman people by his arbitrary and arrogant proceedings in the East. Augustus found that the Romans were quite prepared to desert his rival, and accordingly in 32 the senate declared war against Cleopatra, for Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. The remainder of the year was occupied by preparations for war on both sides. In the spring of 31 Augustus passed over to Epirus, and in September in the same year his fleet gained a brilliant victory over Antony's near the promontory of Actium in Acarnania. In the following year (30) Augustus sailed to Egypt. Antony and Cleopatra, who had escaped in safety from Actium, put an end to their lives to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror; and Augustus now became the undisputed master of the Roman world. He returned to Rome in 29, and after restoring order in all parts of the government he proposed in the senate to lay down his powers, but pretended to be prevailed upon to remain at the head of affairs for 10 years longer. This plan was afterwards repeated several times, and he apparently allowed himself to be always persuaded to retain his power either for 10 or 5 years more. He declined all honours and distinctions which were calculated to remind the Romans of kingly power; but he accepted in 33 the imperium proconsulare and the tribunitia potestas for life, by which his inviolability was legally established, while by the imperium proconsulare he became the highest authority in all the Roman provinces. On the death of Lepidus in 12 he became pontifex maximus; but though he had thus united in his own person all the great offices of state, yet he was too prudent to show to the Romans by any display of authority that he was the sole master. He had no ministers, in our sense of the word; but on state matters, which he did not choose to be discussed in public, he consulted his personal friends, C. Cilnius Maecenas, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, and Asinius Pollio. The people retained their republican privileges, though they were mere forms: they still met in their assemblies, and elected consuls and other magistrates; but only such persons were elected as had been proposed or recommended by the emperor. The almost uninterrupted festivities, games, distributions of corn, and the like, made the people forget the substance of their republican freedom, and obey contentedly their new ruler. The wars of Augustus were not aggressive, but were chiefly undertaken to protect the frontiers of the Roman dominions. Most of them were carried on by his relations and friends, but he conducted some of them in person. Thus, in 27, he attacked the warlike Cantabri and Astures in Spain, whose subjugation, however, was not completed till 19 by Agrippa. In 21 Augustus travelled through Sicily and Greece, and spent the winter following at Samos. Next year (20) he went to Syria, where he received from Phraätes, the Parthian monarch, the standards and prisoners which had been taken from Crassus and Antony. In 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; whereupon Augustus went himself to Gaul, and spent 4 years there, to regulate the government of that province, and to make the necessary preparations for defending it against the Germans. In 9 he again went to Gaul, where he received German ambassadors, who sued for peace; and from this time forward, he does not appear to have again taken any active part in the wars that were carried on. Those in Germany were the most formidable, and lasted longer than the reign of Augustus. He died at Nola, on the 29th of August, A. D. 14, at the age of 76. Augustus was first married, though only nominally, to Clodia, a daughter of Clodius and Fulvia. His 2nd wife, Scribonia, bore him his only daughter, Julia. His 3rd wife was Livia Drusilla, the wife of Tiberius Nero. Augustus had at first fixed on M. Marcellus as his successor, the son of his sister Octavia, who was married to his daughter Julia. After his death Julia was married to Agrippa, and her 2 sons, Caius and Lucius Caesar, were now destined by Augustus as his successors. On the death of these 2 youths, Augustus was persuaded to adopt Tiberius, the son of Livia, and to make him his colleague and successor. [TIBERIUS.]

Augustŭlus, Romŭlus, last Roman emperor of the West, was placed upon the throne by his father Orestes (A. D. 475), after the latter had deposed the emperor Julius Nepos. In 476 Orestes was defeated by Odoacer and put to death: Romulus Augustulus was allowed to live, but was deprived of the sovereignty.

Aulerci, a powerful Gallic people dwelling between the Sequana (Seine) and the Liger (Loire), were divided into 3 great tribes. 1. A. Eburovīces, near the coast on the left bank of the Seine in the modern Normandy: their capital was Mediolanum, afterwards called Eburovices (Evreux). — 2. A. Cenomāni, S.W. of the preceding near the Liger: their capital was Subdinnum (le Mans). At an early period some of the Cenomani crossed the Alps and settled in Upper Italy. — 3. A. Brannovīces, E. of the Cenomani near the Aedui, whose clients they were. The Diablintes mentioned by Caesar are said by Ptolemy to have been likewise a branch of the Aulerci.

Aulis (Αὐλίς), a harbour in Bœotia on the Euripus, where the Greek fleet assembled before sailing against Troy: it had a temple of Artemis.

Aulon (Αὐλών: Αὐλωνίτης). 1. A district and town on the borders of Elis and Messenia, with a temple of Aesculapius, who hence had the surname Aulonius. — 2. A town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Strymonic gulf. — 3. (Melone), a fertile valley near Tarentum celebrated for its wine (amicus Aulon fertili Baccho, Hor. Carm. ii. 6. 18).

Aurānītis (Αὐρανῖτις: Hauran), a district S. of Damascus and E. of Ituraea and Batanaea, on the E. side of the Jordan, belonging either to Palestine or to Arabia.

Aurĕa Chersonēsus (ἡ Χρυσῆ Χερσόνησος), the name given by the late geographers to the Malay Peninsula. They also mention an Aurea Regio beyond the Ganges, which is supposed to be the country round Ava.

Aurēlĭa, the wife of C. Julius Caesar, by whom she became the mother of C. Julius Caesar, the dictator, and of 2 daughters. She carefully watched over the education of her children, and always took a lively interest in the success of her son. She died in B. C. 54, while Caesar was in Gaul.

Aurēlĭa Gens, plebeian, of which the most important members are given under their family names, COTTA, ORESTES, and SCAURUS.

Aurēlĭa Orestilla, a beautiful but profligate woman, whom Catiline married. As Aurelia at first objected to marry him, because he had a grown-up son by a former marriage, Catiline is said to have killed his own offspring in order to remove this impediment to their union.

Aurēlĭa Via, the great coast road from Rome to Transalpine Gaul, at first extended no further than Pisae, but was afterwards continued along the coast to Genua and Forum Julii in Gaul.

Aureliāni. [GENABUM.]

Aurēlĭānus, Roman emperor, A. D. 270—275, was born about A. D. 212, at Sirmium in Pannonia. He entered the army as a common soldier, and by his extraordinary bravery was raised to offices of trust and honour by Valerian and Claudius II. On the death of the latter, he was elected emperor by the legions at Sirmium. His reign presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while their ancient lustre to the arms of Rome. He first defeated the Goths and Vandals, who had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. He next gained a great victory over the Alemanni and other German tribes; but they succeeded notwithstanding in crossing the Alps. Near Placentia they defeated the Romans, but were eventually overcome by Aurelian in two decisive engagements in Umbria. After crushing a formidable conspiracy at Rome, Aurelian next turned his arms against Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, whom he defeated, took prisoner, and carried with him to Rome. [ZENOBIA.] On his return to Italy he marched to Alexandria and put Firmus to death, who had assumed the title of emperor. He then proceeded to the West, where Gaul, Britain, and Spain were still in the hands of Tetricus, who had been declared emperor a short time before the death of Gallienus. Tetricus surrendered to Aurelian in a battle fought near Chalons. [TETRICUS.] The emperor now devoted his attention to domestic improvements and reforms. Many works of public utility were commenced: the most important of all was the erection of a new line of strongly fortified walls, embracing a much more ample circuit than the old ones, which had long since fallen into ruin; but this vast plan was not completed until the reign of Probus. After a short residence in the city, Aurelian visited the provinces on the Danube. He now entirely abandoned Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, and made the S. bank of the Danube, as in the time of Augustus, the boundary of the empire. A large force was now collected in Thrace in preparation for an expedition against the Persians; but while the emperor was on the march between Heraclea and Byzantium, he was killed by some of his officers. They had been induced to conspire against him by a certain Mnestheus, the freedman of the emperor and his private secretary, who had betrayed his trust, and fearful of punishment, had, by means of forged documents, organised the conspiracy.

Aurēliānus, Caelius or Coelius, a very celebrated Latin physician, was a native of Numidia, and probably lived in the 4th century after Christ. Of his writings we possess 3 books On Acute Diseases "Celerum Passionum," (or "De Morbis Acutis,") and 5 books On Chronic Diseases, "Tardarum Passionum" (or "De Morbis Chronicis"). Edited by Amman, Amstel. 1709.

M. Aurēlius Antōnīnus, Roman emperor, A. D. 161—180, commonly called "the philosopher," was born at Rome on the 20th of April, A. D. 121. He was adopted by Antoninus Pius immediately after the latter had been himself adopted by Hadrian, received the title of Caesar, and married Faustina, the daughter of Pius (138). On the death of the latter in 161, he succeeded to the throne, but he admitted to an equal share of the sovereign power L. Ceionius Commodus, who had been adopted by Pius at the same time as Marcus himself. The two emperors henceforward bore respectively the names of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. Soon after their accession Verus was despatched to the East, and for 4 years (A. D. 162—165) carried on war with great success against Vologeses III., king of Parthia, over whom his lieutenants, especially Avidius Cassius, gained many victories. At the conclusion of the war both emperors triumphed, and assumed the titles of Armeniacus, Parthicus Maximus, and Medicus. Meantime Italy was threatened by the numerous tribes dwelling along the northern limits of the empire, from the sources of the Danube to the Illyrian border. Both emperors set out to encounter the foe; and the contest with the northern nations was continued with varying success during the whole life of M. Aurelius, whose head-quarters were generally fixed in Pannonia. After the death of Verus in 169, Aurelius prosecuted the war against the Marcomanni with great success, and in consequence of his victories over them he assumed in 172 the title of Germanicus, which he also conferred upon his son Commodus. In 174 he gained a decisive victory over the Quadi, mainly through a violent storm, which threw the barbarians into confusion. This storm is said to have been owing to the prayers of a legion chiefly composed of Christians. It has given rise to a famous controversy among the historians of Christianity upon what is commonly termed the Miracle of the Thundering Legion. The Marcomanni and the other northern barbarians concluded a peace with Aurelius in 175, who forthwith set out for the East, where Avidius Cassius, urged on by Faustina, the unworthy wife of Aurelius, had risen in rebellion and proclaimed himself emperor. But before Aurelius reached the East, Cassius had been slain by his own officers. On his arrival in the East, Aurelius acted with the greatest clemency; none of the accomplices of Cassius were put to death, and to establish perfect confidence in all, he ordered the papers of Cassius to be destroyed without suffering them to be read. During this expedition, Faustina, who had accompanied her husband, died, according to some by her own hands. Aurelius returned to Rome towards the end of 176; but in 178 he set out again for Germany, where the Marcomanni and their confederates had again renewed the war. He gained several victories over them, but died in the middle of the war on March 17th, 180, in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirmium, in the 59th year of his age and 20th of his reign. — The leading feature in the character of M. Aurelius was his devotion to philosophy and literature. When only 12 years old, he adopted the dress and practised the austerities of the Stoics, and he continued throughout his life a warm adherent and a bright ornament of the Stoic philosophy. We still possess a work by M. Aurelius, written in the Greek language, and entitled Τὰ εἰς ἑαυτὸν, or Meditations, in 12 books. It is a sort of common-place book, in which were registered from time to time the thoughts and feelings of the author upon moral and religious topics, without an attempt at order or arrangement. No remains of antiquity present a nobler view of philosophical heathenism. The best edition of the Meditations is by Gataker, Cantab. 1652, and Lond. 1697. — The chief and perhaps the only stain upon the memory of Aurelius is his 2 persecutions of the Christians; in the former of which, 166, the martyrdom of Polycarp occurred, and in the latter, 177, that of Irenaeus. — Aurelius was succeeded by his son Commodus.

Aurēlius Victor. [VICTOR.]

Aurĕŏlus, one of the Thirty Tyrants (A. D. 260—267), who assumed the title of Augustus during the feeble rule of Gallienus. Aureolus was proclaimed emperor by the legions of Illyria in 267, and made himself master of N. Italy, but he was defeated and slain in battle in 268, by Claudius II., the successor of Gallienus.

Aurōra. [EOS.]

Aurunci. [ITALIA.]

Auruncuieius Cotta. [COTTA.]

Ausa. [AUSETANI.]

Ausci or Auscii, a powerful people in Aquitania, who possessed the Latin franchise: their capital was called Climberrum or Elimberrum, also Augusta and Ausci (now Auch).

Ausētāni, a Spanish people in the modern Catalonia: their capital was Ausa (Vique).

Auson (Αὔσων), son of Ulysses and Calypso or Circe, from whom the country of the Auruncans was believed to have been called Ausonia.

Ausŏnes, Ausŏnĭa. [ITALIA.]

Ausŏnĭus, Decĭmus Magnus, a Roman poet, born at Burdigăla (Bourdeaux), about A. D. 310, taught grammar and rhetoric with such reputation at his native town, that he was appointed tutor of Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian, and was afterwards raised to the highest honours of the state. He was appointed by Gratian praefectus of Latium, of Libya, and of Gaul, and in 379 was elevated to the consulship. After the death of Gratian, in 383, he retired from public life, and ended his days in a country retreat near Bourdeaux, perhaps about 390. It is most probable that he was a Christian and not a heathen. His extant works are — 1. Epigrammatum Liber, a collection of 150 epigrams. 2. Ephemeris, containing an account of the business and proceedings of a day. 3. Parentalia, a series of short poems addressed to friends and relations on their decease. 4. Professores, notices of the Professors of Bourdeaux. 5. Epitaphia Heroum, epitaphs on the heroes who fell in the Trojan war and a few others. 6. A metrical catalogue of the first 12 Caesars. 7. Tetrasticha, on the Caesars from Julius to Elagabalus. 8. Clarae Urbes, the praises of 14 illustrious cities. 9. Ludus Septem Sapientum, the doctrines of the 7 sages expounded by each in his own person. 10. Idyllia, a collection of 20 poems. 11. Eclogarium, short poems connected with the Calendar, &c. 12. Epistolae, 25 letters, some in verse and some in prose. 13. Gratiarum Actio pro Consulatu, in prose, addressed to Gratian. 14. Periochae, short arguments to each book of the Iliad and Odyssey. 15. Tres Praefatiunculae. — Of these works the Idyls have attracted most notice, and of them the most pleasing is the Mosella, or a description of the river Moselle. Ausonius possesses skill in versification, but is destitute of all the higher attributes of a poet. The best edition of his complete works is by Tollius, Amstel. 1671.

Auster, called Notus (Νότος) by the Greeks, the S. wind or strictly the S.W. wind, is personified as the god of the S. wind, son of Astraeus and Eos. It frequently brought with it fogs and rain; but at certain seasons of the year it was a dry sultry wind (hence called plumbeus Auster, Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 18), injurious both to man and to vegetation, the Sirocco of the modern Italians.

Autariātae (Αὐταριᾶται), an Illyrian people in the Dalmatian mountains, extinct in Strabo's time.

Autesiodōrum, -ūrum (Auxerre), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Autĕsĭon (Αὐτεσίων), son of Tisamenus, father of Theras and Argia, left Thebes at the command of an oracle, and joined the Dorians in Peloponnesus.

Autochthŏnes (αὐτόχθονες). [ABORIGINES.]

Autŏlŏles, or -ae (Αὐτολόλαι), a Gaetulian tribe on the W. coast of Africa, S. of the Atlas mountains.

Autŏlycus (Αὐτόλυκος). 1. Son of Hermes and Chione, father of Anticlēa, and thus maternal grandfather of Ulysses. He lived on mount Parnassus, and was renowned for his cunning and robberies. Ulysses, when staying with him on one occasion, was wounded by a boar on Parnassus, and it was by the scar of this wound that he was recognized by his aged nurse, when he returned from Troy. — 2. A Thessalian, son of Deïmachus, one of the Argonauts, and the founder of Sinope. — 3. A mathematician of Pitane in Aeolis, lived about B.C. 340, and wrote 2 astronomical treatises, which are the most ancient existing specimens of the Greek mathematics. 1. On the Motion of the Sphere (περὶ κινουμένης σφαῖρας). 2. On the risings and settings of the fixed stars (περὶ ἐπιτολῶν καὶ δύσεων). Edited by Dasypodius in his Sphaericae Doctrinae Propositiones, Argent. 1572.

Autŏmăla (τὰ Αὐτόμαλα), a fortified place on the Great Syrtis in N. Africa.

Autŏmĕdon (Αὐτομέδων). 1. Son of Diores, the charioteer and companion of Achilles, and, after the death of the latter, the companion of his son Pyrrhus. Hence Automedon is the name of any skilful charioteer. (Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 35; Juv. i. 61.) — 2. Of Cyzicus, a Greek poet, 12 of whose epigrams are in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Nerva, A. D. 96—98.

Autŏmŏli (Αὐτόμολοι), as a proper name, was applied to the Egyptian soldiers, who were said to have deserted from Psammetichus into Aethiopia, where they founded the kingdom of MEROË.

Autŏnŏē (Αὐτονόη), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, wife of Aristaeus, and mother of Actaeon. With her sister Agave, she tore Pentheus to pieces in their Bacchic fury: her tomb was shown in the territory of Megara.

Autrigŏnes, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis between the ocean (Bay of Biscay) and the upper course of the Iberus: their chief town was FLAVIOBRIGA.

Autronĭus Paetus. [PAETUS.]

Auxēsĭa (Αὐξησία), the goddess who grants growth and prosperity to the fields, honoured at Troezen and Epidaurus, was another name for Persephone. Damia, who was honoured along with Auxesia at Epidaurus and Troezen, was only another name for Demeter.

Auxĭmum (Auximas, -ātis: Osimo), an important town of Picenum in Italy, and a Roman colony.

Auxūme or Ax- (Αὐξούμη, or Ἀξώμη, and other forms: Αὐξουμῖται, or Ἀξωμῖται, &c.: Axum, Ru. S.W. of Adowa), the capital of a powerful kingdom in Ethiopia, to the S. E. of Meroë, in Habesh or Abyssinia, which either first arose or first became known to the Greeks and Romans in the early part of the 2nd century of our aera. It grew upon the decline of the kingdom of Meroë, and extended beyond the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb into Arabia. Being a mountainous region, watered by the numerous upper streams of the Astaboras and Astapus, and intersected by the caravan routes from the interior of Africa to the Red Sea and the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, the country possessed great internal resources and a flourishing commerce.

Auzēa, or -ia, or Audia (Sur-Guzlan or Hamza, Ru.), a city in the interior of Mauretania Caesariensis; a Roman colony under M. Aurelius Antoninus.

Avălītes (Αὐαλίτης: Zeilah), an emporium in S. Aethiopia, on a bay of the Erythraean Sea, called Avălītes Sĭnus (Ἀ. κόλπος), probably the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, or its innermost part, S. of the Straits. A people, Avalītae, are also mentioned in these parts.

Avarĭcum. [BITURIGES.]

Avella. [ABELLA.]

Avenĭo (Avignon), a town of the Cavares in Gallia Narbonensis on the left bank of the Rhone.

Aventĭcum (Avenches), the chief town of the Helvetii, and subsequently a Roman colony with the name Pia Flavia Constans Emerita, of which ruins are still to be seen in the modern town.

Aventinensis, Genucĭus. 1. L., consul B. C. 365, and again 362, was killed in battle against the Hernicans in the latter of these years, and his army routed. — 2. Cn., consul 363.

Aventīnus, son of Hercules and the priestess Rhea.

Aventīnus Mons. [ROMA.]

Avernus Lacus (ἡ Ἄορνος λίμνη: Lago Averno), a lake close to the promontory which runs out into the sea between Cumae and Puteoli. This lake fills the crater of an extinct volcano; it is circular, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in circumference, is very deep, and is surrounded by high banks, which in antiquity were covered by a gloomy forest sacred to Hecate. From its waters mephitic vapours arose, which are said to have killed the birds that attempted to fly over it, from which circumstance its Greek name was supposed to be derived (from α priv. and ὄρνις). The lake was celebrated in mythology on account of its connection with the lower world. On its banks dwelt the Cimmerians in constant darkness, and near it was the cave of the Cumaean Sibyl, through which Aeneas descended to the lower world. Agrippa, in the time of Augustus, cut down the forest which surrounded the lake, and connected the latter with the Lucrine lake ; he also caused a tunnel to be made from the lake to Cumae, of which a considerable part remains and is known under the name of Grotta di Sibylla. The Lucrine lake was filled up by an eruption in 1530, so that Avernus is again a separate lake.

Aviānus, Flavĭus, the author of 42 Aesopic fables in Latin elegiac verse, which are of very little merit both as respects the matter and the style. The date of Avianus is uncertain ; he probably lived in the 3rd or 4th century of the Christian aera.—Editions. By Cannegieter, Amstel. 1731 ; by Nodell, Amstel. 1787 ; and by Lachmann, Berol. 1845.

Aviēnus, Rufus Festus, a Latin poet towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian aera. His poems are chiefly descriptive, and are some of the best specimens of the poetry of that age. His works are :—1. Descriptio Orbis Terrae, also called Metaphrasis Periegeseos Dionysii, in 1394 hexameter lines, derived directly from the περιήγησις of Dionysius, and containing a succinct account of the most remarkable objects in the physical and political geography of the known world. — 2. Ora Maritima, a fragment in 703 Iambic trimeters, describing the shores of the Mediterranean from Marseilles to Cadiz. — 3. Aratea Phaenomena, and Aratea Prognostica, both in Hexameter verse, the first containing 1325, the second 552 lines, being a paraphrase of the two works of Aratus. The poems are edited by Wernsdorf, in his Poetae Latini Minores, vol. v. pt. ii., which, however, does not include the Aratea.

Aviōnes, a people in the N. of Germany, whose position is uncertain.

Avītus, Alphĭus, a Latin poet under Augustus and Tiberius, the fragments of some of whose poems are preserved in the Anthologia Latina.

Avītus, Cluentĭus. [Cluentius.]

Avītus, M. Maecilĭus, emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by the assistance of Theodoric II. king of the Visigoths in A. D. 455 ; but, after a year's reign, was deposed by Ricimer.

Axĕnus. [Euxinus Pontus.]

Axĭa (Castell d' Asso), a fortress in the territory of Tarquinii in Etruria.

Axĭon (Ἀξίων), son of Phegeus, brother of Temenus, along with whom he killed Alcmaeon.

Axiŏthĕa (Ἀξιοθέα), a maiden of Phlius, who came to Athens, and putting on male attire, was for some time a hearer of Plato, and afterwards of Speusippus.

Axĭus, Q., an intimate friend of Cicero and Varro, one of the speakers in the 3d book of Varro's De Re Rustica.

Axĭus (Ἄξιος : Wardar or Vardhari), the chief river in Macedonia, rises in Mt. Scardus, receives many affluents, of which the most important is the Erĭgon, and flows S.E. through Macedonia into the Thermaic gulf. As a river-god, Axius begot by Periboea a son Pelegon, the father of Asteropaeus.

Axŏna (Aisne), a river in Gallia Belgica, which falls into the Isara (Oise).

Axūme. [Auxume.]

Azan (Ἀζάν), son of Arcas and the nymph Erato, brother of Aphīdas and Elatus. The part of Arcadia which he received from his father was called Azania : it was on the borders of Elis.

Azāni (Ἀζανοί : Ἀζανίτης), a town of Phrygia, on the river Rhyndacus, and 20 miles S.W. of Cotyaeium (Kiutayah). The ruins of columns, capitals, and other architectural fragments are scattered over the ground. There are also the remains of a splendid temple, and of a theatre. This ancient site was discovered by Mr. Keppel.

Azanĭa or Barbarĭa (Ἀζανία, Βαρβαρία : Ajan), the region on the E. coast of Africa, S. of Aromata Pr. (C. Guardafui), as far as Rhaptum Pr. (C. Formosa ?)

Azēnĭa (Ἀζηνία : Ἀζηνιεύς), a demus in the S.W. of Attica, near Sunium, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis.

Azeus (Ἀζεύς), son of Clymenus of Orchomenos, brother of Erginus, Stratius, Arrhon, and Pyleus, father of Actor and grandfather of Astyoche.

Azŏrus or Azŏrĭum (Ἄζωρος, Ἀζώριον : Ἀζωρίτης, Ἀζωριάτης, Ἀζωρεύς), a town in the N. of Thessaly, on the W. slope of Olympus, formed, with Doliche and Pythium, the Perrhaebian Tripolis.

Azōtus (Ἄζωτος : Ἀζώτιος : Ashdod or Ashdoud), a city of Palestine, near the sea-coast, 9 miles N.E. of Ascalon. It was one of the free cities of the Philistines, which were included within the portion of the tribe of Judah.

B.

Babrĭus (Βάβριος), a Greek poet, probably in the time of Augustus, turned the fables of Aesop into verse, of which only a few fragments were known, till within the last few years, when a manuscript containing 123 fables was discovered on Mount Athos. Edited by Lachmann, Berol. 1845 ; by Orelli and Baiter, Turic. 1845 ; by Lewis, Lond. 1847.

Băbylon (Βαβυλών : Βαβυλώνιος, fem. Βαβυλωνίς : Babel in O. T. : Ru. at and around Hillah), one of the oldest and greatest cities of the ancient world, the capital of a great empire, was built on both banks of the river Euphrates, in about 32° 28′ N. lat. Its foundation, and the establishment of a kingdom by Nimrod, with the city for a capital, are among the first recorded facts subsequent to the Deluge (Gen. x. 9, 10, xi. 1—9). Secular history ascribes its origin to Belus (i. e. the god Baal), and its enlargement and decoration to Ninus or his wife Semiramis ; or, according to another tradition, the country was subdued by Ninus, and the city was subsequently built by Semiramis, who made it the capital of the Assyrian empire. At all events it is pretty clear that Babylon was subject to the Assyrian kings of Nineveh from a very early period ; and the time at which the governors of Babylon first succeeded in making themselves virtually independent, cannot be determined with any certainty until we know more of the history of the early Assyrian dynasties. [Comp. NABONASSAR.] The Babylonian empire begins with the reign of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, who, with the aid of the Median king Cyaxares, overthrew the Assyrian monarchy, and destroyed Nineveh (B. C. 606), and soon afterwards defended his kingdom against the aggressions (at first successful) of Necho, king of Egypt, in the battle of Circesium, B. C. 604. Under his son and successor, Nebuchadnezzar (B. C. 604—562), the Babylonian empire reached its height, and extended from the Euphrates to Egypt, and from the mountains of Armenia to the deserts of Arabia. After his death it again declined, until it was overthrown by the capture of Babylon by the Medes and Persians under Cyrus (B. C. 538), who made the city one of the capitals of the Persian empire, the others being Susa and Ecbatana. Under his successors the city rapidly sank. Darius I. dismantled its fortifications, in consequence of a revolt of its inhabitants; Xerxes carried off the golden statue of Belus, and the temple in which it stood became a ruin. After the death of Alexander, Babylon became a part of the Syrian kingdom of Seleucus Nicator, who contributed to its decline by the foundation of SELEUCIA on the Tigris, which soon eclipsed it. At the commencement of our era, the greater part of the city was in ruins; and at the present day all its visible remains consist of mounds of earth, ruined masses of brick walls, and a few scattered fragments. Its very site has been turned into a dreary marsh by repeated inundations from the river. — The city of Babylon had reached the summit of its magnificence in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. It formed a square, each side of which was 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) in length. The walls, of burnt brick, were 200 cubits high and 50 thick; in them were 250 towers and 60 bronze gates; and they were surrounded by a deep ditch. The Euphrates, which divided the city into 2 equal parts, was embanked with walls of brick, the openings of which at the ends of the transverse streets were closed by gates of bronze. A bridge, built on piers of hewn stone, united the 2 quarters of the city; and at each end of it stood a royal palace: these erections were ascribed to Semiramis. Of two other public buildings of the greatest celebrity, the one was the temple of Belus, rising to a great height, and consisting of 8 stories, gradually diminishing in width, and ascended by a flight of steps, which wound round the whole building on the outside; in the uppermost story was the golden statue of Belus, with a golden altar and other treasures: this building also was ascribed to Semiramis. The other edifice referred to was the "hanging gardens" of Nebuchadnezzar, laid out upon terraces which were raised above one another on arches. The houses of the city were 3 or 4 stories in height, and the streets were straight, intersecting one another at right angles. The buildings were almost universally constructed of bricks, some burnt and some only sun-dried, cemented together with hot bitumen and in some cases with mortar. — The Babylonians were certainly a Semitic race; but the ruling class, to which the kings and priests and the men of learning belonged, were the Chaldaeans, whose origin and affinities are somewhat doubtful; the most probable opinion, however, is that they were a tribe of invaders, who descended from the mountains on the borders of Armenia, and conquered the Babylonians. — The religion of the Chaldaeans was Sabaeism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, not purely so, but symbolized in the forms of idols, besides whom they had other divinities, representing the powers of nature. The priests formed a caste, and cultivated science, especially astronomy; in which they knew the apparent motions of the sun, moon, and 5 of the planets, the calculation of eclipses of the moon, the division of the zodiac into 12 constellations, and of the year into 12 months, and the measurement of time by the sun-dial. They must also have had other instruments for measuring time, such as the water-clock, for instance; and it is highly probable that the definite methods of determining such quantities, which the Chaldaean astronomers invented, were the origin of the systems of weights and measures used by the Greeks and Romans. Their buildings prove their knowledge of mechanics; and their remains, slight as they are, show considerable progress in the fine arts. — The Babylonian government was an unlimited monarchy: the king appears to have lived in almost total seclusion from his people, surrounded by his court; and the provinces were administered by governors, like the Persian satraps, responsible only to the monarch, whose commands they obeyed or defied according to his strength or weakness. — The position of the city on the lower course of the Euphrates, by which it was connected with the Persian Gulf, and at the meeting of natural routes between E. Asia and India on the one side, and Europe, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, on the other, made it the seat of a flourishing commerce and of immense wealth and luxury. — The district around the city, bounded by the Tigris on the E., Mesopotamia on the N., the Arabian Desert on the W., and extending to the head of the Persian Gulf on the S., was known in later times by the name of Babylonia (Irak Arabi), sometimes also called Chaldaea. [But comp. CHALDAEA.] This district was a plain, subject to continual inundations from the Tigris and Euphrates, which were regulated by canals, the chief of which was the Naarmalcha, i. e. Royal River or Canal (ποταμὸς βασίλειος, διῶρυξ βασιλική, flumen regium), which extended from the Tigris at Seleucia due W. to the Euphrates, and was navigable. The country was fertile, but deficient in trees.

Băbȳlon (Βαβυλών: nr. Fostat or Old Cairo), a fortress in Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, exactly opposite to the pyramids, and at the beginning of the canal which connected the Nile with the Red Sea. Its origin was ascribed by tradition to a body of Babylonian deserters. It first became an important place under the Romans. Augustus made it the station of one of the 3 Egyptian legions.

Babylōnĭa. [BABYLON.]

Bacchae (Βάκχαι), also called Maenades and Thyiades. 1. The female companions of Dionysus or Bacchus in his wanderings through the East, are represented as crowned with vine-leaves, clothed with fawn-skins, and carrying in their hands the thyrsus (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.). — 2. Priestesses of Dionysus, who by wine and other exciting causes worked themselves up to frenzy at the Dionysiac festivals.

Bacchĭădae (Βακχιάδαι), an Heraclid clan, derived their name from Bacchis, king of Corinth, and retained the supreme rule in that state, first under a monarchical form of government, and next as a close oligarchy, till their deposition by Cypselus, about B. C. 657. They were for the most part driven into banishment, and are said to have taken refuge in different parts of Greece and even Italy.

Bacchīus (Βακχεῖος). 1. The author of a short musical treatise called εἰσαγωγὴ τέχνης μουσικῆς, printed by Meibomius, in the Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652. — 2. Of Tanagra in Boeotia, one of the earliest commentators on the writings of Hippocrates: his writings have perished. — 3. Of Miletus, the author of a work on agriculture.

Bacchus. [DIONYSUS.]

Bacchȳlĭdes (Βακχυλίδης), one of the great lyric poets of Greece, born at Iulis in Ceos, and nephew as well as fellow-townsman of Simonides. He flourished about B. C. 470, and lived a long time at the court of Hiero in Syracuse, together with Simonides and Pindar. He wrote in the Doric dialect Hymns, Paeans, Dithyrambs, &c.; but all his poems have perished, with the exception of a few fragments, and 2 epigrams in the Greek Anthology. The fragments have been published by Neue, Bacchylidis Cei Fragmenta, Berol. 1823, and by Bergk, Poëtae Lyrici Graeci, p. 820.

Bacēnis Silva, a forest which separated the Suevi from the Cherusci, probably the W. part of the Thuringian Forest.

Bacis (Βάκις), the name of several prophets, of whom the most celebrated was the Boeotian seer, who delivered his oracles in hexameter verse at Heleon in Boeotia. In later times there existed a collection of his oracles, similar to the Sibylline books at Rome.

Bactra or Zariaspa (τὰ Βάκτρα, τὰ Ζαρίασπα and ἡ Ζαρι'σπη: Balkh), the capital of BACTRIA, appears to have been founded by the early Persian kings, but not to have been a considerable city till the time of Alexander, who settled in it his Greek mercenaries and his disabled Macedonian soldiers. It stood at the N. foot of the M. Paropamisus (the Hindoo Koosh) on the river Bactrus (Adirsiah or Dehas), about 25 miles S. of its junction with the Oxus. It was the centre of a considerable traffic. The existing ruins, 20 miles in circuit, are all of the Mohammedan period.

Bactrĭa or -iāna (Βακτριανή: Βάκτροι, -ιοι, -ιανοί: Bokhara), a province of the Persian empire, bounded on the S. by M. Paropamisus, which separated it from Ariana, on the E. by the N. branch of the same range, which divided it from the Sacae, on the N.E. by the Oxus, which separated it from Sogdiana, and on the W. by Margiana. It was inhabited by a rude and warlike people, who were subdued by Cyrus or his next successors. It was included in the conquests of Alexander, and formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, until B. C. 255, when Theodotus, its governor, revolted from Antiochus II., and founded the Greek kingdom of Bactria, which lasted till B. C. 134 or 125, when it was overthrown by the Parthians, with whom, during its whole duration, its kings were sometimes at war, and sometimes in alliance against Syria. This Greek kingdom extended beyond the limits of the province of Bactria, and included at least a part of Sogdiana. Bactria was watered by the Oxus and its tributaries, and contained much fertile land; and much of the commerce between W. Asia and India passed through it.

Baduhennae Lucus, a wood in W. Friesland.

Baebĭa Gens, plebeian, the most important members of which are given under their surnames, DIVES, SULCA, TAMPHILUS.

Baecŭla, a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, W. of Castulo, in the neighbourhood of silver mines.

Baeterrae (Beziers), also called Biterrensis urbs, a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the Obris, not far from Narbo, and a Roman colony: its neighbourhood produced good wine.

Baetĭca [HISPANIA.]

Baetis (Guadalquiver), a river in S. Spain, formerly called Tartessus, and by the inhabitants Certis, rises in Hispania Tarraconensis in the territory of the Oretani, flows S.W. through Baetica, to which it gives its name, past the cities of Corbuda and Hispalis, and falls into the Atlantic Ocean by 2 mouths, N. of Gades.

Bagăcum (Bavai), the chief town of the Nervii in Gallia Belgica: there are many Roman remains in the modern town.

Bagaudae, a Gallic people, who revolted under Diocletian, and were with difficulty subdued by Maximian, A. D. 286.

Bagōas (Βαγώας), an eunuch, highly trusted and favoured by Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), whom he poisoned, B. C. 338. He was put to death by Darius III. Codomannus, whom he had attempted likewise to poison, 336. The name Bagoas frequently occurs in Persian history, and is sometimes used by Latin writers as synonymous with an eunuch.

Bagrădas (Βαγράδας: Mejerdah), a river of N. Africa, falling into the Gulf of Carthage near Utica.

Baiae (Baiānus), a town in Campania, on a small bay W. of Naples, and opposite Puteoli, was situated in a beautiful country, which abounded in warm mineral springs. The baths of Baiae were the most celebrated in Italy, and the town itself was the favourite watering-place of the Romans, who flocked thither in crowds for health and pleasure; it was distinguished by licentiousness and immorality. The whole country was studded with the palaces of the Roman nobles and emperors, which covered the coast from Baiae to Puteoli: many of these palaces were built out into the sea. (Hor. Carm. ii. 18. 20.) The site of ancient Baiae is now for the most part covered by the sea.

Balbīnus, D. Caelĭus, was elected emperor by the senate along with M. Clodius Pupienus Maximus, after the murder of the two Gordians in Africa at the beginning of A. D. 238; but the new emperors were slain by the soldiers at Rome in June in the same year.

Balbus, M'. Acilĭus, the name of 2 consuls, one in B. C. 150, and the other in 114.

Balbus, T. Ampĭus, tribune of the plebs B. C. 63, was a supporter of Pompey, whom he joined in the civil war B. C. 49. He was pardoned by Caesar through the intercession of Cicero, who wrote to him on the occasion (ad Fam. vi. 12).

Balbus, M. Atĭus, of Aricia, married Julia, the sister of Julius Caesar, who bore him a daughter, Atia, the mother of Augustus Caesar.

Balbus, L. Cornelĭus. 1. Of Gades, served under Q. Metellus and Pompey against Sertorius in Spain, and received from Pompey the Roman citizenship. He accompanied Pompey on his return to Rome, B. C. 71, and was for a long time one of his most intimate friends. At the same time he gained the friendship of Caesar, who placed great confidence in him. As the friend of Caesar and Pompey, he had numerous enemies, who accused him in 56 of having illegally assumed the Roman citizenship; he was defended by Cicero, whose speech has come down to us, and was acquitted. In the civil war, 49, Balbus did not take any open part against Pompey; but he attached himself to Caesar, and, in conjunction with Oppius, had the entire management of Caesar's affairs at Rome. After the death of Caesar (44) he was equally successful in gaining the favour of Octavian, who raised him to the consulship in 40. Balbus wrote a diary (Ephemeris), which has not come down to us, of the most remarkable occurrences in Caesar's life. He took care that Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic war should be continued; and we accordingly find the 8th book dedicated to him. — 2. Nephew of the preceding, received the Roman franchise along with his uncle. He served under Caesar in the civil war; he was quaestor of Asinius Pollio in Further Spain in B. C. 43, and while there added to his native town Gades a suburb; many years afterwards he was proconsul of Africa, and triumphed over the Garamantes in 19. He built a magnificent theatre at Rome, which was dedicated in 13.

Balbus, Lucilius. 1. L., a jurist, and brother of the following. — 2. Q., a Stoic philosopher, and a pupil of Panaetius, is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his De Natura Deorum.

Balbus, Octavius, a contemporary of Cicero, bore a high character as a judex; he was put to death by the triumvirs, B. C. 43.

Balbus, Sp. Thorius, tribune of the plebs, about B. C. 111, proposed an agrarian law. See Dict. of Ant., art. Lex Thoria.

Baleāres (Βαλεαρίδες, Βαλιαρίδες), also called Gymnēsiae (Γυμνησίαι) by the Greeks, 2 islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, distinguished by the epithets Major and Minor, whence their modern names Majorca and Minorca. They were early known to the Carthaginians, who established settlements there for the purposes of trade; they afterwards received colonies from Rhodes; and their population was at a later time of a very mixed kind. Their inhabitants, also called Baleares, were celebrated as slingers, and were employed as such in the armies of the Carthaginians and Romans. In consequence of their piracies they provoked the hostility of the Romans, and were finally subdued B. C. 123, by Q. Metellus, who assumed accordingly the surname Balearicus.

Balista, prefect of the praetorians under Valerian, whom he accompanied to the East. After the defeat and capture of that emperor (A. D. 260), he rallied a body of Roman troops, and defeated the Persians in Cilicia. His subsequent career is obscure; he is mentioned as one of the Thirty Tyrants, and was probably put to death, about 264, by Odenathus.

Bambalĭo, M. Fulvĭus, father of Fulvia, the wife of M. Antonius, the triumvir, received the nickname of Bambalio on account of a hesitancy in his speech.

Bambȳcē. [HIERAPOLIS].

Bănăsa (Mamora? Ru.), a city of Mauretania Tingitana, on the river Subur (Sebou), near the W. coast: a colony under Augustus.

Bandŭsĭae Fons (Sambuco), a fountain in Apulia, 6 miles from Venusia. (Hor. Carm. iii. 13.)

Bantĭa (Bantinus; Banzi or Vanzi), a town in Apulia, near Venusia, in a woody district (saltus Bantini, Hor. Carm. iii. 4. 15).

Barbāna (Bojana), a river in Illyria, flows through the Palus Labeatis.

Barbări (Βάρβαροι), the name given by the Greeks to all foreigners, whose language was not Greek, and who were therefore regarded by the Greeks as an inferior race. The Romans applied the name to all people, who spoke neither Greek nor Latin.

Barbărĭa. [AZANIA.]

Barbātĭo, commander of the household troops under Gallus, whom he arrested by command of Constantius, A. D. 354. In 355 he was made general of the infantry, and sent into Gaul to assist Julian against the Alemanni. He was put to death by Constantius in 359.

Barbātus, M. Horātĭus, consul B. C. 449 with Valerius Publicola after the overthrow of the decemvirs. [PUBLICOLA.]

Barbosthĕnes, a mountain E. of Sparta.

Barbŭla, Aemĭlĭus. 1. Q., consul B. C. 317, when he subdued Apulia, and consul again in 311, when he fought against the Etruscans. — 2. L., consul in 281, carried on war against the Tarentines, Samnites, and Sallentines. — 3. M., consul in 230, carried on war against the Ligurians.

Barca, the surname of HAMILCAR, the father of Hannibal, is probably the same as the Hebrew Barak, which signifies lightning. His family was distinguished subsequently as the "Barcine family," and the democratical party, which supported this family, as the "Barcine party."

Barca or -e (Βάρκη: Βαρκίτης, Βαρκαῖος, Barcaeus). 1. (Merjeh, Ru.), the second city of Cyrenaica, in N. Africa, 100 stadia (10 geog. miles) from the sea, appears to have been at first a settlement of a Libyan tribe, the Barcaei, but about B. C. 560 was colonized by the Greek seceders from Cyrene, and became so powerful as to make the W. part of Cyrenaica virtually independent of the mother city. In B. C. 510 it was taken by the Persians, who removed most of its inhabitants to Bactria, and under the Ptolemies its ruin was completed by the erection of its port into a new city, which was named PTOLEMAIS, and which took the place of Barca as one of the cities of the Cyrenaïc Pentapolis. — 2. A town in Bactria peopled by the removed inhabitants of the Cyrenaic Barca.

Barcĭno (Barcelona), a town of the Laeëtani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, afterwards a Roman colony: the town was not large, but it possessed an excellent harbour.

Bardanes. [ARSACES XXI.]

Bardylis or Bardyllis (Βάρδυλις, Βάρδυλλις), an Illyrian chieftain, carried on frequent wars with the Macedonians, but was at length defeated and slain in battle by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, B. C. 359.

Barĕa Sorānus, consul suffectus in A. D. 52 under Claudius, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, was a man of justice and integrity. He was accused of treason in the reign of Nero, and was condemned to death together with his daughter Servilia. The chief witness against him was P. Egnatius Celer, a Stoic philosopher, and the teacher of Soranus. (See Juv. iii. 116.)

Bargūsii, a people in the N.E. of Spain, between the Pyrenees and the Iberus.

Bărium (Barinus: Bari), a town in Apulia, on the Adriatic, a municipium, and celebrated for its fisheries (Barium piscosum, Hor. Sat. i. 5. 97).

Barsaentes (Βαρσαέντης) or Barzaentus (Βαρζάεντος), satrap of the Arachoti and Drangae, took part in the murder of Darius III., and afterwards fled to India, where he was seized by the inhabitants and delivered up to Alexander, who put him to death.

Barsinē (Βαρσίνη). 1. Daughter of Artabazus, and wife of Memnon the Rhodian, subsequently married Alexander the Great, to whom she bore a son, Hercules. She and her son were put to death by Polysperchon in 309. — 2. Also called Statīra, elder daughter of Darius III., whom Alexander married at Susa, B.C. 324. Shortly after Alexander's death she was murdered by Roxana.

Basănītis. [BATANAEA.]

Basilīa (Basel or Bâle), a town on the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of which Valentinian built a fortress.

Basilīna, the mother of Julian the apostate, being the second wife of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great.

Basilīus, commonly called Basil the Great, was born A.D. 329, at Caesarēa. He studied at Antioch or Constantinople under Libanius, and subsequently continued his studies for 4 years (351—355) at Athens, chiefly under the sophists Himerius and Proaeresius. Among his fellow-students were the emperor Julian and Gregory Nazianzen, the latter of whom became his most intimate friend. After acquiring the greatest reputation as a student for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and science, he returned to Caesarea, where he began to plead causes, but soon abandoned his profession and devoted himself to a religious life. He now led an ascetic life for many years; he was elected bishop of Caesarea in 370 in place of Eusebius; he died in 379. — The best edition of his works is by Garnier, Paris, 1721—1730.

Băsĭlus, L. Minucĭus, served under Caesar in Gaul, and commanded part of Caesar's fleet in the civil war. He was one of Caesar's assassins (B.C. 44), and in the following year was murdered by his own slaves.

Bassăreus (Βασσαρεύς), a surname of Dionysus, probably derived from βασσαρίς, a fox-skin, worn by the god himself and the Maenads in Thrace.

Bassus, Aufidĭus, an orator and historian under Augustus and Tiberius, wrote an account of the Roman wars in Germany, and a work upon Roman history of a more general character, which was continued in 31 books by the elder Pliny.

Bassus, Q. Caecilĭus, a Roman eques, and an adherent of Pompey, fled to Tyre after the battle of Pharsalia B.C. 48. Shortly afterwards he obtained possession of Tyre, and was joined by most of the troops of Sex. Caesar, the governor of Syria, who had been killed by his own soldiers at the instigation of Bassus. He subsequently settled down in Apamea, where he maintained himself for 3 years (46—43) against C. Antistius Vetus, and afterwards against Statius Murcus and Marcius Crispus. On the arrival of Cassius in Syria in 43, the troops of Bassus went over to Cassius.

Bassus, Caesĭus, a Roman lyric poet, and a friend of Persius, who addresses his 6th satire to him, was destroyed along with his villa in A.D. 79 by the eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii.

Bassus, Saleius, a Roman epic poet of considerable merit, contemporary with Vespasian.

Bastarnae or Basternae, a warlike German people, who migrated to the country near the mouth of the Danube. They are first mentioned in the wars of Philip and Perseus against the Romans, and at a later period they frequently devastated Thrace, and were engaged in wars with the Roman governors of the province of Macedonia. In B.C. 30, they were defeated by M. Crassus, and driven across the Danube; and we find them, at a later time, partly settled between the Tyras (Dneister) and Borysthenes (Dnieper), and partly at the mouth of the Danube, under the name of Peucini, from their inhabiting the island of Peuce, at the mouth of this river.

Bastitāni (also Bastetani, Bastuli), a people in Hispania Baetica on the coast.

Bătănaea or Basanitis (Βαταναῖα, Βασανῖτις: O. T. Bashan, Basan), a district of Palestine, E. of the Jordan, extending from the river Jabbok on the S. to Mt. Hermon, in the Antilibanus chain, on the N. The s and t are mere dialectic varieties.

Bătāvi or Bătăvi, a Celtic people who abandoned their homes in consequence of civil dissensions, before the time of Julius Caesar, and settled in the island formed by the Rhine, the Waal, and the Maas, which island was called after them Insula Batavorum. They were for a long time allies of the Romans in their wars against the Germans, and were of great service to the former by their excellent cavalry; but at length, exasperated by the oppressions of the Roman officers, they rose in revolt under Claudius Civilis, in A.D. 69, and were with great difficulty subdued. On their subjugation, they were treated by the Romans with mildness, and were exempt from taxation. Their country, which also extended beyond the island S. of the Maas and the Waal, was called, at a later time, Batavia. Their chief towns were Lugdunum (Leyden) and Batavodurum, between the Maas and the Waal. The Caninefates or Canninefates were a branch of the Batavi, and dwelt in the W. of the island.

Batavodūrum. [BATAVI.]

Bathycles (Βαθυκλῆς), a celebrated artist of Magnesia on the Maeander, constructed for the Lacedaemonians the colossal throne of the Amyclaean Apollo. He probably flourished about the time of Solon, or a little later.

Băthyllus. 1. Of Samos, a beautiful youth beloved by Anacreon. — 2. Of Alexandria, the freedman and favourite of Maecenas, brought to perfection, together with Pylades of Cilicia, the imitative dance or ballet called Pantomimus. Bathyllus excelled in comic, and Pylades in tragic personifications.

Batnae (Βάτναι: Βατναῖος). 1. (Sarvj), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, E. of the Euphrates, and S.W. of Edessa, at about equal distances; founded by the Macedonians, and taken by Trajan; celebrated for its annual fair of Indian and Syrian merchandize. — 2. (Dahab), a city of Cyrrhestice, in Syria, between Beroea and Hierapolis.

Bato (Βάτων). 1. The charioteer of Amphiaraus, was swallowed up by the earth along with AMPHIARAUS. — 2. The name of 2 leaders of the Pannonians and Dalmatians in their insurrection in the reign of Augustus, A. D. 6. Tiberius and Germanicus were both sent against them, and obtained some advantages over them, in consequence of which the Pannonians and Dalmatians concluded a peace with the Romans in 8. But the peace was of short duration. The Dalmatian Bato put his namesake to death, and renewed the war. Tiberius now finally subdued Dalmatia; Bato surrendered to him in 9 upon promise of pardon; he accompanied Tiberius to Italy, and his life was spared.

Battĭadae (Βαττιάδαι), kings of Cyrene during 8 generations. 1. Battus I., of Thera, led a colony to Africa at the command of the Delphic oracle, and founded Cyrene about B. C. 631. He was the first king of Cyrene, his government was gentle and just, and after his death in 599 he was worshipped as a hero. — 2. Arcesilaus I., son of No. 1, reigned B. C. 599—583. — 3. Battus II., surnamed "the Happy," son of No. 2, reigned B. C. 583—560? In his reign, Cyrene received a great number of colonists from various parts of Greece; and in consequence of the increased strength of his kingdom Battus was able to subdue the neighbouring Libyan tribes, and to defeat Apries, king of Egypt (570), who had espoused the cause of the Libyans. — 4. Arcesilaus II., son of No. 3, surnamed "the Oppressive," reigned about B. C. 560—550. In consequence of dissensions between himself and his brothers, the latter withdrew from Cyrene, and founded Barca. He was strangled by his brother or friend, Learchus. — 5. Battus III., or "the Lame," son of No. 4, reigned about B. C. 550—530. In his time, Demonax, a Mantinean, gave a new constitution to the city, whereby the royal power was reduced within very narrow limits. — 6. Arcesilaus III., son of No. 5, reigned about B. C. 530—514, was driven from Cyrene in an attempt to recover the ancient royal privileges, but recovered his kingdom with the aid of Samian auxiliaries. He endeavoured to strengthen himself by making submission to Cambyses in 525. He was, however, again obliged to leave Cyrene; he fled to Alazir, king of Barca, whose daughter he had married, and was there slain by the Barcaeans and some Cyrenaean exiles. — 7. Battus IV., probably son of No. 6. of whose life we have no accounts. — 8. Arcesilaus IV., probably son of No. 7, whose victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games, B. C. 466, is celebrated by Pindar in his 4th and 5th Pythian odes. At his death, about 450, a popular government was established.

Battus (Βάττος), a shepherd whom Hermes turned into a stone, because he broke a promise which he made to the god.

Batŭlum, a town in Campania of uncertain site.

Baucis. [PHILEMON.]

Bauli (Bacolo), a collection of villas rather than a town, between Misenum and Baiae in Campania.

Băvĭus and Maevĭus, 2 malevolent poetasters, who attacked the poetry of Virgil and Horace.

Bazīra or Bezīra (Βάζιρα: Βάζιροι: Bajour, N.W. of Peshawur), a city in the Paropamisus, taken by Alexander on his march into India.

Bebrўces (Βέβρυκες). 1. A mythical people in Bithynia, said to be of Thracian origin, whose king, Amycus, slew Pollux [p. 76, a.]. — 2. An ancient Iberian people on the coast of the Mediterranean, N. and S. of the Pyrenees: they possessed numerous herds of cattle.

Bedriăcum, a small place in Cisalpine Gaul between Cremona and Verona, celebrated for the defeat both of Otho and of the Vitellian troops, A. D. 69.

Belbīna (Βέλβινα: Βελβινίτης). 1. (St. George d'Arbori), an island in the Aegaean sea, off the S. coast of Attica. — 2. See BELEMINA.

Belemīna (Βελεμίνα), also called Belmina and Belbina, a town in the N.W. of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia. The surrounding district was called Belminatis and Belbinatis.

Belĕsis or Belĕsys (Βέλεσις, Βέλεσυς), a Chaldaean priest at Babylon, who is said, in conjunction with Arbaces, the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. [ARBACES.] Belesis afterwards received the satrapy of Babylon from Arbaces.

Belgae, one of the 3 great people, into which Caesar divides the population of Gaul. They were bounded on the N. by the Rhine, on the W. by the ocean, on the S. by the Sequana (Seine) and Matrona (Marne), and on the E. by the territory of the Treviri. They were of German origin, and had settled in the country, expelling or reducing to subjection the former inhabitants. They were the bravest of the inhabitants of Gaul, were subdued by Caesar after a courageous resistance, and were the first Gallic people who threw off the Roman dominion. The Belgae were subdivided into the tribes of the NERVII, BELLOVACI, REMI, SUESSIONES, MORINI, MENAPII, ADUATICI, and others; and the collective forces of the whole nation were more than a million.

Belgĭca [GALLIA.]

Belgĭum, the name generally applied to the territory of the BELLOVACI, and of the tribes dependent upon the latter, namely, the Atrebates, Ambiani, Velliocasses, Aulerci, and Caleti. Belgium did not include the whole country inhabited by the Belgae, for we find the Nervii, Remi, &c., expressly excluded from it. (Caes. B. G. v. 24.)

Belisārĭus, the greatest general of Justinian, was a native of Illyria and of mean extraction. In A. D. 534, he overthrew the Vandal kingdom in Africa, which had been established by Genseric about 100 years previously, and took prisoner the Vandal king, Gelimer, whom he led in triumph to Constantinople. In 535—540, Belisarius carried on war against the Goths in Italy, and conquered Sicily, but he was recalled by the jealousy of Justinian. In 541—544 he again carried on war against the Goths in Italy, but was again recalled by Justinian, leaving his victories to be completed by his rival Narses in the complete overthrow of the Gothic kingdom, and the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna. The last victory of Belisarius was gained in repelling an inroad of the Bulgarians, 559. In 563 he was accused of a conspiracy against the life of Justinian; according to a popular tradition, he was deprived of his property, his eyes were put out, and he wandered as a beggar through Constantinople; but according to the more authentic account, he was merely imprisoned for a year in his own palace, and then restored to his honours. He died in 565.

Bellĕrŏphon or Bellĕrŏphontes (Βελλεροφῶν or Βελλεροφόντης), son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and Eurymede, and grandson of Sisyphus, was originally called Hipponous, and received the name Bellerophon from slaying the Corinthian Bellerus. To be purified from the murder he fled to Proetus, whose wife Antēa fell in love with the young hero; but as her offers were rejected by him, she accused him to her husband of having made improper proposals to her. Proetus, unwilling to kill him with his own hands, sent him to his father-in-law, Iobates, king of Lycia, with a letter in which the latter was requested to put the young man to death. Iobates accordingly sent him to kill the monster Chimaera, thinking that he was sure to perish in the contest. After obtaining possession of the winged horse, PEGASUS, Bellerophon rose with him in the air, and killed the Chimaera with his arrows. Iobates, thus disappointed, sent Bellerophon against the Solymi and next against the Amazons. In these contests he was also victorious; and on his return to Lycia, being attacked by the bravest Lycians, whom Iobates had placed in ambush for the purpose, Bellerophon slew them all. Iobates, now seeing that it was hopeless to kill the hero, gave him his daughter (Philonoë, Anticlēa, or Cassandra) in marriage, and made him his successor on the throne. Bellerophon became the father of Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodamīa. At last Bellerophon drew upon himself the hatred of the gods, and, consumed by grief, wandered lonely through the Aleïan field, avoiding the paths of men. This is all that Homer says respecting Bellerophon's later fate: some traditions related that he attempted to fly to heaven upon Pegasus, but that Zeus sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, which threw off the rider upon the earth, who became lame or blind in consequence. (Hor. Carm. iv. 11. 26.)

Belli, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Bellōna, the Roman goddess of war, was probably a Sabine divinity. She is frequently mentioned by the Roman poets as the companion of Mars, or even as his sister or his wife, and is described as armed with a bloody scourge. (Virg. Aen. viii. 703). During the Samnite wars, in B.C. 296, App. Claudius Caecus vowed a temple to her, which was erected in the Campus Martius. Her priests, called Bellonarii, wounded their own arms or legs when they offered sacrifices to her.

Bellovăci, the most powerful of the Belgae, dwelt in the modern Beauvais, between the Seine, Oise, Somme, and Bresle. In Caesar's time they could bring 100,000 men into the field, but they were subdued by Caesar with the other Belgae.

Bĕlon or Baelon (Βελών, Βαιλών, nr. Bolonia, Ru.), a sea-port town in Hispania Baetica on a river of the same name (now Barbate), the usual place for crossing over to Tingis in Mauretania.

Bēlus (Βῆλος), son of Poseidon and Libya or Eurynome, twin-brother of Agenor, and father of Aegyptus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several eastern nations, from whom the legions about him were transplanted to Greece and there became mixed up with Greek myths.

Bēlus (Βῆλος: Nahr Naman), a river of Phoenicia, rising at the foot of M. Carmel, and falling into the sea close to the S. of Ptolemais (Acre), celebrated for the tradition that its fine sand first led the Phoenicians to the invention of glass.

Bēnăcus Lacus (Lago di Garda), a lake in the N. of Italy (Gallia Transpadana), out of which the Mincius flows.

Bĕnĕventum (Benevento), a town in Samnium on the Appia Via, at the junction of the two valleys, through which the Sabatus and Calor flow, formerly called Maleventum on account, it is said, of its bad air. It was one of the most ancient towns in Italy, having been founded, according to tradition, by Diomede. In the Samnite wars it was subdued by the Romans, who sent a colony thither in B.C. 268, and changed its name Maleventum into Beneventum. It was colonized a second time by Augustus, and was hence called Colonia Julia Concordia Augusta Felix. The modern town has several Roman remains, among others a triumphal arch of Trajan.

Bĕrĕcyntĭa (Βερεκυντία), a surname of Cybele, which she derived from Mt. Berecyntus where she was worshipped.

Bĕrĕnīcē (Βερενίκη), a Macedonic form of Pherenīce (Φερενίκη), i. e. "Bringing Victory." — 1. First the wife of an obscure Macedonian, and afterwards of Ptolemy I. Soter, who fell in love with her when she came to Egypt in attendance on his bride Eurydice, Antipater's daughter. She was celebrated for her beauty and virtue, and was the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. — 2. Daughter of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, and wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who divorced Laodice in order to marry her, B.C. 249. On the death of Ptolemy, B.C. 247, Antiochus recalled Laodice, who notwithstanding caused him to be poisoned, and murdered Berenice and her son. — 3. Daughter of Magas, king of Cyrene, and wife of Ptolemy III. Euergetes. She was put to death by her son Ptolemy IV. Philopator on his accession to the throne, 221. The famous hair of Berenice, which she dedicated for her husband's safe return from his Syrian expedition in the temple of Arsinoë at Zephyrium, was said to have become a constellation. It was celebrated by Callimachus in a poem, of which we have a translation by Catullus. — 4. Otherwise called Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, succeeded her father on the throne, B.C. 81, and married Ptolemy X. (Alexander II.), but was murdered by her husband 19 days after her marriage. — 5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, and eldest sister of the famous Cleopatra, was placed on the throne by the Alexandrines when they drove out her father, B.C. 58. She next married Archelaus, but was put to death with her husband, when Gabinius restored Auletes, 55. — 6. Sister of Herod the Great, married Aristobulus, who was put to death, B.C. 6. She afterwards went to Rome, where she spent the remainder of her life. She was the mother of Agrippa I. — 7. Daughter of Agrippa I., married her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had 2 sons. After the death of Herod, A.D. 48, Berenice, then 20 years old, lived with her brother Agrippa II., not without suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him. She gained the love of Titus, who was only withheld from making her his wife by fear of offending the Romans by such a step.

Bĕrĕnīcē (Βερενίκη: Βερενικεύς), the name of several cities of the period of the Ptolemies. 1. Formerly Eziongeber (Ru. nr. Akabah), in Arabia, at the head of the Sinus Aelanites, or E. branch of the Red Sea. — 2. In Upper Egypt (for so it was considered, though it lay a little S. of the parallel of Syene), on the coast of the Red Sea, on a gulf called Sinus Immundus (ἀκάθαρτος κόλπος, now Foul Bay), where its ruins are still visible. It was named after the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, who built it, and made a road hence to Coptos, so that it became a chief emporium for the commerce of Egypt with Arabia and India. Under the Romans it was the residence of a praefectus.— 3. B. Panchrȳsos (B. πάγχρυσος or ἡ κατὰ Σάβας), on the Red Sea coast in Aethiopia, considerably S. of the above. — 4. B. Epidīres (B. ἐπὶ Δειρῆς), on the Prom. Dira, on the W. side of the entrance to the Red Sea (Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb). — 5. (Ben Ghazi, Ru.), in Cyrenaica, formerly Hesperis (Ἑσπερίς), the fabled site of the Gardens of the Hesperides. It took its later name from the wife of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, and was the W.-most of the 5 cities of the Lybian Pentapolis. — There were other cities of the name.

Bergistāni, a people in the N. E. of Spain between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, whose capital was Bergium.

Bergŏmum (Bergomas, -atis: Bergamo), a town of the Orobii in Gallia Cisalpina, between Comum and Brixia, afterwards a municipium.

Berŏē (Βερόη), a Trojan woman, wife of Doryclus, one of the companions of Aeneas, whose form Iris assumed when she persuaded the women to set fire to the ships of Aeneas in Sicily.

Beroea (Βέροια, also Βέῤῥοια, Βερόη: Βεροιεύς, Βεροιαῖος). 1. (Verria), one of the most ancient towns of Macedonia, on one of the lower ranges of Mt. Bermius, and on the Astraeus, a tributary of the Haliacmon, S.W. of Pella, and about 20 miles from the sea. — 2. (Beria), a town in the interior of Thrace, was under the later Roman empire, together with Philippopolis, one of the most important military posts. — 3. (Aleppo or Haleb), a town in Syria near Antioch, enlarged by Seleucus Nicator, who gave it the Macedonian name of Beroea. It is called Helbon or Chelbon in Ezekiel (xxvii. 18), and Chalep in the Byzantine writers, a name still retained in the modern Haleb, for which Europeans have substituted Aleppo.

Bērōsus (Βηρωσός or Βηρωσσός), a priest of Belus at Babylon, lived in the reign of Antiochus II. (B. C. 261—246), and wrote in Greek a history of Babylonia, in 3 books (called Βαβυλωνικά, and sometimes Χαλδαϊκά or ἱστορίαι Χαλδαϊκαί). It embraced the earliest traditions about the human race, a description of Babylonia and its population, and a chronological list of its kings down to the time of the great Cyrus. Berosus says that he derived the materials for his work from the archives in the temple of Belus. The work itself is lost, but considerable fragments of it are preserved in Josephus, Eusebius, Syncellus, and the Christian fathers: the best editions of the fragments are by Richter, Lips. 1825, and in Didot's Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, vol. ii. Paris, 1848.

Bērȳtus (Βηρυτός: Βηρύτιος: Beirut, Ru.), one of the oldest sea-ports of Phoenicia, stood on a promontory near the mouth of the river Magoras (Nahr Beirut), half way between Byblus and Sidon. It was destroyed by the Syrian king Tryphon (B. C. 140), and restored by Agrippa under Augustus, who made it a colony. It afterwards became a celebrated seat of learning.

Bēsa. [ANTINOŏPOLIS.]

Bessi, a fierce and powerful Thracian people, who dwelt along the whole of Mt. Haemus as far as the Euxine. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans (B. C. 168), the Bessi were attacked by the latter, and subdued after a severe struggle.

Bessus (Βῆσσος), satrap of Bactria under Darius III., seized Darius soon after the battle of Arbela, B. C. 331. Pursued by Alexander in the following year, Bessus put Darius to death, and fled to Bactria, where he assumed the title of king. He was betrayed by two of his followers to Alexander, who put him to death.

Bestĭa, Calpurnĭus. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 121, and consul 111, when he carried on war against Jugurtha, but having received large bribes he concluded a peace with the Numidian. On his return to Rome he was in consequence accused and condemned. — 2. L., one of the Catilinarian conspirators, B. C. 63, was at the time tribune of the plebs designatus, and not actually tribune as Sallust says. In 59 he was aedile, and in 57 was an unsuccessful candidate for the praetorship, notwithstanding his bribery, for which offence he was brought to trial in the following year and condemned, although he was defended by Cicero.

Betasĭi, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Tungri and Nervii in the neighbourhood of Beetz in Brabant.

Bezīra. [BAZIRA.]

Biānor. 1. Also called Ocnus or Aucnus, son of Tiberis and Manto, is said to have built the town of Mantua, and to have called it after his mother. — 2. A Bithynian, the author of 21 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Augustus and Tiberius.

Bias (Βίας). 1. Son of Amythaon, and brother of the seer Melampus. He married Pero, daughter of Neleus, whom her father had refused to give to any one unless he brought him the oxen of Iphiclus. These Melampus obtained by his courage and skill, and so won the princess for his brother. Melampus also gained for Bias a third of the kingdom of Argos, in consequence of his curing the daughters of Proetus and the other Argive women of their madness. — 2. Of Priene in Ionia, one of the Seven Sages of Greece, flourished about B. C. 550.

Bibacŭlus, M. Furĭus, a Roman poet, born at Cremona, B. C. 103, wrote iambics, epigrams, and a poem on Caesar's Gaulish wars; the opening line in the latter poem is parodied by Horace. (Furius hibernas cana nive conspuet Alpes, Sat. ii. 5. 41.) It is probable that Bibaculus also wrote a poem entitled Aethiopis, containing an account of the death of Memnon by Achilles, and that the turgidus Alpinus of Horace (Sat. i. 10. 36) is no other than Bibaculus. The attacks of Horace against Bibaculus may probably be owing to the fact that the poems of Bibaculus contained insults against the Caesars. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34.)

Bibracte (Autun), the chief town of the Aedui in Gallia Lugdunensis, afterwards Augustodunum.

Bibrax (Bièvre), a town of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, not far from the Aisne.

Bĭbŭlus Calpurnĭus. 1. M., curule aedile B. C. 65, praetor 62, and consul 59, in each of which years he had C. Julius Caesar as his colleague. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocratical party, but was unable in his consulship to resist the powerful combination of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Caesar's agrarian law, he withdrew from the popular assemblies altogether; whence it was said in joke, that it was the consulship of Julius and Caesar. In 51 Bibulus was proconsul of Syria; and in the civil war he commanded Pompey's fleet in the Adriatic, and died (48) while holding this command off Corcyra. He married Porcia, the daughter of Cato Uticensis, by whom he had 3 sons, 2 of whom were murdered by the soldiers of Gabinius, in Egypt, 50. — 2. L., son of No. 1, was a youth at his father's death, and was brought up by M. Brutus, who married his mother Porcia. He fought with Brutus at the battle of Philippi in 42, but he was afterwards pardoned by Antony, and was intrusted by the latter with important commands. He died shortly before the battle of Actium.

Bidis (Bidīnus, Bidensis), a small town in Sicily, W. of Syracuse.

Bigerra (Becerra?), a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Bigerriōnes or Bigerri, a people in Aquitania near the Pyrenees.

Bilbĭlis (Baubola), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a municipium with the surname Augusta, on the river Salo, also called Bilbilis (Xalon), was the birth-place of the poet Martial, and was celebrated for its manufactories in iron and gold.

Billaeus (Βιλλαῖος: Filbas), a river of Bithynia, rising in the Hypii M., and falling into the Pontus Euxinus 20 stadia (2 geog. miles) E. of Tium. Some made it the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

Bingĭum (Bingen), a town on the Rhine in Gallia Belgica.

Bĭōn (Βίων). 1. Of Smyrna, a bucolic poet, flourished about B. C. 280, and spent the last years of his life in Sicily, where he was poisoned. He was older than Moschus, who laments his untimely death, and calls himself the pupil of Bion. (Mosch. Id. iii.) The style of Bion is refined, and his versification fluent and elegant, but he is inferior to Theocritus in strength and depth of feeling. — Editions, including Moschus, by Jacobs, Gotha, 1795; Wakefield, London, 1795; and Manso, Leipzig, 1807. — 2. Of Borysthenes, near the mouth of the Dnieper, flourished about B.C. 250. He was sold as a slave, when young, and received his liberty from his master, a rhetorician. He studied at Athens, and embraced the later Cyrenaic philosophy, as expounded by THEODORUS, the Atheist. He lived a considerable time at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. Bion was noted for his sharp sayings, whence Horace speaks of persons delighting Bioneis sermonibus et sale nigro. (Epist. ii. 2. 60.)

Bisaltĭa (Βισαλτία: Βισάλτης), a district in Macedonia on the W. bank of the Strymon. The Bisaltae were Thracians, and at the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (B. C. 480) they were ruled by a Thracian prince, who was independent of Macedonia; but at the time of the Peloponnesian war we find them subject to Macedonia.

Bisanthē (Βισάνθη: Βισανθηνός: Rodosto), subsequently Rhaedestum or Rhaedestus, a town in Thrace on the Propontis, with a good harbour, was founded by the Samians, and was in later times one of the great bulwarks of the neighbouring Byzantium.

Bistŏnes (Βίστονες), a Thracian people between Mt. Rhodope and the Aegean sea, on the lake Bistonis in the neighbourhood of Abdera, through whose land Xerxes marched on his invasion of Greece (B. C. 480). — From the worship of Dionysus in Thrace the Bacchic women are called Bistŏnĭdes. (Hor. Carm. ii. 19. 20).

Bithȳnĭa (Βιθυνία: Βιθυνός), a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the W. by Mysia, on the N. by the Pontus Euxinus, on the E. by Paphlagonia, and on the S. by Phrygia Epictetus, was possessed at an early period by Thracian tribes from the neighbourhood of the Strymon, called Thyni (Θυνοί) and Bithyni (Βιθυνοί), of whom the former dwelt on the coast, the latter in the interior. The earlier inhabitants were the BEBRYCES, CAUCONES, and MYGDONES, and the N.E. part of the district was possessed by the MARIANDYNI. The country was subdued by the Lydians, and afterwards became a part of the Persian empire under Cyrus, and was governed by the satraps of Phrygia. During the decline of the Persian empire, the N. part of the country became independent, under native princes, called ἔπαρχοι, who resisted Alexander and his successors, and established a kingdom, which is usually considered to begin with Zipoetes (about B. C. 287) or his son Nicomedes I. (B. C. 278), and which lasted till the death of Nicomedes III. (B. C. 74), who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans. By them it was at first attached to the province of Asia, afterwards to that of Pontus, and, under Augustus, it was made a proconsular province. Several changes were made in its boundaries under the later emperors. — It was a fertile country, intersected with wooded mountains, the highets of which was the Mysian Olympus, on its S. border. Its chief rivers were the SANGARIUS and the BILLAEUS.

Bithȳnĭum (Βιθύνιον), aft. Claudiopolis, an inland city of Bithynia, the birth-place of Hadrian's favourite Antinoüs.

Biton (Βίτων), a mathematician, the author of an extant work on Military Machines (κατασκευαὶ πολεμικῶν ὀργάνων καὶ καταπελτικῶν), whose history is unknown. The work is printed in Vet. Mathem. Op. Paris, 1693, p. 105, seq.

Biton and Cleŏbis (Κλέοβις), sons of Cydippe, a priestess of Hera at Argos. They were celebrated for their affection to their mother, whose chariot they once dragged during a festival to the temple of Hera, a distance of 45 stadia. The priestess prayed to the goddess to grant them what was best for mortals; and during the night they both died while asleep in the temple.

Bituĭtus, in inscriptions BETULTUS king of the Arverni in Gaul, joined the Allobroges in their war against the Romans. Both the Arverni and Allobroges were defeated B.C. 121, at the confluence of the Rhone and the Isara, by Q. Fabius Maximus. Bituitus was subsequently taken prisoner and sent to Rome.

Bitŭriges, a numerous and powerful Celtic people in Gallia Aquitanica, had in early times the supremacy over the other Celts in Gaul. (Liv. v. 34.) They were divided into, 1. Bit. Cubi, separated from the Carnutes and Aedui by the Liger, and bounded on the S. by the Lemovices, in the country of the modern Bourges; their capital was AVARICUM. 2. Bit. Vivisci or Ubisci on the Garumna: their capital was BURDIGALA.

Blādus, Blandus, or Blaudus (Βλά-, Βλάν-, Βλαῦδος: Βλαυδηνός: Blaudesius), a city of Phrygia, near the borders of Mysia and Lydia.

Blaesus, C. Sempronĭus, consul with Cn. Servilius Caepio, B. C. 253, in the 1st Punic war. The 2 consuls sailed to the coast of Africa, and on their return were overtaken off cape Palinurus by a tremendous storm, in which 150 ships perished.

Blaesus, Junĭus, governor of Pannonia at the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, when the formidable insurrection of the legions broke out in that province. He obtained the government of Africa in 21, where he gained a victory over Tacfarinas. On the fall of his uncle Sejanus in 31, he was deprived of the priestly offices which he held, and in 36 put an end to his own life, to avoid falling by the hand of the executioner.

Blanda. 1. (Blaños), a town of the Laeëtani in Hispania Tarraconensis. — 2. (St. Biasio), a town in Lucania.

Blascon (Brescou), a small island in the Gallicus Sinus, off the town of Agatha.

Blasĭo, M. Helvĭus, praetor B. C. 197, defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took Illiturgi.

Blavĭa (Blaye), a town of the Santones, in Gallia Aquitanica, on the Garumna.

Blemyes (Βλέμυες, Βλέμμυες), an Aethiopian people, on the borders of Upper Egypt, to which their predatory incursions were very troublesome in the times of the Roman emperors.

Blera (Bleranus: Bieda), a town in Etruria, on the Via Clodia, between Forum Clodii and Tuscania: there are many remains of the ancient town at Bieda.

Blosĭus or Blossĭus, the name of a noble family in Campania. — One of this family, C. Blosius of Cumae, was a philosopher, a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus, and a friend of Tib. Gracchus. After the death of Gracchus (B. C. 133) he fled to Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, and on the conquest of Aristonicus by the Romans, Blosius put an end to his own life for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans.

Boadicēa, queen of the Iceni in Britain, having been shamefully treated by the Romans, who even ravished her 2 daughters, excited an insurrection of the Britons against their oppressors during the absence of Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman governor, on an expedition to the island of Mona. She took the Roman colonies of Camalodunum, Londinium, and other places, and slew nearly 70,000 Romans and their allies. She was at length defeated with great loss by Suetonius Paulinus, and put an end to her own life, A. D. 61.

Boagrĭus (Βοάγριος), a river in Locris, also called Manes, flows past Thronium into the Sinus Maliacus.

Bocchus (Βόκχος). 1. King of Mauretania, and father-in-law of Jugurtha, with whom at first he made war against the Romans, but whom he afterwards delivered up to Sulla, the quaestor of Marius, B. C. 106. — 2. Son of the preceding, reigned along with his brother Bogud, over Mauretania. Bocchus and Bogud assisted Caesar in his war against the Pompeians in Africa, B. C. 46; and in 45 Bogud joined Caesar in his war in Spain. After the murder of Caesar, Bocchus sided with Octavianus, and Bogud with Antony. When Bogud was in Spain in 38, Bocchus usurped the sole government of Mauretania, in which he was confirmed by Octavianus. He died about 33, whereupon his kingdom became a Roman province. Bogud had previously betaken himself to Antony, and was killed on the capture of Methone by Agrippa in 31.

Bodencus or Bodincus. [PADUS.]

Bodiocasses, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis; their capital was Augustodurum (Bayeux).

Bodotrĭa or Boderia Aestuārĭum (Firth of Forth), an aestuary on the E. coast of Scotland.

Boeae (Βοιαί: Βοιάτης: Vatka), a town in the S. of Laeonica, near C. Malea.

Boebē (Βοίβη: Βοιβεύς), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, on the W. shore of the lake Boebēis (Βοιβηΐς), into which several rivers of Thessaly flow.

Boēdrŏmĭus (Βοηδρόμιος), "the helper in distress," a surname of Apollo at Athens, because he had assisted the Athenians. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Boedromia.)

Boeōtĭa (Βοιωτία: Βοιωτός: part of Livadia), a district of Greece, bounded N. by Opuntian Locris, E. by the Euboean sea, S. by Attica, Megaris, and the Corinthian Gulf, and W. by Phocis. It is nearly surrounded by mountains, namely Helicon and Parnassus on the W., Cithaeron and Parnes on the S., the Opuntian mountains on the N., and a range of mountains along the whole sea-coast on the E. The country contains several fertile plains, of which the two most important were the valley of the Asopus in the S., the inhabitants of which were called Parosopii, and the valley of the Cephissus in the N. (the upper part of which, however, belonged to Phocis), the inhabitants of which were called Epicephisii. In the former valley the chief towns were THEBAE, TANAGRA, THESPIAE, and PLATAEAE; in the latter the chief towns were ORCHOMENUS, CHAERONEA, CORONEA, LEBADEA, and HALIARTUS; the latter valley included the lake COPAIS. The surface of Boeotia is said to be 1080 square miles. The atmosphere was damp and thick, to which circumstance some of the ancients attributed the dullness of the Boeotian intellect, with which the Athenians frequently made merry; but the deficiency of the Boeotians in this respect was more probably owing, as has been well remarked, to the extraordinary fertility of their country, which probably depressed their intellectual and moral energies.—In the earliest times Boeotia was inhabited by various tribes, the Aones (whence the country was called Aonia), Temmices, Hyantes, Thracians, Leleges, &c. Orchomenus was inhabited by the powerful tribe of the Minyans, and Thebes by the Cadmeans, the reputed descendants of CADMUS. The Boeotians were an Aeolian people, who originally occupied Arne in Thessaly, from which they were expelled by the Thessalians 60 years after the Trojan war, and migrated into the country called after them Boeotia, partly expelling and partly incorporating with themselves the ancient inhabitants of the land. Boeotia was then divided into 14 independent states, which formed a league, with Thebes at its head. The chief magistrates of the confederacy were the Boeotarchs, elected annually, 2 by Thebes and 1 by each of the other states; but as the number of the states was different at different times, that of the Boeotarchs also varied. The government in most states was an aristocracy. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Boeotarches.)

Boēthĭus, whose full name was ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOETHIUS, a Roman statesman and author, was born between A. D. 470 and 475. He was famous for his general learning, and especially for his knowledge of Greek philosophy, which according to a common account (though of doubtful authority), he studied under Proclus at Athens. He was consul in 510, and was treated with great distinction by Theodoric the Great; but having incurred the suspicions of the latter, by advocating the cause of the Italians against the oppressions of the Goths, he was put to death by Theodoric about 524. During his imprisonment he wrote his celebrated work De Consolatione Philosophiae, in 5 books, which is composed alternately in prose and verse. The diction is pure and elegant, and the sentiments are noble and exalted, showing that the author had a real belief in prayer and Providence, though he makes no reference to Christianity. Boëthius was the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece. He translated many of the works of the Greek philosophers, especially of Aristotle, and wrote commentaries upon them, several of which have come down to us. He also wrote a commentary, in 6 books, upon the Topica of Cicero, which is also extant. In the ignorance of Greek writers which prevailed from the 6th to the 14th century, Boëthius was looked upon as the head and type of all philosophers, as Augustin was of all theology and Virgil of all literature; but after the introduction of the works of Aristotle into Europe in the 13th century, Boëthius's fame gradually died away. — The best edition of his collective works was printed at Basel, 1570; the last edition of his De Consolatione is by Obbarius, Jenae, 1843.

Boēthus (Βοηθός). 1. A Stoic philosopher of uncertain date, wrote several works, from one of which Cicero quotes. — 2. A Peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Sidon in Phoenicia, a disciple of Andronicus of Rhodes, and an instructor of the philosopher Strabo. He therefore flourished about B. C. 30. He wrote several works, all of which are now lost.

Boeum (Βοιόν, Βοΐον, Βοῖον: Βοιάτης), an ancient town of the Dorian Tetrapolis.

Bogud. [BOCCHUS, No. 2.]

Bōii, one of the most powerful of the Celtic people, said to have dwelt originally in Gaul (Transalpina), but in what part of the country is uncertain. At an early time they migrated in two great swarms, one of which crossed the Alps and settled in the country between the Po and the Apennines; the other crossed the Rhine and settled in the part of Germany called Boihemum (Bohemia) after them, and between the Danube and the Tyrol. The Boii in Italy long carried on a fierce struggle with the Romans, but they were at length subdued by the consul P. Scipio in B. C. 191, and were subsequently incorporated in the province of Gallia Cisalpina. The Boii in Germany maintained their power longer, but were at length subdued by the Marcomanni, and expelled from the country. We find 32,000 Boii taking part in the Helvetian migration; and after the defeat of the Helvetians (B. C. 58), Caesar allowed these Boii to dwell among the Aedui.

Boiorix, a chieftain of the Boii, fought against the Romans in Cisalpine Gaul, B. C. 194.

Bōla, Bōlae or Vōlae (Bolānus), an ancient town of the Aequi, belonging to the Latin league not mentioned in later times.

Bolānus, Vettĭus, governor of Britain in A. D. 69, is praised by Statius in the poem (Silv. v. 2), addressed to Crispinus, the son of Bolanus.

Bolbē (Βόλβη: Beshek), a lake in Macedonia, empties itself by a short river into the Strymonic gulf near Bromiscus and Aulon: the lake is now about 12 miles in length, and 6 or 8 in breadth. — There was a town of the same name upon the lake.

Bolbĭtīne (Βολβιτίνη: Βολβιτινήτης: Rosetta), a city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of a branch of the Nile (the W.-most but one), which was called the Bolbitine mouth (τὸ Βολβίτινον στόμα).

Bŏlīnē (Βολίνη: Βολιναῖος), a town in Achaia, the inhabitants of which Augustus transplanted to Patrae.

Bolissus (Βολισσός: Βολίσσιος), a town on the W. coast of Chios.

Bomilcar (Βομίλκας, Βοαμίλκας). 1. Commander, with Hanno, of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, B. C. 310. In 308 he attempted to seize the government of Carthage, but failed, and was crucified. — 2. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies sent to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, 216. He afterwards attempted to relieve Syracuse, when besieged by Marcellus, but was unable to accomplish any thing. — 3. A Numidian, deep in the confidence of Jugurtha. When Jugurtha was at Rome, 109, Bomilcar effected for him the assassination of Massiva. In 107 he plotted against Jugurtha.

Bōmĭus Mons (Βώμιος and οἱ Βωμοί), the W. part of Mt. Oeta in Aetolia, inhabited by the Bomienses (Βωμιεῖς).

Bona Dea, a Roman divinity, is described as the sister, wife, or daughter of Faunus, and was herself called Fauna, Fatua, or Oma. She was worshipped at Rome as a chaste and prophetic divinity; she revealed her oracles only to females, as Faunus did only to males. Her festival was celebrated every year on the 1st of May, in the house of the consul or praetor, as the sacrifices on that occasion were offered on behalf of the whole Roman people. The solemnities were conducted by the Vestals, and no male person was allowed to be in the house at one of the festivals. P. Clodius profaned the sacred ceremonies, by entering the house of Caesar in the disguise of a woman, B. C. 62.

Bonifacĭus, a Roman general, governor of Africa under Valentinian III. Believing that the empress Placidia meditated his destruction, he revolted against the emperor, and invited Genseric, king of the Vandals, to settle in Africa. In 430 he was reconciled to Placidia, and attempted to drive the Vandals out of Africa, but without success. He quitted Africa in 431, and in 432 he died of a wound received in combat with his rival Aëtius.

Bonna (Bonn), a town on the left bank of the Rhine in Lower Germany, and in the territory of the Ubii, was a strong fortress of the Romans and the regular quarters of a Roman legion. Here Drusus constructed a bridge across the Rhine.

Bonōnĭa (Bononiensis). 1. (Bologna), a town in Gallia Cispadana, originally called Felsina, was in ancient times an Etruscan city, and the capital of N. Etruria. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Boii, but it was colonized by the Romans on the conquest of the Boii, B. C. 191, and its name of Felsina was then changed into Bononia. It fell into decay in the civil wars, but it was enlarged and adorned by Augustus, 32. — 2. (Boulogne) a town in the N. of Gaul. See GESORIACUS. — 3. (Banostor?), a town of Pannonia on the Danube.

Bonōsus, a Spaniard by birth, served with distinction under Aurelian, and usurped the imperial title in Gaul in the reign of Probus. He was defeated and slain by Probus, A. D. 280 or 281.

Boōtes. [ARCTURUS.]

Borbetomăgus (Worms), also called Vangiones, at a later time Wormatia, a town of the Vangiones on the left bank of the Rhine in Upper Germany.

Bŏrĕas (Βορέας or Βορᾶς), the N. wind, or more strictly the wind from the N.N.E., was, in mythology, a son of Astraeus and Eos, and brother of Hesperus, Zephyrus, and Notus. He dwelt in a cave of mount Haemus in Thrace. He carried off Orithyia, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Attica, by whom he begot Zetes, Calais, and Cleopatra, wife of Phineus, who are therefore called Boreades. In the Persian war, Boreas showed his friendly disposition towards the Athenians by destroying the ships of the barbarians. According to an Homeric tradition (Il. xx. 223), Boreas begot 12 horses by the mares of Erichthonius, which is commonly explained as a figurative mode of expressing the extraordinary swiftness of those horses. Boreas was worshipped at Athens, where a festival, Boreasmi, was celebrated in his honour.

Borēum (Βόρειον). 1. (Malin Head), the N. promontory of Hibernia (Ireland). — 2. (Ras Teyonas), a promontory on the W. coast of Cyrenaica, forming the E. headland of the Great Syrtis. — 3. The N. extremity of the island of Taprobane (Ceylon).

Borēus Mons (Βόρεων ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia, on the borders of Laconia, containing the sources of the rivers Alpheus and Eurotas.

Borēus Portus (Βόρειος λιμήν), a harbour in the island of Tenedos, at the mouth of a river of the same name.

Borsippa (τὰ Βόρσιππα: Βορσιππηνός: Boursa), a city of Babylonia, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, a little S. of Babylon, celebrated for its manufactures of linen, and as the chief residence of the Chaldaean astrologers. The Greeks held it sacred to Apollo and Artemis.

Borysthĕnes (Βορυσθένης: Dnieper), afterwards Danapris, a river of European Sarmatia, flows into the Euxine, but its sources were unknown to the ancients. Near its mouth and at its junction with the Hypanis, lay the town Borysthenes or Borysthenis (Kudak), also called Olbia, Olbiopolis, and Miletopolis, a colony of Miletus, and the most important Greek city on the N. of the Euxine. (Ethnic, Βορυσθενίτης, Ὀλβιοπολίτης.)

Bospŏrus (Βόσπορος), Ox-ford, the name of any straits among the Greeks, but especially applied to the 2 following. — 1. The Thracian Bosporus (Channel of Constantinople), unites the Propontis or Sea of Marmora with the Euxine or Black Sea. According to the legend it was called Bosporus from Io, who crossed it in the form of a heifer. At the entrance of the Bosporus were the celebrated SYMPLEGADES. Darius constructed a bridge across the Bosporus, when he invaded Scythia. — 2. The Cimmerian Bosporus (Straits of Kaffa), unites the Palus Maeotis or Sea of Azof with the Euxine or Black Sea. It formed, with the Tanais (Don) the boundary between Asia and Europe, and it derived its name from the CIMMERII, who were supposed to have dwelt in the neighbourhood. On the European side of the Bosporus, the modern Crimea, the Milesians founded the town of Panticapaeum, also called Bosporus, and the inhabitants of Panticapaeum subsequently founded the town of Phanagoria on the Asiatic side of the Straits. These cities, being favourably situated for commerce, soon became places of considerable importance; and a kingdom gradually arose, of which Panticapaeum was the capital, and which eventually included the whole of the Crimea. The first kings we read of were the Archaeanactidae, who reigned 42 years, from B.C. 480 to 438. They were succeeded by Spartacus I. and his descendants. Several of these kings were in close alliance with the Athenians, who obtained annually a large supply of corn from the Bosporus. The last of these kings was Paerisades, who, being hard pressed by the Scythians, voluntarily ceded his dominions to Mithridates the Great. On the death of Mithridates, his son Pharnaces was allowed by Pompey to succeed to the dominion of Bosporus; and we subsequently find a series of kings, who reigned in the country till a late period, under the protection of the Roman emperors.

Bostar (Βώστωρ, Βώσταρος). 1. A Carthaginian general, who, with Hamilcar and Hasdrubal, the son of Hanno, fought against M. Atilius Regulus, in Africa, B.C. 256, but was defeated, taken prisoner, and sent to Rome, where he is said to have perished in consequence of the barbarous treatment which he received from the sons of Regulus. — 2. A Carthaginian general, under Hasdrubal, in Spain, set at liberty the Spanish hostages kept at Saguntum, hoping thereby to secure the affections of the Spaniards.

Bostra (τὰ Βόστρα, O. T. Bozrah: Βοστρηνός and -αῖος: Busrah, Ru.), a city of Arabia, in an Oasis of the Syrian Desert, a little more than 1° S. of Damascus. It was enlarged and beautified by Trajan, who made it a colony. Under the later emperors it was the seat of an archbishoprick.

Bottĭa, Bottiaea, Bottiaeis (Βοττία, Βοττιαία, Βοττιαΐς: Βοττιαῖος), a district in Macedonia, on the right bank of the river Axius, extended in the time of Thucydides to Pieria on the W. It contained the towns of Pella and Ichnae near the sea. The Bottiaei were a Thracian people, who, being driven out of the country by the Macedonians, settled in that part of the Macedonian Chalcidice N. of Olynthus, which was called Bottice (Βοττική).

Bottĭcē. [BOTTIA.]

Boviānum (Bovianius: Bojano), the chief town of the Pentri in Samnium, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was colonized by Augustus with veterans.

Bovillae (Bovillensis), an ancient town in Latium at the foot of the Alban mountain, on the Appian Way about 10 miles from Rome. Near it Clodius was killed by Milo (B.C. 52); and here was the sacrarium of the Julia gens.

Bracăra Augusta (Braga), the chief town of the Callaici Bracarii in Hispania Tarraconensis: at Braga there are the ruins of an amphitheatre, aqueduct, &c.

Brachmānae or -i (Βραχμᾶνες), is a name used by the ancient geographers, sometimes for a caste of priests in India (the Brahmins), sometimes, apparently, for all the people whose religion was Brahminism, and sometimes for a particular tribe.

Brachōdes or Caput Vada (Βραχώδης ἄκρα: Ras Kapoudiah), a promontory on the coast of Byzacena in N. Africa, forming the N. headland of the Lesser Syrtis.

Brachylles or Brachyllas (Βραχύλλης, Βραχύλλας), a Boeotian, supported the Macedonian interests in the reigns of Antigonus Doson and Philip V. At the battle of Cynoscephalae, B.C. 197, he commanded the Boeotian troops in Philip's army, and was murdered in 196 at Thebes by the Roman party in that city.

Branchĭdae (αἱ Βραγχίδαι: Jeronda, Ru.), aft. Didyma, or -i (τὰ Δίδυμ οἱ Δίδυμοι), a place on the sea-coast of Ionia, a little S. of Miletus, celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo surnamed Didymeus (Διδυμεύς). This oracle, which the Ionians held in the highest esteem, was said to have been founded by Branchus, son of Apollo or Smicrus of Delphi, and a Milesian woman. The reputed descendants of this Branchus, the Branchidae (οἱ Βραγχίδαι) were the hereditary ministers of this oracle. They delivered up the treasures of the temple to Darius or Xerxes; and, when Xerxes returned from Greece, the Branchidae, fearing the revenge of the Greeks, begged him to remove them to a distant part of his empire. They were accordingly settled in Bactria or Sogdiana, where their descendants are said to have been punished by the army of Alexander for the treason of their forefathers. The temple, called Didymacum, which was destroyed by Xerxes, was rebuilt, and its ruins contain some beautiful specimens of the Ionic order of architecture.

Branchus (Βράγχος). [Branchidae.]

Brannovīces. [Aulerci.]

Brasĭdas (Βρασίδας), son of Tellis, the most distinguished Spartan in the first part of the Peloponnesian war. In B. C. 424, at the head of a small force, he effected a dexterous march through the hostile country of Thessaly, and joined Perdiccas of Macedonia, who had promised co-operation against the Athenians. By his military skill, and the confidence which his character inspired, he gained possession of many of the cities in Macedonia subject to Athens; his greatest acquisition was Amphipolis. In 422 he gained a brilliant victory over Cleon, who had been sent, with an Athenian force, to recover Amphipolis, but he was slain in the battle. He was buried within the city, and the inhabitants honoured him as a hero, by yearly sacrifices and by games. (Dict. of Ant. art. Brasideia.)

Bratuspantĭum (Bratuspante nr. Breteuil), the chief town of the Bellovaci in Gallia Belgica.

Braurōn (Βραυρῶν: Βραυρώνιος: Vraona or Vrana), a demus in Attica on the E. coast on the river Erasinus, with a celebrated temple of Artemis, who was hence called Brauronia, and in whose honour the festival Brauronia was celebrated in this place. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.)

Bregetĭo (nr. Szöny, Ru., E. of Comorn), a Roman municipium in Lower Pannonia on the Danube, where Valentinian I. died.

Brennus. 1. The leader of the Senonian Gauls, who in B. C. 390 crossed the Apennines, defeated the Romans at the Allia, and took Rome. After besieging the Capitol for 6 months, he quitted the city upon receiving 1000 pounds of gold as a ransom for the Capitol, and returned home safe with his booty. But it was subsequently related in the popular legends that Camillus and a Roman army appeared at the moment that the gold was being weighed, that Brennus was defeated by Camillus, and that he himself and his whole army were slain to a man. — 2. The chief leader of the Gauls who invaded Macedonia and Greece, B. C. 280, 279. In 280 Ptolemy Ceraunus was defeated by the Gauls under Belgius and slain in battle; and Brennus in the following year penetrated into the S. of Greece, but he was defeated near Delphi, most of his men were slain, and he himself put an end to his own life.

Breuci, a powerful people of Pannonia near the confluence of the Savus and the Danube, took an active part in the insurrection of the Pannonians and Dalmatians against the Romans, A. D. 6.

Breuni, a Rhaetian people, dwelt in the Tyrol near the Brenner. (Hor. Carm. iv. 14. 11.)

Brĭăreus. [Aegeon.]

Bricinnĭae (Βρικιννίαι), a place in Sicily not far from Leontini.

Brigantes, the most powerful of the British tribes, inhabited the whole of the N. of the island from the Abus (Humber) to the Roman wall, with the exception of the S. E. corner of Yorkshire, which was inhabited by the Parisii. The Brigantes consequently inhabited the greater part of Yorkshire, and the whole of Lancashire, Durham, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Their capital was Eboracum. They were conquered by Petilius Cerealis in the reign of Vespasian. — There was also a tribe of Brigantes in the S. of Ireland, between the rivers Birgus (Barrow) and Dabrona (Blackwater), in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary.

Brigantĭi, a tribe in Vindelicia on the lake Brigantinus, noted for their robberies.

Brigantīnus Lacus (Bodensee or Lake of Constance), also called Venetus and Acronius, through which the Rhine flows, was inhabited by the Helvetii on the S., by the Rhaetii on the S.E., and by the Vindelici on the N. Near an island on it, probably Reichenau, Tiberius defeated the Vindelici in a naval engagement.

Brigantĭum. 1. (Briançon), a town of the Segusiani in Gaul at the foot of the Cottian Alps. — 2. (Corunna), a sea-port town of the Lucenses in Gallaecia in Spain with a light-house, which is still used for the same purpose, having been repaired in 1791, and which is now called La Torre de Hercules. — 3. (Bregenz), a town of the Brigantini Vindelici on the lake of Constance.

Brilessus (Βριλησσός), a mountain in Attica N.E. of Athens.

Brīmo (Βριμώ), "the angry or the terrifying," a surname of Hecate and Persephone.

Briniātes, a people in Liguria S. of the Po near the modern Brignolo.

Brīsēis (Βρισηΐς), daughter of Briseus of Lyrnessus, fell into the hands of Achilles, but was seized by Agamemnon. Hence arose the dire feud between the 2 heroes. [Achilles.] Her proper name was Hippodamīa.

Brĭtannĭa (ἡ Βρεττανικὴ or Βρετανικὴ, sc. νῆσος, ἡ Βρεττανία or Βρετανία: Βρεττανοί, Βρετανοί, Britanni, Brittŏnes), the island of England and Scotland, which was also called Albion (Ἀλβιον, Ἀλουίων, Insula Albionum). Hibernia or Ireland is usually spoken of as a separate island, but is sometimes included under the general name of the Insulae Britannicae (Βρετανικαὶ νῆσοι), which also comprehended the smaller islands around the coast of Great Britain. — The etymology of the word Britannia is uncertain, but it is derived by most writers from the Celtic word brith or brit "painted," with reference to the custom of the inhabitants of staining their bodies with a blue colour: whatever may be the etymology of the word, it is certain that it was used by the inhabitants themselves, since in the Gaelic the inhabitants are called Brython and their language Bryhoneg. The name Albion is probably derived from the white cliffs of the island; but writers, who derived the names of all lands and people from a mythical ancestor, connected the name with one

Albion, the son of Neptune. — The Britons were Celts, belonging to that branch of the race called Cymry, and were apparently the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. Their manners and customs were in general the same as the Gauls; but separated more than the Gauls from intercourse with civilised nations, they preserved the Celtic religion in a purer state than in Gaul, and hence Druidism, according to Caesar, was transplanted from Gaul to Britain. The Britons also retained many of the barbarous Celtic customs, which the more civilised Gauls had laid aside. They painted their bodies with a blue colour extracted from woad, in order to appear more terrible in battle, and they had wives in common. At a later time the Belgae crossed over from Gaul, and settled on the S. and E. coasts, driving the Britons into the interior of the island. — It was not till a late period that the Greeks and Romans obtained any knowledge of Britain. In early times the Phoenicians visited the Scilly islands and the coast of Cornwall for the purpose of obtaining tin; but whatever knowledge they acquired of the country they jealously kept secret, and it only transpired that there were Cassiterides or Tin Islands in the N. parts of the ocean. The first certain knowledge which the Greeks obtained of Britain was from the merchants of Massilia about the time of Alexander the Great, and especially from the voyages of Pytheas, who sailed round a great part of Britain. From this time it was generally believed that the island was in the form of a triangle, an error which continued to prevail even at a later period. Another important mistake, which likewise prevailed for a long time, was the position of Britain in relation to Gaul and Spain. As the N.W. coast of Spain was supposed to extend too far to the N., and the W. coast of Gaul to run N.E., the lower part of Britain was believed to lie between Spain and Gaul. — The Romans first became personally acquainted with the island by Caesar's invasion. He twice landed in Britain (B. C. 55, 54), and though on the second occasion he conquered the greater part of the S.E. of the island, yet he did not take permanent possession of any portion of the country, and after his departure the Britons continued as independent as before. The Romans made no further attempts to conquer the island for nearly 100 years. In the reign of Claudius (A. D. 43) they again landed in Britain, and permanently subdued the country S. of the Thames. They now began to extend their conquests over the other parts of the island; and the great victory (61) of Suetonius Paulinus over the Britons who had revolted under Boadicea, still further consolidated the Roman dominions. In the reign of Vespasian, Petilius Cerealis and Julius Frontinus made several successful expeditions against the Silures and the Brigantes; and the conquest of S. Britain was at length finally completed by Agricola, who in 7 campaigns (78—84), subdued the whole of the island as far N. as the Frith of Forth and the Clyde, between which he erected a series of forts to protect the Roman dominions from the incursions of the barbarians in the N. of Scotland. The Roman part of Britain was now called Britannia Romana, and the N. part inhabited by the Caledonians Britannia Barbara or Caledonia. The Romans however gave up the N. conquests of Agricola in the reign of Hadrian, and made a rampart of turf from the Aestuarium Ituna (Solway Frith) to the German Ocean, which formed the N. boundary of their dominions. In the reign of Antoninus Pius the Romans again extended their boundary as far as the conquests of Agricola, and erected a rampart connecting the Forth and the Clyde, the remains of which are now called Grimes Dyke, Grime in the Celtic language signifying great or powerful. The Caledonians afterwards broke through this wall; and in consequence of their repeated devastations of the Roman dominions, the emperor Severus went to Britain in 208, in order to conduct the war against them in person. He died in the island at Eboracum (York) in 211, after erecting a solid stone wall from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne, a little N. of the rampart of Hadrian. After the death of Severus, the Romans relinquished for ever all their conquests N. of this wall. In 287 Carausius assumed the purple in Britain, and reigned as emperor, independent of Diocletian and Maximian, till his assassination by Allectus in 293. Allectus reigned 3 years, and Britain was recovered for the emperors in 296. Upon the resignation of the empire by Diocletian and Maximian (305), Britain fell to the share of Constantius, who died at Eboracum in 306, and his son Constantine assumed in the island the title of Caesar. Shortly afterwards the Caledonians, who now appear under the names of Picts and Scots, broke through the wall of Severus, and the Saxons ravaged the coasts of Britain; and the declining power of the Roman empire was unable to afford the province any effectual assistance. In the reign of Valentinian I., Theodosius, the father of the emperor of that name, defeated the Picts and Scots (367); but in the reign of Honorius, Constantine, who had been proclaimed emperor in Britain (407), withdrew all the Roman troops from the island, in order to make himself master of Gaul. The Britons were thus left exposed to the ravages of the Picts and Scots, and at length, in 447, they called in the assistance of the Saxons, who became the masters of Britain. — The Roman dominions of Britain formed a single province till the time of Severus, and were governed by a legatus of the emperor. Severus divided the country into 2 provinces, Britannia Superior and Inferior, of which the latter contained the earlier conquests of the Romans in the S. of the island, and the former the later conquests in the N., the territories of the Silures, Brigantes, &c. Upon the new division of the provinces in the reign of Diocletian, Britain was governed by a Vicarius, subject to the Praefectus Praetorio of Gaul, and was divided into 4 provinces, (1) Britannia prima, the country S. of the Thames: (2) Britannia Secunda, Wales: (3) Maxima Caesariensis, the country between the Thames and the Humber: (4) Flavia Caesariensis, the country between the Humber and the Roman wall. Besides these, there was also a fifth province, Valentia, which existed for a short time, including the conquests of Theodosius beyond the Roman wall.

Britannĭcus, son of the emperor Claudius and Messalina, was born A. D. 42. Agrippina, the second wife of Claudius, induced the emperor to adopt her own son, and give him precedence over Britannicus. This son, the emperor Nero, ascended the throne in 54, and caused Britannicus to be poisoned in the following year.

Brĭtŏmartis (Βριτόμαρτις, usually derived from βριτύς, sweet or blessing, and μάρτις, a maiden) was a Cretan nymph, daughter of Zeus and Carme, and beloved by Minos, who pursued her 9 months, till at length she leaped into the sea and was changed by Artemis into a goddess. She seems to have been originally a Cretan divinity who presided over the sports of the chase; on the introduction of the worship of Artemis into Crete she was naturally placed in some relation with the latter goddess; and at length the 2 divinities became identified, and Britomartis is called in one legend the daughter of Leto. At Aegina Britomartis was worshipped under the name of Aphaea.

Brixellum (Brixellanus: Bregella or Brescella), a town on the right bank of the Po in Gallia Cisalpina, where the emperor Otho put himself to death, A. D. 69.

Brixĭa (Brixianus: Brescia), a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the road from Comum to Aquileia, through which the river Mella flowed (flavus quam molli percurrit flumine Mella, Catull. lxvii. 33). It was probably founded by the Etruscans, was afterwards a town of the Libui and then of the Cenomani, and finally became a Roman municipium with the rights of a colony.

Brŏmĭus (Βρόμιος), a surname of Dionysus, i. e. the noisy god, from the noise of the Bacchic revelries (from βρέμω).

Brontes. [CYCLOPES.]

Bruchīum. [ALEXANDRIA.]

Bructĕri, a people of Germany, dwelt on each side of the Amisia (Ems) and extended S. as far as the Luppia (Lippe). The Bructeri joined the Batavi in their revolt against the Romans in A. D. 69, and the prophetic virgin, VELEDA, who had so much influence among the German tribes, was a native of their country. A few years afterwards the Bructeri were almost annihilated by the Chamavi and Angrivarii. (Tac. Germ. 33.)

Brundŭsĭum or Brundĭsĭum (Βρεντήσιον, Βρεντέσιον: Brundusinus: Brindisi), a town in Calabria, on a small bay of the Adriatic, forming an excellent harbour, to which the place owed its importance. The Appia Via terminated at Brundusium, and it was the usual place of embarkation for Greece and the East. It was an ancient town, and probably not of Greek origin, although its foundation is ascribed by some writers to the Cretans, and by others to Diomede. It was at first governed by kings of its own, but was conquered and colonized by the Romans, B. C. 245. The poet Pacuvius was born at this town, and Virgil died here on his return from Greece, B. C. 19.

Bruttĭum, Bruttius and Bruttiorum Ager (Βρέττια: Bruttius), more usually called Bruttii after the inhabitants, the S. extremity of Italy, separated from Lucania by a line drawn from the mouth of the Laus to Thurii, and surrounded on the other 3 sides by the sea. It was the country called in ancient times Oenotria and Italia. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through it down to the Sicilian Straits; it contained excellent pasturage for cattle, and the valleys produced good corn, olives, and fruit. — The earliest inhabitants of the country were Oenotrians. Subsequently some Lucanians, who had revolted from their countrymen in Lucania, took possession of the country, and were hence called Bruttii or Brettii, which word is said to mean "rebels" in the language of the Lucanians. This people, however, inhabited only the interior of the land; the coast was almost entirely in the possession of the Greek colonies. At the close of the 2nd Punic war, in which the Bruttii had been the allies of Hannibal, they lost their independence and were treated by the Romans with great severity. They were declared to be public slaves, and were employed as lictors and servants of the magistrates.

Brūtus, Junĭus. 1. L., son of M. Junius and of Tarquinia, the sister of Tarquinius Superbus. His elder brother was murdered by Tarquinius, and Lucius escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiotcy, whence he received the surname of Brutus. After Lucretia had stabbed herself, Brutus roused the Romans to expel the Tarquins; and upon the banishment of the latter he was elected first consul with Tarquinius Collatinus. He loved his country better than his children, and put to death his 2 sons, who had attempted to restore the Tarquins. He fell in battle the same year, fighting against Aruns, the son of Tarquinius. Brutus was the great hero in the legends about the expulsion of the Tarquins, but we have no means of determining what part of the account is historical. — 2. D., surnamed SCAEVA, magister equitum to the dictator Q. Publilius Philo, B. C. 339, and consul in 325, when he fought against the Vestini. — 3. D., surnamed SCAEVA, consul 292, conquered the Faliscans. — 4. M., tribune of the plebs 195, praetor 191, when he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, one of the ambassadors sent into Asia 189, and consul 178, when he subdued the Istri. He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 171. — 5. P., tribune of the plebs 195, curule aedile 192, praetor 190, propraetor in Further Spain, 189. — 6. D., surnamed GALLAECUS (CALLAECUS) or CALLAICUS, consul 138, commanded in Further Spain, and conquered a great part of Lusitania. From his victory over the Gallaeci he obtained his surname. He was a patron of the poet L. Accius, and well versed in Greek and Roman literature. — 7. D., son of No. 6, consul 77, and husband of Sempronia, who carried on an intrigue with Catiline. — 8. D., adopted by A. Postumius Albinus, consul 99, and hence called Brutus Albinus. He served under Caesar in Gaul and in the civil war. He commanded Caesar's fleet at the siege of Massilia, 49, and was afterwards placed over Further Gaul. On his return to Rome Brutus was promised the praetorship and the government of Cisalpine Gaul for 44. Nevertheless, he joined the conspiracy against Caesar. After the death of the latter (44) he went into Cisalpine Gaul, which he refused to surrender to Antony, who had obtained this province from the people. Antony made war against him, and kept him besieged in Mutina, till the siege was raised in April 43 by the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and Octavianus. But Brutus only obtained a short respite. Antony was preparing to march against him from the N. with a large army, and Octavianus, who had deserted the senate, was marching against him from the S. His only resource was flight, but he was betrayed by Camillus, a Gaulish chief, and was put to death by Antony, 43. — 9. M., praetor 88, belonged to the party of Marius, and put an end to his own life in 82, that he might not fall into the hands of Pompey, who commanded Sulla's fleet. — 10. L., also called DAMASIPPUS, praetor 82, when the younger Marius was blockaded at Praeneste, put to death at Rome by order of Marius several of the most eminent senators of the opposite party. — 11. M., married Servilia, the half-sister of Cato of Utica. He was tribune of the plebs, 83; and in 77 he espoused the cause of Lepidus, and was placed in command of the forces in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was slain by command of Pompey. — 12. M., the so-called tyrannicide, son of No. 11 and Servilia. He lost his father when he was only 8 years old, and was trained by his uncle Cato in the principles of the aristocratical party. Accordingly, on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Pompey, although he was the murderer of his father. After the battle of Pharsalia, 48, he was not only pardoned by Caesar, but received from him the greatest marks of confidence and favour. Caesar made him governor of Cisalpine Gaul in 46, and praetor in 44, and also promised him the government of Macedonia. But notwithstanding all the obligations he was under to Caesar, he was persuaded by Cassius to murder his benefactor under the delusive idea of again establishing the republic. [CAESAR.] After the murder of Caesar Brutus spent a short time in Italy, and then took possession of the province of Macedonia. He was joined by Cassius who commanded in Syria, and their united forces were opposed to those of Octavian and Antony. Two battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Philippi (42), in the former of which Brutus was victorious though Cassius was defeated, but in the latter Brutus also was defeated and put an end to his own life. — Brutus's wife was PORCIA, the daughter of Cato. — Brutus was an ardent student of literature and philosophy, but he appears to have been deficient in judgment and original power. He wrote several works, all of which have perished. He was a literary friend of Cicero, who dedicated to him his Tusculanae Disputationes, De Finibus, and Orator, and who has given the name of Brutus to his dialogue on illustrious orators.

Bryaxis (Βρύαξις), an Athenian statuary in stone and metal, lived B. C. 372—312.

Brygi or Bryges (Βρύγοι, Βρίγες), a barbarous people in the N. of Macedonia, probably of Illyrian or Thracian origin, who were still in Macedonia at the time of the Persian war. The Phrygians were believed by the ancients to have been a portion of this people, who emigrated to Asia in early times. [PHRYGIA.]

Bubassus (Βύβασσος), an ancient city of Caria, E. of Cnidus, which gave name to the bay (Bubassius Sinus) and the peninsula (ἡ Χερσονῆσος ἡ Βυβασσίη), on which it stood. Ovid speaks of Būbăsides nurus (Met. ix. 643).

Bubastis (Βούβαστις), daughter of Osiris and Isis, an Egyptian divinity, whom the Greeks identified with Artemis, since she was the goddess of the moon. The cat was sacred to her, and she was represented in the form of a cat, or of a female with the head of a cat.

Bubastis or -us (Βούβαστις or -ος: Βουβαστίτης: Tel Basta, Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Bubastītes in Lower Egypt, stood on the E. bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, and was the chief seat of the worship of Bubastis, whose annual festival was kept here. Under the Persians the city was dismantled, and lost much of its importance.

Bubulcus, C. Junius, consul B. C. 317, a second time in 313, and a third time in 311; in the last of these years he carried on the war against the Samnites with great success. He was censor in 309, and dictator in 302, when he defeated the Aequians; in his dictatorship he dedicated the temple of Safety which he had vowed in his third consulship. The walls of this temple were adorned with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor.

Būcĕphăla or -īa (Βουκέφαλα or -άλεια: Jhelum), a city on the Hydaspes (Jhelum) in N. India (the Punjab), built by Alexander, after his battle with Porus, in memory of his favourite charger Bucephalus, whom he buried here. It stood at the place where Alexander crossed the river, and where General Gilbert crossed it (Feb. 1849) after the battle of Goojerat.

Būcĕphălus (Βουκέφαλος), the celebrated horse of Alexander the Great, which Philip purchased for 13 talents, and which no one was able to break in except the youthful Alexander. This horse carried Alexander through his Asiatic campaigns, and died in India B. C. 327. See BUCEPHALA.

Budalĭa, a town in Lower Pannonia near Sirmium, the birth-place of the emperor Decius.

Budīni (Βουδῖνοι), a Scythian people, who dwelt N. of the Sauromatae in the steppes of S. Russia. Herodotus (iv. 108) calls the nation γλαυκόν τε καὶ πυῤῥόν, which some interpret "with blue eyes and red hair," and others "painted blue and red."

Budŏron (Βούδορον), a fortress in Salamis on a promontory of the same name opposite Megara.

Būlis (Βοῦλις) and Sperthias (Σπερθίης), two Spartans, voluntarily went to Xerxes and offered themselves for punishment to atone for the murder of the heralds whom Darius had sent to Sparta; but they were dismissed uninjured by the king.

Būlis (Βοῦλις: Βούλιος), a town in Phocis on the Corinthian gulf, and on the borders of Boeotia.

Bullis (Bullinus, Bullio -ōnis, Bulliensis), a town of Illyria on the coast, S. of Apollonia.

Bupălus and his brother Athēnis, sculptors of Chios, lived about B. C. 500, and are said to have made caricatures of the poet Hipponax, which the poet requited by the bitterest satires.

Buphras (Βουφράς), a mountain in Messenia near Pylos.

Buprăsĭum (Βουπράσιον: -σιεύς, -σίων, -σίδης), an ancient town in Elis, mentioned in the Iliad, which had disappeared in the time of Strabo.

Būra (Βοῦρα: Βουραῖος, Βούριος), one of the 12 cities of Achaia, destroyed by an earthquake, together with Helice, but subsequently rebuilt.

Burdĭgăla (Βουρδίγαλα: Bordeaux), the capital of the Bituriges Vivisci in Aquitania, on the left bank of the Garumna (Garonne), was a place of great commercial importance, and at a later time one of the chief seats of literature and learning. It was the birth-place of the poet Ausonius.

Burgundiōnes or Burgundĭi, a powerful nation of Germany, dwelt originally between the Viadus (Oder) and the Vistula, and were of the same race as the Vandals or Goths. They pretended, however, to be descendants of the Romans, whom Drusus and Tiberius had left in Germany as garrisons, but this descent was evidently invented by them to obtain more easily from the Romans a settlement W. of the Rhine. They were driven out of their original abodes between the Oder and the Vistula by the Gepidae, and the greater part of them migrated W. and settled in the country on the Main, where they carried on frequent wars with their neighbours the Alemanni. In the 5th century they settled W. of the Alps in Gaul, where they founded the powerful kingdom of Burgundy. Their chief towns were Geneva and Lyons.

Burii, a people of Germany, dwelt near the sources of the Oder and Vistula, and joined the Marcomanni in their war against the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius.

Burrus, Afranīus, was appointed by Claudius praefectus praetorio, A. D. 52, and in conjunction with Seneca conducted the education of Nero. He opposed Nero's tyrannical acts, and was at length poisoned by command of the emperor, 63.

Bursa. [PLANCUS.]

Bursao (Bursaoensis, Bursavolensis), a town of the Autrigonae in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Busīris (Βούσιρις), king of Egypt, son of Poseidon and Lysianassa, is said to have sacrificed all foreigners that visited Egypt. Hercules, on his arrival in Egypt, was likewise seized and led to the altar, but he broke his chains, and slew Busiris. This myth seems to point out a time when the Egyptians were accustomed to offer human sacrifices to their deities.

Busīris (Βούσιρις: Βουσιρίτης). 1. (Abousir, Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Busirites in Lower Egypt, stood just in the middle of the Delta, on the W. bank of the Nile, and had a great temple of Isis, the remains of which are still standing. — 2. (Abousir near Jizeh), a small town, a little N.W. of Memphis.

Butĕo, Fabĭus. 1. N., consul B. C. 247, in the first Punic war, was employed in the siege of Drepanum. — 2. M., consul 245, also in the first Punic war. In 216 he was appointed dictator to fill up the vacancies in the senate occasioned by the battle of Cannae. — 3. Q., praetor 181, with the province of Cisalpine Gaul. In 179 he was one of the triumvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of the Pisani.

Būtes (Βούτης), son of either Teleon or Pandion or Amycus, and Zeuxippe. He was one of the Argonauts, and priest of Athena and of the Erechthean Poseidon. The Attic family of the Butadae or Eteobutadae derived their origin from him; and in the Erechthēum on the Acropolis there was an altar dedicated to Butes.

Buthrōtum (Βουθρωτόν: Βουθρώτιος: Butrinto), a town of Epirus on a small peninsula, opposite Corcyra, was a flourishing sea-port and was colonized by the Romans.

Būto (Βουτώ), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped principally in the town of BUTO. She was the nurse of Horus and Bubastis, the children of Osiris and Isis, and she saved them from the persecutions of Typhon by concealing them in the floating island of Chemnis. The Greeks identified her with Leto, and represented her as the goddess of night The shrew-mouse (μυγαλῆ) and the hawk were sacred to her.

Būtō (Βουτώ, Βούτη, or Βοῦτος: Βουτοΐτης: Baltim? Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Chemmites in Lower Egypt, stood near the Sebennytic branch of the Nile, on the Lake of Buto (Βουτικὴ λίμνη, also Σεβεννυτική), and was celebrated for its oracle of the goddess Buto, in honour of whom a festival was held at the city every year.

Buxentum (Buxentīnus, Buxentius: Policastro), originally Pyxus (Πυξοῦς), a town on the W. coast of Lucania and on the river Buxentius, was founded by Micythus, tyrant of Messana, B. C. 471, and was afterwards a Roman colony.

Byblīni Montes (τὰ Βύβλινα ὄρη), the mountains whence the Nile is said to flow in the mythical geography of Aeschylus (Prom. 811).

Byblis (Βυβλίς), daughter of Miletus and Idothea, was in love with her brother Caunus, whom she pursued through various lands, till at length worn out with sorrow, she was changed into a fountain.

Byblus (Βύβλος: Βύβλιος: Jebeil), a very ancient city on the coast of Phoenicia, between Berytus and Tripolis, a little N. of the river Adonis. It was the chief seat of the worship of Adonis. It was governed by a succession of petty princes, the last of whom was deposed by Pompey.

Bylazōra (Βυλάζωρα), a town in Paeonia, in Macedonia, on the river Astycus.

Byrsa (Βύρσα), the citadel of CARTHAGO.

Byzacīum or Byzacēna Regio (Βυζάκιον, Βυζακὶς χώρα: S. part of Tunis), the S. portion of the Roman province of Africa. [AFRICA, p. 23, b.]

Byzantīni Scriptōres, the general name of the historians, who have given an account of the Eastern or Byzantine empire from the time of Constantine the Great, A. D. 325, to the destruction of the empire, 1453. They all wrote in Greek, and may be divided into different classes. 1. The historians, whose collected works form an uninterrupted history of the Byzantine empire, and whose writings are therefore called Corpus Historiae Byzantinae. They are: (1) ZONARAS, who begins with the creation of the world, and brings his history down to 1188. (2) NICEPHORUS ACOMINATUS, whose history extends from 1188 to 1206. (3) NICEPHORUS GREGORAS, whose history extends from 1204 to 1331. (4) LAONICUS CHALCONDYLES, whose history extends from 1297 to 1462: his work is continued by an anonymous writer to 1565. — 2. The chronographers, who give a brief chronological summary of universal history from the creation of the world to their own times. These writers are very numerous: the most important of them are GEORGIUS SYNCELLUS, THEOPHANES, NICEPHORUS, CEDRENUS, SIMEON METAPHRASTES, MICHAEL GLYCAS, the authors of the Chronicon Paschale, &c. — 3. The writers who have treated of separate portions of Byzantine history, such as ZOSIMUS, PROCOPIUS, AGATHIAS, ANNA COMNENA, &c. — 4. The writers who have treated of the constitution, antiquities, &c., of the empire, such as LAURENTIUS LYDUS, CONSTANTINUS VI. PORPHYROGENNETUS. — A collection of the Byzantine writers was published at Paris by command of Louis XIV. in 36 vols. fol. 1645—1711. A reprint of this edition, with additions, was published at Venice in 23 vols. fol. 1727—1733. A new edition of the Byzantine writers was commenced by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828, 8vo., and is still in course of publication.

Byzantīum (Βυζάντιον: Βυζάντιος, Byzantius: Constantinople), a town on the Thracian Bosporus, founded by the Megarians, B. C. 658, is said to have derived its name from Byzas, the leader of the colony and the son of Poseidon. It was situated on 2 hills, was 40 stadia in circumference, and its acropolis stood on the site of the present seraglio. Its favourable position, commanding as it did the entrance to the Euxine, soon rendered it a place of great commercial importance. It was taken by Pausanias after the battle of Plataea, B. C. 479; and it was alternately in the possession of the Athenians and Lacedaemonians during the Peloponnesian war. The Lacedaemonians were expelled from Byzantium by Thrasybulus in 390, and the city remained independent for some years. Afterwards it became subject in succession to the Macedonians and the Romans. In the civil war between Pescennius Niger and Severus, it espoused the cause of the former: it was taken by Severus A. D. 196 after a siege of 3 years, and a considerable part of it was destroyed. A new city was built by its side (330) by Constantine, who made it the capital of the empire, and changed its name into CONSTANTINOPOLIS.

C.

Căbālia or -is (Καβαλία, Καβαλίς: Καβαλεύς, Καβάλιος), a small district of Asia Minor, between Lycia and Pamphylia, with a town of the same name.

Căbăsa or -us (Κάβασος: Καβασίτης), the chief city of the Nomos Cabasītes, in Lower Egypt.

Cabillōnum (Châlons-sur-Saône), a town of the Aedui on the Arar (Saône) in Gallia Lugdunensis, was a place of some commercial activity when Caesar was in Gaul (B. C. 53). At a later time the Romans kept a small fleet here.

Cabīra (τὰ Κάβειρα: Sivas), a place in Pontus, on the borders of Armenia, near M. Paryadres: a frequent residence of Mithridates, who was defeated here by Lucullus, B. C. 71. Pompey made it a city, and named it Diospolis. Under Augustus it was called Sebaste.

Cabīri (Κάβειροι), mystic divinities who occur in various parts of the ancient world. The meaning of their name, their character and nature, are quite uncertain. They were chiefly worshipped at Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros, and their mysteries at Samothrace were solemnized with great splendour. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Cabeiria.) They were also worshipped at Thebes, Anthedon, Pergamus, and elsewhere. Most of the early writers appear to have regarded them as the children of Hephaestus and as inferior divinities dwelling in Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. Later writers identify them with Demeter, Persephone, and Rhea, and regard their mysteries as solemnized in honour of one of these goddesses. Other writers identify the Cabiri with the Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), and others again with the Roman Penates; but the latter notion seems to have arisen with those writers who traced every ancient Roman institution to Troy, and thence to Samothrace.

Cabȳlē (Καβύλη: Καβυληνός: Golowitza), a town in the interior of Thrace, conquered by M. Lucullus, probably the Goloë of the Byzantine writers.

Cācus, son of Vulcan, was a huge giant, who inhabited a cave on Mt. Aventine, and plundered the surrounding country. When Hercules came to Italy with the oxen which he had taken from Geryon in Spain, Cacus stole part of the cattle while the hero slept; and, as he dragged the animals into his cave by their tails, it was impossible to discover their traces. But when the remaining oxen passed by the cave, those within began to bellow, and were thus discovered, whereupon Cacus was slain by Hercules. In honour of his victory, Hercules dedicated the ara maxima, which continued to exist ages afterwards in Rome.

Cacȳpăris (Κακύπαρις or Κακόπαρις: Cassibili), a river in Sicily, S. of Syracuse.

Cadēna (τὰ Κάδηνα), a strong city of Cappadocia, the residence of the last king, Archelaüs.

Cădi (Κάδοι: Καδηνός: Kodus), a city of Phrygia Epictetus, on the borders of Lydia.

Cadmēa. [THEBAE.]

Cadmus (Κάδμος). 1. Son of Agenor, king of Phoenicia, and of Telephassa, and brother of Europa. Another legend makes him a native of Thebes in Egypt. When Europa was carried off by Zeus to Crete, Agenor sent Cadmus in search of his sister, enjoining him not to return without her. Unable to find her, Cadmus settled in Thrace, but having consulted the oracle at Delphi, he was commanded by the god to follow a cow of a certain kind, and to build a town on the spot where the cow should sink down with fatigue. Cadmus found the cow in Phocis and followed her into Boeotia, where she sank down on the spot on which Cadmus built Cadmea, afterwards the citadel of Thebes. Intending to sacrifice the cow to Athena, he sent some persons to the neighbouring well of Ares to fetch water. This well was guarded by a dragon, a son of Ares, who killed the men sent by Cadmus. Thereupon Cadmus slew the dragon, and, on the advice of Athena, sowed the teeth of the monster, out of which armed men grew up called Sparti or the Sown, who killed each other, with the exception of 5, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Athena assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, and Zeus gave him Harmonia for his wife. The marriage solemnity was honoured by the presence of all the Olympian gods in the Cadmea. Cadmus gave to Harmonia the famous peplus and necklace which he had received from Hephaestus or from Europa, and he became by her the father of Autonoë, Ino, Semele, Agave, and Polydorus. Subsequently Cadmus and Harmonia quitted Thebes, and went to the Enchelians; this people chose Cadmus as their king, and with his assistance they conquered the Illyrians. After this, Cadmus had another son, whom he called Illyrius. In the end, Cadmus and Harmonia were changed into serpents, and were removed by Zeus to Elysium. — Cadmus is said to have introduced into Greece from Phoenicia or Egypt an alphabet of 16 letters, and to have been the first who worked the mines of mount Pangaeon in Thrace. The story of Cadmus seems to suggest the immigration of a Phoenician or Egyptian colony into Greece, by means of which the alphabet, the art of mining, and civilization, came into the country. But many modern writers deny the existence of any such Phoenician or Egyptian colony, and regard Cadmus as a Pelasgian divinity. — 2. Of Miletus, a son of Pandion, the earliest Greek historian or logographer, lived about B. C. 540. He wrote a work on the foundation of Miletus and the earliest history of Ionia generally, in 4 books, but the work extant in antiquity under the latter name was considered a forgery.

Cadmus (Κάδμος). 1. (M. Baba) a mountain in Caria, on the borders of Phrygia, containing the sources of the rivers Cadmus and Lycus. — 2. A small river of Phrygia, flowing N. into the Lycus.

Cadurci, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, in the country now called Querci (a corruption of Cadurci), were celebrated for their manufactories of linen, coverlets, &c. Their capital was Divona, afterwards Civitas Cadurcorum, now Cahors, where are the remains of a Roman amphitheatre and of an aqueduct. A part of the town still bears the name les Cadurcas.

Cadūsii (Καδούσιοι), or Gēlae (Γῆλαι), a powerful Scythian tribe in the mountains S.W. of the Caspian, on the borders of Media Atropatene. Under the Medo-Persian empire they were troublesome neighbours, but the Syrian kings appear to have reduced them to tributary auxiliaries.

Cadȳtis (Κάδυτις), according to Herodotus, a great city of the Syrians of Palestine, not much smaller than Sardis, was taken by Necho, king of Egypt, after his defeat of the "Syrians" at Magdolus. It is now pretty well established that by Cadytis is meant Jerusalem, and that the battle mentioned by Herodotus is that in which Necho defeated and slew king Josiah at Megiddo, B. C. 608. (Comp. Herod. ii. 159, iii. 5, with 2 Kings xxiii. and 2 Chron. xxxv. xxxvi.)

Caecĭlĭa. 1. Caia, the Roman name of TANAQUIL, wife of Tarquinius Priscus. — 2. Metella, daughter of L. Metellus Dalmaticus, consul B. C. 119, was first married to M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul in 115, and afterwards to the dictator Sulla. She fell ill in 81, during the celebration of Sulla's triumphal feast; and as her recovery was hopeless, Sulla for religious reasons sent her a bill of divorce, and had her removed from his house, but honoured her memory with a splendid funeral. — 3. Daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, called Caecilia, because her father took the name of his uncle, Q. Caecilius, by whom he was adopted. She was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. [ATTICUS.]

Caecĭlĭa Gens, plebeian, claimed descent from CAECULUS, the founder of Praeneste, or Caecas, the companion of Aeneas. Most of the Caecilii are mentioned under their cognomens, BASSUS, METELLUS, RUFUS: for others see below.

Caecĭlius. 1. Q., a wealthy Roman eques, who adopted his nephew Atticus in his will, and left the latter a fortune of 10 millions of sesterces. — 2. Caecilius Calactinus, a Greek rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, was a native of Cale Acte in Sicily (whence his name Calactinus). He wrote a great number of works on rhetoric, grammar, and historical subjects. All these works are now lost; but they were in great repute with the rhetoricians and critics of the imperial period. — 3. Caecilius Statius, a Roman comic poet, the immediate predecessor of Terence, was by birth an Insubrian Gaul, and a native of Milan. Being a slave he bore the servile appellation of Statius, which was afterwards, probably when he received his freedom, converted into a sort of cognomen, and he became known as Caecilius Statius. He died B. C. 168. We have the titles of 40 of his dramas, but only a few fragments of them are preserved. They appear to have belonged to the class of Palliatae, that is, were free translations or adaptations of the works of Greek writers of the new comedy. The Romans placed Caecilius in the first rank of comic poets, classing him with Plautus and Terence.

Caecīna, the name of a family of the Etruscan city of Volaterrae, probably derived from the river Caecina, which flows by the town. — 1. A. Caecina, whom Cicero defended in a law-suit, B. C. 69. — 2. A. Caecina, son of the preceding, published a libellous work against Caesar, and was in consequence sent into exile after the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. He afterwards joined the Pompeians in Africa, and upon the defeat of the latter in 46, he surrendered to Caesar, who spared his life. Cicero wrote several letters to Caecina, and speaks of him as a man of ability. Caecina was the author of a work on the Etrusca Disciplina. — 3. A. Caecina Severus, a distinguished general in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He was governor of Moesia in A. D. 6, when he fought against the two Batos in the neighbouring provinces of Dalmatia and Pannonia. [BATO.] In 15 he fought as the legate of Germanicus, against Arminius, and in consequence of his success received the insignia of a triumph. — 4. Caecina Tuscus, son of Nero's nurse, appointed governor of Egypt by Nero, but banished for making use of the baths which had been erected in anticipation of the emperor's arrival in Egypt. He returned from banishment on the death of Nero, A. D. 68. — 5. A. Caecina Alienus, was quaestor in Baetica in Spain at Nero's death, and was one of the foremost in joining the party of Galba. He was rewarded by Galba with the command of a legion in Upper Germany; but, being detected in embezzling some of the public money, the emperor ordered him to be prosecuted. Caecina, in revenge, joined Vitellius, and was sent by the latter into Italy with an army of 30,000 men towards the end of 68. After ravaging the country of the Helvetii, he crossed the Alps by the pass of the Great St. Bernard, and laid siege to Placentia, from which he was repulsed by the troops of Otho, who had succeeded Galba. Subsequently he was joined by Fabius Valens, another general of Vitellius, and their united forces gained a victory over Otho's army at Bedriacum. Vitellius having thus gained the throne, Caecina was made consul on the 1st of September, 69, and was shortly afterwards sent against Antonius Primus, the general of Vespasian. But he again proved a traitor, and espoused the cause of Vespasian. Some years afterwards (79), he conspired against Vespasian, and was slain by order of Titus. — 6. Decius Albinus Caecina, a Roman satirist in the time of Arcadius and Honorius.

Caecīnus (Καικινός or Καικῖνος), a river in Bruttium flowing into the Sinus Scylacius by the town Caecinum.

Caecŭbus Ager, a marshy district in Latium, bordering on the gulf of Amyclae close to Fundi, celebrated for its wine (Caecubum) in the age of Horace. In the time of Pliny the reputation of this wine was entirely gone. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 1207, a, 2nd ed.)

Caecŭlus, an ancient Italian hero, son of Vulcan, is said to have founded Praeneste.

Caeles or Caelĭus Vibenna, the leader of an Etruscan army, is said to have come to Rome in the reign either of Romulus or of Tarquinius Priscus, and to have settled with his troops on the hill called after him the Caelian.

Caelĭus or Coelĭus. 1. Antipater. [ANTIPATER.] — 2. Aurelianus. [AURELIANUS.] — 3. Caldus. [CALDUS.] — 4. Rufus. [RUFUS.]

Caelĭus or Coelĭus Mons. [ROMA.]

Caenae (Καιναί: Senn), a city of Mesopotamia, on the W. bank of the Tigris, opposite the mouth of the Lycus.

Caenē, Caenĕpŏlis, or Neapŏlis (Καινὴ πόλις, Νέη πόλις: Keneh), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, a little below Coptos and opposite to Tentyra.

Caeneus (Καινεύς), one of the Lapithae, son of Elatus or Coronus, was originally a maiden named Caenis, who was beloved by Poseidon, and was by this god changed into a man, and rendered invulnerable. As a man he took part in the Argonautic expedition and the Calydonian hunt. In the battle between the Lapithae and the Centaurs at the marriage of Pirithous, he was buried by the Centaurs under a mass of trees, as they were unable to kill him, but he was changed into a bird. In the lower world Caeneus recovered his female form. (Virg. Aen. vi. 448.)

Caeni or Caenīci, a Thracian people between the Black Sea and the Panysus.

Caenīna (Caeninensis), a town of the Sabines in Latium, whose king Acron is said to have carried on the first war against Rome. After their defeat, most of the inhabitants removed to Rome.

Caenis. [CAENEUS.]

Caenys (Καῖνυς : Capo di Cavallo or Coda di Volpe), a promontory of Bruttium opposite Sicily.

Caepārīus, M., of Tarracina, one of Catiline's conspirators, was to induce the shepherds in Apulia to rise: he escaped from the city, but was overtaken in his flight, and was executed with the other conspirators B. C. 63.

Caepĭo, Servīlĭus. 1. Cn., consul B. C. 253, in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, C. Sempronius Blaesus, to the coast of Africa. — 2. Cn., curule aedile 207, praetor 205, and consul 203, when he fought against Hannibal near Croton in the S. of Italy. He died in the pestilence in 174. — 3. Cn., son of No. 2, curule aedile 179, praetor 174, with Spain as his province, and consul in 169. — 4. Q., son of No. 3, consul 142, was adopted by Q. Fabius Maximus. [MAXIMUS.] — 5. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 141, and censor 125. — 6. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 140, carried on war against Viriathus in Lusitania, and induced two of the friends of Viriathus to murder the latter. — 7. Q., son of No. 6, was consul 106, when he proposed a law for restoring the judicia to the senators, of which they had been deprived by the Sempronia lex of C. Gracchus. He was afterwards sent into Gallia Narbonensis to oppose the Cimbri, and was in 105 defeated by the Cimbri, along with the consul Cn. Mallius or Manlius. 80,000 soldiers and 40,000 camp-followers are said to have perished. Caepio survived the battle, but 10 years afterwards (95) he was brought to trial by the tribune C. Norbanus on account of his misconduct in this war. He was condemned and cast into prison, where according to one account he died, but it was more generally stated that he escaped from prison, and lived in exile at Smyrna. — 8. Q., quaestor urbanus 100, opposed the lex frumentaria of Saturninus. In 91 he opposed the measures of Drusus, and accused two of the most distinguished senators, M. Scaurus and L. Philippus. He fell in battle in the Social War, 90.

Caepĭo, Fannĭus, conspired with Murena against Augustus B. C. 22, and was put to death.

Caerĕ (Caerites, Caeretes, Caeretani: Cervetri), called by the Greeks Agylla (Ἄγυλλα: Agyllina urbs, Virg. Aen. vii. 652), a city in Etruria situated on a small river (Caeritis amnis), W. of Veii and 50 stadia from the coast. It was an ancient Pelasgic city, the capital of the cruel Mezentius, and was afterwards one of the 12 Etruscan cities, with a territory extending apparently as far as the Tiber. In early times Caere was closely allied with Rome; and when the latter city was taken by the Gauls, B. C. 390, Caere gave refuge to the Vestal virgins. It was from this event that the Romans traced the origin of their word caerimonia. The Romans out of gratitude are said to have conferred upon the Caerites the Roman franchise without the suffragium *, though it is not improbable that the Caerites enjoyed this honour previously. In 353, however, Caere joined Tarquinii in making war against Rome, but was obliged to purchase a truce with Rome for 100 years by the forfeiture of half of its territory. From this time Caere gradually sunk in importance, and was probably destroyed in the wars of Marius and Sulla. It was restored by Drusus, who made it a municipium; and it continued to exist till the 13th century, when part of the inhabitants removed to a site about 3 miles off, on which they bestowed the same name (now Ceri), while the old town was distinguished by the title of Vetus or Caere Vetere, corrupted into Cervetri, which is a small village with 100 or 200 inhabitants. Here have been discovered, within the last few years, the tombs of the ancient Caere, many of them in a state of complete preservation. — The country round Caere produced wine and a great quantity of corn, and in its neighbourhood were warm baths which were much frequented. Caere used as its sea-port the town of PYRGI.

Caerellĭa, a Roman lady frequently mentioned in the correspondence of Cicero as distinguished for her acquirements and her love of philosophy.

Caesar, the name of a patrician family of the Julia gens, which traced its origin to Iulus, the son of Aeneas. [JULIA GENS.] Various etymologies of the name are given by the ancient writers; but it is probably connected with the Latin word caes-ar-ies, and the Sanskrit kêsa, "hair," for it is in accordance with the Roman custom for a surname to be given to an individual from some peculiarity in his personal appearance. The name was assumed by Augustus as the adopted son of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, and was by Augustus handed down to his adopted son Tiberius. It continued to be used by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members either by adoption or female descent of Caesar's family; but though the family became extinct with Nero, succeeding emperors still retained the name as part of their titles, and it was the practice to prefix it to their own name, as for instance, Imperator Caesar Domitianus Augustus. When Hadrian adopted Aelius Verus, he allowed the latter to take the title of Caesar; and from this time, though the title of Augustus continued to be confined to the reigning prince, that of Caesar was also granted to the second person in the state and the heir presumptive to the throne.

Caesar, Jūlĭus. 1. Sex., praetor B. C. 208, with Sicily as his province. — 2. Sex., curule aedile, 165, when the Hecyra of Terence was exhibited at the Megalesian games, and consul 157. — 3. L., consul 90, fought against the Socii, and in the course of the same year proposed the Lex Julia de Civitate, which granted the citizenship to the Latins and the Socii who had remained faithful to Rome. Caesar was censor in 89; he belonged to the aristocratical party, and was put to death by Marius in 87. — 4. C., surnamed STRABO VOPISCUS, brother of No. 3, was curule aedile 90, was a candidate for the consulship in 88, and was slain along with his brother by Marius in 87. He was one of the chief orators and poets of his age, and is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue De Oratore. Wit was the chief characteristic of his oratory; but he was deficient in power and energy. The names of 2 of his tragedies are preserved, the Adrastus and Tecmessa. — 5. L., son of No. 3, and uncle by his sister Julia of M. Antony the triumvir. He was consul 64, and belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party. He appears to have deserted this party afterwards; we find him in Gaul in 52 as one of the legates of C. Caesar, and he continued in Italy during the civil war. After Caesar's death (44) he sided with the senate in opposition to his uncle Antony, and was in consequence proscribed by the latter in 43, but obtained his pardon through the influence of his sister Julia. — 6. L., son of No. 5, usually distinguished from his father by the addition to his name of filius or adolescens. He joined Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war in 49, and was sent by Pompey to Caesar with proposals of peace. In the course of the same year, he crossed over to Africa, where the command of Clupea was entrusted to him. In 46 he served as proquaestor to Cato in Utica, and after the death of Cato he surrendered to the dictator Caesar, and was shortly afterwards put to death, but probably not by the dictator's orders. — 7. C., the father of the dictator, was praetor, but in what year is uncertain, and died suddenly at Pisae in 84. — 8. Sex., brother of No. 7, consul 91. — 9. C., the Dictator, son of No. 7 and of Aurelia, was born on the 12th of July, 100, in the consulship of C. Marius (VI.) and L. Valerius Flaccus, and was consequently 6 years younger than Pompey and Cicero. He had nearly completed his 56th year at the time of his murder, 15th of March, 44. Caesar was closely connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julia with the great Marius; and in 83, though only 17 years of age, he married Cornelia, the daughter of L. Cinna, the chief leader of the Marian party. Sulla commanded him to put away his wife, but he refused to obey him, and was consequently proscribed. He concealed himself for some time in the country of the Sabines, till his friends obtained his pardon from Sulla, who is said to have observed, when they pleaded his youth, "that that boy would some day or another be the ruin of the aristocracy, for that there were many Mariuses in him." Seeing that he was not safe at Rome, he went to Asia, where he served his first campaign under M. Minucius Thermus, and, at the capture of Mytilene (80), was rewarded with a civic crown for saving the life of a fellow-soldier. On the death of Sulla in 78, he returned to Rome, and in the following year gained great renown as an orator, though he was only 22 years of age, by his prosecution of Cn. Dolabella on account of extortion in his province of Macedonia. To perfect himself in oratory, he resolved to study in Rhodes under Apollonius Molo, but on his voyage thither he was captured by pirates, and only obtained his liberty by a ransom of 50 talents. At Miletus he manned some vessels, overpowered the pirates, and conducted them as prisoners to Pergamus, where he crucified them, a punishment with which he had frequently threatened them in sport when he was their prisoner. He then repaired to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius, and shortly afterwards returned to Rome. He now devoted all his energies to acquire the favour of the people. His liberality was unbounded, and as his private fortune was not large, he soon contracted enormous debts. But he gained his object, and became the favourite of the people, and was raised by them in succession to the high offices of the state. He was quaestor in 68, and aedile in 65, when he spent enormous sums upon the public games and buildings. He was said by many to have been privy to Catiline's conspiracy in 63, but there is no satisfactory evidence of his guilt, and it is improbable that he would have embarked in such a rash scheme. In the debate in the senate on the punishment of the conspirators, he opposed their execution in a very able speech, which made such an impression, that their lives would have been spared but for the speech of Cato in reply. In the course of this year (63), Caesar was elected Pontifex Maximus, defeating the other candidates, Q. Catulus and Servilius Isauricus, who had both been consuls, and were two of the most illustrious men in the state.—In 62 Caesar was praetor, and took an active part in supporting the tribune Metellus in opposition to his colleague Cato; in consequence of the tumults that ensued, the senate suspended both Caesar and Metellus from their offices, but were obliged to reinstate him in his dignity after a few days. In the following year (61) Caesar went as propraetor into Farther Spain, where he gained great victories over the Lusitanians. On his return to Rome, he became a candidate for the consulship, and was elected notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the aristocracy, who succeeded however in carrying the election of Bibulus as his colleague, who was one of the warmest supporters of the aristocracy. After his election, but before he entered upon the consulship, he formed that coalition with Pompey and M. Crassus, usually known by the name of the first triumvirate. Pompey had become estranged from the aristocracy, since the senate had opposed the ratification of his acts in Asia and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. Crassus in consequence of his immense wealth was one of the most powerful men at Rome, but was a personal enemy of Pompey. They were reconciled by means of Caesar, and the 3 entered into an agreement to support one another, and to divide the power in the state between them.—In 59 Caesar was consul, and being supported by Pompey and Crassus he was able to carry all his measures. Bibulus, from whom the senate had expected so much, could offer no effectual opposition, and, after making a vain attempt to resist Caesar, shut himself up in his own house, and did not appear again in public till the expiration of his consulship. Caesar's first measure was an agrarian law, by which the rich Campanian plain was divided among the poorer citizens. He next gained the favour of the equites by relieving them from 1-3rd of the sum which they had agreed to pay for the farming of the taxes in Asia. He then obtained the confirmation of Pompey's acts. Having thus gratified the people, the equites, and Pompey, he was easily able to obtain for himself the provinces which he wished. By a vote of the people, proposed by the tribune Vatinius, the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum were granted to Caesar with 3 legions for 5 years; and the senate added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, with another legion, for 5 years also, as they saw that a bill would be proposed to the people for that purpose, if they did not grant the province themselves. Caesar foresaw that the struggle between the different parties at Rome must eventually be terminated by the sword, and he had therefore resolved to obtain an army, which he might attach to himself by victories and rewards. In the course of the same year Caesar united himself more closely to Pompey by giving him his daughter Julia in marriage. During the next 9 years Caesar was occupied with the subjugation of Gaul. He conquered the whole of Transalpine Gaul, which had hitherto been independent of the Romans, with the exception of the S. E. part called Provincia ; he twice crossed the Rhine, and twice landed in Britain, which had been previously unknown to the Romans. — In his 1st campaign (58) Caesar conquered the Helvetii, who had emigrated from Switzerland with the intention of settling in Gaul. He next defeated Ariovistus, a German king, who had taken possession of part of the territories of the Aedui and Sequani, and pursued him as far as the Rhine. At the conclusion of the campaign Caesar went into Cisalpine Gaul to attend to the civil duties of his province and to keep up his communication with the various parties at Rome. During the whole of his campaigns in Gaul, he spent the greater part of the winter in Cisalpine Gaul. — In his 2nd campaign (57) Caesar carried on war with the Belgae, who dwelt in the N.E. of Gaul between the Sequana (Seine) and the Rhine, and after a severe struggle completely subdued them. — Caesar's 3rd campaign in Gaul (56) did not commence till late in the year. He was detained some months in the N. of Italy by the state of affairs at Rome. At Luca (Lucca) he had interviews with most of the leading men at Rome, among others with Pompey and Crassus, who visited him in April. He made arrangements with them for the continuance of their power ; it was agreed between them that Crassus and Pompey should be the consuls for the following year, that Crassus should have the province of Syria, Pompey the 2 Spains, and that Caesar's government, which would expire at the end of 54, should be prolonged for 5 years after that date. After making these arrangements he crossed the Alps, and carried on war with the Veneti and the other states in the N.W. of Gaul, who had submitted to Crassus, Caesar's legate, in the preceding year, but who had now risen in arms against the Romans. They were defeated and obliged to submit to Caesar, and during the same time Crassus conquered Aquitania. Thus, in 3 campaigns, Caesar subdued the whole of Gaul ; but the people made several attempts to recover their independence ; and it was not till their revolts had been again and again put down by Caesar, and the flower of the nation had perished in battle, that they learnt to submit to the Roman yoke.—In his 4th campaign (55) Caesar crossed the Rhine in order to strike terror into the Germans, but he only remained 18 days on the further side of the river. Late in the summer he invaded Britain, but more with the view of obtaining some knowledge of the island from personal observation, than with the intention of permanent conquest at present. He sailed from the port Itius (probably Witsand, between Calais and Boulogne), and effected a landing somewhere near the South Foreland, after a severe struggle with the natives. The late period of the year compelled him to return to Gaul after remaining only a short time in the island. In this year, according to his arrangement with Pompey and Crassus, who were now consuls, his government of the Gauls and Illyricum was prolonged for 5 years, namely, from the 1st of January, 53, to the end of December, 49. — Caesar's 5th campaign (54) was chiefly occupied with his 2nd invasion of Britain. He landed in Britain at the same place as in the former year, defeated the Britons in a series of engagements, and crossed the Tamesis (Thames). The Britons submitted, and promised to pay an annual tribute; but their subjection was only nominal, for Caesar left no garrisons or military establishments behind him, and Britain remained nearly 100 years longer independent of the Romans. During the winter one of the Roman legions, which had been stationed under the command of T. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, in the country of the Eburones, was cut to pieces by Ambiorix and the Eburones. Ambiorix then proceeded to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, who was stationed with a legion among the Nervii ; but Cicero defended himself with bravery, and was at length relieved by Caesar in person. In September of this year, Julia, Caesar's only daughter and Pompey's wife, died in childbirth. — In Caesar's 6th campaign (53) several of the Gallic nations revolted, but Caesar soon compelled them to return to obedience. The Treviri, who had revolted, had been supported by the Germans, and Caesar accordingly again crossed the Rhine, but made no permanent conquests on the further side of the river. — Caesar's 7th campaign (52) was the most arduous of all. Almost all the nations of Gaul rose simultaneously in revolt, and the supreme command was given to Vercingetorix, by far the ablest general that Caesar had yet encountered. After a most severe struggle in which Caesar's military genius triumphed over every obstacle, the war was brought to a conclusion by the defeat of the Gauls before Alesia and the surrender of this city.—The 8th and 9th campaigns (51, 50) were employed in the final subjugation of Gaul, which had entirely submitted to Caesar by the middle of 50. Meanwhile, an estrangement had taken place between Caesar and Pompey. Caesar's brilliant victories had gained him fresh popularity and influence ; and Pompey saw with ill-disguised mortification that he was becoming the second person in the state. He was thus led to join again the aristocratical party, by the assistance of which he could alone hope to retain his position as the chief man in the Roman state. The great object of this party was to deprive Caesar of his command, and to compel him to come to Rome as a private man to sue for the consulship. They would then have formally accused him, and as Pompey was in the neighbourhood of the city at the head of an army, the trial would have been a mockery, and his condemnation would have been certain. Caesar offered to resign his command if Pompey would do the same ; but the senate would not listen to any compromise. Accordingly, on the 1st of January, 49, the senate passed a resolution that Caesar should disband his army by a certain day, and that if he did not do so, he should be regarded as an enemy of the state. Two of the tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, put their veto upon this resolution, but their opposition was set at nought, and they fled for refuge to Caesar's camp. Under the plea of protecting the tribunes, Caesar crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and marched towards Rome. Pompey, who had been entrusted by the senate with the conduct of the war, soon discovered how greatly he had overrated his own popularity and influence. His own troops deserted to his rival in crowds; town after town in Italy opened its gates to Caesar, whose march was like a triumphal progress. The only town which offered Caesar any resistance was Corfinium, into which L. Domitius Ahenobarbus had thrown himself with a strong force; but even this place was obliged to surrender at the end of a few days. Meantime, Pompey, with the magistrates and senators, had fled from Rome to Capua, and now, despairing of opposing Caesar in Italy, he marched from Capua to Brundusium, and on the 17th of March embarked for Greece. Caesar pursued Pompey to Brundusium, but he was unable to follow him to Greece for want of ships. He therefore marched back from Brundusium, and repaired to Rome, having thus in 3 months become master of the whole of Italy. After remaining a short time in Rome, he set out for Spain, where Pompey's legates, Afranius, Petreius, and Varro, commanded powerful armies. After defeating Afranius and Petreius, and receiving the submission of Varro, Caesar returned to Rome, where he had meantime been appointed dictator by the praetor M. Lepidus. He resigned the dictatorship at the end of 11 days, after holding the consular comitia, in which he himself and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus were elected consuls for the next year. — At the beginning of January, 48, Caesar crossed over to Greece, where Pompey had collected a formidable army. At first the campaign was in Pompey's favour; Caesar was repulsed before Dyrrhachium with considerable loss, and was obliged to retreat towards Thessaly. In this country on the plains of Pharsalus or Pharsalia, a decisive battle was fought between the 2 armies on the 9th of August, 48, in which Pompey was completely defeated. Pompey fled to Egypt, pursued by Caesar, but he was murdered before Caesar arrived in the country. [POMPEIUS.] His head was brought to Caesar, who turned away from the sight, shed tears at the untimely death of his rival, and put his murderers to death. When the news of the battle of Pharsalia reached Rome, various honours were conferred upon Caesar. He was appointed dictator for a whole year and consul for 5 years, and the tribunician power was conferred upon him for life. He declined the consulship, but entered upon the dictatorship in September in this year (48), and appointed M. Antony his master of the horse. On his arrival in Egypt, Caesar became involved in a war, which gave the remains of the Pompeian party time to rally. This war, usually called the Alexandrine war, arose from the determination of Caesar that Cleopatra, whose fascinations had won his heart, should reign in common with her brother Ptolemy; but this decision was opposed by the guardians of the young king, and the war which thus broke out, was not brought to a close till the latter end of March, 47. It was soon after this, that Cleopatra had a son by Caesar. [CAESARION.] Caesar returned to Rome through Syria and Asia Minor, and on his march through Pontus attacked Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the Great, who had assisted Pompey. He defeated Pharnaces near Zela with such ease, that he informed the senate of his victory by the words, Veni, vidi, vici. He reached Rome in September (47), was appointed consul for the following year, and before the end of September set sail for Africa, where Scipio and Cato had collected a large army. The war was terminated by the defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus, on the 6th of April, 46. Cato, unable to defend Utica, put an end to his own life. — Caesar returned to Rome in the latter end of July. He was now the undisputed master of the Roman world, but he used his victory with the greatest moderation. Unlike other conquerors in civil wars, he freely forgave all who had borne arms against him, and declared that he would make no difference between Pompeians and Caesarians. His clemency was one of the brightest features of his character. At Rome all parties seemed to vie in paying him honour: the dictatorship was bestowed on him for 10 years, and the censorship, under the new title of Praefectus Morum, for 3 years. He celebrated his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa by 4 magnificent triumphs. Caesar now proceeded to correct the various evils which had crept into the state, and to obtain the enactment of several laws suitable to the altered condition of the commonwealth. The most important of his measures this year (46) was the reformation of the calendar. As the Roman year was now 3 months in advance of the real time, Caesar added 90 days to this year, and thus made the whole year consist of 445 days; and he guarded against a repetition of similar errors for the future by adapting the year to the sun's course. (Dict. of Ant. art. Calendarium.) — Meantime the 2 sons of Pompey, Sextus and Cneius, had collected a new army in Spain. Caesar set out for Spain towards the end of the year, and brought the war to a close by the battle of Munda, on the 17th of March, 45, in which the enemy were only defeated after a most obstinate resistance. Cn. Pompey was killed shortly afterwards, but Sextus made good his escape. Caesar reached Rome in September, and entered the city in triumph. Fresh honours awaited him. His portrait was to be struck on coins; the month of Quintilis was to receive the name of Julius in his honour; he received the title of imperator for life; and the whole senate took an oath to watch over his safety. To reward his followers, Caesar increased the number of senators and of the public magistrates, so that there were to be 16 praetors, 40 quaestors, and 6 aediles. He began to revolve vast schemes for the benefit of the Roman world. Among his plans of internal improvement, he proposed to frame a digest of all the Roman laws, to establish public libraries, to drain the Pomptine marshes, to enlarge the harbour of Ostia, and to dig a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. To protect the boundaries of the Roman empire, he meditated expeditions against the Parthians and the barbarous tribes on the Danube, and had already begun to make preparations for his departure to the East. Possessing royal power, he now wished to obtain the title of king, and Antony accordingly offered him the diadem in public on the festival of the Lupercalia (the 15th of February); but, seeing that the proposition was not favourably received by the people, he declined it for the present. — But Caesar's power was not witnessed without envy. The Roman aristocracy, who had been so long accustomed to rule the Roman world and to pillage it at their pleasure, could ill brook a master, and resolved to remove him by assassination. The conspiracy against Caesar's life had been set afoot by Cassius, a personal enemy of Caesar's, and there were more than 60 persons privy to it. Many of these persons had been raised by Caesar to wealth and honour; and some of them, such as M. Brutus, lived with him on terms of the most intimate friendship. It has been the practice of rhetoricians to speak of the murder of Caesar as a glorious deed, and to represent Brutus and Cassius as patriots; but the mask ought to be stripped off these false patriots; they cared not for the republic, but only for themselves; and their object in murdering Caesar was to gain power for themselves and their party. Caesar had many warnings of his approaching fate, but he disregarded them all, and fell by the daggers of his assassins on the Ides or 15th of March, 44. At an appointed signal the conspirators surrounded him; Casca dealt the first blow, and the others quickly drew their swords and attacked him; Caesar at first defended himself, but when he saw that Brutus, his friend and favourite, had also drawn his sword, he exclaimed Tu quoque Brute! pulled his toga over his face, and sunk pierced with wounds at the foot of Pompey's statue. — Julius Caesar was the greatest man of antiquity. He was gifted by nature with the most various talents, and was distinguished by the most extraordinary attainments in the most diversified pursuits. He was at one and the same time a general, a statesman, a lawgiver, a jurist, an orator, a poet, an historian, a philologer, a mathematician, and an architect. He was equally fitted to excel in all, and has given proofs that he would have surpassed almost all other men in any subject to which he devoted the energies of his extraordinary mind. During the whole of his busy life he found time for literary pursuits, and was the author of many works, the majority of which has been lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his Commentarii, which are his only works that have come down to us. They relate the history of the first 7 years of the Gallic war in 7 books, and the history of the Civil war down to the commencement of the Alexandrine in 3 books. Neither of these works completed the history of the Gallic and Civil wars. The history of the former was completed in an 8th book, which is usually ascribed to Hirtius, and the history of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars were written in 3 separate books, which are also ascribed to Hirtius, but their authorship is uncertain. The lost works of Caesar are: — 1. Anticato, in reply to Cicero's Cato, which Cicero wrote in praise of Cato after the death of the latter in 46. 2. De Analogia, or, as Cicero explains it, De Ratione Latine loquendi, dedicated to Cicero, contained investigations on the Latin language, and were written by Caesar while he was crossing the Alps. 3. Libri Auspiciorum, or Auguralia. 4. De Astris. 5. Apophthegmata, or Dicta collectanea, a collection of good sayings. 6. Poemata. Two of these written in his youth, Laudes Herculis and a tragedy Oedipus, were suppressed by Augustus. Of the numerous editions of Caesar's Commentaries the best are by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat. 1737, Stuttgard, 1822; by Morus, Lips. 1780; and by Oberlin, Lips. 1805, 1819.

* The Caerites appear to have been the first body of Roman citizens who did not enjoy the suffrage. Thus, when a Roman citizen was struck out of his tribe by the Censors and made an aerarian, he was said to become one of the Caerites, since he had lost the suffrage: hence we find the expressions in tabulas Caeritum referre and aerarium facere used as synonymous.

C. Caesar and L. Caesar, the sons of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, and the grandsons of Augustus. L. Caesar died at Massilia, on his way to Spain, A. D. 2, and C. Caesar in Lycia, A. D. 4, of a wound which he had received in Armenia.

Caesaraugusta (Zaragoza or Saragossa), more anciently Salduba, a town of the Edetani on the Iberus in Hispania Tarraconensis, was colonized by Augustus B. C. 27, and was the seat of a Conventus Juridicus. It was the birth-place of the poet Prudentius.

Caesărēa (Καισάρεια: Καισαρεύς: Caesariensis), a name given to several cities of the Roman empire in honour of one or other of the Caesars. — 1. C. ad Argaeum, formerly Mazăca, also Eusĕbīa (K. ἡ πρὸς τῷ Ἀργαίῳ, τὰ Μάζακα, Εὐσέβεια: Kesarieh, Ru.), one of the oldest cities of Asia Minor, stood upon Mount Argaeus, about the centre of Cappadocia, in the district (praefectura) called Cilicia. It was the capital of Cappadocia, and when that country was made a Roman province by Tiberius (A. D. 18), it received the name of Caesarea. It was ultimately destroyed by an earthquake. — 2. C. Philippi or Panēas (K. ἡ Φιλίππου, N. T.; K. Πανειάς: Banias), a city of Palestine, at the S. foot of M. Hermon, on the Jordan, just below its source [PANIUM], built by Philip the tetrarch, B. C. 3; King Agrippa called it Neronias, but it soon lost this name. — 3. C. Palaestinae, formerly Stratōnis Turris (Στράτωνος πύργος: Kaisariyeh, Ru.), an important city of Palestine, on the sea-coast, just above the boundary line between Samaria and Galilee. It was surrounded with a wall and decorated with splendid buildings by Herod the Great (B. C. 13), who called it Caesarea, in honour of Augustus. He also made a splendid harbour for the city. Under the Romans it was the capital of Palestine and the residence of the procurator. Vespasian made it a colony, and Titus conferred additional favours upon it; hence it was called Colonia Flavia. — 4. C. Mauretaniae, formerly Iol (Ἰὼλ Καισάρεια: Zershell, Ru.), a Phoenician city on the N. coast of Africa, with a harbour, the residence of King Juba, who named it Caesarea, in honour of Augustus. When Claudius erected Mauretania into a Roman province, he made Caesarea a colony, and the capital of the middle division of the province, which was thence called Mauretania Caesariensis. — 5. C. ad Anazarbum. [ANAZARBUS.] There are several others, which are better known by other names, and several which are not important enough to be mentioned here.

Caesarīon, son of C. Julius Caesar and of Cleopatra, originally called Ptolemaeus as an Egyptian prince, was born B. C. 47. In 42 the triumvirs allowed him to receive the title of king of Egypt, and in 34 Antony conferred upon him the title of king of kings. After the death of his mother in 30 he was executed by order of Augustus.

Caesarodūnum (Tours), chief town of the Turōnes or Turŏni, subsequently called Turoni, on the Liger (Loire) in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Caesaromăgus. 1. (Beauvais), chief town of the Bellovaci in Gallia Belgica. — 2. (Chelmsford), a town of the Trinobantes in Britain.

Caesēna (Caesenas -ātis: Cesena), a town in Gallia Cispadana on the Via Aemilia not far from the Rubico.

Caesennīus Lento. [LENTO.]

Caesennīus Paetus. [PAETUS.]

Caesetīus Flavus. [FLAVUS.]

Caesĭa, a surname of Minerva, a translation of the Greek γλαυκῶπις.

Caesĭa Silva (Hasernwald), a forest in Germany between the Lippe and the Yssel.

Caesōnĭa, first the mistress and afterwards the wife of the emperor Caligula, was a woman of the greatest licentiousness, and was put to death with Caligula together with her daughter, A. D. 41.

M. Caesōnĭus, a judex at the trial of Oppianicus for the murder of Cluentius, B. C. 74, and aedile with Cicero in 69.

Căĭcus (Καΐκός: Akson or Bakir), a river of Mysia, rising in M. Temnus and flowing past Pergamus into the Cumaean Gulf.

Caiēta (Caietānus: Gaeta), a town in Latium on the borders of Campania, 40 stadia S. of Formiae, situated on a promontory of the same name and on a bay of the sea called after it Sinus Caietanus. It possessed an excellent harbour (Cic. pro Leg. Man. 12), and was said to have derived its name from Caieta, the nurse of Aeneas, who, according to some traditions, was buried at this place.

Căĭus, the jurist. [Gaius.]

Caius Caesar. [Caligula.]

Călăber. [Quintus Smyrnaeus.]

Calabrĭa (Calabri), the peninsula in the S. E. of Italy, extending from Tarentum to the Prom. Iapygium, formed part of Apulia.

Calacta (Καλὴ Ἀκτή: Καλακτῖνος: nr. Caronia, Ru.), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, founded by Ducetius, a chief of the Sicels, about B. C. 447. Calacta was, as its name imports, originally the name of the coast. (Herod. vi. 22.)

Calactīnus. [Caecilius Calactinus.]

Calagurris (Calagurritānus: Calahorra), a town of the Vascones and a Roman municipium in Hispania Tarraconensis near the Iberus, memorable for its adherence to Sertorius and for its siege by Pompey and his generals, in the course of which mothers killed and salted their children, B. C. 71. (Juv. xv. 93.) It was the birth-place of Quintilian.

Călăĭs, brother of Zetes. [Zetes.]

Călămă. 1. (Kalma, Ru.) an important town in Numidia, between Cirta and Hippo Regius, on the E. bank of the Rubricatus (Seibouss). — 2. (Kalat-al-Wad), a town in the W. of Mauretania Caesariensis, on the E. bank of the Malva, near its mouth.

Călămīne, in Lydia, a lake with floating islands, sacred to the nymphs.

Calămis (Κάλαμις), a statuary and embosser at Athens, of great celebrity, was a contemporary of Phidias, and flourished B. C. 467—429.

Călămus (Κάλαμος: El-Kulmon), a town on the coast of Phoenicia, a little S. of Tripolis.

Calănus (Κάλανος), an Indian gymnosophist, followed Alexander the Great from India, and having been taken ill, burnt himself alive in the presence of the Macedonians, 3 months before the death of Alexander (B. C. 323), to whom he had predicted his approaching end.

Calasĭrĭes (Καλασίριες), one of the two divisions (the other being the Hermotybii) of the warrior-caste of Egypt. Their greatest strength was 250,000 men, and their chief abode in the W. part of the Delta. They formed the king's body guard.

Călātĭa (Calatīnus: Cajazzo), a town in Samnium on the Appia Via between Capua and Beneventum, was conquered by the Romans B. C. 313, and was colonized by Julius Caesar with his veterans.

Calatīnus, A. Atilĭus, consul B. C. 258, in the first Punic war, carried on the war with success in Sicily. He was consul a 2nd time, 254, when he took Panormus; and was dictator, 249, when he again carried on the war in Sicily, which was the first instance of a dictator commanding an army out of Italy.

Calaurēa -ĭa (Καλαύρεια, Καλαυρία: Καλαυρείτης: Poro), a small island in the Saronic gulf off the coast of Argolis and opposite Troezen, possessed a celebrated temple of Poseidon, which was regarded as an inviolable asylum. Hither Demosthenes fled to escape Antipater, and here he took poison, B. C. 322. This temple was the place of meeting of an ancient Amphictyonia. (See Dict. of Ant. p. 79, b, 2d ed.)

Calāvĭus, the name of a distinguished family at Capua, the most celebrated member of which was Pacuvius Calavius, who induced his fellow-citizens to espouse the cause of Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216.

Calbis (ὁ Κάλβις), also Indus (Quingi or Tanas), a considerable river of Caria, which rises in M. Cadmus, above Cibyra, and after receiving (according to Pliny) 60 small rivers and 100 mountain torrents, falls into the sea W. of Caunus and opposite to Rhodes.

Calchas (Κάλχας), son of Thestor of Mycenae or Megara, the wisest soothsayer among the Greeks at Troy, foretold the length of the Trojan war, explained the cause of the pestilence which raged in the Greek army, and advised the Greeks to build the wooden horse. An oracle had declared that Calchas should die if he met with a soothsayer superior to himself; and this came to pass at Claros, near Colophon, for here Calchas met the soothsayer Mopsus, who predicted things which Calchas could not. Thereupon Calchas died of grief. After his death he had an oracle in Daunia.

Caldus, C. Caelĭus. 1. Rose from obscurity by his oratory, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 107, when he proposed a lex tabellaria, and consul 94. In the civil war between Sulla and the party of Marius, he fought on the side of the latter, 83. — 2. Grandson of the preceding, was Cicero's quaestor in Cilicia, 50.

Cale (Oporto), a port-town of the Callaeci in Hispania Tarraconensis at the mouth of the Durius. From Porto Cale the name of the country Portugal is supposed to have come.

Călēdŏnĭa. [Britannia.]

Calentum, a town probably of the Calenses Emanici in Hispania Baetica, celebrated for its manufacture of bricks so light as to swim upon water.

Calēnus, Q. Fūfĭus, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 61, when he succeeded in saving P. Clodius from condemnation for his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 59 he was praetor, and from this time appears as an active partizan of Caesar. In 51 he was legate of Caesar in Gaul, and served under Caesar in the civil war. In 49 he joined Caesar at Brundusium and accompanied him to Spain, and in 48 he was sent by Caesar from Epirus to bring over the remainder of the troops from Italy, but most of his ships were taken by Bibulus. After the battle of Pharsalia (48) Calenus took many cities in Greece. In 47 he was made consul by Caesar. After Caesar's death (44) Calenus joined M. Antony, and subsequently had the command of Antony's legions in the N. of Italy. At the termination of the Perusinian war (41) Calenus died, and Octavianus was thus enabled to obtain possession of his army.

Cales or -ex (Κάλης or -ηξ: Halabli), a river of Bithynia, S.W. of Heraclēa Pontica. (Thuc. iv. 75.)

Căles (-is, usually Pl. Cales -ium: Calenus: Calvi), chief town of the Caleni, an Ausonian people in Campania, on the Via Latina, said to have been founded by Calais, son of Boreas, and therefore called Threïcia by the poets. Cales was taken and colonized by the Romans, B. C. 335. It was celebrated for its excellent wine.

Calētes or -i, a people in Belgic Gaul near the mouth of the Seine: their capital was Juliobona.

Calētor (Καλήτωρ), son of Clytius, slain at Troy by the Telamonian Ajax.

Calĭdius. 1. Q., tribune of the plebs B. C. 99, carried a law for the recall of Q. Metellus Numidicus from banishment. He was praetor 79, and had the government of one of the Spains, and on his return was accused by Q. Lollius, and condemned. — 2. M., son of the preceding, distinguished as an orator. In 57 he was praetor, and supported the recal of Cicero from banishment. In 51 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, and on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Caesar, who placed him over Gallia Togata, where he died in 48.

Călĭgŭla, Roman emperor, A. D. 37—41, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A. D. 12, and was brought up among the legions in Germany. His real name was Caius Caesar, and he was always called Caius by his contemporaries: Caligula was a surname given him by the soldiers from his wearing in his boyhood small caligae, or soldiers' boots. Having escaped the fate of his mother and brother, he gained the favour of Tiberius, who raised him to offices of honour, and held out to him hopes of the succession. On the death of Tiberius (37), which was either caused or accelerated by Caligula, the latter succeeded to the throne. He was saluted by the people with the greatest enthusiasm as the son of Germanicus. His first acts gave promise of a just and beneficent reign. He pardoned all the persons who had appeared as witnesses or accusers against his family; he released all the state-prisoners of Tiberius; he restored to the magistrates full power of jurisdiction without appeal to his person, and promised the senate to govern according to the laws. Towards foreign princes hė behaved with great generosity. He restored Agrippa, the grandson of Herod, to his kingdom of Judaea, and Antiochus IV. to his kingdom of Commagene. But at the end of 8 months the conduct of Caligula became suddenly changed. After a serious illness, which probably weakened his mental powers, he appears as a sanguinary and licentious madman. He put to death Tiberius, the grandson of his predecessor, compelled his grandmother Antonia and other members of his family to make away with themselves, often caused persons of both sexes and of all ages to be tortured to death for his amusement while taking his meals, and on one occasion, during the exhibition of the games in the Circus, he ordered a great number of the spectators to be seized, and to be thrown before the wild beasts. Such was his love of blood that he wished the Roman people had only one head, that he might cut it off with a blow. His obscenity was as great as his cruelty. He carried on an incestuous intercourse with his own sisters, and no Roman woman was safe from his attacks. His marriages were disgracefully contracted and speedily dissolved; and the only woman who exercised a permanent influence over him was his last wife Caesonia. In his madness he considered himself a god; he even built a temple to himself as Jupiter Latiaris, and appointed priests to attend to his worship. He sometimes officiated as his own priest, making his horse Incitatus, which he afterwards raised to the consulship, his colleague. His monstrous extravagancies soon exhausted the coffers of the state. One instance may show the senseless way in which he spent his money. He constructed a bridge of boats between Baiae and Puteoli, a distance of about 3 miles, and after covering it with earth he built houses upon it. When it was finished, he gave a splendid banquet in the middle of the bridge, and concluded the entertainment by throwing numbers of the guests into the sea. To replenish the treasury he exhausted Italy and Rome by his extortions, and then marched into Gaul in 40, which he plundered in all directions. With his troops he advanced to the ocean, as if intending to cross over into Britain; he drew them up in battle array, and then gave them the signal — to collect shells, which he called the spoils of conquered Ocean. The Roman world at length grew tired of such a mad tyrant. Four months after his return to the city, on the 24th of January 41, he was murdered by Cassius Chaerea, tribune of a praetorian cohort, Cornelius Sabinus and others. His wife Caesonia and his daughter were likewise put to death.

Calingae, a numerous people of India intra Gangem, on the E. coast, below the mouths of the Ganges.

Calinipaxa (Canonge? a little above 27° N. lat.), a city on the Ganges, N. of its confluence with the Jomanes (Jumna), said to have been the furthest point in India reached by Seleucus Nicator.

Callaïci, Callaeci. [Gallaeci.]

Callatis (Κάλλατις, Κάλατις: Καλατιανός: Kollat, Kollati), a town of Moesia, on the Black Sea, originally a colony of Miletus, and afterwards of Heraclea.

Callĭărus (Καλλίαρος), a town in Locris, mentioned by Homer.

Callĭas and Hippŏnĭcus (Καλλίας, Ἱππόνικος), a noble Athenian family, celebrated for their wealth. They enjoyed the hereditary dignity of torchbearer at the Eleusinian mysteries, and claimed descent from Triptolemus. 1. Hipponicus I., acquired a large fortune by fraudulently making use of the information he had received from Solon respecting the introduction of his σεισάχθεια, B. C. 594. (Plut. Sol. 15.) — 2. Callias I., son of Phaenippus, an opponent of Pisistratus, and a conqueror at the Olympic and Pythian games. — 3. Hipponicus II., surnamed Ammon, son of No. 2. — 4. Callias II., son of No. 3, fought at the battle of Marathon, 490. He was afterwards ambassador from Athens to Artaxerxes, and according to some accounts negotiated a peace with Persia, 449, on terms most humiliating to the latter. On his return to Athens, he was accused of having taken bribes, and was condemned to a fine of 50 talents. — 5. Hipponicus III., son of No. 4, one of the Athenian generals in their incursion into the territory of Tanagra, 426, also commanded at the battle of Delium, 424, where he was killed. It was his divorced wife, and not his widow, whom Pericles married. His daughter Hipparete was married to Alcibiades, with a dowry of 10 talents: another daughter was married to Theodorus, and became the mother of Isocrates the orator. — 6. Callias III., son of No. 5, by the lady who married Pericles, dissipated all his ancestral wealth on sophists, flatterers, and women. The scene of Xenophon's Banquet, and also that of Plato's Protagoras is laid at his house. He is said to have ultimately reduced himself to absolute beggary. In 400 he was engaged in the attempt to crush Andocides. In 392 he commanded the Athenian heavy-armed troops, when Iphicrates defeated the Spartans; and in 371 he was one of the envoys empowered to negotiate peace with Sparta.

Callĭas. 1. A wealthy Athenian, who, on condition of marrying Cimon's sister, Elpinice, paid for him the fine of 50 talents which had been imposed on Miltiades. He appears to have been unconnected with the nobler family of Callias and Hipponicus. — 2. Tyrant of Chalcis in Euboea, and the rival of Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria. He was defeated by the Athenians under Phocion, B. C. 350, and thereupon betook himself to the Macedonian court; but as he could not obtain aid from Philip, he formed an alliance with the Athenians, and by their means obtained the supremacy in the island. — 3. A poet of the old comedy, flourished B. C. 412; the names of 6 of his comedies are preserved. — 4. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian, was a contemporary of Agathocles, and wrote a history of Sicily in 22 books, embracing the reign of Agathocles, B. C. 317—289.

Callicrătes (Καλλικράτης). 1. An Achaean, exerted all his influence in favour of the Romans. On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, B. C. 168, Callicrates pointed out 1000 Achaeans, as having favoured the cause of Perseus, who were taken to Rome; and among them was the historian Polybius. Callicrates died at Rhodes, 149. — 3. One of the architects of the Parthenon on the Acropolis of Athens. — 4. A Lacedaemonian sculptor, made ants and other animals out of ivory, so small that one could not distinguish the different limbs.

Callicrătĭdas (Καλλικρατίδας), a Spartan, succeeded Lysander as admiral of the Lacedaemonian fleet, B. C. 406, took Methymna, and shut up Conon in Mytilene; but the Athenians sent out a fleet of 150 sail, and defeated Callicratidas off the Arginusae. Callicratidas fell in the battle. Callicratidas was a plain, blunt Spartan of the old school. Witness his answer, when asked what sort of men the Ionians were: "Bad freemen, but excellent slaves."

Callidrŏmus or -um (Καλλίδρομος), part of the range of Mt. Oeta, near Thermopylae.

Callifae (Callifānus: Calvisi), a town in Samnium, perhaps in the territory of Allifae.

Callĭmăchus (Καλλίμαχος). 1. The Athenian polemarch, commanded the right wing at Marathon, where he was slain, after behaving with much gallantry, B. C. 490. This is the last recorded instance of the polemarch performing the military duties which his name implies. — 2. A celebrated Alexandrine grammarian and poet, was a native of Cyrene in Africa, and a descendant of the Battiadae, whence he is sometimes called Battiades. He lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, and was chief librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, from about B. C. 260 until his death about 240. He founded a celebrated grammatical school at Alexandria, and among his pupils were Eratosthenes, Aristophanes of Byzantium, and Apollonius Rhodius. We have no other particulars of the life of Callimachus except his enmity with his former pupil Apollonius Rhodius, which is related elsewhere. [APOLLONIUS, No. 6.] He is said to have written 800 works, in prose and in verse, on an infinite variety of subjects, but of these we possess only some of his poems, which are characterized rather by labour and learning than by real poetical genius. Hence Ovid (Am. i. 15. 14) says of Callimachus, Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet. The extant works of Callimachus are 6 Hymns in hexameter verse, 5 in the Ionic dialect, and 1, on the bath of Pallas, in the Doric dialect, and 72 Epigrams, which belong to the best specimens of this kind of poetry, and were incorporated in the Greek Anthology at an early time. We have only a few fragments of his elegies, which enjoyed great celebrity, and were imitated by the Roman poets, the most celebrated of whose imitations is the De Coma Berenices of Catullus. Of the lost poems of Callimachus the most important were, Αἴτια, Causes, an epic poem in 4 books, on the causes of the various mythical stories, &c., and an epic poem entitled Hecale, the name of an aged woman who received Theseus hospitably when he went out to fight against the Marathonian bull. — Editions. By Spanheim, Ultraj. 1697, re-edited by Ernesti, Lugd. Batav. 1761; by Blomfield, Lond. 1815; by Volzer, Lips. 1817. — 3. An architect and statuary, of uncertain country, who is said to have invented the Corinthian column, and who must have lived before B. C. 396. He was so anxious to give his works the last touch of perfection that he lost the grand and sublime; whence Dionysius compares him to the orator Lysias. Callimachus was never satisfied with himself, and therefore received the epithet κακιζότεχνος, which Pliny interprets as calumniator sui.

Callĭmĕdon (Καλλιμέδων), one of the orators at Athens in the Macedonian interest, and a friend of Phocion, was condemned to death by the Athenians in his absence, B. C. 317.

Callinīcus Seleucus. [SELEUCUS.]

Callīnus (Καλλῖνος), of Ephesus, the earliest Greek elegiac poet, probably flourished about B. C. 700. Only one of his elegies is extant, consisting of 21 lines, in which he exhorts his countrymen to courage and perseverance against their enemies. Printed in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 303.

Callĭŏpē. [MUSAE.]

Callĭŏpē (Καλλιόπη), a considerable city in the W. of Parthia, founded, or else enlarged, by Seleucus Nicator.

Callĭphon (Καλλιφῶν), a Greek philosopher, and probably a disciple of Epicurus, is condemned by Cicero as making the chief good of man to consist in an union of virtue (honestas) and bodily pleasure (ἡδονή, voluptas).

Callipŏlis (Καλλίπολις: Καλλιπολίτης). 1. (Gallipoli), a Greek town on the Tarentine gulf in Calabria. — 2. A town on the E. coast of Sicily not far from Aetna. — 3. (Gallipoli), a town in the Thracian Chersonese opposite Lampsacus. — 4. A town in Aetolia. See CALLIUM.

Callippĭdes (Καλλιππίδης), of Athens, a celebrated tragic actor, a contemporary of Alcibiades and Agesilaus.

Callippus (Κάλλιππος). 1. An Athenian, accompanied Dion to Syracuse, where he murdered the latter B. C. 353. Callippus now usurped the government of Syracuse, but was expelled the city at the end of 13 months, and after wandering about Sicily with his mercenaries was at length put to death by his own friends. — 2. An astronomer of Cyzicus, came to Athens, where he assisted Aristotle in rectifying and completing the discoveries of Eudoxus. Callippus invented the period or cycle of 76 years, called after him the Callippic, which commenced B. C. 330.

Callirrhŏē (Καλλιῤῥόη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus, wife of Chrysaor, and mother of Geryones and Echidna. — 2. Daughter of Achelous and wife of Alcmaeon, induced her husband to procure her the peplus and necklace of Harmonia, by which she caused his death. [ALCMAEON.] — 3. Daughter of Scamander, wife of Tros, and mother of Ilus and Ganymedes.

Callirrhŏe (Καλλιῤῥόη), afterwards called Enneacrūnus (Ἐννεάκρουνος) or the "Nine Springs," because its water was distributed by 9 pipes, was the most celebrated well in Athens, and still retains its ancient name Callirrhoe. It was situated in the S. E. extremity of the city between the Olympiĕum and the Ilissus.

Callisthĕnes (Καλλισθένης), of Olynthus. a relation and a pupil of Aristotle, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia. In his intercourse with Alexander he was arrogant and bold, and took every opportunity of exhibiting his independence. He expressed his indignation at Alexander's adoption of Oriental customs, and especially at the requirement of the ceremony of adoration. He thus rendered himself so obnoxious to the king, that he was accused of being privy to the plot of Hermolaus to assassinate Alexander; and after being kept in chains for 7 months, was either put to death or died of disease. Callisthenes wrote an account of Alexander's expedition; a history of Greece, in 10 books, from the peace of Antalcidas to the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus (B. C. 387—357); and other works, all of which have perished.

Callisto (Καλλιστώ), an Arcadian nymph, hence called Nonacrīna virgo (Ov. Met. ii. 409) from Nonacris, a mountain in Arcadia, was daughter either of Lycaon or of Nycteus or of Ceteus, and a companion of Artemis in the chase. She was beloved by Zeus, who metamorphosed her into a she-bear that Hera might not become acquainted with the amour. But Hera learnt the truth, and caused Artemis to slay Callisto during the chase. Zeus placed Callisto among the stars under the name of Arctos, or the Bear. ARCAS was her son by Zeus. According to Ovid Jupiter (Zeus) overcame the virtue of Callisto by assuming the form of Artemis; Juno (Hera) then metamorphosed Callisto into a bear; and when Arcas during the chase was on the point of killing his mother Jupiter placed both among the stars. [ARCTOS.] — According to a modern scholar Callisto is merely another form of Calliste, a surname of Artemis, and she is therefore the same as this goddess. The she-bear was the symbol of the Arcadian Artemis.

Callistrătĭa (Καλλιστρατία), a town in Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Euxine.

Callistrătus (Καλλίστρατος). 1. An Athenian orator, son of Callicrates of Aphidna. His oratory was greatly admired by Demosthenes, and his speech on the affair of Oropus, B. C. 366, is said to have excited the emulation of Demosthenes, and to have caused the latter to devote himself to oratory. After taking an active part in public affairs, generally in favour of Sparta, Callistratus was condemned to death by the Athenians in 361, and went into banishment to Methone in Macedonia. He ultimately returned to Athens, and was put to death. During his exile he is said to have founded the city of Datum, afterwards Philippi. — 2. A Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Aristophanes of Byzantium. — 3. A Roman jurist, frequently cited in the Digest, wrote at least as late as the reign (A. D. 198—211) of Severus and Antoninus (i. e. Septimius Severus and Caracalla).

Callistus, C. Jūlĭus, a freedman of Caligula, possessed great influence in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, and is the person to whom the physician Scribonius Largus dedicates his work.

Callĭum (Κάλλιον: Καλλιεύς), called Callipolis by Livy (xxxvi. 30), a town in Aetolia in the valley of the Spercheus, S.W. of Hypata.

Callixĕnus (Καλλίξενος), the leader in the prosecution of the Athenian generals who had conquered at Arginusae, B. C. 406. Not long after the execution of the generals, the Athenians repented of their unjust sentence, and decreed the institution of criminal accusations against Callixenus, but he escaped from Athens. On the restoration of democracy, 403, Callixenus took advantage of the general amnesty, and returned to Athens, but no man would give him either water or light for his fire, and he perished miserably of hunger.

Callon (Κάλλων). 1. An artist of Aegina, flourished B. C. 516. — 2. An artist of Elis, lived before B. C. 436.

Calor. 1. A river in Samnium, flows past Beneventum and falls into the Vulturnus. — 2. (Calore), a river in Lucania, falls into the Silarus.

Calpē (Κάλπη: Gibralter), a mountain in the S. of Spain on the Straits between the Atlantic and Mediterranean. This and M. Abyla opposite to it on the African coast, were called the Columns of Hercules. [ABYLA.]

Calpe (Κάλπη: Kirpeh), a river, promontory, and town on the coast of Bithynia, between the rivers Psilis and Sangarius.

Calpurnĭa, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, consul B. C. 58, and last wife of the dictator Caesar, to whom she was married in 59. The reports respecting the conspiracy against Caesar's life filled Calpurnia with the liveliest apprehensions; she in vain entreated her husband not to leave home on the Ides of March, 44.

Calpurnĭa Gens, plebeian, pretended to be descended from Calpus, a son of Numa. It was divided into the families of BESTIA, BIBULUS, FLAMMA, and PISO.

T. Calpurnĭus Sicŭlus, the author of 11 Eclogues in Latin verse, which are close imitations of Virgil, perhaps lived about A. D. 290. — Editions. In the Poetae Latini Minores of Wernsdorff; and by Glaeser, Gotting. 1842.

Calva, a surname of Venus at Rome, probably in honour of the Roman women, who are said, during the war with the Gauls, to have cut off their hair for the purpose of making bow-strings.

Calventĭus, an Insubrian Gaul, of the town of Placentia, whose daughter married L. Piso, the father of L. Piso Caesoninus, consul B. C. 58. In his speech against the latter, Cicero upbraids him with the low origin of his mother, and calls him Caesoninus Semiplacentinus Calventius.

Calvīnus, Domitĭus. 1. Cn., curule aedile, B. C. 299, consul 283, and dictator and censor 280. In his consulship he, together with his colleague Dolabella, defeated the Gauls and Etruscans, and hence received the surname Maximus. — 2. Cn., tribune of the plebs, 59, when he supported Bibulus against Caesar, praetor 56, and consul 53, through the influence of Pompey. In the civil war he joined Caesar. In 49 he fought under Curio in Africa; and in 48 he fought under Caesar in Greece, and commanded the centre of Caesar's army at the battle of Pharsalia. In 47 he had the command of Asia, and in 46 he fought in Africa against the Pompeian party. After Caesar's death (44) he fought under Octavian and Antony against the republicans. In 40 he was consul a 2nd time, and in 39 went as proconsul to Spain, where he defeated the revolted Cerretani.

Calvīnus, L. Sextĭus, consul B. C. 124, defeated the Salluvii and other people in Transalpine Gaul, and in 123 founded the colony of Aquae Sextiae (Aix).

Calvīnus, T. Veturĭus, twice consul, B. C. 334 and 321. In his second consulship he and his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus were defeated by the Sabines at Caudium. For details see ALBINUS, No. 3.

Calvisĭus Sabīnus. [SABINUS.]

Calvus, Licinĭus. [LICINIUS.]

Călўcadnus (Καλύκαδνος). 1. (Ghiuk Sooyoo), a considerable river of Cilicia Tracheia, navigable as far up as Seleucia. — 2. The promontory of this name, mentioned by Polybius (xxii. 26) and Livy (xxxviii. 38), appears to be the same as ANEMURIUM.

Calydnae (Καλύδναι νῆσοι). 1. Two small islands off the coast of Troas, between Tenedos and the Prom. Lectum. — 2. A group of islands off the coast of Caria, N.W. of Cos, belonging to the Sporades. The largest of them was called Calydna, and afterwards Calymna (now Kalimno).

Calўdōn (Καλυδών: Καλυδώνιος), an ancient town of Aetolia on the Evenus in the land of the Curetes, said to have been founded by Aetolus or his son Calydon. The surrounding country produced wine, oil, and corn; and in the mountains in the neighbourhood took place the celebrated hunt of the Calydonian boar. The inhabitants were removed by Augustus to NICOPOLIS.

Calymna. [CALYDNAE.]

Calynda (Κάλυνδα: Καλυνδεύς), a city of Caria, E. of Caunus, and 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) from the sea. The Calyndians formed a part of the fleet of Xerxes, under their king Damasithymus: afterwards they were subject to the Caunians; and both cities were added by the Romans to the territory of Rhodes.

Călypso (Καλυψώ), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Nereus, or, according to Homer, of Atlas, was a nymph inhabiting the island of Ogygia, on which Ulysses was shipwrecked. Calypso loved the unfortunate hero, and promised him immortality if he would remain with her. Ulysses refused, and after she had detained him 7 years, the gods compelled her to allow him to continue his journey homewards.

Camalodūnum (Colchester), the capital of the Trinobantes in Britain, and the first Roman colony in the island, founded by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 43.

Camarīna (Καμάρινα: Καμαριναῖος: Camerina), a town on the S. coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the Hipparis, founded by Syracuse, B. C. 599. It was several times destroyed by Syracuse; and in the 1st Punic war it was taken by the Romans, and most of the inhabitants sold as slaves. Scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town remain. In the neighbourhood was a marsh, which the inhabitants drained contrary to the command of an oracle, and thus opened a way to their enemies to take the town: hence arose the proverb μὴ κίνει Καμαρίναν, ne moveas Camarinam.

Cambūni Montes, the mountains which separate Macedonia and Thessaly.

Cambўsēnē (Καμβυσηνή), a district of Armenia Major, on the borders of Iberia and Colchis.

Cambўses (Καμβύσης). 1. Father of CYRUS the Great. — 2. Second king of Persia, succeeded his father Cyrus, and reigned B. C. 529—522. In 525 he conquered Egypt; but an army which he sent against the Ammonians perished in the sands, and the forces, which he led in person against the Aethiopians S. of Egypt, were compelled by failure of provisions to return. On his return to Memphis he treated the Egyptians with great cruelty; he insulted their religion, and slew their god Apis with his own hands. He also acted tyrannically towards his own family and the Persians in general. He caused his own brother Smerdis to be murdered; but a Magian personated the deceased prince, and set up a claim to the throne. [SMERDIS.] Cambyses forthwith set out from Egypt against this pretender, but died in Syria, at a place named Ecbatana, of an accidental wound in the thigh, 522.

Cambўses (Καμβύσης). 1. (Iora), a river of Iberia and Albania, which, after uniting with the Alazon (Alasan), falls into the Cyrus. — 2. A small river of Media, falling into the Caspian between the Araxes and the Amardus.

Camēnae (not Camoenae), also called Casmenae, Carmenae. The name is connected with carmen, a "prophecy." The Camenae accordingly were prophetic nymphs, and they belonged to the religion of ancient Italy, although later traditions represent their worship as introduced into Italy from Arcadia, and some accounts identify them with the Muses. The most important of these goddesses was Carmenta or Carmentis, who had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline hill, and altars near the porta Carmentalis. Respecting her festival see Dict. of Ant. art. Carmentalia. The traditions which assigned a Greek origin to her worship, state that her original name was Nicostrate, and that she was the mother of EVANDER by Hermes, with whom she fled to Italy.

Camerĭa (Camerinus), an ancient town of Latium, conquered by Tarquinius Priscus.

Cămĕrīnum or Camarīnum, more anciently Camers (Camertes: Camerino), a town in Umbria on the borders of Picenum, an ally of the Romans against the Etruscans, B. C. 308, and also an ally of the Romans in the 2nd Punic war, subsequently a Roman colony.

Cămĕrīnus, the name of a patrician family of the Sulpicia gens, the members of which frequently held the consulship in the early times of the republic

(B.C. 500, 490, 461, 393, 345). After B.C. 345 the Camerini disappear from history for 400 years, but they are mentioned again as one of the noblest Roman families in the early times of the empire.

Camerīnus, a Roman poet, contemporary with Ovid, wrote a poem on the capture of Troy by Hercules.

Camīcus (Καμικός: Καμίκιος), an ancient town of the Sicani on the S. coast of Sicily on a river of the same name, occupied the site of the citadel of AGRIGENTUM.

Cămilla, daughter of king Metabus of the Volscian town of Privernum, was one of the swift-footed servants of Diana, accustomed to the chase and to war. She assisted Turnus against Aeneas, and after slaying numbers of the Trojans was at length killed by Aruns.

Cămillus, Furius. 1. M., one of the great heroes of the Roman republic. He was censor B.C. 403, in which year Livy erroneously places his first consular tribunate. He was consular tribune for the first time in 401, and for the second time in 398. In 396 he was dictator, when he gained a glorious victory over the Faliscans and Fidenates, took Veii, and entered Rome in triumph, riding in a chariot drawn by white horses. In 394 he was consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. The story of the schoolmaster who attempted to betray the town of Falerii to Camillus, belongs to this campaign. In 391, Camillus was accused of having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii, and went voluntarily into exile at Ardea. Next year (390) the Gauls took Rome, and laid siege to Ardea. The Romans in the Capitol recalled Camillus, and appointed him dictator in his absence. Camillus hastily collected an army, attacked the Gauls, and defeated them completely. [BRENNUS.] His fellow-citizens saluted him as the Second Romulus. In 389 Camillus was dictator a third time, and defeated the Volscians, Aequians, and other nations. In 386 he was consular tribune for the fourth, in 384 for the fifth, and in 381 for the sixth time. In 368 he was appointed dictator a fourth time to resist the rogations of C. Licinius Stolo. Next year, 367, he was dictator a fifth time, and though 80 years of age, he completely defeated the Gauls. He died of the pestilence, 365. Camillus was the great general of his age, and the resolute champion of the patrician order. His history has received much legendary and traditional fable, and requires a careful critical sifting. — 2. Sp., son of No. 1., first praetor 367. — 3. L., also son of No. 1, was dictator 350 in order to hold the comitia, and consul 349, when he defeated the Gauls. — 4. L., son of No. 2, consul 338, when he took Tibur, and in conjunction with his colleague Maenius completed the subjugation of Latium. In 325 he was consul a second time. — 5. M., proconsul of Africa in the reign of Tiberius, defeated the Numidian Tacfarinas, A. D. 17. — 6. M., surnamed SCRIBONIANUS, consul A. D. 32, under Tiberius. At the beginning of the reign of Claudius he was legate of Dalmatia, where he revolted, but was conquered, 42, sent into exile, and died 53.

Camīrus (Κάμειρος: Καμειρεύς), a Dorian town on the W. coast of the island of Rhodes, said to have been founded by Camirus, son of Cercaphus and Cydippe, and the principal town in the island before the foundation of Rhodes. It was the birth-place of the poet Pisander.

Camīsa (Κάμισα), a fortress in Cappadocia, 23 Roman miles E. of Sebaste.

Camoenae. [CAMENAE.]

Campānĭa (Campanus: Terra di Lavoro), a district of Italy, the name of which is probably derived from campus "a plain," was bounded on the N.W. by Latium, N. and E. by Samnium, S.E. by Lucania, and S. and S.W. by the Tyrrhenian sea. It was separated from Latium by the river Liris, and from Lucania at a later time by the river Silarus, though in the time of Augustus it did not extend further S. than the promontory of Minerva. In still earlier times the Ager Campanus included only the country round Capua. The country along the coast from the Liris to the Promontory of Minerva is a plain inclosed by the Apennines which sweeps round it in the form of a semicircle. Campania is a volcanic country, to which circumstance it was mainly indebted for its extraordinary fertility, for which it was celebrated in antiquity above all other lands. It produced corn, wine, oil, and every kind of fruit in the greatest abundance, and in many parts crops could be gathered 3 times in the year. The fertility of the soil, the beauty of the scenery, and the softness of the climate, the heat of which was tempered by the delicious breezes of the sea, procured for Campania the epithet Felix, a name which it justly deserved. It was the favourite retreat in summer of the Roman nobles, whose villas studded a considerable part of its coast, especially in the neighbourhood of BAIAE. The principal river was the VULTURNUS: the minor rivers were the LIRIS, SAVO, CLANIUS, SEBETHUS, SARNUS, and SILARUS. The chief lakes were LUCRINUS, ACHERUSIA, AVERNUS, and LITERNA, most of them craters of extinct volcanos. — The earliest inhabitants of the country were the AUSONES and OSCI or OPICI. They were subsequently conquered by the Etruscans, who became the masters of almost all the country. In the time of the Romans we find 3 distinct people, besides the Greek population of CUMAE: 1. The Campani, properly so called, a mixed race, consisting of Etruscans and the original inhabitants of the country, dwelling along the coast from Sinuessa to Paestum. They were the ruling race: their history is given under CAPUA, their chief city. 2. SIDICINI, an Ausonian people, in the N.W. of the country on the borders of Samnium. 3. PICENTINI in the S. E. of the country.

Campē (Κάμπη), a monster which guarded the Cyclops in Tartarus, was killed by Zeus when he wanted the assistance of the Cyclops against the Titans.

Campi Lapidĕi (πεδίον λιθῶδες; la Crau), "Plain of Stones" in the S. of Gaul, E. of the Rhone, near the Mediterranean, and on the road from Arles to Marseilles. These stones were probably deposited by the Rhone and the Druentia (Durance), when their course was different from what it is at present. This singular plain was known even to Aeschylus, who says that Zeus rained down these stones from heaven to assist Hercules in his flight with the Ligurians, after the hero had shot away all his arrows. A sweet herbage grows underneath and between the stones, and consequently in ancient as well as in modern times, flocks of sheep were pastured on this plain.

Campi Macri (Μακροὶ Κάμποι), the "Long Plains," a tract of country between Parma and Modena, celebrated for the wool of its sheep. There appears to have been a place of the same name, where annual meetings of the neighbouring people were held even in the time of Strabo.

Campi Raudii, a plain in the N. of Italy near Vercella, where Marius and Catulus defeated the Cimbri, B.C. 101.

Campus Martius, the "Plain of Mars," frequently called the Campus simply, was, in its widest signification, the open plain at Rome outside the city-walls, lying between the Tiber and the hills Capitolinus, Quirinal, and Pincius; but it was more usually used to signify the N.W. portion of the plain lying in the bend of the Tiber, which nearly surrounded it on 3 sides. The S. portion of the plain in the neighbourhood of the Circus Flaminius was called Circus Flaminius or Campus Flaminius or Prata Flaminia. The Campus Martius is said to have belonged originally to the Tarquins, and to have become the property of the state, and to have been consecrated to Mars upon the expulsion of the kings. Here the Roman youths were accustomed to perform their gymnastic and warlike exercises, and here the comitia of the centuries were held. At a later time it was surrounded by porticoes, temples, and other public buildings. It was included within the city walls by Aurelian. — Some modern writers make 3 divisions of the Campus Martius, and suppose that there was a portion of the plain lying between the Campus Martius proper and the Circus Flaminius, called Campus Tiberinus or Campus Minor, but this supposition does not rest on sufficient evidence. The Campus Minor mentioned by Catullus (lv. 3) probably refers to another Campus altogether. Respecting the other Campi see ROMA.

Canae (Κάναι), a sea-port of Aeolis, in Asia Minor, opposite to Lesbos.

Cănăcē (Κανάκη), daughter of Aeolus and Enarete, had several children by Poseidon. She entertained an unnatural love for her brother Macareus, and on this account was killed by her own father; but according to others, she put an end to her life.

Cănăchus (Κάναχος). 1. A Sicyonian artist, flourished B.C. 540—508, and executed, among other works, a colossal statue of Apollo Philesius at Miletus, which was carried to Ecbatana by Xerxes, 479. — 2. A Sicyonian artist, probably grandson of the former, from whom he is not distinguished by the ancients. He and Patrocles cast the statues of 2 Spartans, who had fought in the battle of Aegospotamos, B.C. 405.

Canastrum or Canastraeum (Κάναστρον, Καναστραῖον, sc. ἀκρωτήριον, ἡ Καναστραίη ἄκρη: C. Paillari), the S.E. extremity of the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia.

Candacē (Κανδάκη), a queen of the Aethiopians of Meroë, invaded Egypt B.C. 22, but was driven back and defeated by Petronius, the Roman governor of Egypt. Her name seems to have been common to all the queens of Aethiopia.

Candaules (Κανδαύλης), also called Myrsilus, last Heraclid king of Lydia. His wife compelled Gyges to put her husband to death, because he had exhibited to Gyges her unveiled charms. Gyges then married the queen and mounted the throne, B.C. 716.

Candāvia, Candāvii Montes, the mountains separating Illyricum from Macedonia, across which the Via Egnatia ran.

Candidum Pr. (Ras-el-Abiad, Cap Bianco), N.W. of Hippo Zaritus on the N. coast of Zeugitana, in Africa, forms the W. headland of the Sinus Hipponensis.

Canicula. [CANIS.]

Canidia, whose real name was Gratidia, was a Neapolitan courtezan beloved by Horace; but when she deserted him, he revenged himself by holding her up to contempt as an old sorceress. (Epod. 5, 17, Sat. i. 8.)

Caninius Gallus. [GALLUS.]

Caninius Rebilus. [REBILUS.]

Cănis (Κύων), the constellation of the Great Dog. The most important star in this constellation was specially named Canis or Canicula, and also Sīrius. About B.C. 400 the heliacal rising of Sirius at Athens, corresponding with the entrance of the sun into the sign Leo, marked the hottest season of the sea, and this observation being taken on trust by the Romans, without considering whether it suited their age and country, the Dies Caniculares became proverbial among them, as the Dog Days are among ourselves. — The constellation of the Little Dog was called Procyon (Προκύων), literally translated Ante canem, Antecanis, because in Greece this constellation rises heliacally before the Great Dog. When Boötes was regarded as Icarius [ARCTOS], Procyon became Maera, the dog of Icarius.

Cannae (Cannensis: Canne), a village in Apulia, N.E. of Canusium, situated in an extensive plain E. of the Aufidus and N. of the small river Vergellus, memorable for the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal, B.C. 216.

Canninefates. [BATAVI.]

Canōbus or Canōpus (Κάνωβος or Κάνωπος), according to Grecian story, the helmsman of Menelaus, who on his return from Troy died in Egypt, and was buried on the site of the town of Canobus, which derived its name from him.

Cănōbus or Canōpus (Κάνωβος, Κάνωπος: Κανωβίτης: Ru. W. of Aboukir), an important city on the coast of Lower Egypt, near the W.-most mouth of the Nile, which was hence called the Canopic Mouth (τὸ Κανωβικὸν στόμα). It was 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) E. of Alexandria, and was (at least at one time) the capital of the Nomos Menelaïtes. It had a great temple of Serapis, and a considerable commerce; and its inhabitants were proverbial for their luxury (Κανωβισμός). After the establishment of Christianity, the city rapidly declined.

Cantăbri, a people in the N. of Spain. The Romans originally gave this name to all the people on the N. coast of Spain; but when they became better acquainted with the country, the name was restricted to the people bounded on the E. by the Astures and on the W. by the Autrigones. The Cantabri were a fierce and warlike people, and were only subdued by Augustus after a struggle of several years (B.C. 25—19).

Canthărus (Κάνθαρος), a statuary and embosser of Sicyon, flourished about B.C. 268.

Canthus (Κάνθος), an Argonaut, son of Canethus or of Abas of Euboea, was slain in Libya by Cephalion or Caphaurus.

Cantium (Cantii: Kent), a district of Britain, nearly the same as the modern Kent, but included LONDINIUM.

Canulēius, C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 445, proposed the law, establishing connubium, or the right of intermarriage, between the patricians and plebs. He also proposed that the people should have the right of choosing the consuls from either the patricians or the plebs; but this proposal was not carried, and it was resolved instead, that military tribunes, with consular power, should be elected from either order in place of the consuls.

Canŭsĭum (Canusinus: Canosa), a town in Apulia, on the Aufidus, and on the high road from Rome to Brundusium, founded, according to tradition, by Diomede, whence the surrounding country was called Campus Diomedis. It was at all events a Greek colony, and both Greek and Oscan were spoken there in the time of Horace. (Canusini more bilinguis, Hor. Sat. i. 10. 30.) Canusium was a town of considerable importance, but suffered greatly, like most of the other towns in the S. of Italy, during the 2nd Punic war. Here the remains of the Roman army took refuge after their defeat at Cannae, B. C. 216. It was celebrated for its mules and its woollen manufactures, but it had a deficient supply of water. (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 91.) There are still ruins of the ancient town near Canosa.

Canūtĭus, or Cannūtĭus. 1. P., a distinguished orator, frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius. — 2. Ti., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 44, a violent opponent of Antony, and, after the establishment of the triumvirate, of Octavian also. He was taken prisoner at the capture of Perusia, and was put to death by Octavian, 40.

Capăneus (Καπανεύς), son of Hipponous and Astynome or Laodice, and father of Sthenelus, was one of the 7 heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes. He was struck by Zeus with lightning, as he was scaling the walls of Thebes, because he had dared to defy the god. While his body was burning, his wife Evadne leaped into the flames and destroyed herself.

Capella, the star. [Capra.]

Capella, Martiānus Mineus Felix, a native of Carthage, probably flourished towards the close of the fifth century of our aera. He is the author of a work in 9 books, composed in a medley of prose and various kinds of verse, after the fashion of the Satyra Menippea of Varro. It is a sort of encyclopaedia, and was much esteemed in the middle ages. The first two books, which are an introduction to the rest, consist of an allegory, entitled the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury, while in the remaining 7 are expounded the principles of the 7 liberal arts, Grammar, Dialectics, Rhetoric, Geometry, Arithmetic, Astronomy, and Music, including Poetry. — Editions. By Hugo Grotius, Lugd. Bat. 1599; and by Kopp, Francf. 1836.

Capēna (Capenas, -ātis: Civitucola, an uninhabited hill), an ancient Etruscan town founded by and dependent on Veii, submitted to the Romans B. C. 395, the year after the conquest of Veii, and subsequently became a Roman municipium. In its territory was the celebrated grove and temple of Feronia on the small river Capenas. [Feronia.]

Capēna Porta. [Roma.]

Caper, Flavĭus, a Roman grammarian of uncertain date, whose works are quoted repeatedly by Priscian, and of whom we have 2 short treatises extant: printed by Putschius, Grammat. Latin. Auct. Antiqu., pp. 2239—2248, Hanov. 1605.

Căpĕtus Silvĭus. [Silvius.]

Caphāreus (Καφηρεύς: Capo d' Oro), a rocky and dangerous promontory on the S. E. of Euboea, where the Greek fleet is said to have been wrecked on its return from Troy.

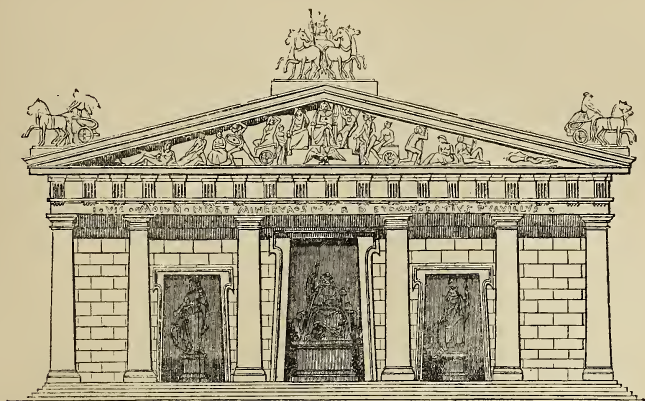
Caphyae (Καφύαι: Καφυεύς, Καφυάτης), a town in Arcadia, N. W. of Orchomenus.

Capĭto, C. Atēĭus. 1. Tribune of the plebs B. C. 55, when he opposed the triumvirs. — 2. Son of No. 1, an eminent Roman jurist, was appointed Curator aquarum publicarum in A. D. 13, and held this office till his death, 22. He gained the favour of both Augustus and Tiberius by flattery and obsequiousness. He wrote numerous legal works, which are cited in the Digest and elsewhere. Capito and his contemporary Labeo were reckoned the highest legal authorities of their day, and were the founders of 2 legal schools, to which most of the great jurists belonged. The schools took their respective names from distinguished disciples of those jurists. The followers of Capito were called from Masurius Sabinus, Sabiniani; and afterwards from Cassius Longinus, Cassiani. The followers of Labeo took from Proculus the name Proculeiani.

Capĭto, C. Fontēĭus, a friend of M. Antony, accompanied Maecenas to Brundisium, B. C. 37, when the latter was sent to effect a reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony. (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 32.) Capito remained with Antony, and went with him to the East.

Căpĭtōlīnus, Jūlĭus, one of the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, lived in the reign of Diocletian (A. D. 284—305), and wrote the lives of 9 emperors: — 1. Antoninus Pius, 2. M. Aurelius, 3. L. Verus, 4. Pertinax, 5. Clodius Albinus, 6. Opilius Macrinus, 7. the 2 Maximini, 8. the 3 Gordiani, 9. Maximus and Balbinus. The best editions of the Scriptores Historiae Augustae are by Salmasius, Par. 1620; Schrevelius, Lugd. Bat. 1671.

Căpĭtōlīnus, Manlĭus. [Manlius.]



Căpĭtōlīnus Mons. [Capitolium: Roma.]

Căpĭtōlīnus, Petillĭus, was, according to the Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 4. 94), entrusted with the care of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol (whence he was called Capitolinus), and was accused of having stolen the crown of Jupiter, but was acquitted by the judges in consequence of his being a friend of Augustus. The surname Capitolinus appears, however, to have been a regular family-name of the gens.

Căpĭtōlīnus, Quintĭus. [Quintius.]

Căpĭtōlĭum, the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus at Rome, was situated on the Mons Capitolinus, which derived its name from the temple. This hill is in figure an irregular oblong, with two more elevated summits at the N. and S. ends. The N. summit, which is somewhat higher and steeper, was the Arx or citadel of Rome, and is now occupied by the church of Ara Celi: while the S. summit, which is now covered in part by the Palazzo Caffarelli, was the site of the Capitolium. The temple is said to have been called the Capitolium, because a human head (caput) was discovered in digging the foundations. The building of it was commenced by Tarquinius Priscus, and it was finished by Tarquinius Superbus, but was not dedicated till the 3rd year of the republic, B. C. 507, by the consul M. Horatius. It was burnt down in the civil wars, 83, but was rebuilt by Sulla, and was dedicated by Q. Catulus, 69. It was burnt down a 2nd time by the soldiers of Vitellius, A. D. 69, and was rebuilt by Vespasian; but it was burnt down a 3rd time in the reign of Titus, 80, and was again rebuilt by Domitian with greater splendour than before. The Capitol contained 3 cells under the same roof: the middle cell was the temple of Jupiter, hence described as "media qui sedet aede Deus" (Ov. ex Pont. iv. 9. 32), and on either side were the cells of his attendant deities, Juno and Minerva. The Capitol was one of the most imposing buildings at Rome, and was adorned as befitted the majesty of the king of the gods. It was in the form of a square, namely, 200 feet on each side, and was approached by a flight of 100 steps. The gates were of bronze, and the ceilings and tiles gilt. The gilding alone of the building cost Domitian 12,000 talents. In the Capitol were kept the Sibylline books. Here the consuls upon entering on their office offered sacrifices and took their vows; and hither the victorious general, who entered the city in triumph, was carried in his triumphal car to return thanks to the Father of the gods. — Although the words Arx Capitoliumque are properly used to signify the whole hill, yet we sometimes find the term Arx applied alone to the whole hill, since the hill itself constituted a natural citadel to the city, and sometimes the term Capitolium to the whole hill, on account of the importance and reverence attaching to the temple. Moreover, as the Capitol was nearly as defensible as the Arx, it is sometimes called Arx Tarpeia or Capitolina, but the epithet Tarpeia or Capitolina is applied to distinguish it from the Arx properly so called.

Cappădŏcĭa (Καππαδοκία: Καππάδοξ, Cappădox), a district of Asia Minor, to which different boundaries were assigned at different times. Under the Persian empire it included the whole country inhabited by a people of Syrian origin, who were called (from their complexion) White Syrians (Λευκόσυροι), and also Cappadoces, which appears to have been a word of Persian origin. Their country seems to have embraced the whole N.E. part of Asia Minor E. of the Halys and N. of the Taurus. Afterwards (but whether under the Persians or after the Macedonian conquest, is a disputed point) the country was divided into two parts, which were named respectively from their proximity to the Euxine and to the Taurus, the N. part being called Cappadocia ad Pontum and then simply PONTUS, the S. part Cappadocia ad Taurum, and then simply Cappadocia: the former was also called Cappadocia Minor and the latter Cappadocia Major. Under the Persian Empire, the whole country was governed by a line of hereditary satraps, who traced their descent from Anaphas, an Achaemenid, one of the 7 chieftains that slew the pseudo-Smerdis, and who soon raised themselves to the position of tributary kings. After a temporary suspension of their power during the wars between the successors of Alexander, when Ariarathes I. was defeated and slain by Perdiccas (B. C. 322), the kings of S. Cappadocia (respecting the other part see PONTUS) recovered their independence under Ariarathes II., whose history and that of his successors will be found under ARIARATHES and ARIOBARZANES. In A. D. 17, Archelaüs, the last king, died at Rome, and Tiberius made Cappadocia a Roman province. [ARCHELAÜS, No. 6.] Soon afterwards the districts of Cataonia and Melitene, which had before belonged to Cilicia, were added to Cappadocia, and the province then comprised the 10 praefecturae of Melitene, Cataonia, Cilicia, Tyanitis, Garsauritis, Laviniasene, Sargarausene, Sarauravene, Chamanene, and Morimene. There were other divisions under the later emperors. Cappadocia was a rough and generally sterile mountain region; bordered by the chains of the PARYADRES on the N., the SCYDISSES on the E., and the TAURUS on the S., and intersected by that of the ANTI-TAURUS, on the side of whose central mountain, ARGAEUS, stood the capital Mazaca, aft. CAESAREA AD ARGAEUM. Its chief rivers were the HALYS and the MELAS. Its fine pastures supported abundance of good horses and mules.

Cappădox (Καππάδοξ: Konax), a tributary of the Halys, rising in M. Lithrus, in the chain of Paryadres, and forming the N.W. boundary of Cappadocia, on the side of Galatia.

Capra, or Capella (Αἴξ), the brightest star in the constellation of the Auriga, or Charioteer, is sometimes called Olenia Capella, because it rested on the shoulder (ἐπὶ τῆς ὠλένης) of the Auriga. This star was said to have been originally the nymph or goat who nursed the infant Zeus in Crete. [AEGA; AMALTHEA.] Its heliacal rising took place soon before the winter solstice, and thus it was termed signum pluviale.

Caprārĭa or Caprāsĭa. 1. (Capraja), a small island off the coast of Etruria between Populonia and the N. extremity of Corsica, inhabited only by wild goats, whence its name: called by the Greeks Αἴγιλον. — 2. (Cabrera), a small island off the S. of the Balearis Major (Majorca), dangerous to ships. — 3. See AEGATES. — 4. See FORTUNATAE INSULAE.

Caprĕae (Capri), a small island, 9 miles in circumference, off Campania, at the S. entrance of the gulf of Puteoli, and 2½ miles from the promontory of Minerva, from which the island had been separated by an earthquake. It is composed of calcareous rocks, which rise to 2 summits, the highest of which is between 1600 and 1700 feet above the sea. The scenery is beautiful, and the climate soft and genial. According to tradition, it was originally inhabited by the Teleboae, but afterwards belonged to the inhabitants of Neapolis, from whom Augustus either purchased it or obtained it in exchange for the island Pithecusa. Here Tiberius lived the last 10 years of his reign, indulging in secret debauchery, and accessible only to his creatures. He erected many magnificent buildings on the island, the chief of which was the Villa Jovis, and the ruins of which are still to be seen.

Caprĭa (Καπρία), a large salt lake in Pamphylia, near the coast, between Perge and Aspendus.

Capricornus (Αἰγόκερως), the Goat, a sign of the Zodiac, between the Archer and the Waterman, is said to have fought with Jupiter against the Titans.

Caprus (Κάπρος). 1. (Little Zab), a river of Assyria, rising in Mt. Zagros (Mts. of Kurdistan), and flowing S.W. into the Tigris, opposite to Caenae. — 2. A little river of Phrygia, rising at the foot of M. Cadmus, and flowing N. into the Lycus.

Capsa (Capsetānus: Ghafsah), a strong and ancient city in the S.W. of Byzacena in N. Africa, in a fertile oasis, surrounded by a sandy desert abounding in serpents. Its foundation was ascribed by tradition to the Libyan Hercules. In the war with Jugurtha, who used it as a treasure-city, it was destroyed by Marius; but it was afterwards rebuilt and erected into a colony.

Capŭa (Capuanus, Capuensis, but more commonly Campānus: Capua), originally called Vulturnum, the chief city of Campania after the fall of Cumae, is said to have derived its name from Capys. Capua was either founded or colonized by the Etruscans, according to some 50 years before the foundation of Rome, and it became at an early period the most prosperous, wealthy, and luxurious city in the S. of Italy. In B. C. 420 it was conquered by the warlike Samnites; and the population, which had always been of a mixed nature, now consisted of Ausonians, Oscans, Etruscans, and Samnites. At a later time Capua, again attacked by the Samnites, placed itself under the protection of Rome, 343. It revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, 216, but was taken by the Romans in 211, was fearfully punished, and never recovered its former prosperity. It was now governed by a Praefectus, who was sent annually to the city from Rome. It received a Roman colony by the lex agraria of Julius Caesar, 59, and under Nero a colony of veterans was settled there. It was subsequently destroyed by the barbarians who invaded Italy. The modern town of Capua is built about 3 miles from the ancient one, the site of which is indicated by the ruins of an amphitheatre.

Caput Vada Prom. [Brachodes.]

Căpys (Κάπυς). 1. Son of Assaracus and Hieromnemone, and father of Anchises. — 2. A companion of Aeneas, from whom Capua was said to have derived its name.

Căpys Silvĭus. [Silvius.]

Capÿtĭum or Capĭtĭum (Capizzi), called by Cicero Capitina Civitas, a town in Sicily near Mt. Aetna.

Car (Κάρ), son of Phoroneus, and king of Megara, from whom the acropolis of this town was called Caria.

Căracalla, emperor of Rome, A. D. 211—217, was son of Septimius Severus and his 2nd wife Julia Domna, and was born at Lyons, A. D. 188. He was originally called Bassianus after his maternal grandfather, but afterwards M. Aurelius Antoninus, which became his legal name, and appears on medals and inscriptions. Caracalla was a nickname derived from a long tunic worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favourite dress after he became emperor. In 198 Caracalla, when 10 years old, was declared Augustus, and in the same year accompanied his father Severus in the expedition against the Parthians. He returned with Severus to Rome in 202, and married Plautilla, daughter of Plautianus, the praetorian praefect. In 208 he went with Severus to Britain; and on the death of the latter at York, 211, Caracalla and his brother Geta succeeded to the throne, according to their father's arrangements. Caracalla's first object was to obtain the sole government by the murder of his brother; and after making several unsuccessful attempts upon the life of Geta, he at length pretended to be reconciled with him, and having thus thrown him off his guard, he caused him to be murdered in the arms of his mother, 212. The assassination of Geta was followed by the execution of many of the most distinguished men of the state, whom Caracalla suspected of favouring his brother's cause: the celebrated jurist Papinian was one of his victims.* His cruelties and extravagancies knew no bounds; and after exhausting Italy by his extortions, he resolved to visit the different provinces of the empire, which became the scenes of fresh atrocities. In 214 he visited Gaul, Germany, Dacia, and Thrace; and, in consequence of a campaign against the Alemanni, he assumed the surname Alemannicus. In 215 he went to Syria and Egypt; his sojourn at Alexandria was marked by a general slaughter of the inhabitants, in order to avenge certain sarcastic pleasantries in which they had indulged against himself and his mother. In 216 he crossed the Euphrates, laid waste Mesopotamia, and returned to Edessa, where he wintered. Next year he again took the field, intending to cross the Tigris, but was murdered near Edessa by Macrinus, the praetorian praefect. Caracalla gave to all free inhabitants of the empire the name and privileges of Roman citizens.

Caractăcus, king of the Silures in Britain, bravely defended his country against the Romans, in the reign of Claudius. He was at length defeated by the Romans, and fled for protection to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him to the Romans, who carried him to Rome, A. D. 51. When brought before Claudius, he addressed the emperor in so noble a manner that the latter pardoned him and his friends.

Carălis or Carăles (Caralitānus: Cagliari), the chief town of Sardinia, with an excellent harbour, situated on the Sinus Caralitanus and on a promontory of the same name (Capo S. Elia). It was founded by the Carthaginians; under the Romans it was the residence of the praetor, and at a later period enjoyed the Roman franchise.

Cărambis (Καράμβις ἄκρα: Kerempe), a promontory, with a city of the same name, on the coast of Paphlagonia, almost exactly opposite the Kriu Metopon or S. promontory of the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea). An imaginary line joining these two headlands would make an almost equal division of the Euxine, which was hence called διδύμη θάλασσα. (Soph. Antig. 978.)

Carānus (Κάρανος). 1. Of Argos, a descendant of Hercules, and a brother of Phidon, is said to have settled at Edessa in Macedonia with an Argive colony about B. C. 750, and to have become the founder of the dynasty of Macedonian kings. — 2. Son of Philip and half-brother of Alexander the Great. — 3. A general of Alexander the Great.

Carausĭus, born among the Menapii in Gaul, was entrusted by Maximian with the command of the fleet which was to protect the coasts of Gaul against the ravages of the Franks. But Maximian, having become dissatisfied with the conduct of Carausius in this command, gave orders for the execution of the latter. Carausius forthwith crossed over to Britain, where he assumed the title of Augustus, A. D. 287. After several ineffectual attempts to subdue him, Diocletian and Maximian acknowledged him as their colleague in the empire, and he continued to reign in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his chief officer, Allectus.

Carbo, Papĭrĭus. 1. C., a distinguished orator, and a man of great talents, but of no principle. He commenced public life as one of the 3 commissioners or triumvirs for carrying into effect the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus. His tribuneship of the plebs, B. C. 131, was characterized by the most vehement opposition to the aristocracy; and he was thought even to have murdered Scipio Africanus, the champion of the aristocratical party, 129. But after the death of C. Gracchus (121), he suddenly deserted the popular party, and in his consulship (120) actually undertook the defence of Opimius, who had murdered C. Gracchus. In 119 Carbo was accused by L. Licinius Crassus, who brought a charge against him, and as he foresaw his condemnation, he put an end to his life. — 2. Cn., consul 113, was defeated by the Cimbri near Noreia, and being afterwards accused by M. Antonius, he put an end to his own life. — 3. C., with the surname Arvina, son of No. 1, was a supporter of the aristocracy. In his tribuneship (90), Carbo and his colleague, M. Plautius Silvanus, carried a law (Lex Papiria Plautia), giving the Roman franchise to the citizens of the federate towns. Carbo was murdered in 82, by the praetor Brutus Damasippus, at the command of the younger Marius. [Brutus, No. 10.] — 4. Cn., son of No. 2, was one of the leaders of the Marian party. He was thrice consul, namely, in 85, 84, and 82. In 82 he carried on war against Sulla and his generals, but was at length obliged to abandon Italy: he fled to Sicily, where he was taken prisoner, and put to death by Pompey at Lilybaeum, in the course of the same year.

Carcăso (Carcassone), a town of the Tectosages in Gallia Narbonensis.

Carcăthĭŏcerta (Καρκαθιόκερτα: Kartpurt or Diarbekr), the capital of the district of Sophene in Armenia Major.

Carcīnus (Καρκίνος). 1. A comic poet and a contemporary of Aristophanes (Nub. 1263, Pax, 794). — 2. A tragic poet, lived about B. C. 380.

Cardămўle (Καρδαμύλη: Καρδαμυλίτης). 1. A town in Messenia, one of the 7 towns promised by Agamemnon to Achilles. — 2. An island near or perhaps a town in Chios.

Cardĕa, a Roman divinity protecting the hinges of doors (cardo), was a nymph beloved by Janus, who rewarded her for her favours by giving her the protection of the hinges of doors, and the power of preventing evil daemons from entering houses. Ovid (Fast. vi. 101, seq.) confounds this goddess with Carna.

Cardĭa (Καρδία: Καρδιανός), a town on the W. side of the Thracian Chersonese on the gulf of Melas, founded by Miletus and Clazomenae, and subsequently colonized by the Athenians under Miltiades. It was destroyed by Lysimachus, who built the town of Lysimachia in its immediate neighbourhood. Cardia was the birth-place of Eumenes and of the historian Hieronymus.

Cardūchi (Καρδοῦχοι), a powerful and warlike people in the S. E. of Great Armenia, on the N. E. margin of the Tigris valley, probably the same as the Γορδυαῖοι and Γορδυηνοί of the late geographers and the Kurds of modern times. They dwelt in the mountains which divided Assyria on the N. E. from Armenia (Mts. of Kurdistan), and were never thoroughly subdued by the Persians, Greeks, or Romans.

Carēsus (Κάρησος), a town of the Troad, on a river of the same name flowing into the Aesepus: destroyed before the time of Strabo.

Cārĭa (Καρία: Κᾶρ), a district of Asia Minor, in its S. W. corner, bounded on the N. and N. E. by the mountains Messogis and Cadmus, which divided it from Lydia and Phrygia, and adjacent to Phrygia and Lycia on the E. and S. E. It is intersected by low mountain chains running out far into the sea in long promontories, the N.-most of which was called Mycale or Trogilium (opposite to Samos), the next Posidium (on which stood Miletus and Branchidae), the next is the long tongue of land terminated by the 2 headlands of Zephyrium and Termerium (with Halicarnassus on its S. side), next the Cnidian Chersonesus, terminated by the cape Triopium and the city of Cnidus, then the Rhodian Chersonesus, the S. point of which was called Cynossema, opposite to Rhodes, and, lastly, Pedalium or Artemisium, forming the W. headland of the bay of Glaucus. The chief gulfs formed by these promontories were the Maeandrian, between Trogilium and Posidium; the Iassian, between Posidium and Zephyrium; and the Ceraunian or Dorian, between Termerium and Triopium. The valleys between these mountain chains were well watered and fertile. The chief river was the Maeander, between the chains of Messogis and Latmus, to the S. of which the country was watered by its tributaries, the Marsyas, Harpasus, and Mosynus, besides some streams flowing W. and S. into the sea, the most considerable of which was the Calbis. (See the articles.) The chief products of the country were corn, wine, oil, and figs; for the last of which Caunus, on the S. coast, was very famous. An extensive commerce was carried on by the Greek colonies on the coast. — Even before the great colonization of the coasts of Asia Minor, Dorian settlements existed on the Triopian and Cnidian promontories, and this part of Caria, with the adjacent islands, received at that time other Dorian colonies, and obtained the name of Doris; while to the N. of the Iassian Gulf, the coast was occupied by Ionian colonies, and thus formed the S. part of Ionia. The inhabitants of the rest of the country were Carians (Κᾶρες), a wide-spread race of the Indo-Germanic stock, nearly allied to the Lydians and Mysians, which appears, in the earliest times of which we know any thing, to have occupied the greater part of the W. coast of Asia Minor and several islands of the Aegean, in conjunction with the Leleges, from whom the Carians are not easily distinguishable. The connection between the Carians, Lydians, and Mysians is attested by their common worship of Zeus Carios at Mylasa: the Carians had also a common sanctuary of Zeus Chrysaoreus. — Their language was reckoned by the Greeks as a barbarian tongue (i. e. unintelligible), though it early received an intermixture of Greek. The people were considered mean and stupid, even for slaves. — The country was governed by a race of native princes, who fixed their abode at Halicarnassus after its exclusion from the Dorian confederacy. [Halicarnassus.] These princes were subject allies of Lydia and Persia, and some of them rose to great distinction in war and peace. [See Artemisia, Mausolus, and Ada.] After the Macedonian conquest, the S. portion of the country became subject to Rhodes [Rhodus], and the N. part to the kings of Pergamus. Under the Romans, Caria formed a part of the province of Asia.

Carīnae. [Roma.]

Carīnus, M. Aurelius, the elder of the 2 sons of Carus, was associated with his father in the government, A. D. 283, and remained in the W., while his father and brother Numerianus proceeded to the E. to carry on war against the Persians. On the death of his father, in the course of the same year, Carinus and Numerianus succeeded to the empire. In 284 Numerianus was slain, and Carinus marched into Moesia to oppose Diocletian, who had been proclaimed emperor. A decisive battle was fought near Margum, in which Carinus gained the victory, but, in the moment of triumph, he was slain by some of his own officers, whose wives he had seduced, 285. Carinus was one of the most profligate and cruel of the Roman emperors.

Carmāna (Κάρμανα: Kerman, Ru.), the capital of Carmania Propria, 3° long. E. of Persepolis.

Carmānĭa (Καρμανία: Kirman), a province of the ancient Persian empire, bounded on the W. by Persis, on the N. by Parthia, on the E. by Gedrosia, and on the S. by the Indian Ocean. It was divided into 2 parts, C. Propria and C. Deserta, the former of which was well watered by several small streams, and abounded in corn, wine, and cattle. The country also yielded gold, silver, copper, salt, and cinnabar. The people were akin to the Persians.

Carmānor (Καρμάνωρ), a Cretan, said to have purified Apollo and Artemis, after slaying the monster Python.

Carmēlus, and -um (Κάρμηλος: Jebel-Elyas), a range of mountains in Palestine, branching off, on the N. border of Samaria, from the central chain (which extends S. and N. between the Jordan and the Mediterranean), and running N. and N. W. through the S. W. part of Galilee, till it terminates in the promontory of the same name (Cape Carmel), the height of which is 1200 feet above the Mediterranean.

Carmenta, Carmentis. [Camenae.]

Carmo (Carmona), a fortified town in Hispania Baetica, N. E. of Hispalis.

Carna, a Roman divinity, whose name is probably connected with caro, flesh, for she was regarded as the protector of the physical well-being of man. Her festival was celebrated June 1st, and was believed to have been instituted by Brutus in the first year of the republic. Ovid confounds this goddess with Cardea.

Carnĕădes (Καρνεάδης), a celebrated philosopher, born at Cyrene about B. C. 213, was the founder of the Third or New Academy at Athens. In 155 he was sent to Rome, with Diogenes and Critolaus, by the Athenians, to deprecate the fine of 500 talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. At Rome he attracted great notice from his eloquent declamations on philosophical subjects, and it was here that he first delivered his famous orations on Justice. The 1st oration was in commendation of the virtue, and the next day the 2nd answered all the arguments of the 1st, and showed that justice was not a virtue, but a matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. Thereupon Cato moved the senate to send the philosopher home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demoralizing doctrines. Carneades died in 129, at the age of 85. He was a strenuous opponent of the Stoics, and maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

Carnēus (Καρνεῖος), a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped by the Dorians, is derived by some from Carnus, a son of Zeus and Leto, and by others from Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer. The latter was murdered by Hippotes, and it was to propitiate Apollo that the Dorians introduced his worship under the surname of Carneus. The festival of the Carnēa, in honour of Apollo, was one of the great national festivals of the Spartans. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.)

Carni, a Celtic people, dwelling N. of the Veneti in the Alpes Carnicae. [See p. 40.]

Carnuntum (Καρνοῦς, -οῦντος: Ru. between Deutsch-Altenburg and Petronell), an ancient Celtic town in Upper Pannonia on the Danube, E. of Vindobona (Vienna), and subsequently a Roman municipium or a colony. It was one of the chief fortresses of the Romans on the Danube, and was the residence of the emperor M. Aurelius during his wars with the Marcomanni and Quadi. It was the station of the Roman fleet on the Danube and the regular quarters of the 14th legion. It was destroyed by the Germans in the 4th century, but was rebuilt and was finally destroyed by the Hungarians in the middle ages.

Carnus. [Carneus.]

Carnūtes or -i, a powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis between the Liger and Sequana: their capital was Genabum.

Carpasĭa (Καρπασία: Karpass), a town in the S. E. of Cyprus.

Carpătes, also called Alpes Bastarnĭcae (Carpathian Mountains), the mountains separating Dacia from Sarmatia.

Carpăthus (Κάρπαθος: Scarpanto), an island between Crete and Rhodes, in the sea named after it: its chief towns were Posidium and Nisyrus.

Carpētāni, a powerful people in Hispania Tarraconensis, with a fertile territory on the rivers Anas and Tagus, in the modern Castille and Estremadura: their capital was Toletum.

Carpi or Carpiāni, a German people between the Carpathian mountains and the Danube.

Carrae or Carrhae (Κάρραι: Haran or Charran, S.S.: Harran), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, not far from Edessa. It was here that Crassus met his death after his defeat by the Parthians, B. C. 53.

Carrīnas or Carīnas. 1. C., one of the commanders of the Marian party, fought B. C. 83 against Pompey, and in 82 against Sulla and his generals. After the battle at the Colline gate at Rome, in which the Marian army was defeated, Carrinas took to flight, but was seized, and put to death. — 2. C., son of No. 1, was sent by Caesar, in 45, into Spain against Sext. Pompeius, but he did not accomplish anything. In 43 he was consul, and afterwards served as one of the generals of Octavian against Sext. Pompeius in Sicily, in 36, and as proconsul in Gaul in 31. — 3. Secundus, a rhetorician, expelled by Caligula from Rome, because he had, by way of exercise, declaimed against tyrants in his school.

Carsĕŏli (Carseolānus: Carsoli), a town of the Aequi in Latium, colonized by the Romans at an early period.

Carsŭlae (Carsulānus: Monte Castrilli), a town in Umbria, originally of considerable importance, but afterwards declined.

Carteia (also called Carthaea, Carpia, Carpessus: Crantia), more anciently Tartessus, a celebrated town and harbour in the S. of Spain, at the head of the gulf of which M. Calpe forms one side, founded by the Phoenicians, and colonized B. C. 170 by 4000 Roman soldiers, whose mothers were Spanish women.

Cartenna or Cartinna (Tennez), a colony on the coast of Mauretania Caesariensis in N. Africa, founded by Augustus.

Carthaea (Καρθαία: Poles, Ru.), a town on the S. side of the island of Ceos.

Carthāgo, Magna Carthago (Καρχηδών: Καρχηδόνιος, Carthaginiensis, Poenus: Ru. near El-Marsa, N.E. of Tunis), one of the most celebrated cities of the ancient world, stood in the recess of a large bay (Sinus Carthaginiensis) enclosed by the headlands Apollinis and Mercurii (C. Farina and C. Bon), in the middle and N.-most part of the N. coast of Africa, in lat. about 36° 55′ N., and long. about 10° 20′ E. The coast of this part of Africa has been much altered by the deposits of the river Bagradas and the sand which is driven seawards by the N. W. winds. In ancient times Carthage stood upon a peninsula surrounded by the sea on all sides except the W.: but now the whole space between the N. side of this peninsula and the S. side of the Apollinis Pr. (C. Farina), is filled up and converted into a marsh; Utica, which was on the sea-shore, being left some miles inland; and the course of the Bagradas itself being turned considerably N. of its original channel, so that, instead of flowing about half-way between Utica and Carthage, it now runs close to the ruins of Utica, and falls into the sea just under C. Farina. The N. E. and S. E. sides of the peninsula are still open to the sea, which has indeed rather encroached here, for ruins are found under water. The S. side of the peninsula was formed by an enclosed bay, connected with the sea only by a narrow opening (now called the Goletta, or, in Arabic, Haket-el-Wad, i. e. Throat of the River), which still forms the port of Tunis (anc. Tunes), which stands at its furthest end; but it is nearly choked up with the deposit of the sewers of the city. The circuit of the old peninsula may be estimated at about 30 miles: the width of the isthmus is 3 miles. The greatest circumference of the city itself was probably about 15 miles. The original city appears to have stood on the N. E. part of the peninsula, between Ras Ghammart and Ras Bousaid (C. Carthage), where the remains of cisterns are seen under water: these, and the aqueduct, whose ruins may be traced for 52 miles to Zaghwan, are the only remains of the old city. Its port, called Cothon, was on the N. W. side of the peninsula, where a little village (now inland) still retains the name of El-Marsa, i. e. the Port. The Roman city, which was built after the destruction of the original Carthage, lay to the S. of it. — The Tyrian colony of Carthage was founded, according to tradition, about 100 years before the building of Rome, that is, about B. C. 853. There were several more ancient Phoenician colonies along the same coast, between 2 of which, Utica and Tunes, the new settlement was fixed, about 27 miles (Roman) from the former, and 10 from the latter. The mythical account of its foundation is given under DIDO. The part of the city first built was called, in the Phoenician language, Betzura or Bosra, i. e. a castle, which was corrupted by the Greeks into Byrsa (Βύρσα), i. e. a hide, and hence probably arose the story of the way in which the natives were cheated out of the ground. As the city grew, the Byrsa formed the citadel: it stood on a low hill; but its site can no longer be identified, as there are several such hills within the circuit of the ancient city. The Cothon, or Port, is said to have been excavated, and the quarter of the city adjoining to it built, 40 years later, B. C. 813. This Cothon was the inner harbour, and was used for ships of war: the outer harbour, divided from it by a tongue of land 300 feet wide, was the station for the merchant ships. The fortifications of the city consisted of a single wall on the side towards the sea, where the steep shore formed a natural defence, and a triple wall of great height, with battlements and towers, on the land side; — on this side were barracks for 40,000 soldiers, and stables for 300 elephants and 4000 horses. Beyond the fortifications was a large suburb, called Magara or Magalia, containing many beautiful gardens and villas. The aqueduct already mentioned is supposed, on good grounds, to have been built at an early period of the existence of the city. The most remarkable buildings mentioned within the city were the temple of the god whom the Greeks and Romans identified with Aesculapius, and that of Apollo (Baal or the Sun) in the market-place. The population of Carthage, at the time of the 3rd Punic war, is stated at 700,000. — The constitution of Carthage was a municipal oligarchy, somewhat resembling that of Venice. The two chief magistrates, called Suffetes (probably the same word as the Hebrew Shophetim, i. e. Judges) appear to have been elected for life; the Greek and Roman writers call them kings. The generals and foreign governors were usually quite distinct from the suffetes; but the 2 offices were sometimes united in the same person. The governing body was a Senate, partly hereditary and partly elective, within which there was a select body of 100 or 104, called Gerusia, whose chief office was to controul the magistrates, and especially the generals returning from foreign service, who might be suspected of attempts to establish a tyranny. The Gerusia was first formed about B. C. 400, when the power of the house of Mago excited suspicion; and its efficacy was shown in the defeat of the attempts made by Hanno (B. C. 340) and Hamilcar (B. C. 306) to seize the supreme power. Its members are said by Aristotle to have been elected by the pentarchies, bodies of which we have very little information, but which appear to have been committees of five, chosen from the most eminent members of the senate, and entrusted with the controul of the various departments of the government. Important questions, especially those on which the senate and the suffetes disagreed, were referred to a general assembly of the citizens; but concerning the mode of proceeding in this assembly, and the extent of its powers, we know very little. It seems to have elected the magistrates; the senate having either the power of previous nomination or of a veto, it is not clear which. The generals were chosen by the gerusia, and approved by the assembly of the citizens. — The general tone of social morality at Carthage appears to have been high, at least during its earlier history: there was a censorship of public morals, under the care of the gerusia; and all the magistrates were required, during their term of office, to abstain from wine: the magistrates were also unpaid. Their punishments were very severe, and the usual mode of inflicting death was by crucifixion. — The religion of Carthage was that of the mother country: especial mention is made of the cruel rites of their tutelar deity Melcarth (i. e. king of the city, no doubt the same as Moloch), which were abolished by the treaty with Gelon of Syracuse, B. C. 480; and also of the worship of Ashtaroth and Astarte, and Aesculapius. — The chief occupations of the people were commerce and agriculture: in the former they rivalled the mother city, Tyre; and the latter they pursued with such success that the country around the city was one of the best cultivated districts in the ancient world, and a great work on agriculture, in 28 books, was composed by Mago, a suffete. — The revenues of the state were derived from the subject provinces; and its army was composed of mercenaries from the neighbouring country, among whom the Numidian cavalry were especially distinguished. — Of the History of Carthage a brief sketch will suffice; as the most important portions of it are related in the ordinary histories of Rome. The first colonists preserved the character of peaceful traders, and maintained friendly relations with the natives of the country, to whom they long continued to pay a rent or tribute for the ground on which the city was built. Gradually, however, as their commerce brought them power and wealth, they were enabled to reduce the natives of the district round the city, first to the condition of allies, and then to that of tributaries. Meanwhile, they undertook military expeditions at sea, and possessed themselves, first of the small islands near their own coast, and afterwards of Malta, and the Lipari and Balearic islands: they also sent aid to Tyre, when it was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (B. C. 600), and took part in wars between the Etruscans and the Phocaean colonies. On the coast of Africa they founded numerous colonies, from the Pillars of Hercules to the bottom of the Great Syrtis, where they met the Greek colonists of Cyrenaica: the people of these colonies became intermixed with the Libyans around them, forming a population who are called Libyo-Phoenicians. In connection with their commercial enterprizes, they no doubt sent forth various expeditions of maritime discovery; among which we have mention of 2, which were undertaken during the long peace which followed the war with Gelon in B. C. 480, to explore the W. coasts of Europe and Africa respectively. The record of the latter expedition, under Hanno, is still preserved to us in a Greek translation [HANNO], from which we learn that it reached probably as far S. as 10° N. lat., if not further. The relations of the Carthaginians with the interior of N. Africa appear to have been very extensive, but the country actually subject to them, and which formed the true Carthaginian territory, was limited to the district contained between the river Tusca (Zain) on the W. and the lake and river Triton, at the bottom of the Lesser Syrtis, on the S., corresponding very nearly to the modern regency of Tunis; and even within this territory there were some ancient Phoenician colonies, which, though in alliance with Carthage, preserved their independent municipal government, such as Hippo Zaritus, Utica, Hadrumetum, and Leptis. — The first great developement of the power of Carthage for foreign conquest was made by Mago (about B. C. 550—500), who is said to have first established a sound discipline in the armies of the republic, and to have freed the city from the tribute which it still paid to the Libyans. His sons, Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, reduced a part of the island of Sardinia, where the Carthaginians founded the colonies of Caralis and Sulci; and by this time the fame of Carthage had spread so far, that Darius is said to have sent to ask her aid against the Greeks, which, however, was refused. The Carthaginians, however, took advantage of the Persian war to attempt the conquest of Sicily, whither Hamilcar was sent with a great force, in B. C. 480, but his army was destroyed and himself killed in a great battle under the walls of Himera, in which the Sicilian Greeks were commanded by Gelon the tyrant of Syracuse, and which was said to have been fought on the same day as the battle of Salamis. Their next attempt upon Sicily, in B. C. 410, led to a protracted war, which resulted in a treaty between the Syracusans, under Timoleon, and the Carthaginians, by which the latter were confirmed in the possession of the W. part of the island, as far as the river Halicus. From B. C. 310—307 there was another war between Syracuse and the Carthaginians, which was chiefly remarkable for the bold step taken by Agathocles, who invaded the Carthaginian territory in Africa, and thus, though unable to maintain himself there, set an example which was followed a century later by Scipio, with fatal results to Carthage. Passing over the wars with PYRRHUS and HIERO, we come to the long struggle between Rome and Carthage, known as the Punic Wars, which are fully related in the Histories of Rome. [See also HAMILCAR.] The first lasted from B. C. 265—242, and resulted in the loss to Carthage of Sicily and the Lipari islands. It was followed by a fierce contest of some years between Carthage and her disbanded mercenaries, which is called the Libyan War, and which was terminated by Hamilcar Barcas. After a hollow peace, during which the Romans openly violated the last treaty, and the Carthaginians conquered Spain as far as the Iberus (Ebro), the Second Punic War, the decisive contest between the two rival states, which were too powerful to co-exist, began with the siege of Saguntum (B. C. 218) and terminated (B. C. 201) with a peace by which Carthage was stripped of all her power. [HANNIBAL; SCIPIO.] Her destruction was now only a question of time, and, though she scrupulously observed the terms of the last peace for 50 years, in spite of every provocation from the Romans and their ally Masinissa, the king of Numidia, a pretext was at length found for a new war (B. C. 149), which lasted only 3 years, during which the Carthaginians, driven to despair by the terms proposed to them, sustained a siege so destructive that, out of 700,000 persons, who were living in the city at its commencement, only 50,000 surrendered to the Romans. The city was razed to the ground, and remained in ruins for 30 years. At the end of that time a colony was established on the old site by the Gracchi, which remained in a feeble condition till the times of Julius and Augustus, under whom a new city was built S. of the former, on the S. E. side of the peninsula, with the name of Colonia Carthago. It soon grew so much as to cover a great part (if not the whole) of the site of the ancient Tyrian city: it became the first city of Africa, and occupied an important place in ecclesiastical as well as in civil history. It was taken by the Vandals in A. D. 439, retaken by Belisarius in A. D. 533, and destroyed by the Arab conquerors in A. D. 698. — Respecting the territory of Carthage under the Romans, see AFRICA, No. 2.

Carthāgo Nŏva (Καρχηδὼν ἡ νέα: Carthagena), a town on the E. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal, B. C. 243, and subsequently conquered and colonized by the Romans, from which time its full name was Colonia Victrix Julia Nova Carthago. It is situated on a promontory running out into the sea, and possesses one of the finest harbours in the world; at the entrance of the harbour was a small island called Scombraria, from the great number of scombri or mackerel caught here, from which such famous pickle was made. In ancient times Carthago Nova was one of the most important cities in all Spain; its population was numerous, its trade flourishing, and its temples and other public buildings handsome and imposing. It was, together with Tarraco, the residence of the Roman governor of the province. In the neighbourhood were valuable silver mines; and the country produced an immense quantity of Spartum or broom, whence the town bore the surname Spartaria, and the country was called Campus Spartarius.

Carūra (τὰ Καρουρά: Sarikivi), a Phrygian city, in the territory of Caria, on the left bank of the Maeander, celebrated for its hot springs and its temple of Men Carus.

Cārus, M. Aurēlius, Roman emperor A. D. 282—283, probably born at Narbo in Gaul, was praefectus praetorio under Probus, and on the murder of the latter was elected emperor. After defeating the Sarmatians, Carus invaded the Persian dominions, took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and was preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris, when he was struck dead by lightning, towards the close of 283. He was succeeded by his sons CARINUS and NUMERIANUS. Carus was a victorious general and able ruler.

Carūsa (ἡ Καροῦσα: Kerzeh), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, S. of Sinope.

Carventum, a town of the Volsci, to which the Carventana Arx mentioned by Livy belonged, a town of the Volsci between Signia and the sources of the Trerus.

Carvilius Maximus. 1. Sp., twice consul, B. C. 293 and 273, both times with L. Papirius Cursor. In their first consulship they gained brilliant victories over the Samnites, and in their second they brought the Samnite war to a close. — 2. Sp., son of the preceding, twice consul, 234 and 228, was alive at the battle of Cannae, 216, after which he proposed to fill up the vacancies in the senate from the Latins. This Carvilius is said to have been the first person at Rome who divorced his wife.

Caryae (Καρύαι: Καρυάτης, fem. Καρυᾶτις), a town in Laconia near the borders of Arcadia, originally belonged to the territory of Tegea in Arcadia. It possessed a temple of Artemis Caryatis, and an annual festival in honour of this goddess was celebrated here by the Lacedaemonian maidens with national dances. Respecting the female figures in architecture called Caryatides, see Dict. of Ant. s. v.

Caryanda (τὰ Καρύανδα: Καρυανδεύς: Karakoyan), a city of Caria, on a little island, once probably united with the mainland, at the N.W. extremity of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It once belonged to the Ionian league; and it was the birthplace of the geographer Scylax.

Caryātis. [CARYAE.]

Carystius (Καρύστιος), a Greek grammarian of Pergamus, lived about B.C. 120, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

Carystus (Κάρυστος: Καρύστιος: Karysto or Castel Rosso), a town on the S. coast of Euboea, at the foot of Mount Oche, founded by Dryopes; called, according to tradition, after Carystus, son of Chiron. In the neighbourhood was excellent marble, which was exported in large quantities; and the mineral, called Asbestos, was also found here.

Casca, P. Servilius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 44, was one of the conspirators against Caesar, and aimed the first stroke at his assassination. He fought in the battle of Philippi (42), and died shortly afterwards. — C. Casca, the brother of the preceding, was also one of the conspirators against Caesar.

Cascellius, A., an eminent Roman jurist (Hor. Ar. Poët. 371), contemporary with Caesar and Augustus, was a man of stern republican principles, and spoke freely against the proscriptions of the triumvirs.

Casilinum (Casilinas, -ātis), a town in Campania on the Vulturnus, and on the same site as the modern Capua, celebrated for its heroic defence against Hannibal B. C. 216. It received Roman colonists by the Lex Julia, but had greatly declined in the time of Pliny.

Casinum (Casīnas, -ātis: S. Germano), a town in Latium on the river Casinus, and on the Via Latina near the borders of Campania; colonized by the Romans in the Samnite wars; subsequently a municipium; its citadel containing a temple of Apollo occupied the same site as the celebrated convent Monte Cassino: the ruins of an amphitheatre are found at S. Germano.

Casiōtis. [CASIUS.]

Căsius. 1. (Ras Kasaroun), a mountain on the coast of Egypt, E. of Pelusium, with a temple of Jupiter on its summit. Here also was the grave of Pompey. At the foot of the mountain, on the land side, on the high road from Egypt to Syria, stood the town of Casium (Katieh). The surrounding district was called Casiōtis. — 2. (Jebel Okrah), a mountain on the coast of Syria, S. of Antioch and the Orontes, 5318 feet above the level of the sea. The name of Casiōtis was applied to the district on the coast S. of Casius, as far as the N. border of Phoenicia.

Casmēna, -ae (Κασμένη, Herod.: Κασμέναι, Thuc.: Κασμεναῖος), a town in Sicily, founded by Syracuse about B. C. 643.

Caspēria or Caspērŭla, a town of the Sabines, N. W. of Cures, on the river Himella (Aspra).

Caspiae Portae or Pylae (Κάσπιαι πύλαι, i. e. the Caspian Gates), the principal pass from Media into Parthia and Hyrcania, through the CASPII MONTES, was a deep ravine, made practicable by art, but still so narrow that there was only room for a single waggon to pass between the lofty overhanging walls of rock, from the sides of which a constant drip of salt water fell upon the road. The Persians erected iron gates across the narrowest part of the pass, and maintained a guard for its defence. This pass was near the ancient Rhagae or Arsacia; but there were other passes through the mountains round the Caspian, which are called by the same name, especially that on the W. shore of the Caspian, through the Caucasus near Derbent, which was usually called Albaniae or Caucasiae Portae. The Caspian gates, being the most important pass from Western to Central Asia, were regarded by many of the ancients as a sort of central point, common to the boundaries between W. and E. Asia and N. and S. Asia; and distances were reckoned from them.

Caspii (Κάσπιοι), the name of certain Scythian tribes near the Caspian Sea, is used rather loosely by the ancient geographers. The Caspii of Strabo are on the W. side of the sea, and their country, Caspiāne, forms a part of Albania. Those of Herodotus and Ptolemy are in the E. of Media, on the borders of Parthia, in the neighbourhood of the Caspiae Pylae. Probably it would not be far wrong to apply the name generally to the people round the S. W. and S. shores of the Caspian in and about the Caspii Montes.

Caspii Montes (τὰ Κάσπια ὄρη: Elburz Mts.) or Caspius Mons, is a name applied generally to the whole range of mountains which surround the Caspian Sea, on the S. and S. W., at the distance of from 15 to 30 miles from its shore, on the borders of Armenia, Media, Hyrcania, and Parthia; and more specifically to that part of this range S. of the Caspian, in which was the pass called Caspiae Pylae. The term was also loosely applied to other mountains near the Caspian, especially, by Strabo, to the E. part of the Caucasus, between Colchis and the Caspian.

Caspiri or Caspiraei (Κάσπειροι, Κασπιραῖοι), a people of India, whose exact position is doubtful: they are generally placed in Cashmeer and Nepaul.

Caspium Mare (ἡ Κασπία θάλασσα, the Caspian Sea), also called Hyrcanium, Albanum, and Scythicum, all names derived from the people who lived on its shores, is a great salt-water lake in Asia, according to the ancient division of the continents, but now on the boundary between Europe and Asia. Its average width from E. to W. is about 210 miles, and its length from N. to S., in a straight line, is about 740 miles; but, as its N. part makes a great bend to the E., its true length, measured along a curve drawn through its middle, is about 900 miles; its area is about 180,000 square miles. The notions of the ancients about the Caspian varied very much; and it is curious that two of the erroneous opinions of the later Greek and Roman geographers, namely, that it was united both with the Sea of Aral and with the Arctic Ocean, expressed what, at some remote period, were probably real facts. Their other error, that its greatest length lay W. and E., very likely arose from its supposed union with the Sea of Aral. Another consequence of this error was the supposition that the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes flowed into the Caspian. That the former really did so at some time subsequent to the separation of the two lakes (supposing that they were once united) is pretty well established; but whether this has been the case within the historical period cannot be determined [Oxus]. The country between the two lakes has evidently been greatly changed, and the sand-hills which cover it have doubtless been accumulated by the force of the E. winds bringing down sand from the steppes of Tartary. Both lakes have their surface considerably below that of the Black Sea, the Caspian between nearly 350 feet, and the Aral about 200 feet, lower than the level of the Black Sea, and both are still sinking by evaporation. Moreover, the whole country between and around them for a considerable distance is a depression, surrounded by lofty mountains on every side, except where the valley of the Irtish and Obi stretches away to the Arctic Ocean. Besides a number of smaller streams, two great rivers flow into the Caspian; the Rha (Volga) on the N., and the united Cyrus and Araxes (Kour) on the W.; but it loses more by evaporation than it receives from these rivers.

Cassandane (Κασσανδάνη), wife of Cyrus the Great, and mother of Cambyses.

Cassander (Κάσσανδρος), son of Antipater. His father, on his death-bed (B. C. 319), appointed Polysperchon regent, and conferred upon Cassander only the secondary dignity of Chiliarch. Being dissatisfied with this arrangement, Cassander strengthened himself by an alliance with Ptolemy and Antigonus, and entered into war with Polysperchon. In 318 Cassander obtained possession of Athens and most of the cities in the S. of Greece. In 317 he was recalled to Macedonia to oppose Olympias. He kept her besieged in Pydna throughout the winter of 317, and on her surrender in the spring of the ensuing year, he put her to death. The way now seemed open to him to the throne of Macedon. He placed Roxana and her young son, Alexander Aegus, in custody at Amphipolis, not thinking it safe as yet to murder them; and he connected himself with the regal family by a marriage with Thessalonica, half-sister to Alexander the Great. In 315 Cassander joined Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus in their war against Antigonus, of whose power they had all become jealous. This war was upon the whole unfavourable to Cassander, who lost most of the cities in Greece. By the general peace of 311, it was provided that Cassander was to retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Aegus should be grown to manhood. Cassander thereupon put to death the young king and his mother Roxana. In 310 the war was renewed, and Hercules, the son of Alexander by Barsine, was brought forward by Polysperchon as a claimant to the Macedonian throne; but Cassander bribed Polysperchon to murder the young prince and his mother, 309. In 306 Cassander took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy. In the following years, Demetrius Poliorcetes, the son of Antigonus, carried on the war in Greece with great success against Cassander; but in 302 Demetrius was obliged to pass into Asia, to support his father; and next year, 301, the decisive battle of Ipsus was fought, in which Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated, and the former slain, and which gave to Cassander Macedonia and Greece. Cassander died of dropsy in 297, and was succeeded by his son Philip.

Cassandra (Κασσάνδρα), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and twin-sister of Helenus. She and her brother, when young, were left asleep in the sanctuary of Apollo, when their ears were purified by serpents, so that they could understand the divine sounds of nature and the voices of birds. Cassandra sometimes used to sleep afterwards in the same temple; and when she grew up her beauty won the love of Apollo. The god conferred upon her the gift of prophecy, upon her promising to comply with his desires; but when she had become possessed of the prophetic art, she refused to fulfil her promise. Thereupon the god in anger ordained that no one should believe her prophecies. She predicted to the Trojans the ruin that threatened them, but no one believed her; she was looked upon as a madwoman, and, according to a late account, was shut up and guarded. On the capture of Troy she fled into the sanctuary of Athena, but was torn away from the statue of the goddess by Ajax, son of Oïleus, and, according to some accounts, was even ravished by him in the sanctuary. On the division of the booty, Cassandra fell to the lot of Agamemnon, who took her with him to Mycenae. Here she was killed by Clytaemnestra.

Cassandrēa. [POTIDAEA.]

Cassĭa Gens. [CASSIUS.]

Cassĭĕpēa, Cassĭŏpēa, or Cassĭŏpē (Κασσιέπεια, Κασσιόπεια, or Κασσιόπη), wife of Cepheus in Aethiopia, and mother of Andromeda, whose beauty she extolled above that of the Nereids. [ANDROMEDA.] She was afterwards placed among the stars.

Cassiodōrus, Magnus Aurēlĭus, a distinguished statesman, and one of the few men of learning at the downfal of the Western Empire, was born about A. D. 468, at Scylacium in Bruttium, of an ancient and wealthy Roman family. He enjoyed the full confidence of Theodoric the Great and his successors, and under a variety of different titles he conducted for a long series of years the government of the Ostrogothic kingdom. At the age of 70 he retired to the monastery of Viviers, which he had founded in his native province, and there passed the last 30 years of his life. His time was devoted to study and to the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the 7 liberal arts, and divinity; while his leisure hours were employed in the construction of philosophical toys, such as sun-dials, water-clocks, &c. Of his numerous writings the most important is his Variarum (Epistolarum) Libri XII., an assemblage of state papers drawn up by Cassiodorus in accordance with the instructions of Theodoric and his successors. The other works of Cassiodorus are of less value to us. The principal are: 1. Chronicon, a summary of Universal History; 2. De Orthographia Liber; 3. De Arte Grammatica ad Donati Mentem; 4. De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Literarum, much read in the middle ages; 5. De Anima; 6. Libri XII. De Rebus Gestis Gothorum, known to us only through the abridgement of Jornandes; 7. De Institutione Divinarum Literarum, an introduction to the profitable study of the Scriptures. There are also several other ecclesiastical works of Cassiodorus extant. — The best edition of his collected works is by D. Garet, Rouen, 1679, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Venice, 1729.

Cassĭŏpē (Κασσιόπη), a town in Corcyra on a promontory of the same name, with a good harbour and a temple of Zeus.

Cassiopēa. [CASSIEPEA.]

Cassitĕrĭdes. [BRITANNIA, p. 126, a.]

Cassĭus, the name of one of the most distinguished of the Roman gentes, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian. 1. Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, thrice consul: first B. C. 502, when he conquered the Sabines; again 493, when he made a league with the Latins; and, lastly, 486, when he made a league with the Hernicans, and carried his celebrated agrarian law, the first which was proposed at Rome. It probably enacted that the portion of the patricians in the public land should be strictly defined, and that the remainder should be divided among the plebeians. In the following year he was accused of aiming at regal power, and was put to death. The manner of his death is related differently, but it is most probable that he was accused before the comitia curiata by the quaestores parricidii, and was sentenced to death by his fellow patricians. His house was razed to the ground, and his property confiscated. His guilt is doubtful; he had made himself hateful to the patricians by his agrarian law, and it is most likely that the accusation was invented for the purpose of getting rid of a dangerous opponent. He left 3 sons; but as all the subsequent Cassii are plebeians, his sons were perhaps expelled from the patrician order, or may have voluntarily passed over to the plebeians, on account of the murder of their father. — 2. C. Cass. Longinus, consul 171, obtained as his province Italy and Cisalpine Gaul, and without the authority of the senate attempted to march into Macedonia through Illyricum, but was obliged to return to Italy. In 154 he was censor with M. Messala; and a theatre, which these censors had built, was pulled down by order of the senate, at the suggestion of P. Scipio Nasica, as injurious to public morals. — 3. Q. Cass. Longinus, praetor urbanus B. C. 167, and consul 164, died in his consulship. — 4. L. Cass. Longinus Ravilla, tribune of the plebs, 137, when he proposed a law for voting by ballot (tabellaria lex); consul 127, and censor 125. He was very severe and just as a judex. — 5. L. Cass. Longinus, praetor 111, when he brought Jugurtha to Rome; consul 107, with C. Marius, and received as his province Narbonese Gaul, in order to oppose the Cimbri, but was defeated and killed by the Tigurini. — 6. L. Cass. Longinus, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward many laws to diminish the power of the aristocracy. — 7. C. Cass. Longinus Varus, consul 73, brought forward, with his colleague M. Terentius, a law (lex Terentia Cassia), by which corn was to be purchased and then sold in Rome at a small price. In 72 he was defeated by Spartacus near Mutina; in 66 he supported the Manilian law for giving the command of the Mithridatic war to Pompey; and in his old age was proscribed by the triumvirs and killed, 43. — 8. C. Cass. Longinus, the murderer of Julius Caesar. In 53 he was quaestor of Crassus in his campaign against the Parthians, in which he greatly distinguished himself by his prudence and military skill. After the death of Crassus, he collected the remains of the Roman army, and made preparations to defend Syria against the Parthians. In 52 he defeated the Parthians, who had crossed the Euphrates, and in 51 he again gained a still more important victory over them. Soon afterwards he returned to Rome. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, joined the aristocratical party in the civil war, and fled with Pompey from Rome. In 48 he commanded the Pompeian fleet; after the battle of Pharsalia he went to the Hellespont, where he accidentally fell in with Caesar, and surrendered to him. He was not only pardoned by Caesar, but in 44 was made praetor, and the province of Syria was promised him for the next year. But Cassius had never ceased to be Caesar's enemy; it was he who formed the conspiracy against the dictator's life, and gained over M. Brutus to the plot. After the death of Caesar, on the 15th of March, 44 [CAESAR], Cassius remained in Italy for a few months, but in July he went to Syria, which he claimed as his province, although the senate had given it to Dolabella, and had conferred upon Cassius Cyrene in its stead. He defeated Dolabella, who put an end to his own life; and after plundering Syria and Asia most unmercifully, he crossed over to Greece with Brutus in 42, in order to oppose Octavian and Antony. At the battle of Philippi, Cassius was defeated by Antony, while Brutus, who commanded the other wing of the army, drove Octavian off the field; but Cassius, ignorant of the success of Brutus, commanded his freedman to put an end to his life. Brutus mourned over his companion, calling him the last of the Romans. Cassius was married to Junia Tertia or Tertulla, half-sister of M. Brutus. Cassius was well acquainted with Greek and Roman literature; he was a follower of the Epicurean philosophy; his abilities were considerable, but he was vain, proud, and revengeful. — 9. L. Cass. Longinus, brother of No. 8, assisted M. Laterensis in accusing Cn. Plancius, who was defended by Cicero in 54. He joined Caesar at the commencement of the civil war, and was one of Caesar's legates in Greece in 48. In 44 he was tribune of the plebs, but was not one of the conspirators against Caesar's life. He subsequently espoused the side of Octavian, in opposition to Antony; and on their reconciliation in 43, he fled to Asia: he was pardoned by Antony in 41. — 10. Q. Cass. Longinus, the frater or first-cousin of No. 8. In 54 he went as the quaestor of Pompey into Spain, where he was universally hated on account of his rapacity and cruelty. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, and a warm supporter of Caesar, but was obliged to leave the city and take refuge in Caesar's camp. In the same year he accompanied Caesar to Spain, and after the defeat of Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, Caesar left him governor of Further Spain. His cruelty and oppressions excited an insurrection against him at Corduba, but this was quelled by Cassius. Subsequently 2 legions declared against him, and M. Marcellus, the quaestor, put himself at their head. He was saved from this danger by Lepidus, and left the province in 47, but his ship sank, and he was lost, at the mouth of the Iberus. — 11. L. Cass. Longinus, a competitor with Cicero for the consulship for 63; was one of Catiline's conspirators, and undertook to set the city on fire; he escaped the fate of his comrades by quitting Rome before their apprehension. — 12. L. Cass. Longinus, consul A. D. 30, married to Drusilla, the daughter of Germanicus, with whom her brother Caligula afterwards lived. Cassius was proconsul in Asia A. D. 40, and was commanded by Caligula to be brought to Rome, because an oracle had warned the emperor to beware of a Cassius: the oracle was fulfilled in the murder of the emperor by Cassius Chaerea. — 13. C. Cass. Longinus, the celebrated jurist, governor of Syria, A. D. 50, in the reign of Claudius. He was banished by Nero in A. D. 66, because he had, among his ancestral images, a statue of Cassius, the murderer of Caesar. He was recalled from banishment by Vespasian. Cassius wrote 10 books on the civil law (Libri Juris Civilis), and Commentaries on Vitellius and Urseius Ferox, which are quoted in the Digest. He was a follower of the school of Ateius Capito; and as he reduced the principles of Capito to a more scientific form, the adherents of this school received the name of Cassiani. — 14. L. Cass. Hemina, a Roman annalist, lived about B. C. 140, and wrote a history of Rome from the earliest times to the end of the 3rd Punic war. — 15. Cass. Parmensis, so called from Parma, his birth-place, was one of the murderers of Caesar, B. C. 43; took an active part in the war against the triumvirs; and, after the death of Brutus and Cassius, carried over the fleet which he commanded to Sicily, and joined Sex. Pompey; upon the defeat of Pompey, he surrendered himself to Antony, whose fortunes he followed until after the battle of Actium, when he went to Athens, and was there put to death by the command of Octavian, B. C. 30. Cassius was a poet, and his productions were prized by Horace (Ep. i. 4. 3.). He wrote 2 tragedies, entitled Thyestes and Brutus, epigrams, and other works. — 16. Cass. Etruscus, a poet censured by Horace (Sat. i. 10. 61), must not be confounded with No. 15. — 17. Cass. Avidius, an able general of M. Aurelius, was a native of Syria. In the Parthian war (A. D. 162—165), he commanded the Roman army as the general of Verus, and after defeating the Parthians, he took Seleucia and Ctesiphon. He was afterwards appointed governor of all the Eastern provinces, and discharged his trust for several years with fidelity; but in A. D. 175 he proclaimed himself emperor. He reigned only a few months, and was slain by his own officers, before M. Aurelius arrived in the East. [See p. 111.] — 18. Dionysius Cassius, of Utica, a Greek writer, lived about B. C. 40, and translated into Greek the work of the Carthaginian Mago on agriculture. — 19. Cass. Felix, a Greek physician, probably lived under Augustus and Tiberius; wrote a small work entitled Ἰατρικαὶ Ἀπορίαι καὶ Προβλήματα Φυσικά, Quaestiones Medicae et Problemata Naturalia: printed in Ideler's Physici et Medici Graeci Minores, Berol. 1841. — 20. Cass. Chaerea. [CHAEREA.] — 21. Cass. Dion. [DION CASSIUS.] — 22. Cass. Severus. [SEVERUS.]

Cassivelaunus, a British chief, ruled over the country N. of the Tamesis (Thames), and was entrusted by the Britons with the supreme command on Caesar's 2nd invasion of Britain, B. C. 54. He was defeated by Caesar, and was obliged to sue for peace.

Cassōpē (Κασσώπη: Κασσωπαῖος), a town in Thesprotia near the coast.

Castăbăla (τὰ Καστάβαλα). 1. A city of Cappadocia, near Tyana, celebrated for its temple of Artemis Perasia. — 2. A town in Cilicia Campestris, near Issus.

Castălĭa (Κασταλία), a celebrated fountain on Mt. Parnassus, in which the Pythia used to bathe; sacred to Apollo and the Muses, who were hence called Castălĭdes; said to have derived its name from Castalia, daughter of Achelous, who threw herself into the fountain when pursued by Apollo.

Castor, brother of Pollux. [DIOSCURI.]

Castor (Κάστωρ). 1. A Greek grammarian, surnamed Philoromaeus, probably lived about B. C. 150, and wrote several books; a portion of his Τέχνη ῥητορική is still extant and printed in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. iii. p. 712, seq. — 2. Grandson of Deiotarus. [DEIOTARUS.]

Castra, a "camp," the name of several towns, which were originally the stationary quarters of the Roman legions. 1. Constantia, in Gaul, near the mouth of the Sequana (Seine). — 2. Hannibalis, in Bruttium, on the S. E. coast, N. of Scylacium, arose out of the fortified camp which Hannibal maintained there during the latter years of the 2nd Punic war. — 3. Herculis, in Batavia, perhaps near Heussen. — 4. Minervae (Castro), in Calabria, with a temple of Minerva, S. of Hydruntum; the most ancient town of the Salentini, subsequently colonized by the Romans; its harbour was called Portus Veneris (Porto Badisco). — 5. Vetera (Xanten), in Gallica Belgica, on the Rhine: many Roman remains have been found at Xanten. — 6. Cornēlĭă (Ghellah), a place in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana) in N. Africa, where Scipio Africanus the elder established his camp when he invaded Africa in the Second Punic War.

It was between Utica and Carthage, on the N. side of the river Bagradas, but its site is now S. of the river in consequence of the alterations described under CARTHAGO.

Castrum. 1. Inui, a town of the Rutuli, on the coast of Latium, confounded by some writers with No. 2. — 2. Novum (Torre di Chiaruccia), a town in Etruria, and a Roman colony on the coast. — 3. Novum (Giulia Nova), a town in Picenum, probably at the mouth of the small river Batinum (Salinello), colonized by the Romans, B. C. 264, at the commencement of the 1st Punic war.

Castŭlo (Καστάλων: Cazlona), a town of the Oretani on the Baetis, and near the frontiers of Baetica, at the foot of a mountain which bore a great resemblance to Parnassus, was under the Romans an important place, a municipium with the Jus Latii, and included in the jurisdiction of Carthago Nova: its inhabitants were called Caesari venales. In the mountains (Saltus Castulonensis) in the neighbourhood were silver and lead mines. The wife of Hannibal was a native of Castulo.

Casuentus (Basiento), a river in Lucania, flows into the sea near Metapontum.

Casystes (Κασύστης: Chismeh), a fine sea-port on the coast of Ionia; the harbour of ERYTHRAE.

Catabathmus Magnus (Καταβαθμός, i. e. descent; Marsa Sollern, i. e. Port of the Ladder), a mountain and sea-port, at the bottom of a deep bay on the N. coast of Africa (about 25° 5′ E. long.), was generally considered the boundary between Egypt and Cyrenaica. Ptolemy distinguishes from this a place called Catabathmus Parvus, in the interior of Africa, near the borders of Egypt, above Paraetonium.

Cătădūpa or -i (τὰ Κατάδουπα, οἱ Κατάδουποι), a name given to the cataracts of the Nile, and also to the parts of Aethiopia in their neighbourhood. [NILUS.]

Catalauni or Catelauni, a people in Gaul in the modern Champagne, mentioned only by later writers: their capital was Durocatelauni or Catelauni (Châlons sur Marne), in the neighbourhood of which Attila was defeated by Aëtius and Theodoric, A. D. 451.

Catamītus, the Roman name for Ganymedes, of which it is only a corrupt form.

Catăna or Catĭna (Κατάνη: Καταναῖος: Catania), an important town in Sicily on the E. coast at the foot of Mt. Aetna, founded B. C. 730 by Naxos, which was itself founded by the Chalcidians of Euboea. In B. C. 476 it was taken by Hiero I., who removed its inhabitants to Leontini, and settled 5000 Syracusans and 5000 Peloponnesians in the town, the name of which he changed into Aetna. Soon after the death of Hiero (467), the former inhabitants of Catana again obtained possession of the town, and called it by its original name, Catana. Subsequently Catana was conquered by Dionysius, was then governed by native tyrants, next became subject to Agathocles, and finally in the 1st Punic war fell under the dominion of Rome. It was colonized by Augustus with some veterans. Catana frequently suffered from earthquakes and eruptions of Mt. Aetna. It is now one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily.

Cătăŏnĭa (Καταονία), a district in the S. E. part of Cappadocia, to which it was first added under the Romans, with Melitene, which lies E. of it. These two districts form a large and fertile plain, lying between the Anti-Taurus and the Taurus and Amanus, and watered by the river Pyramus. Cataonia had no large towns, but several strong mountain fortresses.

Catarrhactes (Καταῤῥάκτης). 1. (Duden-Soo), a river of Pamphylia, which descends from the mountains of Taurus, in a great broken waterfall (whence its name, fr. καταῤῥήγνυμι), and which, after flowing beneath the earth in two parts of its course, falls into the sea E. of Attalia. — 2. The term is also applied, first by Strabo, to the cataracts of the Nile, which are distinguished as C. Major and C. Minor [NILUS], in which use it must of course be regarded as a common noun, equivalent to the Latin cataracta, but whether derived from the name of the Pamphylian river, or at once from the Greek verb, cannot be determined.

Catelauni. [CATALAUNI.]

Cathaei (Καθαῖοι), a great and warlike people of India intra Gangem, upon whom Alexander made war. Some of the best Orientalists suppose the name to be that, not of a tribe but, of the warrior caste of the Hindoos, the Kshatriyas.

Cătĭlīna, L. Sergĭus, the descendant of an ancient patrician family which had sunk into poverty. His youth and early manhood were stained by every vice and crime. He first appears in history as a zealous partizan of Sulla; and during the horrors of the proscription, he killed, with his own hand, his brother-in-law, Q. Caecilius, a quiet inoffensive man, and put to death by torture M. Marius Gratidianus, the kinsman and fellow-townsman of Cicero. He was suspected of an intrigue with the vestal Fabia, sister of Terentia, and was said and believed to have made away with his first wife and afterwards with his son, in order that he might marry Aurelia Orestilla, who objected to the presence of a grown-up step-child; but notwithstanding this infamy he attained to the dignity of praetor in B. C. 68, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 66, in order to sue for the consulship. The election for 65 was carried by P. Autronius Paetus and P. Cornelius Sulla, both of whom were soon after convicted of bribery, and their places supplied by their competitors and accusers, L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus. Catiline had been disqualified for becoming a candidate, in consequence of an impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Clodius Pulcher, afterwards so celebrated as the enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Autronius and Catiline formed a project, along with Cn. Piso, to murder the new consuls when they entered upon their office upon the 1st of January. This design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, before the whole of the armed agents had assembled. Encouraged rather than disheartened by a failure which had so nearly proved a triumph, Catiline now determined to organize a more extensive conspiracy, in order to overthrow the existing government, and to obtain for himself and his followers all places of power and profit. Having been acquitted in 65 upon his trial for extortion, he was left unfettered to mature his plans. The time was propitious to his schemes. The younger nobility were thoroughly demoralised, with ruined fortunes, and eager for any change which might relieve them from their embarrassments ; the Roman populace were restless and discontented, ready to follow at the bidding of any demagogue ; while many of the veterans of Sulla, who had squandered their ill-gotten wealth, were now anxious for a renewal of those scenes of blood which they had found so profitable. Among such men Catiline soon obtained numerous supporters ; and his great mental and physical powers, which even his enemies admitted, maintained his ascendency over his adherents. The most distinguished men who joined him, and were present at a meeting of the conspirators which he called in June, 64, were P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura, who had been consul in B. C. 71, but having been passed over by the censors, had lost his seat in the senate, which he was now seeking to recover by standing a second time for the praetorship ; C. Cornelius Cethegus, distinguished throughout by his headstrong impetuosity and sanguinary violence ; P. Autronius, spoken of above ; L. Cassius Longinus, at this time a competitor for the consulship ; L. Vargunteius, who had been one of the colleagues of Cicero in the quaestorship, and had subsequently been condemned for bribery ; L. Calpurnius Bestia, tribune elect ; Publius and Servius Sulla, nephews of the dictator ; M. Porcius Laeca, &c. The first object of Catiline was to obtain the consulship for himself and C. Antonius, whose cooperation he confidently anticipated. But in this object he was disappointed : Cicero and Antonius were elected consuls. This disappointment rendered him only more vigorous in the prosecution of his designs ; more adherents were gained, and troops were levied in various parts of Italy, especially in the neighbourhood of Faesulae, under the superintendence of C. Manlius, one of the veteran centurions of Sulla. Meantime, Cicero, the consul, was unrelaxing in his efforts to preserve the state from the threatened danger. Through the agency of Fulvia, the mistress of Curius, one of the conspirators, he became acquainted with every circumstance as soon as it occurred, and was enabled to counteract all the machinations of Catiline. Cicero at the same time gained over his colleague Antonius, by promising him the province of Macedonia. At length Cicero openly accused Catiline, and the senate, now aware of the danger which threatened the state, passed the decree, "that the consuls should take care that the republic received no harm," in virtue of which the consuls were invested for the time being with absolute power, both civil and military. In the consular elections which followed soon afterwards, Catiline was again rejected. On the night of the 6th of November, B. C. 63 he met the ringleaders of the conspiracy at the dwelling of M. Porcius Laeca, and informed them that he had resolved to wait no longer, but at once to proceed to open action. Cicero, informed as usual of these proceedings, summoned the senate on the 8th of November, and there delivered the first of his celebrated orations against Catiline, in which he displayed a most intimate acquaintance with all the proceedings of the conspirators. Catiline, who was present, attempted to justify himself, but scarcely had he commenced when his words were drowned by the shouts of "enemy" and "parricide" which burst from the whole assembly. Finding that he could at present effect nothing at Rome, he quitted the city in the night (8th—9th November), and proceeded to the camp of Manlius, after leaving the chief controul of affairs at Rome in the hands of Lentulus and Cethegus. On the 9th, when the flight of Catiline was known, Cicero delivered his second speech, addressed to the people in the forum, in which he justified his recent conduct. The senate declared Catiline and Manlius public enemies, and soon afterwards Cicero obtained legal evidence of the guilt of the conspirators within the city, through the ambassadors of the Allobroges. These men had been solicited by Lentulus to join the plot, and to induce their own countrymen to take part in the insurrection. They revealed what they had heard to Q. Fabius Sanga, the patron of their state, who in his turn acquainted Cicero. By the instructions of the latter, the ambassadors affected great zeal in the undertaking, and having obtained a written agreement, signed by Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius, they quitted Rome soon after midnight on the 3d of December, but were arrested on the Milvian bridge, by Cicero's order. Cicero instantly summoned the leaders of the conspiracy to his presence, and conducted them to the senate, which was assembled in the temple of Concord (4th of December). He proved the guilt of the conspirators by the testimony of witnesses and their own signatures. They were thereupon consigned to the charge of certain senators. Cicero then summoned the people, and delivered what is called his 3d oration against Catiline, in which he informed them of all that had taken place. On the following day, the nones (5th) of December, the day so frequently referred to by Cicero in after times with pride, the senate was called together to deliberate respecting the punishment of the conspirators. After an animated debate, of which the leading arguments are expressed in the 2 celebrated orations assigned by Sallust to Caesar and to Cato, a decree was passed, that Lentulus and the conspirators should be put to death. The sentence was executed the same night in the prison. Cicero's speech in the debate in the senate is preserved in his 4th oration against Catiline. The consul Antonius was then sent against Catiline, and the decisive battle was fought early in 62. Antonius, however, unwilling to fight against his former associate, gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. Catiline fell in the engagement, after fighting with the most daring valour. — The history of Catiline's conspiracy has been written by Sallust.

Cătĭus, an Epicurean philosopher, a native of Gallia Transpadana (Insuber), composed a treatise in 4 books on the nature of things and on the chief good (de Rerum Natura et de summo Bono); died B. C. 45.

Cătŏ, Dionysĭus, the author of a small work, entitled Disticha de Moribus ad Filium, consisting of a series of sententious moral precepts. Nothing is known of the author or the time when he lived, but many writers place him under the Antonines. The best edition is by Arntzenius, Amsterdam, 1754.

Cătŏ, Porcĭus. 1. M., frequently surnamed Censorius or Censor, also Cato Major, to distinguish him from his great-grandson Cato Uticensis [No. 8]. Cato was born at Tusculum, B. C. 234, and was brought up at his father's farm, situated in the Sabine territory. In 217 he served his first campaign in his 17th year, and during the remaining years of the 2d Punic war, he greatly distinguished himself by his courage and military abilities. In the intervals of war, he returned to his Sabine farm, which he had inherited from his father, and there led the same frugal and simple life, which characterised him to his last days. Encouraged by L. Valerius Flaccus, a young nobleman in the neighbourhood, he went to Rome, and became a candidate for office. He obtained the quaestorship in 204, and served under the proconsul Scipio Africanus in Sicily and Africa. From this time we may date the enmity which Cato always displayed towards Scipio; their habits and views of life were entirely different; and Cato on his return to Rome denounced in the strongest terms the luxury and extravagance of his commander. On his voyage home he is said to have touched at Sardinia, and to have brought the poet Ennius from the island to Italy. In 199 he was aedile, and in 198 praetor; he obtained Sardinia as his province, which he governed with justice and economy. He had now established a reputation for pure morality and strict virtue. In 195 he was consul with his old friend and patron L. Valerius Flaccus. He carried on war in Spain with the greatest success, and received the honour of a triumph on his return to Rome in 194. In 191 he served, under the consul M'. Acilius Glabrio, in the campaign against Antiochus in Greece, and the decisive victory at Thermopylae was mainly owing to Cato. From this time Cato's military career, which had been a brilliant one, appears to have ceased. He now took an active part in civil affairs, and distinguished himself by his vehement opposition to the Roman nobles, who introduced into Rome Greek luxury and refinement. It was especially against the Scipios that his most violent attacks were directed and whom he pursued with the bitterest animosity. He obtained the condemnation of L. Scipio, the conqueror of Antiochus, and compelled his brother P. Scipio to quit Rome in order to avoid the same fate. [Scipio.] In 184 he was elected censor with L. Valerius Flaccus, having been rejected in his application for the office in 189. His censorship was a great epoch in his life. He applied himself strenuously to the duties of his office, regardless of the enemies he was making; but all his efforts to stem the tide of luxury which was now setting in proved unavailing. His strong national prejudices appear to have diminished in force as he grew older and wiser. He applied himself in old age to the study of Greek literature, with which in youth he had no acquaintance, although he was not ignorant of the Greek language. But his conduct continued to be guided by prejudices against classes and nations, whose influence he deemed to be hostile to the simplicity of the old Roman character. He had an antipathy to physicians, because they were mostly Greeks, and therefore unfit to be trusted with Roman lives. When Athens sent Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus as ambassadors to Rome, he recommended the senate to send them from the city an account of the dangerous doctrines taught by Carneades. [Carneades.] Cato retained his bodily and mental vigour in his old age. In the year before his death he was one of the chief instigators of the third Punic war. He had been one of the Roman deputies sent to Africa to arbitrate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, and he was so struck with the flourishing condition of Carthage that on his return home he maintained that Rome would never be safe as long as Carthage was in existence. From this time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were Delenda est Carthago. Very shortly before his death, he made a powerful speech in accusing Galba on account of his cruelty and perfidy in Spain. He died in 149, at the age of 85. — Cato wrote several works, of which only the De Re Rustica has come down to us, though even this work is not exactly in the form in which it proceeded from his pen: it is printed in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae, edited by Gesner (Lips. 1773—4), and Schneider (Lips. 1794—7). His most important work was entitled Origines, but only fragments of it have been preserved. The 1st book contained the history of the Roman kings; the 2d and 3d treated of the origin of the Italian towns, and from these two books the whole work derived its title. The 4th book treated of the first Punic war, the 5th book of the second Punic war, and the 6th and 7th continued the narrative to the year of Cato's death. — 2. M., son of No. 1., by his first wife Licinia, and thence called Licinianus, was distinguished as a jurist. In the war against Perseus, 168, he fought with great bravery under the consul Aemilius Paulus, whose daughter, Aemilia Tertia, he afterwards married. He died when praetor designatus, about 152. — 3. M., son of No. 1, by his second wife Salonia, and thence called Salonianus, was born 154, when his father had completed his 80th year. — 4. M., son of No. 2, consul 118, died in Africa in the same year. — 5. C., also son of No. 2, consul 114, obtained Macedonia as his province, and fought unsuccessfully against the Scordisci. He was accused of extortion in Macedonia, and was sentenced to pay a fine. He afterwards went to Tarraco in Spain, and became a citizen of that town. — 6. M., son of No. 3, tribunus plebis, died when a candidate for the praetorship. — 7. L., also son of No. 3, consul 89, was killed in battle against the Socii. — 8. M., son of No. 6 by Livia, great-grandson of Cato the Censor, and surnamed Uticensis from Utica, the place of his death, was born 95. In early childhood he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus, along with his sister Porcia and the children of his mother by her second husband, Q. Servilius Caepio. In early years he discovered a stern and unyielding character; he applied himself with great zeal to the study of oratory and philosophy, and became a devoted adherent of the Stoic school; and among the profligate nobles of the age he soon became conspicuous for his rigid morality. He served his first campaign as a volunteer, 72, in the servile war of Spartacus, and afterwards, about 67, as tribunus militum in Macedonia. In 65 he was quaestor, when he corrected numerous abuses which had crept into the administration of the treasury. In 63 he was tribune of the plebs, and supported Cicero in proposing that the Catilinarian conspirators should suffer death. [Catilina.] He now became one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party, and opposed with the utmost vehemence the measures of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. In order to get rid of him, he was sent to Cyprus in 58 with the task of uniting the island to the Roman dominions. He returned in 56 and continued to oppose the triumvirs; but all his efforts were vain, and he was rejected when he became a candidate for the praetorship. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), he was entrusted, as propraetor, with the defence of Sicily; but, on the landing of Curio with an overwhelming force, he abandoned the island and joined Pompey in Greece. After Pompey's victory at Dyrrachium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and thus was not present at the battle of Pharsalia (48). After this battle, he set sail for Corcyra, and thence crossed over to Africa, where he joined Metellus Scipio, after a terrible march across the desert. The army wished to be led by Cato; but he yielded the command to the consular Scipio. In opposition to the advice of Cato, Scipio fought with Caesar, and was utterly routed at Thapsus (April 6th, 46). All Africa now, with the exception of Utica, submitted to Caesar. Cato wanted the Romans in Utica to stand a siege; but when he saw that they were inclined to submit, he resolved to die rather than fall alive into the hands of the conqueror. Accordingly, after spending the greater part of the night in perusing Plato's Phaedo several times, he stabbed himself below the breast. In falling he overturned an abacus: his friends, hearing the noise, ran up, found him bathed in blood, and, while he was fainting, dressed his wound. When, however, he recovered feeling, he tore open the bandages, let out his entrails, and expired at the age of 49. — Cato soon became the subject of biography and panegyric. Shortly after his death appeared Cicero's Cato, which provoked Caesar's Anticato. In Lucan the character of Cato is a personification of godlike virtue. In modern times, the closing events of his life have been often dramatised; and few dramas have gained more celebrity than the Cato of Addison. — 9. M., a son of No. 8, fell at the battle of Philippi, 42.

Cătō, Valĕrius, a distinguished grammarian and poet, lost his property in his youth during the usurpation of Sulla. He is usually considered the author of an extant poem in 183 hexameter verses, entitled Dirae. Edited by Putsch, Jena, 1828.

Catti or Chatti, whose name is connected with the old German word cat or cad "war," one of the most important nations of Germany, bounded by the Visurgis (Weser) on the E., the Agri Decumates on the S., and the Rhine on the W., in the modern Hesse and the adjacent countries. They were a branch of the Hermiones, and are first mentioned by Caesar under the erroneous name of Suevi. Although defeated by Drusus, Germanicus, and other Roman generals, they were never completely subjugated by the Romans; and their power was greatly augmented on the decline of the Cherusci. Their capital was MATTIUM.

Cătullus, Valerius, a Roman poet, born at Verona or in its immediate vicinity, B. C. 87. Catullus inherited considerable property from his father, who was the friend of Julius Caesar; but he squandered a great part of it by indulging freely in the pleasures of the metropolis. In order to better his fortunes, he went to Bithynia in the train of the praetor Memmius, but it appears that the speculation was attended with little success. It was probably during this expedition that his brother died in the Troad — a loss which he deplores in the affecting elegy to Hortalus. On his return he continued to reside at Rome or at his country-seats on the promontory of Sirmio and at Tibur. He probably died about B. C. 47. The extant works of Catullus consist of 116 poems, on a variety of topics, and composed in different styles and metres. Some are lyrical, others elegies, others epigrams; while the Nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, in 409 Hexameter lines, is an heroic poem. Some of his poems are translations or imitations from the Greek, as, for instance, his De Coma Berenices, which was taken from Callimachus. In consequence of the intimate acquaintance which Catullus displays with Greek literature and mythology, he was called doctus by Tibullus, Ovid, and others. Catullus adorned all he touched, and his shorter poems are characterised by original invention and felicity of expression. — Editions. By Volpi, Patav. 1710; by Doering, Altona, 1834, 2nd ed.; and by Lachmann, Berol. 1829.

Cătŭlus, Lutātius. 1. C., consul B. C. 242, defeated as proconsul in the following year the Carthaginian fleet off the Aegates islands, and thus brought the first Punic war to a close, 241. — 2. Q., consul 102 with C. Marius IV., and as proconsul next year gained along with Marius a decisive victory over the Cimbri near Vercellae (Vercelli), in the N. of Italy. Catulus claimed the entire honour of this victory, and asserted that Marius did not meet with the enemy till the day was decided; but at Rome the whole merit was given to Marius. Catulus belonged to the aristocratical party; he espoused the cause of Sulla; was included by Marius in the proscription of 87; and as escape was impossible, put an end to his life by the vapours of a charcoal fire. Catulus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and famed for the grace and purity with which he spoke and wrote his own language. He was the author of several orations, of an historical work on his own Consulship and the Cimbric war, and of poems; but all these have perished with the exception of 2 epigrams. — 3. Q., son of No. 2, a distinguished leader of the aristocracy, also won the respect and confidence of the people by his upright character and conduct. Being consul with M. Lepidus in 78, he resisted the efforts of his colleague to abrogate the acts of Sulla, and the following spring he defeated Lepidus in the battle of the Milvian bridge, and forced him to take refuge in Sardinia. He opposed the Gabinian and Manilian laws which conferred extraordinary powers upon Pompey (67 and 66). He was censor with Crassus in 65, and died in 60.

Caturĭges, a Ligurian people in Gallia Narbonensis, near the Cottian Alps: their chief towns were EBURODUNUM, and Caturigae or Catorimagus (Chorges).

Cătus Deciānus, procurator of Britain in the reign of Nero, was by his extortion one of the chief causes of the revolt of the people under Boadicea, A. D. 62. He fled to Gaul.

Cauca (Coca), a town of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis; birth-place of the emperor Theodosius I.

Caucăsĭae Pylae. [CAUCASUS.]

Caucăsus, Caucasii Montes (ὁ Καύκασος, τὸ Καυκάσιον ὄρος, τὰ Καυκάσια ὄρη: Caucasus). 1. A great chain of mountains in Asia, extending W.N.W. and E.S.E. from the E. shore of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea) to the W. shore of the Caspian. Its length is about 700 miles; its greatest breadth 120, its least 60 or 70. Its greatest height exceeds that of the Alps, its loftiest summit (Mt. Elbrooz, nearly in 43° N. lat. and 43° E. long.), being 16,800 feet above the sea, and to the E. of this there are several other summits above the line of perpetual snow, which, in the Caucasus, is from 10,000 to 11,000 feet above the sea. The W. part of the chain is much lower, no summit W. of Mt. Elbrooz rising above the snow line. At both extremities the chain sinks down to low hills. There are two chief passes over the chain, both of which were known to the ancients: the one, between its E. extremity and the Caspian, near Derbent, was called Albaniae and sometimes CASPIAE PYLAE: the other, nearly in the centre of the range, was called Caucasiae Pylae (Pass of Dariel). In ancient times, as is still the case, the Caucasus was inhabited by a great variety of tribes, speaking different languages (Strabo says, at least 70), but all belonging to that family of the human race, which has peopled Europe and W. Asia, and which has obtained the name of Caucasian from the fact that in no other part of the world are such perfect examples of it found, as among the mountaineers of the Caucasus. — That the Greeks had some vague knowledge of the Caucasus in very early times, is proved by the myths respecting Prometheus and the Argonauts, from which it seems that the Caucasus was regarded as at the extremity of the earth, on the border of the river Oceanus. The account which Herodotus gives is good as far as it goes (i. 203); but it was not till the march of Pompey, in the Mithridatic War, extended to the banks of the Cyrus and Araxes and to the foot of the great chain, that means were obtained for that accurate description of the Caucasus which Strabo gives in his 11th book. The country about the E. part of the Caucasus was called ALBANIA: the rest of the chain divided IBERIA and COLCHIS, on the S., from SARMATIA ASIATICA on the N. — 2. When the soldiers of Alexander advanced to that great range of mountains which formed the N. boundary of Ariana, the Paropamisus, they supposed that they had reached the great Caucasian chain at the extremity of the world mentioned by the early poets, and they applied to it the name of Caucasus: afterwards, for the sake of distinction, it was called Caucasus Indicus. [PAROPAMISUS.]

Cauci. [CHAUCI.]

Caucōnes (Καύκωνες), the name of peoples both in Greece and Asia, but whether of the same or different tribes cannot be determined with certainty. The Caucones in the N.W. of Greece, in Elis and Achaia, were supposed by the ancient geographers to be an Arcadian people. The Caucones in the N.W. of Asia Minor are mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans, and are placed in Bithynia and Paphlagonia by the geographers, who regarded them as Pelasgians, though some thought them Scythians.

Caudĭum (Caudīnus), a town in Samnium on the road from Capua to Beneventum. In the neighbourhood were the celebrated Furculae Caudinae, or Caudine Forks, narrow passes in the mountains, where the Roman army surrendered to the Samnites, and was sent under the yoke, B. C. 321: it is now called the valley of Arpaia.

Caulōn or Caulōnĭa (Cauloniata: Castel Vetere), a town in Bruttium, N.E. of Locri, originally called Aulon or Aulonia; founded by the inhabitants of Croton or by the Achaeans; destroyed by Dionysius the elder, who removed its inhabitants to Syracuse and gave its territory to Locri; afterwards rebuilt, but again destroyed in the war with Pyrrhus; rebuilt a third time and destroyed a third time in the 2nd Punic war. It was celebrated for its worship of the Delphian Apollo. Its name is preserved in the hill Caulone in the neighbourhood of Castel Vetere.

Caunus. [BYBLIS.]

Caunus (ἡ Καῦνος: Καύνιος: Kaigues), one of the chief cities of Caria, on its S. coast, a little E. of the mouth of the Calbis, in a very fertile but unhealthy situation. It had a citadel called Imbros, an enclosed harbour for ships of war, and safe roads for merchant vessels. It was founded by the Cretans. Its dried figs (Cauneae ficus) were highly celebrated. The painter Protogenes was born here.

Caurus, the Argestes (Ἀργέστης) of the Greeks, the N.W. wind, is in Italy a stormy wind.

Cavăres, or -i, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, E. of the Rhone, between the Druentia and the Isara.

Cavarīnus, a Senonian, whom Caesar made king of his people, was expelled by his subjects and compelled to fly to Caesar, B. C. 54.

Caÿstrus (Κάϋστρος, Ion. Καΰστρως: Kara Su, i. e. the Black River, or Kuchuk-Meinder, i. e. Little Maeander), a celebrated river of Lydia and Ionia, rising in the Cilbiani M. (the E. part of Tmolus), and flowing between the ranges of Tmolus and Messogis into the Aegean, a little N. W. of Ephesus. To this day it abounds in swans, as it did in Homer's time. The valley of the Caÿstrus is called by Homer "the Asian meadow," and is probably the district to which the name of Asia was first applied. There was an inland town of the same name on its S. bank.

Cebenna Mons or Gebenna (τὸ Κέμμενον ὄρος: Cevennes), mountains in the S. of Gaul, 2000 stadia in length, extending N. as far as Lugdunum and separating the Arverni from the Helvii: Caesar found them in the winter covered with snow 6 feet deep.

Cĕbēs (Κέβης), of Thebes, a disciple and friend of Socrates, was present at the death of his teacher. He wrote 3 philosophical works, one of which, entitled Πίναξ or Table, is extant. This work is an allegorical picture of human life, which is explained by an old man to a circle of youths. The drift of the book is to show, that only the development of our mind and the possession of real virtue can make us happy. Few works have enjoyed a greater popularity. Of the numerous editions the best are by Schweighaüser, Argent. 1806, and by Coraes in his edition of Epictetus, Paris, 1826.

Cebrēnē (Κεβρήνη), a city in the Troad, on M. Ida, which fell into decay when Antigonus transplanted its inhabitants to Alexandria Troas. A little river, which flowed past it, was called Cebren (Κεβρήν), and the surrounding district Cebrenia (Κεβρηνία).

Cecrŏpĭa. [ATHENAE, p. 102, b.]

Cecrops (Κέκροψ), a hero of the Pelasgic race, said to have been the first king of Attica. He was married to Agraulos, daughter of Actaeus, by whom he had a son, Erysichthon, who succeeded him as king of Athens, and 3 daughters, Agraulos, Herse, and Pandrosos. In his reign Poseidon and Athena contended for the possession of Attica, but Cecrops decided in favour of the goddess. [ATHENA.] Cecrops is said to have founded Athens, the citadel of which was called Cecropia after him, to have divided Attica into 12 communities, and to have introduced the first elements of civilized life; he instituted marriage, abolished bloody sacrifices, and taught his subjects how to worship the gods. He is sometimes called διφυής or geminus, an epithet which some explain by his having instituted marriage, while others suppose it to have reference to the legends, in which the upper part of his body was represented as that of a man and the lower part as that of a serpent. The later Greek writers describe Cecrops as a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony of Egyptians into Attica, and thus introduced from Egypt the arts of civilized life; but this account is rejected by some of the ancients themselves, and by the ablest modern critics.

Cecryphalīa (Κεκρυφάλεια), a small island in the Saronic gulf, between Aegina and Epidaurus.

Cedreae (Κεδρέαι or -εῖαι, Κεδρεάτης or -αῖος), a town of Caria, on the Ceramic Gulf.

Cedrēnus, Georgĭus, a Byzantine writer, of whose life nothing is known, the author of an historical work, which begins with the creation of the world, and goes down to A. D. 1057. The last edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1838–39.

Cĕlaenae (Κελαιναί, Κελαινίτης), the greatest city of S. Phrygia, before the rise of its neighbour, Apamea Cibotus, reduced it to insignificance. It lay at the sources of the rivers Maeander and Marsyas. In the midst of it was a citadel built by Xerxes, on a precipitous rock, at the foot of which, in the Agora of the city, the Marsyas took its rise, and near the river's source was a grotto celebrated by tradition as the scene of the punishment of Marsyas by Apollo. Outside of the city was a royal palace, with pleasure-gardens and a great park (παράδεισος) full of game, which was generally the residence of a satrap. The Maeander took its rise in the very palace, and flowed through the park and the city, below which it received the Marsyas.

Cĕlaeno (Κελαινώ). 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, beloved by Poseidon.—2. One of the Harpies. [HARPYIAE.]

Celēïa (Cilly), an important town in the S. E. of Noricum, and a Roman colony with the surname Claudia, was in the middle ages the capital of a Slavonic state called Zellia; hence the modern name of the town, which possesses Roman remains.

Cĕlendĕris (Κελένδερις: Khelindreh), a sea-port town of Cilicia, said to have been founded by Sandarus the Syrian, and afterwards colonized by the Samians.

Cĕler, together with Severus, the architect of Nero's immense palace, the golden house. He and Severus began digging a canal from the lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber.

Cĕler, P. Egnātĭus. [BAREA.]

Celetrum (Kastoria), a town in Macedonia on a peninsula of the Lacus Castoris, probably the same town afterwards called Diocletianopolis.

Cĕleus (Κηλεός), king of Eleusis, husband of Metanīra, and father of Demophon and Triptolemus. He received Demeter with hospitality at Eleusis, when she was wandering in search of her daughter. The goddess, in return, wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and placed him in the fire in order to destroy his mortal parts; but Metanira screamed aloud at the sight, and Demophon was destroyed by the flames. Demeter then bestowed great favours upon Triptolemus. [TRIPTOLEMUS.] Celeus is described as the first priest and his daughters as the first priestesses of Demeter at Eleusis.

Celsa (Velilla Ru., nr. Xelsa), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis on the Iberus, with a stone bridge over this river, and a Roman colony with the name Victrix Julia Celsa.

Celsus. 1. One of the 30 tyrants, usurped the purple in Africa, and was slain on the 7th day of his reign, A. D. 265.—2. An Epicurean philosopher, lived in the time of the Antonines, and was a friend of Lucian. He is supposed to be the same as the Celsus who wrote the work against Christianity called Λόγος ἀληθής, which acquired so much notoriety from the answer written to it by Origen. [ORIGENES.]—3. A. Cornelius Celsus, probably lived under the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He wrote several works, of which only one remains entire, his treatise De Medicina, "On Medicine," in 8 books. The first two books are principally occupied by the consideration of diet, and the general principles of therapeutics and pathology; the remaining books are devoted to the consideration of particular diseases and their treatment; the third and fourth to internal diseases; the fifth and sixth to external diseases, and to pharmaceutical preparations; and the last two to those diseases which more particularly belong to surgery. The work has been much valued from the earliest times to the present day.—Editions. By Milligan, Edinb. 1826; by Ritter and Albers, Colon. ad Rhen. 1835.—4. Julius Celsus, a scholar at Constantinople in the 7th century after Christ, made a recension of the text of Caesar's Commentaries. Many modern writers have attributed to him the life of Caesar, which was in reality written by Petrarch.—5. P. Juventius Celsus, two Roman jurists, father and son, both of whom are cited in the Digest. Very little is known of the elder Celsus. The younger Celsus, who was the more celebrated, lived under Nerva and Trajan, by whom he was highly favoured. He wrote Digesta in 39 books, Epistolae, Quaestiones, and Institutiones in 7 books.—6. P. Marius Celsus, an able general first of Galba and afterwards of Otho. After the defeat of Otho's army at the battle of Bedriacum, Celsus was pardoned by Vitellius, and was allowed by him to enter on the consulship in July (A. D. 69).

Celtae, a powerful race, which occupied a great part of W. Europe. The Greek and Roman writers call them by 3 names, which are probably only variations of one name, namely Celtae (Κελταί, Κελτοί), Galatae (Γαλάται), and Galli (Γάλλοι). Their name was originally given to all the people of N. and W. Europe, who were not Iberians, and it was not till the time of Caesar that the Romans made any distinction between the Celts and the Germans: the name of Celts then began to be confined to the people between the Pyrenees and the Rhine. The Celts belonged to the great Indo-Germanic race, as their language proves. Like the other Indo-Germanic races, they came from the East, and, at a period long antecedent to all historical records, settled in the W. of Europe. The most powerful part of the nation appears to have taken up their abode in the centre of the country called after them GALLIA, between the Garumna in the S. and the Sequana and Matrona in the N. From this country they spread over various parts of Europe, and they appear in early times as a migratory race, ready to abandon their homes, and settle in any district which their swords could win. Besides the Celts in Gallia, there were 8 other different settlements of the nation, which may be distinguished by the following names: — 1. Iberian Celts, who crossed the Pyrenees and settled in Spain. [CELTIBERI.] 2. British Celts, the most ancient inhabitants of Britain. [BRITANNIA.] 3. Belgic Celts, the earliest inhabitants of Gallia Belgica, at a later time much mingled with Germans. 4. Italian Celts, who crossed the Alps at different periods, and eventually occupied the greater part of the N. of Italy, which was called after them GALLIA CISALPINA. 5. Celts in the Alps and on the Danube, namely the Helvetii, Gothini, Osi, Vindelici, Raeti, Norici, and Carni. 6. Illyrian Celts, who, under the name of Scordisci, settled on Mt. Scordus. 7. Macedonian and Thracian Celts, who had remained behind in Macedonia, when the Celts invaded Greece, and who are rarely mentioned. 8. Asiatic Celts, the Tolistobogi, Trocmi and Tectosages, who founded the kingdom of GALATIA. — Some ancient writers divided the Celts into two great races, one consisting of the Celts in the S. and centre of Gaul, in Spain, and in the N. of Italy, who were the proper Celts, and the other consisting of the Celtic tribes on the shores of the Ocean and in the E. as far as Scythia, who were called Gauls: to the latter race the Cimbri belonged, and they are considered by some to be identical with the Cimmerii of the Greeks. This twofold division of the Celts appears to correspond to the two races into which the Celts are at present divided in Great Britain, namely the Gael and the Kymry, who differ in language and customs, the Gael being the inhabitants of Ireland and the N. of Scotland, and the Kymry of Wales. — The Celts are described by the ancient writers as men of large stature, of fair complexion, and with flaxen or red hair. They were brave and warlike, impatient of control and prone to change. They fought with long swords; their first charge in battle was the most formidable, but if firmly resisted, they usually gave way. They were long the terror of the Romans: once they took Rome, and laid it in ashes (B.C. 390). — For details respecting their later history and political organization, see GALLIA.

Celtibēri (Κελτίβηρες), a powerful people in Spain, consisting of Celts, who crossed the Pyrenees at an early period, and became mingled with the Iberians, the original inhabitants of the country. They dwelt chiefly in the central part of Spain, in the highlands which separate the Iberus from the rivers which flow towards the W., and in which the Tagus and the Durius rise. They were divided into various tribes, the AREVACAE, BERONES, and PELENDONES, which were the 3 most important, the LUSONES, BELLI, DITTANI, &c. Their chief towns were SEGOBRIGA, NUMANTIA, BILBILIS, &c. Their country called Celtiberia was mountainous and unproductive. They were a brave and warlike people, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They submitted to Scipio Africanus in the 2nd Punic war, but the oppressions of the Roman governors led them to rebel, and for many years they successfully defied the power of Rome. They were reduced to submission on the capture of Numantia by Scipio Africanus the younger (B. C. 134), but they again took up arms under Sertorius, and it was not till his death (72) that they began to adopt the Roman customs and language.

Celtĭci. 1. A Celtic people in Lusitania between the Tagus and Anas. — 2. A Celtic people in Gallaecia near the promontory Nerium, which was called Celticum after them (C. Finisterre).

Cenaeum (Κηναῖον ἄκρον: Kanaia or Litar), the N.W. promontory of Euboea, opposite Thermopylae, with a temple of Zeus Cenaeus.

Cenchrēae (Κεγχρέαι). 1. The E. harbour of Corinth on the Saronic gulf, important for the trade and commerce with the E. — 2. A town in Argolis, S. of Argos, on the road to Tegea.

Cenomāni, a powerful Gallic people, originally a branch of the AULERCI, crossed the Alps at an early period, and settled in the N. of Italy in the country of Brixia, Verona, and Mantua, and extended N. as far as the confines of Rhaetia. They were at constant feud with the neighbouring tribes of the Insubres, Boii, &c., and hence usually assisted the Romans in their wars with these people.

Censorīnus. 1. One of the 30 tyrants, assumed the purple at Bologna, A. D. 270, but was shortly afterwards put to death by his own soldiers. — 2. Author of a treatise entitled de Die Natali, which treats of the generation of man, of his natal hour, of the influence of the stars and genii upon his career, and discusses the various methods employed for the division and calculation of time. The book is dedicated to Q. Cerellius, and was composed A. D. 238. A fragment de Metris and lost tracts de Accentibus and de Geometria are ascribed to this Censorinus. — Editions. By Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 1743; by Gruber, Noremb. 1805.

Censorīnus, Marcĭus. 1. C., son of C. Marcius Rutilus, first plebeian dictator (B. C. 356), was originally called Rutilus, and was the first member of the family who had the surname Censorinus. He was consul in B. C. 310, and conducted the war in Samnium. He was censor 294, and a second time 265, the only instance in which a person held the office of censor twice. — 2. L., consul 149, the first year of the third Punic war, conducted the war against Carthage with his colleague M'. Manilius. — 3. C., one of the leaders of the Marian party, fought against Sulla in the battle near the Colline gate, was taken prisoner, and put to death by Sulla's order. Censorinus was one of the orators of his time, and versed in Greek literature. — 4. L., a partizan of M. Antony, praetor 43, and consul 39. — 5. C., consul B. C. 8, died in Asia A. D. 2, while in attendance upon C. Caesar, the grandson of Augustus.

Centauri (Κένταυροι), that is, the Bull-killers, were an ancient race, inhabiting Mount Pelion in Thessaly. They led a wild and savage life, and are hence called φῆρες or θῆρες in Homer. In later accounts they were represented as half-horses and half-men. Their origin is variously related. According to the most ancient account Centaurus, the offspring of Ixion and a cloud, begot the Hippocentaurs by mixing with Magnesian mares. From most accounts it would appear that the Centaurs and Hippocentaurs were originally regarded as two distinct classes of beings, although the name of Centaurs is applied to both by ancient as well as modern writers. The Centaurs are particularly celebrated in ancient story for their fight with the Lapithae, which arose at the marriage-feast of Pirithous. This fight is sometimes placed in connexion with a combat of Hercules with the Centaurs. It ended by the Centaurs being expelled from their country, and taking refuge on mount Pindus, on the frontiers of Epirus. Chiron is the most celebrated among the Centaurs. [CHIRON.]

We know that hunting the bull on horseback was a national custom in Thessaly, and that the Thessalians were celebrated riders. Hence may have arisen the fable that the Centaurs were half-men and half-horses, just as the Americans, when they first saw a Spaniard on horseback, believed horse and man to be one being. The Centaurs were frequently represented in ancient works of art, and generally, as men from the head to the loins, while the remainder of the body is that of a horse with its 4 feet and tail.

Centrītes (Κεντρίτης: Bedlis), a small river of Armenia, which it divided from the land of the Carduchi, N. of Assyria. It rises in the mountains S. of the Arsissa Palus (L. Van), and flows into the Tigris.

Centumălus, Fulvius. 1. Cn., legate of the dictator M. Valerius Corvus B.C. 301; consul 298, when he gained a victory over the Samnites; and propraetor 295, when he defeated the Etruscans. — 2. Cn., consul 229, defeated the Illyrians subject to the queen Teuta. — 3. Cn., curule aedile 214; praetor 213, with Suessula as his province; and consul 211; in the next year he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonia in Apulia, and was killed in the battle. — 4. M., praetor urbanus 192, superintended the preparations for the war against Antiochus the Great.

Centum Cellae (Civita Vecchia), a sea-port town in Etruria, first became a place of importance under Trajan, who built a villa here and constructed an excellent harbour. It was destroyed by the Saracens in the 9th century, but was rebuilt on its ancient site, and was hence called Civita Vecchia.

Centŭrĭpae (τὰ Κεντόριπα, αἱ Κεντούριπαι: Κεντοριπῖνος, in Thuc. οἱ Κεντόριπες, Centuripīnus: Centorbi), an ancient town of the Siculi in Sicily, at the foot of Mt. Aetna, on the road from Catana to Panormus, and not far from the river Symaethus; in its neighbourhood a great quantity of corn was grown, and it became under the Romans one of the most flourishing cities in the island.

Cĕōs (Κέως, Ion. Κέος: Κεῖος, Ion. Κήϊος, Cēus: Zea), an island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Cyclades, between the Attic promontory Sunium and the island Cythnus, celebrated for its fertile soil and its genial climate. It was inhabited by Ionians, and originally contained 4 towns, Iūlis, Carthaea, Coressus, and Poeëessa; but the two latter perished by an earthquake. Simonides was a native of Iulis in Ceos, whence we read of the Ceae munera neniae. (Hor. Carm. ii. 1. 38.)

Cĕphălē (Κεφαλή), an Attic demus, on the right bank of the Erasinus, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Cĕphallēnĭa (Κεφαλληνία, Κεφαληνία: Κεφαλλήν, pl. Κεφαλλῆνες: Cephalonia), called by Homer Same (Σάμη) or Samos (Σάμος), the largest island in the Ionian sea, separated from Ithaca on the E. by a narrow channel, contains 348 square miles. It is said to have been originally inhabited by Taphians, and to have derived its name from the mythical Cephalus. Even in Homer its inhabitants are called Cephallenes, and are the subjects of Ulysses: but the name Cephallenia first occurs in Herodotus. The island is very mountainous (παιπαλοέσσῃ); and the highest mountain, called Aenos, on which stood a temple of Zeus, rises more than 4000 feet above the sea. Cephallenia was a tetrapolis, containing the 4 towns, Same, Pale, Cranii, and Proni. It never attained political importance. In the Persian wars the inhabitants of Pale are alone mentioned. In the Peloponnesian war Cephallenia surrendered to the Athenians. Same ventured to oppose the Romans, but was taken by M. Fulvius, B.C. 189. In modern times the island was for a long while in possession of the Venetians, but is now one of the 7 Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain.

Cĕphăloedĭum (Κεφαλοίδιον: Cephaloeditānus; Cefali or Cephalu), a town on the N. coast of Sicily in the territory of Himera.

Cĕphălus (Κέφαλος). 1. Son of Hermes and Herse, was carried off by Eos (Aurora), who became by him the mother of Tithonus in Syria. — 2. Son of Deion and Diomede, and husband of Procris or Procne, daughter of Erechtheus, whom he tenderly loved. He was beloved by Eos, but as he rejected her advances from love to his wife, she advised him to try the fidelity of Procris. The goddess then metamorphosed him into a stranger, and sent him with rich presents to his house. Procris was tempted by the brilliant presents to yield to the stranger, who then discovered himself to be her husband, whereupon she fled in shame to Crete. Artemis made her a present of a dog and a spear, which were never to miss their object, and then sent her back to Cephalus in the disguise of a youth. In order to obtain this dog and spear, Cephalus promised to love the youth, who then made herself known to him as his wife Procris. This led to a reconciliation between them. Procris however still feared the love of Eos, and therefore jealously watched Cephalus when he went out hunting, but on one occasion he killed her by accident with the never-erring spear. A somewhat different version of the same story is given by Ovid. (Met. vii. 685, seq.) Subsequently Cephalus fought with Amphitryon against the Teleboans, upon the conquest of whom he was rewarded with the island which he called after his own name Cephallenia. — 3. A Syracusan, and father of the orator Lysias, came to Athens at the invitation of Pericles. He is one of the speakers in Plato's Republic. — 4. An eminent Athenian orator of the Collytean demus, flourished B.C. 402.

Cĕpheus (Κηφεύς). 1. King of Ethiopia, son of Belus, husband of Cassiepeia, and father of Andromeda, was placed among the stars after his death. — 2. Son of Aleus and Nearea or Cleobule, one of the Argonauts. He was king of Tegea in Arcadia, and perished, with most of his sons, in an expedition against Hercules.

Cĕphīsĭa or Cephissia (Κηφισία more correct than Κηφισσία: Κηφισιεύς: Kivisia), one of the 12 Cecropian towns of Attica, and afterwards a demus belonging to the tribe Erechtheis, N.E. of Athens, on the W. slope of Mt. Pentelicus.

Cĕphīsŏdōrus (Κηφισόδωρος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, flourished B.C. 402. — 2. An Athenian orator, a disciple of Isocrates, wrote an apology for Isocrates against Aristotle, entitled αἱ πρὸς Ἀριστοτέλη ἀντιγραφαί.

Cĕphīsŏdŏtus (Κηφισόδοτος). 1. An Athenian general and orator, is mentioned on various occasions from B.C. 371 to 355. — 2. An Athenian sculptor, whose sister was the first wife of Phocion, flourished 372. He belonged to that younger school of Attic artists, who had abandoned the stern and majestic beauty of Phidias, and adopted a more animated and graceful style.—3. An Athenian sculptor, usually called the Younger, a son of the great Praxiteles, flourished 300.

Cēphisŏphon (Κηφισοφῶν), a friend of Euripides, is said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them.

Cēphīsus or Cephissus (Κηφισός, Κηφισσός). 1. The chief river in Phocis and Boeotia, rises near Lilaea in Phocis, flows through a fertile valley in Phocis and Boeotia, and falls into the lake Copais, which is hence called Cephisis in the Iliad (v. 709). [Copais.]—2. The largest river in Attica, rises in the W. slope of Mt. Pentelicus, and flows past Athens on the W. into the Saronic gulf near Phalerum.—3. There was also a river of this name in Argolis, Salamis, Sicyonia, and Scyros.

Cēr (Κήρ), the personified necessity of death (Κήρ or Κῆρες θανάτοιο). The Κῆρες are described by Homer as formidable, dark, and hateful, because they carry off men to the joyless house of Hades. According to Hesiod, they are the daughters of Nyx (Night) and sisters of the Moerae, and punish men for their crimes.

Cĕrămus (ἡ Κέραμος: Keramo), a Dorian seaport town on the N. side of the Cnidian Chersonesus on the coast of Caria, from which the Ceramic gulf (ὁ Κεραμεικὸς κόλπος: Gulf of Kos, or, Golfo di Stanco) took its name. [Caria.]

Cĕrăsus (Κερασοῦς: Κερασούντιος: nr. Kheresoun), a flourishing colony of Sinope, on the coast of Pontus, at the mouth of a river of the same name; chiefly celebrated as the place from which Europe obtained both the cherry and its name. Lucullus is said to have brought back plants of the cherry with him to Rome, but this refers probably only to some particular sorts, as the Romans seem to have had the tree much earlier.—Cerasus fell into decay after the foundation of Pharnacia (Kheresoun).

Cĕrăta (τὰ Κέρατα), the Horns, a mountain on the frontiers of Attica and Megaris.

Ceraunĭi Montes (Κεραύνια ὄρη: Khimara), a range of mountains extending from the frontier of Illyricum along the coast of Epirus, derived their name from the frequent thunder-storms which occurred among them (κεραυνός). These mountains made the coast of Epirus dangerous to ships. They were also called Acroceraunia, though this name was properly applied to the promontory separating the Adriatic and Ionian seas. The inhabitants of these mountains were called Ceraunii.

Cerbĕrus (Κέρβερος), the dog that guarded the entrance of Hades, is mentioned as early as the Homeric poems, but simply as "the dog," and without the name of Cerberus. (Il. viii. 368, Od. xi. 623.) Hesiod calls him a son of Typhaon and Echidna, and represents him with 50 heads. Later writers describe him as a monster with only 3 heads, with the tail of a serpent and with serpents round his neck. Some poets again call him many-headed or hundred-headed. The den of Cerberus is usually placed on the further side of the Styx, at the spot where Charon landed the shades of the departed.

Cercasōrum, or -us, or -esūra (Κερκάσωρος πόλις, Herod., Κερκέσουρα, Strab.: El-Arkas), a city of Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, at the point where the river divided into its 3 principal branches, the E. or Pelusiac, the W. or Canopic, and the N. between them.

Cercĕtae or -ii (Κερκέται, probably the Circassians), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, beyond the Cimmerian Bosporus, on the E. coast of the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov).

Cercetĭus, a mountain in Thessaly, part of the range of Pindus.

Cercīna and Cercinītis (Κερκίνα, Κερκινῖτις: Karkenah Is., Ramlah and Gherba), 2 low islands off the N. coast of Africa, in the mouth of the Lesser Syrtis, united by a bridge, and possessing a fine harbour. Cercina was the larger, and had on it a town of the same name.

Cercīnē (Κερκίνη: Kara-dagh), a mountain in Macedonia, between the Axius and Strymon, forming the boundary between Sintice and Paeonia.

Cercinītis (Κερκινῖτις), a lake in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Strymon, through which this river flows.

Cercinĭum, a town in Thessaly on the lake Bobeis.

Cerco, Q. Lutātĭus, consul with A. Manlius Torquatus, B. C. 241, in which year the first Punic war was brought to a close by the victory of C. Lutatius Catulus at the Aegates. Cerco, in conjunction with his colleague, subdued the Falisci or people of Falerii, who revolted from the Romans.

Cercōpes (Κέρκωπες), droll and thievish gnomes, robbed Hercules in his sleep, but were taken prisoners by him, and either given to Omphale, or killed, or set free again. Some placed them at Thermopylæ (Herod. vii. 216); but the comic poem Cercopes, which bore the name of Homer, probably placed them at Oechalia in Euboea. Others transferred them to Lydia, or the islands called Pithecusae, which derived their name from the Cercopes who were changed into monkeys by Zeus for having deceived him.

Cercops (Κέρκωψ). 1. One of the oldest Orphic poets, also called a Pythagorean, was the author of an epic poem, "on the descent of Orpheus to Hades."—2. Of Miletus, the contemporary and rival of Hesiod, is said to have been the author of an epic poem called Aegimius, which is also ascribed to Hesiod.

Cercyon (Κερκύων), son of Poseidon or Hephaestus, a cruel tyrant at Eleusis, put to death his daughter Alope, and killed all strangers whom he overcame in wrestling; he was in the end conquered and slain by Theseus.

Cerdylĭum (Κερδύλιον), a small town in Macedonia on the right bank of the Strymon, opposite Amphipolis.

Cĕreālis, Pĕtilĭus, served under Vettius Bolanus, in Britain, A. D. 61; was one of the generals who supported the claim of Vespasian to the empire, 69; suppressed the revolt of Civilis on the Rhine, 70; and was governor of Britain, 71, when he conquered a great part of the Brigantes.

Cereātae, a town of the Hernici in Latium, between Sora and Anagnia.

Cĕrēs. [Demeter.]

Cerilli (Cirella Vecchia), a town in Bruttium on the coast, a little S. of the mouth of the Laus.

Cerinthus (Κήρινθος), a town on the E. coast of Euboea, on the river Budorus.

Cernē (Κέρνη), an island off the W. coast of Africa, to which the Phoenicians appear to have traded. Its position is uncertain, and Strabo even denied its existence.

Ceron, a fountain in Histiaeotis in Thessaly, said to have made all the sheep black which drank of it.

Cerretāni, an Iberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis, inhabited the modern Cerdagne in the Pyrenees, and were subsequently divided into the 2 tribes of the Juliani and Augustani: they were celebrated for their hams.

Cersobleptes (Κερσοβλέπτης), son of Cotys, king of Thrace, on whose death in B. C. 358 he inherited the kingdom in conjunction with Berisades and Amadocus, who were probably his brothers. As an ally of the Athenians Cersobleptes became involved in war with Philip, by whom he was frequently defeated, and was at length reduced to the condition of a tributary, 343.

Cersus (Κέρσος: Merkes), a river of Cilicia, flowing through the Pylae Syro-Ciliciae, into the E. side of the Gulf of Issus.

Certōnium (Κερτόνιον), a town in Mysia, mentioned only by Xenophon (Anab. vii. 8. § 8).

Cervidius Scaevŏla. [SCAEVOLA.]

Cēryx (Κῆρυξ), an Attic hero, son of Hermes and Aglauros, from whom the priestly family of the Ceryces at Athens derived their origin.

Cestrus (Κεστρος: Ak-su), a considerable river of Pamphylia, flowing from the Taurus S.-wards into the Mediterranean. It was navigable in its lower course, at least as far as the city of Perge, which stood on its W. bank, 60 stadia (10 geog. miles) above its mouth.

Cētei (Κήτειοι), a people of Mysia, the old inhabitants of the country about Pergamus, mentioned by Homer (Od. xi. 521). Their name is evidently connected with that of the river CETIUS.

Cethēgus, Cornēlius, an ancient patrician family. They seem to have kept up an old fashion of wearing their arms bare, to which Horace alludes in the words cinctuti Cethegi (Ars Poët. 50); and Lucan (ii. 543) describes the associate of Catiline thus, exsertique manus vesana Cethegi. 1. M., curule aedile and pontifex maximus B. C. 213; praetor 211, when he had the charge of Apulia; censor 209, and consul 204. In the next year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where he defeated Mago, brother of Hannibal. He died 196. His eloquence was rated very high, so that Ennius gave him the name of Suada medulla, and Horace twice refers to him as an ancient authority for the usage of Latin words. (Epist. ii. 2. 116, Ars. Poët. 50.) — 2. C., commanded in Spain as proconsul 200; was aedile 199; consul 197, when he defeated the Insubrians and Cenomanians in Cisalpine Gaul; and censor 194. — 3. P., curule aedile 187, praetor 185, and consul 181. The grave of Numa was discovered in his consulship. — 4. M., consul 160, when he drained a part of the Pontine Marshes. — 5. P., a friend of Marius, proscribed by Sulla, 88, but in 83 went over to Sulla, and was pardoned. — 6. C., one of Catiline's crew, was a profligate from his early youth. When Catiline left Rome, 63, after Cicero's first speech, Cethegus stayed behind under the orders of Lentulus. His charge was to murder the leading senators; but the tardiness of Lentulus prevented anything being done. Cethegus was arrested and condemned to death with the other conspirators.

Cētīus (Κήτειος), a small river of Mysia, flowing from the N. through the district of Elaïtis, and falling into the Caïcus close to Pergamus.

Ceutrōnes or Centrōnes, a people in Gallia Belgica, dependents of the Nervii.

Cēyx (Κήϋξ), king of Trachys, husband of Alcyone. His death is differently related. [ALCYONE.] He was the father of Hippasus, who fell fighting as the ally of Hercules.

Chabōras. [ABORRHAS.]

Chabrīas (Χαβρίας), a celebrated Athenian general. In B. C. 392 he succeeded Iphicrates in the command of the Athenian forces at Corinth. In 388 he assisted Evagoras in Cyprus against the Persians. In 378 he was one of the commanders of the forces sent to the aid of Thebes against Agesilaus, when he adopted for the first time that manœuvre for which he became so celebrated,— ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. A statue was afterwards erected at Athens to Chabrias in this posture. In 376 he gained an important victory off Naxos over the Lacedaemonian fleet under the command of Pollis. In 361 he took the command of the naval force of Tachos, king of Egypt, who was in rebellion against Persia. In 358 he was sent as the Athenian commander in Thrace, but was compelled by Charidemus to make a peace unfavourable to Athens. On the breaking out of the Social war in 357, Chabrias commanded the Athenian fleet. At the siege of Chios he sailed into the harbour before the rest of the fleet, and, when his ship was disabled, he refused to save his life by abandoning it, and fell fighting.

Chaerēa, C. Cassīus, tribune of the praetorian cohorts, formed the conspiracy by which the emperor Caligula was slain, A. D. 41. Chaerea was put to death by Claudius upon his accession.

Chaerēmon (Χαιρήμων). 1. One of the most celebrated of the later tragic poets at Athens, flourished B. C. 380. He is erroneously called a comic poet by some writers. There are 3 epigrams ascribed to Chaeremon in the Greek Anthology. — 2. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, chief librarian of the Alexandrian library, was afterwards called to Rome, and became the preceptor of Nero, in conjunction with Alexander of Aegae. He wrote a history of Egypt, on Hieroglyphics, on Comets, and a grammatical work. Martial (xi. 56) wrote an epigram upon him.

Chaerĕphon (Χαιρεφῶν), a well-known disciple of Socrates, was banished by the Thirty tyrants, and returned to Athens on the restoration of democracy, B. C. 403. He was dead when the trial of Socrates took place, 399.

Chaerōnēa (Χαιρώνεια: Χαιρωνεύς: Capurna), the Homeric Arne according to Pausanias, a town in Boeotia on the Cephisus near the frontier of Phocis, memorable for the defeat of the Athenians and the Boeotians in B.C. 338 by Philip, king of Macedon, and for Sulla's victory over the army of Mithridates, 86. Chaeronea was the birthplace of Plutarch. Several remains of the ancient city are to be seen at Capurna, more particularly a theatre excavated in the rock, an aqueduct, and the marble lion (broken in pieces) which adorned the sepulchre of the Boeotians who fell at the battle of Chaeronea.

Chalaeum (Χάλαιον: Χαλαῖος), a port-town of the Locri Ozolae on the Crissaean gulf, on the frontiers of Phocis.

Chalastra (Χαλάστρα, in Herod. Χαλέστρη: Χαλαστραῖος: Culacia), a town in Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouth of the river Axius.

Chalcē or -ae or -ia (Χάλκη, Χάλκαι, Χαλκία:

Χαλκαῖος or -ίτης: Charki), an island of the Carpathian sea, near Rhodes, with a town of the same name, and a temple of Apollo.

Chalcēdon (Χαλκηδών, more correctly, Καλχηδών: Χαλκηδόνιος: Chalkedon, Grk., Kadi-Kioi, Turk., Ru.), a Greek city of Bithynia, on the coast of the Propontis at the entrance of the Bosporus, nearly opposite to Byzantium, was founded by a colony from Megara in B. C. 685. After a long period of independence (only interrupted by its capture by the Persians and its recovery by the Athenians), it became subject to the kings of Bithynia. and suffered by the transference of most of its inhabitants to the new city of Nicomedia (B. C. 140). The Romans restored its fortifications, and made it the chief city of the province of Bithynia, or Pontica Prima. After various fortunes under the empire, it was entirely destroyed by the Turks. — The fourth oecumenical council of the Church met here, A. D. 451.

Chalcĭdĭcē (Χαλκιδική), a peninsula in Macedonia between the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs, runs out into the sea like a 3-pronged fork, terminating in 3 smaller peninsulas, PALLENE, SITHONIA, and ACTE or ATHOS. It derived its name from Chalcidian colonists. [CHALCIS, No. 1.]

Chalcidĭus, a Platonic philosopher who lived probably in the 6th century of the Christian aera, translated into Latin the Timaeus of Plato, on which he likewise wrote a voluminous commentary. Edited by Meursius, Leyden, 1617, and by Fabricius, Hamburg, 1718, at the end of the 2nd volume of the works of Hippolytus.

Chalcioecus (Χαλκίοικος), "the goddess of the brazen house," a surname of Athena at Sparta, from the brazen temple which she had in that city.

Chalcis (Χαλκίς: Χαλκιδεύς, Chalcidensis). 1. (Egripo or Negroponte), the principal town of Euboea, situated on the narrowest part of the Euripus, and united with the mainland by a bridge. It was a very ancient town, originally inhabited by Abantes or Curetes, and colonized by Attic Ionians under Cothus. Its flourishing condition at an early period is attested by the numerous colonies which it planted in various parts of the Mediterranean. It founded so many cities in the peninsula in Macedonia between the Strymonic and Thermaic gulfs, that the whole peninsula was called Chalcidice. In Italy it founded Cuma and in Sicily Naxos. Chalcis was usually subject to Athens during the greatness of the latter city, and afterwards passed into the hands of the Macedonians, Antiochus, Mithridates, and the Romans. It was a place of great military importance, as it commanded the navigation between the N. and S. of Greece, and hence it was often taken and retaken by the different parties contending for the supremacy in Greece. — The orator Isaeus and the poet Lycophron were born at Chalcis, and Aristotle died here. — 2. A town in Aetolia at the mouth of the Evenus, situated at the foot of the mountain Chalcis, and hence also called Hypochalcis. — 3. (Kinnesrin, Ru.), a city of Syria, in a fruitful plain, near the termination of the river Chalus; the chief city of the district of Chalcidice, which lay to the E. of the Orontes. — 4. A city of Syria on the Belus, in the plain of Marsyas.

Chalcocondyles, or, by contraction, Chalcondyles, Laonicus or Nicolaus, a Byzantine historian, flourished A. D. 1446, and wrote a history of the Turks and of the later period of the Byzantine empire, from the year 1298 down to the conquest of Corinth and the invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Turks in 1463, thus including the capture of Constantinople in 1453. Edited by Fabrot, Paris, 1650.

Chaldaea (Χαλδαία: Χαλδαῖος), in the narrower sense, was a province of Babylonia, about the lower course of the Euphrates, the border of the Arabian Desert, and the head of the Persian Gulf. It was intersected by numerous canals, and was extremely fertile. In a wider sense, the term is applied to the whole of Babylonia, and even to the Babylonian empire, on account of the supremacy which the Chaldaeans acquired at Babylon. [BABYLON.] Xenophon mentions Chaldaeans in the mountains N. of Mesopotamia; and we have other statements respecting this people, from which it is very difficult to deduce a clear view of their early history. The most probable opinion is, that their original seat was in the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, whence they descended into the plains of Mesopotamia and Babylonia. Respecting the Chaldaeans as the ruling class in the Babylonian monarchy, see BABYLON.

Chalus (Χάλος: Koweik), a river of N. Syria, flowing S. past Beroea and Chalcis, and terminating in a marshy lake.

Chălybes (Χάλυβες), a remarkable Asiatic people, about whom we find various statements in the ancient writers. They are generally represented, both in the early poetic legends, and in the historical period, as dwelling on the S. shore of the Black Sea, about Themiscyra and the Thermodon (and probably to a wider extent, for Herodotus clearly mentions them among the nations W. of the Halys), and occupying themselves in the working of iron. Xenophon mentions Chalybes in the mountains on the borders of Armenia and Mesopotamia, who seem to be the same people that he elsewhere calls Chaldaeans; and several of the ancient geographers regarded the Chalybes and Chaldaei as originally the same people.

Chălybon (Χαλυβών: O. T. Helbon), a considerable city of N. Syria, probably the same as BEROEA. The district about it was called Chalybonītis.

Chamaelĕon (Χαμαιλέων), a Peripatetic philosopher of Heraclea on the Pontus, one of the immediate disciples of Aristotle, wrote works on several of the ancient Greek poets, and likewise on philosophical subjects.

Chamāvi, a people in Germany, who were compelled by the Roman conquests to change their abodes several times. They first appear in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, but afterwards migrated E., defeated the Bructeri, and settled between the Weser and the Harz. At a later time they dwelt on the Lower Rhine, and are mentioned as auxiliaries of the Franks.

Chāŏnes (Χάονες), a Pelasgian people, one of the 3 peoples which inhabited EPIRUS, were at an earlier period in possession of the whole of the country, but subsequently dwelt along the coast from the river Thyamis to the Acroceraunian promontory, which district was therefore called Chaonia. By the poets Chaonius is used as equivalent to Epirot.

Chăŏs (Χάος), the vacant and infinite space which existed according to the ancient cosmogonies previous to the creation of the world and out of which the gods, men, and all things arose. Chaos was called the mother of Erebos and Nyx.

Charadra (Χαράδρα: Χαραδραῖος). 1. A town in Phocis on the river Charadrus, situated on an eminence not far from Lilaea. — 2. A town in Epirus, N.W. of Ambracia. — 3. A town in Messenia, built by Pelops.

Charadrus (Χάραδρος). 1. A small river in Phocis, a tributary of the Cephisus. — 2. A small river in Argolis, a tributary of the Inachus. — 3. A small river in Messenia, rises near Oechalia.

Charax (Χάραξ), of Pergamus, an historian, wrote a work in 40 books, called Ἑλληνικά, and another named Χρονικά.

Chărax (Χάραξ, i. e. a palisaded camp: Χαρακηνός), the name of several cities, which took their origin from military stations. The most remarkable of them stood at the mouth of the Tigris. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 4.] There were others, which only need a bare mention, in the Chersonesus Taurica, in N. Media, near Celaenae in Phrygia, in Corsica, and on the Great Syrtis in Africa, and a few more.

Charaxus (Χάραξος) of Mytilene, son of Scamandronymus and brother of Sappho, fell in love with RHODOPIS.

Chărēs (Χάρης). 1. An Athenian general, who for a long series of years contrived by profuse corruption to maintain his influence with the people, in spite of his very disreputable character. In B.C. 367 he was sent to the aid of the Phliasians, who were hard pressed by the Arcadians and Argives, and he succeeded in relieving them. In the Social war, after the death of Chabrias, 356, he had the command of the Athenian fleet along with Iphicrates and Timotheus. His colleagues having refused, in consequence of a storm, to risk an engagement, Chares accused them to the people, and they were recalled. Being now left in the sole command, and being in want of money, he entered into the service of Artabazus, the revolted satrap of Western Asia, but was recalled by the Athenians on the complaint of Artaxerxes III In the Olynthian war, 349, he commanded the mercenaries sent from Athens to the aid of Olynthus. In 340 he commanded the force sent to aid Byzantium against Philip; but he effected nothing, and was accordingly superseded by Phocion. In 338 he was one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Chaeronea. When Alexander invaded Asia in 334, Chares was living at Sigeum; and in 333 he commanded for Darius at Mytilene. — 2. Of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, wrote a history of Alexander in 10 books. — 3. Of Lindus in Rhodes, a statuary in bronze, the favourite pupil of Lysippus, flourished B.C. 290. His chief work was the statue of the Sun, which, under the name of "The Colossus of Rhodes," was celebrated as one of the 7 wonders of the world. Its height was upwards of 105 English feet, it was 12 years in erecting, and cost 300 talents. It stood at the entrance of the harbour of Rhodes, but there is no authority for the statement that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbour. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake 56 years after its erection, B.C. 224. The fragments remained on the ground 923 years, till they were sold by the general of the caliph Othman IV., to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on 900 camels, A.D. 672.

Chăriclēs (Χαρικλῆς). 1. An Athenian demagogue, son of Apollodorus, was one of the commissioners appointed to investigate the affair of the mutilation of the Hermae, B.C. 415; was one of the commanders of the Athenian fleet, 413; and one of the 30 tyrants on the capture of Athens by Lysander, 404. — 2. An eminent physician at Rome, attended the emperor Tiberius.

Chăriclō (Χαρικλώ). 1. A nymph, daughter of Apollo, wife of the centaur Chiron, and mother of Carystus and Ocyroë. — 2. A nymph, wife of Eueres and mother of Tiresias.

Chărīdēmus (Χαρίδημος). 1. Of Oreus in Euboea, of mean origin, became the captain of a band of mercenaries, and served in this capacity under the Athenian generals Iphicrates and Timotheus. He next entered the service of the satrap Artabazus, who had revolted against Artaxerxes III., and subsequently of Cotys, king of Thrace, whose daughter he married. On the murder of Cotys, 358, Charidemus adhered to the cause of his son Cersobleptes, and on behalf of the latter carried on the struggle with the Athenians for the possession of the Chersonesus. In 349 he was appointed by the Athenians commander in the Olynthian war, but next year was superseded and replaced by Chares. — 2. An Athenian, one of the orators whose surrender was required by Alexander in B.C. 335, after the destruction of Thebes, fled to Asia, and took refuge with Darius, by whose orders he was put to death, 333, shortly before the battle of Issus.

Chărĭlāus, or Charillus (Χαρίλαος, Χάριλλος), king of Sparta, son of Polydectes, is said to have received his name from the general joy excited by the justice of his uncle Lycurgus when he placed him, yet a new-born infant, on the royal seat, and bade the Spartans acknowledge him for their king. He carried on war against Argos and Tegea; he was taken prisoner by the Tegeans, but was dismissed without ransom on giving a promise (which he did not keep), that the Spartans should abstain in future from attacking Tegea.

Chăris (Χάρις), the personification of Grace and Beauty. In the Iliad (xviii. 382) Charis is described as the wife of Hephaestus, but in the Odyssey Aphrodite appears as the wife of Hephaestus, from which we may infer, if not the identity of Aphrodite and Charis, at least a close connection in the notions entertained about the 2 divinities. The idea of personified grace and beauty was at an early period divided into a plurality of beings, and even in the Homeric poems the plural Charites occurs several times. — The Charites, called Gratiae by the Romans, are usually described as the daughters of Zeus, and as 3 in number, namely, Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. The names of the Charites sufficiently express their character. They were the goddesses who enhanced the enjoyments of life by refinement and gentleness. They are mostly described as in the service of other divinities, and they lend their grace and beauty to every thing that delights and elevates gods and men. The gentleness and gracefulness which they impart to man's ordinary pleasures are expressed by their moderating the exciting influence of wine (Hor. Carm. iii. 19. 15), and by their accompanying Aphrodite and Eros. Poetry, however, is the art which is especially favoured by them, and hence they are the friends of the Muses, with whom they live together in Olympus. In early times the Charites were represented dressed, but afterwards their figures were always naked: specimens of both representations of the Charites are still extant. They appear unsuspicious maidens in the full bloom of life, and they usually embrace each other.

Charisius. 1. Aurelius Arcadius, a Roman jurist, lived in the reign of Constantine the Great, and wrote 3 works, De Testibus, De Muneribus civilibus, and De Officio Praefecti praetorio, all of which are cited in the Digest.—2. Flavius Sosipater, a Latin grammarian, who flourished A. D. 400, author of a treatise in 5 books, drawn up for the use of his son, entitled Institutiones Grammaticae, which has come down to us in a very imperfect state. Edited by Putschius in Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, Hanov. 1605, and by Lindemann, in Corpus Grammat. Latin. Veterum, Lips. 1840.

Charites. [CHARIS.]

Chariton (Χαρίτων), of Aphrodisias, a town of Caria, the author of a Greek romance, in 8 books, on the Loves of Chaereas and Callirrhoë. The name is probably feigned (from χάρις and Ἀφροδίτη), as the time and position of the author certainly are. He represents himself as the secretary of the orator Athenagoras, evidently referring to the Syracusan orator mentioned by Thucydides (vi. 35, 36) as the political opponent of Hermocrates. Nothing is known respecting the real life or the time of the author; but he probably did not live earlier than the 5th century after Christ. Edited by D'Orville, 3 vols. Amst. 1750, with a valuable commentary; reprinted with additional notes by Beck, Lips. 1783.

Charmande (Χαρμάνδη: nr. Haditha or Hit), a great city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates.

Charmides (Χαρμίδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Glaucon, cousin to Critias, and uncle by the mother's side to Plato, who introduces him in the dialogue which bears his name as a very young man at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. In B. C. 404 he was one of the Ten, and was slain fighting against Thrasybulus at the Piraeus.—2. Called also Charmadas by Cicero, a friend of Philo of Larissa, in conjunction with whom he is said by some to have been the founder of a 4th Academy. He flourished B. C. 100.

Charon (Χάρων). 1. Son of Erebos, conveyed in his boat the shades of the dead across the rivers of the lower world. For this service he was paid with an obolus or danace, which coin was placed in the mouth of every corpse previous to its burial. He is represented as an aged man with a dirty beard and a mean dress.—2. A distinguished Theban, concealed Pelopidas and his fellow-conspirators in his house, when they returned to Thebes with the view of delivering it from the Spartans, B. C. 379.—3. An historian of Lampsacus, flourished B. C. 464, and wrote works on Aethiopia, Persia, Greece, &c., the fragments of which are collected by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1841.

Charondas (Χαρώνδας), a lawgiver of Catana, who legislated for his own and the other cities of Chalcidian origin in Sicily and Italy. His date is uncertain. He is said by some to have been a disciple of Pythagoras; and he must have lived before the time of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, B. C. 494—476, for the Rhegians used the laws of Charondas till they were abolished by Anaxilaus. The latter fact sufficiently refutes the common account that Charondas drew up a code of laws for Thurii, since this city was not founded till 443. A tradition relates that Charondas one day forgot to lay aside his sword before he appeared in the assembly, thereby violating one of his own laws, and that on being reminded of this by a citizen, he exclaimed, "By Zeus, I will establish it," and immediately stabbed himself. The laws of Charondas were probably in verse.

Charops (Χάροψ). 1. A chief among the Epirots, sided with the Romans in their war with Philip V., B. C. 198.—2. A grandson of the above. He received his education at Rome, and after his return to his own country adhered to the Roman cause; but he is represented by Polybius as a monster of cruelty. He died at Brundisium, 157.

Charybdis. [SCYLLA.]

Chasuari, or Chasuarii, or Chattuarii, a people of Germany, allies or dependents of the Cherusci. Their position is uncertain. They dwelt N. of the Chatti; and in later times they appear between the Rhine and the Maas as a part of the Franks.

Chatti. [CATTI.]

Chauci or Cauci, a powerful people in the N.E. of Germany between the Amisia (Ems) and the Albis (Elbe), divided by the Visurgis (Weser), which flowed through their territory into Majores and Minores, the former W. and the latter E. of the river. They are described by Tacitus as the noblest and the justest of the German tribes. They formed an alliance with the Romans A. D. 5, and assisted the latter in their wars against the Cherusci; but this alliance did not last long. They were at war with the Romans in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, but were never subdued. They are mentioned for the last time in the 3rd century, when they devastated Gaul, but their name subsequently became merged in the general name of Saxons.

Chelidon, the mistress of C. Verres, often mentioned by Cicero.

Chelidonis (Χελιδονίς), wife of Cleonymus, to whom she proved unfaithful in consequence of a passion for Acrotatus, son of Areus I.

Chelidoniae Insulae (Χελιδόνιαι νῆσοι: Khelidoni), a group of 5 (Strabo only mentions 3) small islands, surrounded by dangerous shallows, off the promontory called Hiera or Chelidonia (Khelidoni) on the S. coast of Lycia.

Chelonatas (Χελωνάτας: C. Tornese), a promontory in Elis, opposite Zacynthus, the most westerly point of the Peloponnesus.

Chemmis aft. Panopolis (Χέμμις, Πανόπολις: Χεμμίτης: Ekhmim, Ru.), a great city of the Thebais, or Upper Egypt, on the E. bank of the Nile, celebrated for its manufactures of linen, its stone-quarries, and its temples of Pan and Perseus. It was the birthplace of the poet Nonnus.

Chenoboscia (Χηνοβοσκία: Kasees-Said, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, opposite Diospolis Parva.

Cheops (Χέοψ), an early king of Egypt, godless and tyrannical, reigned 50 years, and built the first and largest pyramid by the compulsory labour of his subjects.

Chephren (Χεφρήν), king of Egypt, brother and successor of Cheops, whose example of tyranny he followed, reigned 56 years, and built the second pyramid. The Egyptians so hated the memory of these brothers, that they called the pyramids, not by their names, but by that of Philition, a shepherd who at that time fed his flocks near the place.

Chersĭphron (Χερσίφρων) or Ctesiphon, an architect of Cnossus in Crete, in conjunction with his son Metagenes, built, or commenced building, the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus. He flourished B. C. 560.

Chersŏnēsus (Χερσόνησος, Att. Χεῤῥόνησος), "a land-island," that is, "a peninsula" (from χέρσος "land" and νῆσος "island"). 1. Ch. Thracica (Peninsula of the Dardanelles or of Gallipoli), usually called at Athens "The Chersonesus" without any distinguishing epithet, the narrow slip of land, 420 stadia in length, running between the Hellespont and the Gulf of Melas, and connected with the Thracian mainland by an isthmus, which was fortified by a wall, 36 stadia across, near Cardia. The Chersonese was colonized by the Athenians under Miltiades, the contemporary of Pisistratus. — 2. Taurica or Scythica (Crimea), the peninsula between the Pontus Euxinus, the Cimmerian Bosporus, and the Palus Maeotis, united to the mainland by an isthmus 40 stadia in width. The ancients compared this peninsula with the Peloponnesus both in form and size. It produced a great quantity of corn, which was exported to Athens and other parts of Greece. The E. part of the peninsula was called Τρηχέη or the Rugged (Herod. iv. 99). Respecting the Greek kingdom established in this country see Bosporus. — There was a town on the S. coast of this peninsula called Chersonesus, founded by the inhabitants of the Pontic Heraclēa, and situated on a small peninsula, called ἡ μικρὰ Χερ. to distinguish it from the larger, of which it formed a part. — 3. Cimbrica (Jutland.) See Cimbri. — 4. (C. Chersonisi), a promontory in Argolis between Epidaurus and Troezen. — 5. (Chersoneso), a town in Crete on the Prom. Zephyrium, the harbour of Lyctus in the interior.

Cherusci, the most celebrated of all the tribes of ancient Germany. The limits of their territory cannot be fixed with accuracy, since the ancients did not distinguish between the Cherusci proper and the nations belonging to the league of which the Cherusci were at the head. The Cherusci proper dwelt on both sides of the Visurgis (Weser), and their territories extended to the Harz and the Elbe. They were originally in alliance with the Romans, but they subsequently formed a powerful league of the German tribes for the purpose of expelling the Romans from the country, and under the chief Arminius they destroyed the army of Varus and drove the Romans beyond the Rhine, A. D. 9. In consequence of internal dissensions among the German tribes the Cherusci soon lost their influence. Their neighbours the Catti succeeded to their power.

Chēsĭum (Χήσιον), a promontory of Samos, with a temple of Artemis, who was worshipped here under the surname of Χησίας. Near it was a little river Chesius, flowing past a town of the same name.

Chīlōn (Χείλων, Χίλων), of Lacedaemon, son of Damagetus, and one of the Seven Sages, flourished B. C. 590. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games. The institution of the Ephoralty is erroneously ascribed by some to Chilon.

Chimaera (Χίμαιρα), a fire-breathing monster, the fore part of whose body was that of a lion, the hind part that of a dragon, and the middle that of a goat. According to Hesiod, she was a daughter of Typhaon and Echidna, and had 3 heads, one of each of the 3 animals before mentioned. She made great havoc in Lycia and the surrounding countries, and was at length killed by Bellerophon. Virgil places her together with other monsters at the entrance of Orcus. The origin of the notion of this fire-breathing monster must probably be sought for in the volcano of the name of Chimaera near Phaselis, in Lycia. In the works of art recently discovered in Lycia, we find several representations of the Chimaera in the simple form of a species of lion still occurring in that country.

Chīmĕrĭon, a promontory and harbour of Thesprotia in Epirus.

Chion (Χίων), of Heraclēa on the Pontus, a disciple of Plato, put to death Clearchus, the tyrant of his native town, and was in consequence killed, B. C. 353. There are extant 13 letters which are ascribed to Chion, but which are undoubtedly of later origin. Edited by Coberus, Lips. and Dresd. 1765, and by Orelli, in his edition of Memnon, Lips. 1816.

Chĭŏnē (Χιόνη). 1. Daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, became by Poseidon the mother of Eumolpus. — 2. Daughter of Daedalion, beloved by Apollo and Hermes, gave birth to twins, Autolycus and Philammon, the former a son of Hermes and the latter of Apollo. She was killed by Artemis for having compared her beauty to that of the goddess.

Chionĭdes (Χιωνίδης and Χιονίδης), an Athenian poet of the old comedy, flourished B. C. 460, and was the first poet who gave the Athenian comedy that form which it retained down to the time of Aristophanes.

Chīos (Χίος: Χῖος, Chīus: Grk. Khio, Ital. Scio, Turk. Saki-Andassi, i. e. Mastic-island), one of the largest and most famous islands of the Aegean, lay opposite to the peninsula of Clazomenae, on the coast of Ionia, and was reckoned at 900 stadia (90 geog. miles) in circuit. Its length from N. to S. is about 30 miles, its greatest breadth about 10, and the width of the strait, which divides it from the mainland, about 8. It is said to have borne, in the earliest times, the various names of Aethalia, Macris, and Pityusa, and to have been inhabited by Tyrrhenian Pelasgians and Leleges. It was colonized by the Ionians at the time of their great migration, and became an important member of the Ionian league; but its population was mixt. It remained an independent and powerful maritime state, under a democratic form of government, till the great naval defeat of the Ionian Greeks by the Persians, B. C. 494, after which the Chians, who had taken part in the fight with 100 ships, were subjected to the Persians, and their island was laid waste and their young women carried off into slavery. The battle of Mycale, 479, freed Chios from the Persian yoke, and it became a member of the Athenian league, in which it was for a long time the closest and most favoured ally of Athens; but an unsuccessful attempt to revolt, in 412, led to its conquest and devastation. It recovered its independence, with Cos and Rhodes, in 358, and afterwards shared the fortunes of the other states of Ionia. — Chios is covered with rocky mountains, clothed with the richest vegetation. It was celebrated for its wine, which was among the best known to the ancients, its figs, gum-mastic, and other natural products, also for its marble and pottery, and for the beauty of its women, and the luxurious life of its inhabitants. — Of all the states which aspired to the honour of being the birthplace of Homer, Chios was generally considered by the ancients to have the best claim; and it numbered among its natives the tragedian Ion, the historian Theopompus, the poet Theocritus, and other eminent men. Its chief city, Chios (Khio), stood on the E. side of the island, at the foot of its highest mountain, Pelinaeus: the other principal places in it were Posidium, Phanae, Notium, Elaeus, and Leuconium.

Chīrīsŏphus (Χειρίσοφος), a Lacedaemonian, was sent by the Spartans to aid Cyrus in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, B. C. 401. After the battle of Cunaxa and the subsequent arrest of the Greek generals, Chirisophus was appointed one of the new generals, and in conjunction with Xenophon had the chief conduct of the retreat.

Chīron (Χείρων), the wisest and justest of all the Centaurs, son of Cronos and Philyra, and husband of Naïs or Chariclo, lived on mount Pelion. He was instructed by Apollo and Artemis, and was renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and the art of prophecy. All the most distinguished heroes of Grecian story, as Peleus, Achilles, Diomedes, &c., are described as the pupils of Chiron in these arts. His friendship with Peleus, who was his grandson, is particularly celebrated. Chiron saved him from the other Centaurs, who were on the point of killing him, and he also restored to him the sword which Acastus had concealed. Chiron further informed him in what manner he might gain possession of Thetis, who was destined to marry a mortal. Hercules, too, was his friend; but one of the poisoned arrows of this hero was nevertheless the cause of his death. While fighting with the other Centaurs, one of the poisoned arrows of Hercules struck Chiron, who, although immortal, would not live any longer, and gave his immortality to Prometheus. According to others, Chiron, in looking at one of the arrows, dropped it on his foot, and wounded himself. Zeus placed Chiron among the stars.

Chitōnē (Χιτώνη), a surname of Artemis, derived either from the Attic demus of Chitone, or because the goddess is represented with a short chiton.

Chlŏē (Χλόη), the Blooming, a surname of Demeter as the protectress of the green fields: hence Sophocles (Oed. Col. 1600) calls her Δημήτηρ εὔχλοος.

Chlōris (Χλωρίς). 1. Daughter of the Theban Amphion and Niobe: she and her brother Amyclas were the only children of Niobe not killed by Apollo and Artemis. She is often confounded with No. 2. — 2. Daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, wife of Neleus, king of Pylos, and mother of Nestor. — 3. Wife of Zephyrus, and goddess of flowers, identical with the Roman Flora.

Chŏărēnē (Χοαρηνή), a fertile valley in the W. of Parthia, on the borders of Media, between 2 ranges of the Caspii M.

Chŏaspes (Χοάσπης). 1. (Kerah, or Kara-Su), a river of Susiana, falling into the Tigris. Its water was so pure that the Persian kings used to carry it with them in silver vessels, when on foreign expeditions. It is wrongly identified by some geographers with the EULAEUS. — 2. (Attock), a river in the Paropamisus, falling into the Cophes (Cabul), apparently identical with the Suastus of Ptolemy and the Guraeus of Arrian; and if so the Choes of Arrian is probably the Kama: but the proper naming of these rivers is very difficult.

Choerădes (Χοιράδες), two small rocky islands off the coast of Italy, near Tarentum.

Choerĭlus (Χοιρίλος or Χοίριλλος). 1. Of Athens, a tragic poet, contemporary with Thespis, Phrynichus, and Aeschylus, exhibited tragedies for 40 years, B. C. 523—483, and gained the prize 13 times. — 2. Of Samos, the author of an epic poem on the Persian wars; the chief action of the poem appears to have been the battle of Salamis. He was born about 470, and died at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, consequently not later than 399, which was the last year of Archelaus. — 3. Of Iasos, a worthless epic poet in the train of Alexander the Great, is said to have received from Alexander a gold stater for every verse of his poem. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 232, Art. Poët. 357.)

Choës. [CHOASPES, No. 2.]

Chollidae (Χολλεῖδαι or Χολλίδαι: Χολλείδης -ίδης), a demus in Attica belonging either to the tribe Leontis or Acamantis.

Chōnĭa (Χωνία), the name in early times of a district in the S. of Italy, inhabited by the Chones (Χῶνες), an Oenotrian people, who derived their name from the town of Chone (Χώνη). Chonia appears to have included the S. E. of Lucania and the whole of the E. of Bruttium as far as the promontory Zephyrium.

Chōrasmĭi (Χωράσμιοι), a people of Sogdiana, who inhabited the banks and islands of the lower course of the Oxus. They were a branch of the Sacae or Massagetae.

Chosroes. 1. King of Parthia. [ARSACES XXV.] — 2. King of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

Chrȳsa or -e (Χρύσα, -η), a city on the coast of the Troad, near Thebes, with a temple of Apollo Smintheus; celebrated by Homer, but destroyed at an early period, and succeeded by another city of the same name, on a height further from the sea, near Hamaxitos. This second city fell into decay in consequence of the removal of its inhabitants to ALEXANDRIA TROAS.

Chrysantas (Χρυσάντας), described by Xenophon in the Cyropaedīa as a brave and wise Persian, high in the favour of Cyrus, who rewarded him with the satrapy of Lydia and Ionia.

Chrysāor (Χρυσάωρ). 1. Son of Poseidon and Medusa, husband of Callirrhoë, and father of Geryones and Echidna. — 2. The god with the golden sword, a surname of several divinities, as Apollo, Artemis, and Demeter.

Chrysas (Χρύσας), a small river in Sicily, an affluent of the Symaethus, was worshipped as a god in Assorus, in the neighbourhood of which there was a Fanum Chrysae.

Chrȳsēis (Χρυσηΐς), daughter of Chryses, priest of Apollo at Chryse, was taken prisoner by Achilles at the capture of Lyrnessus or the Hypoplacian Thebe. In the distribution of the booty she was given to Agamemnon. Her father Chryses came to the camp of the Greeks to solicit her ransom, but was repulsed by Agamemnon with harsh words. Thereupon Apollo sent a plague into the camp of the Greeks, and Agamemnon was obliged to restore her to her father to appease the anger of the god. Her proper name was Astynome.

Chrȳsēs. [CHRYSEIS.]

Chrȳsippus (Χρύσιππος). 1. Son of Pelops and Axioche, was hated by his step-mother Hippodamīa, who induced her sons Atreus and Thyestes to kill him. — 2. A Stoic philosopher, son of Apollonius of Tarsus, born at Soli in Cilicia, B. C. 280. When young, he lost his paternal property, and went to Athens, where he became the disciple of the Stoic Cleanthes. Disliking the Academic scepticism, he became one of the most strenuous supporters of the principle, that knowledge is attainable and may be established on certain foundations. Hence, though not the founder of the Stoic school, he was the first person who based its doctrines on a plausible system of reasoning, so that it was said, "if Chrysippus had not existed, the Porch could not have been." He died 207, aged 73. He possessed great acuteness and sagacity, and his industry was so great, that he is said to have seldom written less than 500 lines a-day, and to have left behind him 705 works. — 3. Of Cnidos, a physician, sometimes confounded with the Stoic philosopher, but he lived about a century earlier. He was son of Erineus, and pupil of Eudoxus of Cnidos: his works, which are not now extant, are quoted by Galen.

Chrȳsŏcĕras, the "Golden Horn," the promontory on which part of Constantinople was built.

Chrysŏgŏnus, L. Cornelĭus, a favourite freedman of Sulla, and a man of profligate character, was the false accuser of Sex. Roscius, whom Cicero defended, B. C. 80.

Chrȳsŏpŏlis (Χρυσόπολις: Scutari), a fortified place on the Bosporus, opposite to Byzantium, at the spot where the Bosporus was generally crossed. It was originally the port of Chalcedon.

Chrysorrhŏas (Χρυσοῤῥόας: Barrada), also called Bardines, a river of Coele-Syria, flowing from the E. side of Anti-Libanus, past Damascus, into a lake now called Bahr-el-Merj.

Chrysostŏmus, Joannes (Χρυσόστομος, golden-mouthed, so surnamed from the power of his eloquence), usually called St. Chrysostom, was born at Antioch, of a noble family, A. D. 347. He received instruction in eloquence from Libanius; and after being ordained deacon (381) and presbyter (386) at Antioch, he became so celebrated as a preacher that he was chosen archbishop of Constantinople, on the death of Nectarius, 397. Chrysostom soon gave great offence at Constantinople by the simplicity of his mode of living, by the sternness with which he rebuked the immorality of the higher classes, and by the severity which he showed to the worldly-minded monks and clergy. Among his enemies was the empress Eudoxia; and they availed themselves of a dispute which had arisen between Chrysostom and Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, to accuse Chrysostom of Origenism, and to obtain his deposition by a synod held at Chalcedon in 403. But the same causes which had brought on Chrysostom the hatred of the higher orders had made him the idol of the people. A few days after he had left the city an earthquake happened, which the enraged people considered as a proof of the divine anger at his banishment. Eudoxia, fearing a popular insurrection, recalled him, but 2 months after his return he again excited the anger of the empress, and was banished a second time to the desolate town of Cucusus, on the borders of Isauria and Cilicia. He met with much sympathy from other churches, and his cause was advocated by Innocent, bishop of Rome; but all this excited jealousy at Constantinople, and he was ordered to be removed to Pityus in Pontus. He died on the journey at Comana in Pontus, 407, in the 60th year of his age. His bones were brought back to Constantinople in 438, and he received the honour of canonization. His works are most voluminous. They consist of: 1. Homilies, Sermons on different parts of Scripture and points of doctrine and practice. 2. Commentaries on the Scriptures. 3. Epistles. 4. Treatises on various subjects, e. g. the Priesthood, Providence, &c. 5. Liturgies. The best edition of his works is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1718–38, 13 vols. fo.

Chthŏnĭus (Χθόνιος) and Chthŏnĭa (Χθόνια), epithets of the gods and goddesses of the lower world (from χθών, "the earth,") as Hades, Hecate, Demeter, Persephone, &c.

Chytri (Χύτροι). 1. (Chytri), a town in Cyprus on the road from Cerynia to Salamis. — 2. Warm springs at Salamis.

Ciăca, a border fortress of the Romans, in Lesser Armenia.

Cibălae or Cibălis, a town in Pannonia on the lake Hiulcas between the Dravus and Savus, near which Constantine gained a decisive victory over Licinius, A. D. 314: the birth-place of Valentinian and Gratian.

Cibōtus. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 1; APAMEA, No. 3.]

Cibȳra (Κίβυρα: Κιβυράτης: Cibyrāta). 1. Magna (ἡ μεγάλη: Buruz or Arondon ? Ru.), a great city of Phrygia Magna, in the fertile district of Milyas, on the borders of Caria, said to have been founded by the Lydians, but afterwards peopled by the Pisidians. In Strabo's time, 4 native dialects were spoken in it, besides Greek, namely, those of the Lydians, the Pisidians, the Milyae, and the Solymi. Under its native princes, the city ruled over a large district called Cibyrātis (Κιβυρᾶτις), and could send into the field an army of 30,000 men. In B. C. 83, it was added to the Roman empire, and was made the seat of a conventus juridicus. After being nearly destroyed by an earthquake, it was restored by Tiberius, under the names of Caesarea and Civitas Cibyratica. The city was very celebrated for its manufactures, especially in iron. — 2. Parva (Κ. μικρά: Ibura), a city of Pamphylia, on the borders of Cilicia.

C. Cicerēius, secretary of the elder Scipio Africanus, was a candidate for the praetorship, B. C. 174, along with Scipio's son, but resigned in favour of the latter. He was praetor in the following year, and conquered the Corsicans, but was refused a triumph. In 172 and 167 he was one of the ambassadors sent to the Illyrian king, Gentius; and in 168 he dedicated on the Alban mount a temple to Juno Moneta.

Cicĕro, Tullĭus. 1. M., grandfather of the orator, lived at his native town Arpinum, which received the full Roman franchise in B. C. 188. — 2. M., son of No. 1, also lived at Arpinum, and died 64. — 3. L., brother of No. 2, was a friend of M. Antonius the orator. — 4. L., son of No. 3, schoolfellow of the orator, died 68, much regretted by his cousin. — 5. M., the orator, eldest son of No. 2 and Helvia, was born on the 3rd of January, B. C. 106, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. He was educated along with his brother Quintus, and the two brothers displayed such aptitude for learning that his father removed with them to Rome, where they received instruction from the best teachers in the capital. One of their most celebrated teachers was the poet Archias of Antioch. After receiving the manly gown (91) the young Marcus was placed under the care of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, from whom he learnt the principles of jurisprudence. In 89 he served his 1st and only campaign under Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Social war. During the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Cicero identified himself with neither party, but devoted his time to the study of law, philosophy, and rhetoric. He received instruction in philosophy from Phaedrus the Epicurean, Philo, the chief of the New Academy, and Diodotus the Stoic, and in rhetoric from Molo the Rhodian. Having carefully cultivated his powers, Cicero came forward as a pleader in the forum, as soon as tranquillity was restored by the final overthrow of the Marian party. His first extant speech was delivered in 81, when he was 26 years of age, on behalf of P. Quintius. Next year (80) he defended Sex. Roscius of Ameria, charged with parricide by Chrysogonus, a favourite freedman of Sulla. Shortly afterwards (79) Cicero went to Greece, ostensibly for the improvement of his health, which was very delicate, but perhaps because he dreaded the resentment of Sulla. He first went to Athens, where he remained 6 months, studying philosophy under Antiochus of Ascalon, and rhetoric under Demetrius Syrus ; and here he made the acquaintance of Pomponius Atticus, who remained his firm friend to the close of his life. From Athens he passed over to Asia Minor, receiving instruction from the most celebrated rhetoricians in the Greek cities of Asia ; and finally passed some time at Rhodes (78), where he once more placed himself under the care of Molo. After an absence of 2 years, Cicero returned to Rome (77), with his health firmly established and his oratorical powers greatly improved. He again came forward as an orator in the forum, and soon obtained the greatest distinction. His success in the forum paved for him the way to the high offices of state. In 75 he was quaestor in Sicily under Sex. Peducaeus, praetor of Lilybaeum, and discharged the duties of his office with an integrity and impartiality which secured for him the affections of the provincials. He returned to Rome in 74, and for the next 4 years was engaged in pleading causes. In 70 he distinguished himself by the impeachment of VERRES, and in 69 he was curule aedile. In 66 he was praetor, and while holding this office he defended Cluentius in the speech still extant, and delivered his celebrated oration in favour of the Manilian law, which appointed Pompey to the command of the Mithridatic war. Two years afterwards he gained the great object of his ambition, and although a novus homo was elected consul with C. Antonius as a colleague. He entered upon the office on the 1st of January, 63. Hitherto Cicero had taken little part in the political struggles of his time. As far as he had interfered in public affairs, he had sided with the popular party, which had raised him to power ; but he appears never to have had any real sympathy with that party ; and as soon as he had gained the highest office in the state he deserted his former friends, and connected himself closely with the aristocracy. The consulship of Cicero was distinguished by the outbreak of the conspiracy of Catiline, which was suppressed and finally crushed by Cicero's prudence and energy. [CATILINA.] For this service Cicero received the highest honours ; he was addressed as "father of his country," and thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods. But as soon as he had laid down the consulship, the friends of the conspirators, who had been condemned to death by the senate, and whose sentence had been carried into execution by Cicero, accused him loudly of having put Roman citizens to death illegally. Cicero had clearly been guilty of a violation of the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, which declared. that no citizen could be put to death until sentenced by the whole body of the people assembled in the comitia. Cicero's enemies were not slow in availing themselves of this vulnerable point. The people, whose cause he had deserted, soon began to show unequivocal signs of resentment against him. Shortly afterwards (62) he mortally offended Clodius by bearing witness against him, when the latter was accused of a violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Clodius vowed deadly vengeance against Cicero. To accomplish his purpose more securely, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family, was then elected tribune of the plebs, and as tribune (58) brought forward a bill, interdicting from fire and water (i. e. banishing) any one who should be found to have put a Roman citizen to death untried. The triumvirs, Caesar. Pompey, and Crassus, left Cicero to his fate ; and despairing of offering any successful opposition to the measure of Clodius, Cicero voluntarily retired from Rome before it was put to the vote, and crossed over to Greece. He took up his residence at Thessalonica in Macedonia. Here he gave way to unmanly despair ; and his letters during this period are filled with groans, sobs, and tears. Meanwhile his friends at Rome had not deserted him ; and, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of Clodius, they obtained his recall from banishment in the course of next year. In August, 57, Cicero landed at Brundisium, and in September he was again at Rome, where he was received with distinguished honour. Taught by experience Cicero would no longer join the senate in opposition to the triumvirs, and retired to a great extent from public life. In 52 he was compelled much against his will to go to the East as governor of Cilicia. Here he distinguished himself by his integrity and impartial administration of justice, but at the same time made himself ridiculous by the absurd vanity which led him to assume the title of imperator and to aspire to the honours of a triumph on account of his subduing some robber tribes in his province. He returned to Italy towards the end of 50, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Rome on the 4th of January 49, just as the civil war between Caesar and Pompey broke out. After long hesitating which side to join, he finally determined to throw in his lot with Pompey, and crossed over to Greece in June. After the battle of Pharsalia (48), Cicero abandoned the Pompeian party and returned to Brundisium, where he lived in the greatest anxiety for many months, dreading the vengeance of Caesar. But his fears were groundless: he was not only pardoned by Caesar, but, when the latter landed at Brundisium in September, 47, he greeted Cicero with the greatest kindness and respect, and allowed him to return to Rome. Cicero now retired into privacy, and during the next 3 or 4 years composed the greater part of his philosophical and rhetorical works. The murder of Caesar on the 15th of March, 44, again brought Cicero into public life. He put himself at the head of the republican party, and in his Philippic orations attacked M. Antony with unmeasured vehemence. But this proved his ruin. On the formation of the triumvirate between Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus (27th of November, 43), Cicero's name was in the list of the proscribed. Cicero was warned of his danger while at his Tusculan villa, and embarked at Antium, intending to escape by sea, but was driven by stress of weather to Circeii, from whence he coasted along to Formiae, where he landed at his villa. From Formiae his attendants carried him in a litter towards the shore, but were overtaken by the soldiers before they could reach the coast. They were ready to defend their master with their lives, but Cicero commanded them to desist, and stretching forward called upon his executioners to strike. They instantly cut off his head and hands, which were conveyed to Rome, and, by the orders of Antony, nailed to the Rostra. Cicero perished on the 7th of December, 43, and at the time of his death had nearly completed his 64th year. — By his first wife Terentia Cicero had 2 children, a daughter TULLIA, whose death in 45 caused him the greatest sorrow, and a son Marcus. [No. 7.] His wife Terentia, to whom he had been united for 30 years, he divorced in 46, in consequence, it would appear, of some disputes connected with pecuniary transactions; and soon afterwards he married a young and wealthy maiden, PUBLILIA, his ward, but, as might have been anticipated, found little comfort in this new alliance, which was speedily dissolved. — As a statesman and a citizen Cicero cannot command our respect. He did good service to his country by the suppression of the conspiracy of Catiline; but this was almost the only occasion on which he showed vigour and decision of character. His own letters condemn him. In them his inordinate vanity, pusillanimity, and political tergiversation, appear in the clearest colours. — It is as an author that Cicero deserves the highest praise. In his works the Latin language appears in the greatest perfection. They may be divided into the following subjects.—I. Rhetorical Works. 1. Rhetoricorum s. De Inventione Rhetorica Libri II. This appears to have been the earliest of Cicero's prose works. It was intended to exhibit in a systematic form all that was most valuable in the works of the Greek rhetoricians, but it was never completed. — 2. De Partitione Oratoria Dialogus. A catechism of Rhetoric, according to the method of the middle Academy, by way of question and answer, drawn up by Cicero for the instruction of his son Marcus, written in 46. — 3. De Oratore ad Quintum Fratrem Libri III. A systematic work on the art of Oratory, written in 55 at the request of his brother Quintus. This is the most perfect of Cicero's rhetorical works. Best edition by Ellendt, Regiomont. 1840. — 4. Brutus s. De Claris Oratoribus. It contains a critical history of Roman eloquence, from the earliest times down to Hortensius inclusive. Editions by Meyer, Halae, 1838, and by Ellendt, Regiomont. 1844. — 5. Ad M. Brutum Orator, in which Cicero gives his views of a faultless orator: written 45. Edited by Meyer, Lips. 1827. — 6. De Optimo Genere Oratorum. An introduction to Cicero's translation of the orations of Aeschines and Demosthenes in the case of Ctesiphon: the translation itself has been lost. — 7. Topica ad C. Trebatium. An abstract of the Topics of Aristotle, illustrated by examples derived chiefly from Roman law instead of from Greek philosophy: it was written in July 44. — 8. Rhetoricorum ad C. Herennium Libri IV. The author of this work is uncertain, but it was certainly not written by Cicero. — II. Philosophical Works. I. POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. — 1. De Republica Libri VI. A work on the best form of government and the duty of the citizen, in the form of a dialogue, founded on the Republic of Plato; written in 54. This work disappeared in the 10th or 11th century of our aera with the exception of the episode of the Somnium Scipionis, which had been preserved by Macrobius; but in 1822, Angelo Mai found among the Palimpsests in the Vatican a portion of the lost treasure. Thus the greater part of the 1st and 2nd books and a few fragments of the others were discovered. Editions by Mai, Rome, 1822, and by Creuzer and Moser, Frankf. 1826. — 2. De Legibus Libri III. A dialogue, founded on the Laws of Plato; probably written 52. A portion of the 3 books is lost, and it originally consisted of a greater number. Edited by Moser and Creuzer, Frankf. 1824, and by Bake, Lugd. Bat. 1842. — II. PHILOSOPHY OF MORALS. 1. De Officiis Libri III. Written in 44 for the use of his son Marcus, at that time residing at Athens. The first 2 books were chiefly taken from Panaetius, and the 3rd book was founded upon the work of the Stoic Hecato; but the illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature. Edited by Beier, Lips. 1820—1821, 2 vols. — 2. Cato Major s. De Senectute, addressed to Atticus, and written at the beginning of 44: it points out how the burden of old age may be most easily supported. — 3. Laelius s. De Amicitia, written after the preceding, to which it may be considered as forming a companion: also addressed to Atticus. — 4. De Gloria Libri II., written 44, is now lost, though Petrarch possessed a MS. of the work. — 5. De Consolatione s. De Luctu minuendo, written 45, soon after the death of his daughter Tullia, is also lost. — III. SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. 1. Academicorum Libri II., a treatise upon the Academic philosophy, written 45 Edited by Goerenz, Lips. 1810, and Orelli, Turic. 1827. — 2. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri V. Dedicated to M. Brutus, in which are discussed the opinions of the Epicureans, Stoics, and Peripatetics, on the Supreme Good, that is, the finis, or end, towards which all our thoughts and actions are or ought to be directed. Written in 45. Edited by Otto, Lips. 1831, and by Madvig, Copenhagen, 1839. — 3. Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri V. This work, addressed to M. Brutus, is a series of discussions on various important points of practical philosophy supposed to have been held in the Tusculanum of Cicero. Written in 45. Edited by Kühner, Jenae, 1835, and by Moser, Hannov. 3 vols. 1836—1837. — 4. Paradoxa, 6 favourite Paradoxes of the Stoics explained in familiar language, written early in 46. — 5. Hortensius s. De Philosophia, a dialogue in praise of philosophy, of which fragments only are extant, written in 45. — 6. Timaeus s. De Universo, a translation of Plato's Timaeus, of which we possess a fragment. — IV. THEOLOGY. 1. De Natura Deorum Libri III. An account of the speculations of the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Academicians, on the existence, attributes, and providence of a Divine Being; dedicated to M. Brutus, and written early in 44. Edited by Moser and Creuzer, Lips. 1818. — 2. De Divinatione Libri II., a continuation of the preceding work. It presents the opinions of the different schools of philosophy upon the reality of the science of divination. Written in 44, after the death of Caesar. Edited by Creuzer, Kayser, and Moser, Frankf. 1828. — 3. De Fato Liber Singularis, only a fragment. — III. Orations. The following is a list of Cicero's extant speeches, with the date at which each was delivered. Some account of each oration is given separately with the biography of the person principally concerned. 1. Pro P. Quintio, B.C. 81.—2. Pro Sex. Roscio Amerino, 80. — 3. Pro Q. Roscio Comoedo, 76. — 4. Pro M. Tullio, 71. — 5. In Q. Caecilium, 70. — 6. In Verrem Actio I., 5th August, 70. — 7. In Verrem Actio II. Not delivered. — 8. Pro M. Fonteio, 69. — 9. Pro A. Caecina, 69, probably. — 10. Pro Lege Manilia, 66. — 11. Pro A. Cluentio Avito, 66. — 12. Pro C. Cornelio, 55. — 13. Oratio in Toga Candida, 64. — 14. De Lege Agraria, 3 orations, 63. — 15. Pro C. Rabirio, 63. — 16. In Catilinam, 4 orations, 63. — 17. Pro Murena, 63. — 18. Pro P. Cornelio Sulla, 62. — 19. Pro A. Licinio Archia, 61. — 20. Pro L. Valerio Flacco, 59. — 21. Post Reditum in Senatu, 5th Sept. 57. — 22. Post Reditum ad Quirites, 6th or 7th Sept. 57. — 23. Pro Domo sua ad Pontifices, 29th Sept. 57. — 24. De Haruspicum Responsis, 56. — 25. Pro P. Sextio, 56. — 26. In Vatinium, 56. — 27. Pro M. Caelio Rufo, 56. —28. Pro L. Cornelio Balbo, 56. —29. De Provinciis Consularibus, 56.—30. In L. Pisonem, 55. — 31. Pro Cn. Plancio, 55. — 32. Pro C. Rabirio Postumo, 54. — 33. Pro M. Aemilio Scauro, 54. — 34. Pro T. Annio Milone, 52. — 35. Pro M. Marcello, 47. — 36. Pro Q. Ligario, 46. — 37. Pro Rege Deiotaro, 45. — 38. Orationes Philippicae, 14 orations against M. Antonius, 44 and 43. — IV. Epistles. Cicero during the most important period of his life maintained a close correspondence with Atticus and with a wide circle of literary and political friends and connexions. We now have upwards of 800 letters, undoubtedly genuine, extending over a space of 26 years, and commonly arranged in the following manner: — 1. Epistolarum ad Familiares s. Epistolarum ad Diversos Libri XVI, a series of 426 epistles, commencing with a letter to Pompey, written in 62, and terminating with a letter to Cassius, July 43. They are not placed in chronological order, but those addressed to the same individuals, with their replies, where these exist, are grouped together without reference to the date of the rest. — 2. Epistolarum ad T. Pomponium Atticum Libri XVI, a series of 396 epistles addressed to Atticus, of which 11 were written in 68, 67, 65, and 62, the remainder after the end of 62, and the last in Nov. 44. They are for the most part in chronological order, although dislocations occur here and there. — 3. Epistolarum ad Q. Fratrem Libri III, a series of 29 epistles addressed to his brother, the first written in 59, the last in 54. — 4. We find in most editions Epistolarum ad Brutum Liber, a series of 18 epistles all written after the death of Caesar. To these are added 8 more, first published by Cratander. The genuineness of these 2 books is doubtful. — The most useful edition of Cicero's letters is by Schütz, 6 vols. 8vo., 1809—1812, in which they are arranged in chronological order. — Cicero also wrote a great number of other works on historical and miscellaneous works, all of which are lost. He composed several poems, most of them in his earlier years, but 2 at a later period, containing a history of his consulship, and an account of his exile and recall. A line in one of these poems contained the unlucky jingle so well known to us from Juvenal (x. 122), O fortunatam natam me consule Romam. —The best edition of the collected works of Cicero is by Orelli, Turic. 1826—1837, 9 vols. 8vo., in 13 parts. — 6. Q., brother of the orator, was born about 102, and was educated along with his brother. In 67 he was aedile, in 62 praetor, and for the next 3 years governed Asia as propraetor. He returned to Rome in 58, and warmly exerted himself to procure the recall of his brother from banishment. In 55 he went to Gaul as legatus to Caesar, whose approbation he gained by his military abilities and gallantry: he distinguished himself particularly by the resistance he offered to a vast host of Gauls, who had attacked his camp, when he was stationed for the winter with one legion in the country of the Nervii. In 51 he accompanied his brother as legate to Cilicia; and on the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he joined Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia, he was pardoned by Caesar. He was proscribed by the triumvirs, and was put to death in 43. Quintus wrote several works, which are all lost, with the exception of an address to his brother, entitled De Petitione Consulatus. Quintus was married to Pomponia, sister of Atticus; but, from incompatibility of temper, their union was an unhappy one. — 7. M., only son of the orator and his wife Terentia, was born 65. He accompanied his father to Cilicia, and served in Pompey's army in Greece, although he was then only 16 years of age. In 45 he was sent to Athens to pursue his studies, but there fell into irregular and extravagant habits. On the death of Caesar (44) he joined the republican party, served as military tribune under Brutus in Macedonia, and after the battle of Philippi (42) fled to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. When peace was concluded between the triumvirs and Pompey in 39, Cicero returned to Rome, was favourably received by Octavian, who at length assumed him as his colleague in the consulship. (B. C. 30, from 13th Sept.) By a singular coincidence, the despatch announcing the capture of the fleet of Antony, which was immediately followed by his death, was addressed to the new consul in his official capacity, and thus, says Plutarch, "the divine justice reserved the completion of Antony's punishment for the house of Cicero." — 8. Q., son of No. 6, and of Pomponia, sister of Atticus, was born 66 or 67, and perished with his father in the proscription, 43.

Cichyrus (Κίχυρος), called Ephȳra (Ἐφύρη) in Homer, a town of Thesprotia in Epirus, between the Acherusian lake and the sea.

Cĭcŏnes (Κίκονες), a Thracian people on the Hebrus, and near the coast.

Cicynna (Κίκυννα: Κικυννεύς), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, and afterwards to the tribe Acamantis.

Cĭlĭcĭa (Κιλικία: Κίλιξ, fem. Κίλισσα), a district in the S. E. of Asia Minor, bordering to the E. on Syria, to the N. on Cappadocia and Lycaonia, to the N. W. and W. on Pisidia and Pamphylia. On all sides, except the W., it is enclosed by natural boundaries, namely, the Mediterranean on the S., M. Amanus on the E., and M. Taurus on the N. The W. part of Cilicia is intersected by the offshoots of the Taurus, while in its E. part the mountain chains enclose much larger tracts of level country: and hence arose the division of the country into C. Aspera (K. ἡ τραχεῖα, or τραχειῶτις), and C. Campestris (K. ἡ πεδιάς); the latter was also called Cilicia Propria (ἡ ἰδίως K.). Numerous rivers, among which are the PYRAMUS, SARUS, CYDNUS, CALYCADNUS, and smaller mountain streams, descend from the Taurus. The E. division, through which most of the larger rivers flow, was extremely fertile, and the narrower valleys of Cilicia Aspera contained some rich tracts of land; the latter district was famed for its fine breed of horses. The first inhabitants of the country are supposed to have been of the Syrian race. The mythical story derived their name from Cilix, the son of Agenor, who started, with his brothers Cadmus and Phoenix, for Europe, but stopped short on the coast of Asia Minor, and peopled with his followers the plain of Cilicia. The country remained independent till the time of the Persian Empire, under which it formed a satrapy, but appears to have been still governed by its native princes. Alexander subdued it on his march into Upper Asia; and, after the division of his empire, it formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae: its plains were settled by Greeks, and the old inhabitants were for the most part driven back into the mountains of C. Aspera, where they remained virtually independent, practising robbery by land and piracy by sea, till Pompey drove them from the sea in his war against the pirates, and, having rescued the level country from the power of Tigranes, who had overrun it, he erected it into a Roman province, B. C. 67—66. The mountain country was not made a province till the reign of Vespasian. The people bore a low character among the Greeks and Romans. The Carians, Cappadocians, and Cilicians, were called the 3 bad K's.

Ciliciae Pylae or Portae (αἱ Πύλαι τῆς Κιλικίας: Kolinboghaz), the chief pass between Cappadocia and Cilicia, through the Taurus, on the road from Tyana to Tarsus. This was the way by which Alexander entered Cilicia.

Cilicium Mare (ἡ Κιλικία θάλασσα), the N.E. portion of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Cyprus, as far as the Gulf of Issus.

Cilix (Κίλιξ), son of Agenor and Telephassa, was, with his brothers, Cadmus and Phoenix, sent out by their father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus. Cilix settled in the country called after him Cilicia.

Cilla (Κίλλα), a small town in the Troad, on the river Cilleus, at the foot of M. Cillaeus, in the range of Gargarus, celebrated for its temple of Apollo surnamed Cillaeus. Its foundation was ascribed to Pelops.

Cilnii, a powerful family in the Etruscan town of Arretium, were driven out of their native town in B. C. 301, but were restored by the Romans. The Cilnii were nobles or Lucumones in their state, and some of them in ancient times may have held even the kingly dignity. (Comp. Hor. Carm. i. 1.) The name has been rendered chiefly memorable by C. Cilnius Maecenas. [MAECENAS.]

Cimber, C. Annius, had obtained the praetorship from Caesar, and was one of Antony's supporters, B. C. 43, on which account he is attacked by Cicero. He was charged with having killed his brother, whence Cicero calls him ironically Philadelphus.

Cimber, L. Tillius (not Tullius), a friend of Caesar, who gave him the province of Bithynia, but subsequently one of Caesar's murderers, B. C. 44. On the fatal day, Cimber was foremost in the ranks, under pretence of presenting a petition to Caesar praying for his brother's recall from exile. After the assassination, Cimber went to his province and raised a fleet, with which he rendered service to Cassius and Brutus.

Cimbri, a Celtic people, probably of the same race as the Cymry. [CELTAE.] They appear to have inhabited the peninsula, which was called after them Chersonesus Cimbrica (Jutland), though the greatest uncertainty prevailed among the ancients respecting their original abode. In conjunction with the Teutoni and Ambrones, they migrated S., with their wives and children, towards the close of the 2nd century B. C.; and the whole host is said to have contained 300,000 fighting men. They defeated several Roman armies, and caused the greatest alarm at Rome. In B. C. 113 they defeated the consul Papirius Carbo, near Noreia, and then crossed over into Gaul, which they ravaged in all directions. In 109 they defeated the consul Junius Silanus, in 107 the consul Cassius Longinus, who fell in the battle, and in 105 they gained their most brilliant victory near the Rhone over the united armies of the consul Cn. Mallius and the proconsul Servilius Caepio. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri, fortunately for Rome, marched into Spain, where they remained 2 or 3 years. The Romans meantime had been making preparations to resist their formidable foes, and had placed their troops under the command of Marius. The barbarians returned to Gaul in 102. In that year the Teutoni were defeated and cut to pieces by Marius, near Aquae Sextiae (Aix) in Gaul; and next year (101) the Cimbri and their allies were likewise destroyed by Marius and Catulus, in the decisive battle of the Campi Raudii, near Verona, in the N. of Italy. In the time of Augustus, the Cimbri, who were then a people of no importance, sent an embassy to the emperor.

Ciminus or Ciminius Mons (Monte Cimino, also M. Fogliano), a range of mountains in Etruria, thickly covered with wood (Saltus Ciminius, Silva Ciminia), near a lake of the same name, N.W. of Tarquinii between the Lacus Vulsiniensis and Soracte.

Cimmerii (Κιμμέριοι), the name of a mythical and of a historical people. The mythical Cimmerii, mentioned by Homer, dwelt in the furthest W. on the ocean, enveloped in constant mists and darkness. Later writers sought to localise them, and accordingly placed them either in Italy near the lake Avernus, or in Spain, or in the Tauric Chersonesus. — The historical Cimmerii dwelt on the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov), in the Tauric Chersonesus, and in Asiatic Sarmatia. Driven from their abodes by the Scythians, they passed into Asia Minor on the N. E., and penetrated W. as far as Aeolis and Ionia. They took Sardis B.C. 635 in the reign of Ardys, king of Lydia, but they were expelled from Asia by Alyattes, the grandson of Ardys.

Cimmerius Bosporus. [BOSPORUS.]

Cimolis (Κίμωλις: Cimoli or Argentiere), an island in the Aegaean sea, one of the Cyclades, between Siphnos and Melos, celebrated for its fine white earth, used by fullers for cleaning cloths.

Cīmon (Κίμων). 1. Son of Stesagoras, and father of Miltiades, victor at Marathon, gained 3 Olympic victories with his four-horse chariot, and after his 3rd victory was secretly murdered by order of the sons of Pisistratus. — 2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of the great Miltiades. On the death of his father (B. C. 489), he was imprisoned because he was unable to pay his fine of 50 talents, which was eventually paid by Callias on his marriage with Elpinice, Cimon's sister. Cimon first distinguished himself on the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (480), and after the battle of Plataea was brought forward by Aristides. He frequently commanded the Athenian fleet in their aggressive war against the Persians. His most brilliant success was in 466, when he defeated a large Persian fleet, and on the same day landed and routed their land forces also on the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia. The death of Aristides and the banishment of Themistocles left Cimon without a rival at Athens for some years. But his influence gradually declined as that of Pericles increased. In 461 Cimon marched at the head of some Athenian troops to the assistance of the Spartans, who were hard pressed by their revolted subjects. The Athenians were deeply mortified by the insulting manner in which their offers of assistance were declined, and were enraged with Cimon who had exposed them to this insult. His enemies in consequence succeeded in obtaining his ostracism this year. He was subsequently recalled, in what year is uncertain, and through his intervention a 5 year's truce was made between Athens and Sparta, 450. In 449 the war was renewed with Persia, Cimon received the command, and with 200 ships sailed to Cyprus; here, while besieging Citium, illness or the effects of a wound carried him off. — Cimon was of a cheerful convivial temper; frank and affable in his manners. Having obtained a great fortune by his share of the Persian spoils, he displayed unbounded liberality. His orchards and gardens were thrown open; his fellow demesmen were free daily to his table, and his public bounty verged on ostentation. With the treasure he brought from Asia the S. wall of the citadel was built, and at his own private charge the foundation of the long walls to the Piraeus was laid down. — 3. Of Cleonae, a painter of great renown, flourished about B. C. 460, and appears to have been the first painter of perspective.

Cinădon (Κινάδον), the chief of a conspiracy against the Spartan peers (ὅμοιοι) in the first year of Agesilaus II. (B. C. 398—397.) The plot was discovered, and Cinadon and the other conspirators were put to death.

Cinaethon (Κιναίθων), of Lacedaemon, one of the most fertile of the Cyclic poets, flourished B. C. 765.

Cinăra or Cinărus (Zinara), a small island in the Aegaean sea, E. of Naxos, celebrated for its artichokes (κινάρα).

Cincinnātus, L. Quintĭus, a favourite hero of the old Roman republic, and a model of old Roman frugality and integrity. He lived on his farm, cultivating the land with his own hand. In B. C. 460 he was appointed consul suffectus in the room of P. Valerius. In 458 he was called from the plough to the dictatorship, in order to deliver the Roman consul and army from the perilous position in which they had been placed by the Aequians. He saved the Roman army, defeated the enemy, and, after holding the dictatorship only 16 days, returned to his farm. In 439, at the age of 80, he was a 2nd time appointed dictator to oppose the alleged machinations of Sp. Maelius. — Several of the descendants of Cincinnatus held the consulship and consular tribunate, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Cincĭus Alimentus. [ALIMENTUS.]

Cīneas (Κινέας), a Thessalian, the friend and minister of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He was the most eloquent man of his day, and reminded his hearers of Demosthenes, whom he heard speak in his youth. Pyrrhus prized his persuasive powers so highly, that "the words of Cineas (he was wont to say) had won him more cities than his own arms." The most famous passage in his life is his embassy to Rome, with proposals for peace from Pyrrhus, after the battle of Heraclea (B. C. 280). Cineas spared no arts to gain favour. Thanks to his wonderful memory, on the day after his arrival he was able (we are told) to address all the senators and knights by name. The senate, however, rejected his proposals mainly through the dying eloquence of old App. Claudius Caecus. The ambassador returned and told the king that there was no people like that people, — their city was a temple, their senate an assembly of kings. Two years after (278), when Pyrrhus was about to cross over into Sicily, Cineas was again sent to negotiate peace. He appears to have died in Sicily shortly afterwards.

Cinēsĭas (Κινησίας), a dithyrambic poet of Athens, of no merit, ridiculed by Aristophanes and other comic poets. But he had his revenge; for he succeeded in procuring the abolition of the Choragia, as far as regarded comedy, about B. C. 390.

Cinga (Cinca), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, falls with the Sicoris into the Iberus.

Cingĕtŏrix, a Gaul, one of the first men in the city of the Treviri (Trèves, Trier), attached himself to the Romans, though son-in-law to Indutiomarus, the head of the independent party. When this leader had been put to death by Caesar, he became chief of his native city.

Cingŭlum (Cingulanus: Cingolo), a town in Picenum on a rock, built by Labienus, shortly before the breaking out of the civil war, B. C. 49.

Cinna, Cornēlĭus. 1. L., the famous leader of the popular party during the absence of Sulla in the East. (B. C. 87—84.) In 87 Sulla allowed Cinna to be elected consul with Cn. Octavius, on condition of his taking an oath not to alter the constitution as then existing. But as soon as Sulla had left Italy, he began his endeavour to overpower the senate, and to recall Marius and his party. He was, however, defeated by his colleague Octavius in the forum, was obliged to fly the city, and was deposed by the senate from the consulate. But he soon returned; with the assistance of Marius, who came back to Italy, he collected a powerful army, and laid siege to Rome. The capture of the city, and the massacre of Sulla's friends which followed, more properly belong to the life of MARIUS. For the next 3 years (86, 85, 84) Cinna was consul. In 84 Sulla prepared to return from Greece; and Cinna was slain by his own troops, when he ordered them to cross over from Italy to Greece, where he intended to encounter Sulla.—2. L., son of No. 1., joined M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the constitution of Sulla 78; and on the defeat and death of Lepidus in Sardinia, he went with M. Perperna to join Sertorius in Spain. Caesar procured his recall from exile. He was made praetor by Caesar in 44; but was notwithstanding one of the enemies of the dictator. Though he would not join the conspirators, he approved of their act; and so great was the rage of the mob against him, that they nearly murdered him. See below CINNA, HELVIUS.

Cinna, C. Helvius, a poet of considerable renown, the friend of Catullus. In B. C. 44 he was tribune of the plebs, when he was murdered by the mob, who mistook him for his namesake Cornelius Cinna, though he was at the time walking in Caesar's funeral procession. His principal work was an epic poem entitled Smyrna.

Cinnămus, Joannes (Ἰωάννης Κίνναμος), one of the most distinguished Byzantine historians, lived under the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned A. D. 1143—1180), and wrote the history of this emperor and of his father Calo-Joannes, in 6 books, which have come down to us. Edited by Du Cange, Paris, 1670, fol., and by Meineke, Bonn, 186, 8vo.

Cīnyps or Cīnȳphus (Κίνυψ, Κίνυφος: Wad-Khakan or Kinifo), a small river on the N. coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, forming the E. boundary of the proper territory of the African Tripolis. The district about it was called by the same name, and was famous for its fine-haired goats.

Cinȳras (Κινύρας), son of Apollo, king of Cyprus, and priest of the Paphian Aphrodite, which latter office remained hereditary in his family, the Cinyradae. He was married to Metharne, the daughter of the Cyprian king Pygmalion, by whom he had several children, and among them was Adonis. According to some traditions, he unwittingly begot Adonis by his own daughter Smyrna, and killed himself on discovering the crime he had committed. According to other traditions, he had promised to assist Agamemnon; but as he did not keep his word, he was cursed by Agamemnon, and perished in a contest with Apollo.

Cipus or Cippus, Genŭcĭus, a Roman praetor, on whose head it is said that horns suddenly grew, as he was going out of the gates of the city, and, as the haruspices declared that if he returned to the city he would be king, he imposed voluntary exile upon himself.

Circē (Κίρκη), a mythical sorceress, daughter of Helios (the Sun) by the Oceanid Perse, and sister of Aeëtes, lived in the island of Aeaea. Ulysses tarried a whole year with her, after she had changed several of his companions into pigs. By Ulysses she became the mother of Agrius and Telegonus. The Latin poets relate that she metamorphosed Scylla, and Picus king of the Ausonians.

Circēii (Circeiensis: Circello. and the Ru. Citta Vecchia), an ancient town of Latium on the promontory Circeium, founded by Tarquinius Superbus, never became a place of importance, in consequence of its proximity to the unhealthy Pontine marshes. The oysters caught off Circeii were celebrated. (Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 33; Juv. iv. 140.) Some writers suppose Circe to have resided on this promontory, and that hence it derived its name.

Circēsium (Κιρκήσιον: Kerkesiah), a city of Mesopotamia, on the E. bank of the Euphrates, at the mouth of the Aborrhas: the extreme border fortress of the Roman Empire.

Circus. [ROMA.]

Cirphis (Κίρφις), a town in Phocis, on a mountain of the same name, which is separated by a valley from Parnassus.

Cirrha. [CRISSA.]

Cirta, aft. Constantīna (Constantineh, Ru.), a city of the Massylii in Numidia, 50 Roman miles from the sea; the capital of Syphax, and of Masinissa and his successors. Its position on a height, surrounded by the river Ampsagas, made it almost impregnable, as the Romans found in the Jugurthine, and the French in the Algerine, wars. It was restored by Constantine the Great, in honour of whom it received its later name.

Cisseus (Κισσεύς), a king in Thrace, and father of Theano, or, according to others, of Hecuba, who is hence called Cissēis (Κισσηΐς).

Cissĭa (Κισσία), a very fertile district of Susiana, on the Choaspes. The inhabitants (Κίσσιοι) were a wild free people, resembling the Persians in their manners.

Cissus (Κισσός), a town in Macedonia on a mountain of the same name, S. of Thessalonica, to which latter place its inhabitants were transplanted by Cassander.

Cisthēnē (Κισθήνη). 1. A town on the coast of Mysia, on the promontory of Pyrrha, on the Gulf of Adramyttium.—2. (Castel-Roffo), an island and town on the coast of Lycia.—3. In the mythical geography of Aeschylus (Prom. 799) the "plains of Cisthene" are made the abode of the Gorgons.

Cithaeron (Κιθαιρών; Cithaeron, and its highest summit Elatia), a lofty range of mountains, separated Boeotia from Megaris and Attica. It was covered with wood, abounded in game, and was the scene of several celebrated legends in mythology. It was said to have derived its name from Cithaeron, a mythical king of Boeotia. Its highest summit was sacred to the Cithaeronian Zeus, and here was celebrated the festival called Daedala. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.)

Citharista, a sea-port town (Ceireste), and a promontory (C. d'Aigle) in Gallia Narbonensis, near Massilia.

Cĭtium (Κίτιον: Κιτιεύς). 1. (Nr. Larneca, Ru.), one of the 9 chief towns of Cyprus, with a harbour and salt-works, 200 stadia from Salamis, near the mouth of the Tetius: here Cimon, the celebrated Athenian, died, and Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school, was born.—2. A town in Macedonia, on a mountain Citius, N. W. of Beroea.

Cĭus (Κίος: Κῖος or Κεῖος, Ciānus: Ghio, also Ghemlio and Kemlik), an ancient city in Bithynia, on a bay of the Propontis called Ciānus Sinus, was colonized by the Milesians, and became a place of much commercial importance. It joined the Aetolian league, and was destroyed by Philip III., king of Macedonia; but was rebuilt by Prusias, king of Bithynia, from whom it was called Prusias.

Cĭvīlis, Claudĭus, sometimes called Julĭus, the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, A. D. 69—70. He was of the Batavian royal race, and, like Hannibal and Sertorius, had lost an eye. His brother Julius Paulus was put to death on a false charge of treason by Fonteius Capito (A. D. 67 or 68), who sent Civilis in chains to Nero at Rome, where he was heard and acquitted by Galba.

He was afterwards prefect of a cohort, but under Vitellius he became an object of suspicion to the army, and with difficulty escaped with his life. He vowed vengeance. His countrymen, who were shamefully treated by the officers of Vitellius, were easily induced to revolt, and they were joined by the Canninefates and Frisii. He took up arms under pretence of supporting the cause of Vespasian, and defeated in succession the generals of Vitellius in Gaul and Germany, but he continued in open revolt even after the death of Vitellius. In 70 Civilis gained fresh victories over the Romans, but was at length defeated in the course of the year by Petilius Cerealis, who had been sent into Germany with an immense army. Peace was concluded with the Batavi on terms favourable to the latter, but we do not know what became of Civilis.

Cizăra (Κίζαρα), a mountain fortress in the district of Phazemonitis in Pontus; once a royal residence, but destroyed before Strabo's time.

Cladăus (Κλάδαος or Κλάδεος), a river in Elis, flows into the Alphēus at Olympia.

Clampetĭa, called by the Greeks Lampetia (Λαμπετία, Λαμπέτεια), a town of Bruttium, on the W. coast: in ruins in Pliny's time.

Clănis. 1. (Chiano), a river of Etruria, rises S. of Arretium, forms 2 small lakes near Clusium, W. of lake Trasimenus, and flows into the Tiber E. of Vulsinii. — 2. The more ancient name of the Liris. — 3. (Glan in Steiermark), a river in the Noric Alps.

Clanĭus. [LITERNUS.]

Clărus (ἡ Κλάρος), a small town on the Ionian coast, near Colophon, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Apollo, surnamed Clarius.

Clarus, Sex. Erucĭus, a friend of the younger Pliny, fought under Trajan in the E., and took Seleucia, A. D. 115. — His son Sextus was a patron of literatnre, and was consul under Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146.

Classĭcus, Julĭus, a Trevir, was prefect of an ala of the Treviri in the Roman army under Vitellius, A. D. 69, but afterwards joined Civilis in his rebellion against the Romans. [CIVILIS.]

Clastidĭum (Casteggio or Schiateggio), a fortified town of the Ananes in Gallia Cispadana, not far from the Po, on the road from Dertona to Placentia.

Claterna, a fortified town in Gallia Cispadana, not far from Bononia; its name is retained in the small river Quaderna.

Claudĭa. 1. Quinta, a Roman matron, not a Vestal Virgin, as is frequently stated. When the vessel conveying the image of Cybele from Pessinus to Rome, had stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the Tiber, the soothsayers announced that only a chaste woman could move it. Claudia, who had been accused of incontinency, took hold of the rope, and the vessel forthwith followed her, B.C. 204. — 2. Or Clodia, eldest of the 3 sisters of P. Clodius Pulcher, the enemy of Cicero, married Q. Marcius Rex. — 3. Or Clodia, second sister of P. Clodius, married Q. Metellus Celer, but became infamous for her debaucheries, and was suspected of having poisoned her husband. Cicero in his letters frequently calls her Βοῶπις. — 4. Or Clodia, youngest sister of P. Clodius, married L. Lucullus, to whom she proved unfaithful. All 3 sisters are said to have had incestuous intercourse with their brother Publius.

Claudĭa Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Claudii were of Sabine origin, and came to Rome in B. C. 504, when they were received among the patricians. [CLAUDIUS, No. 1.] They were noted for their pride and haughtiness, their disdain for the laws, and their hatred of the plebeians. They bore various surnames, which are given under CLAUDIUS, with the exception of those with the cognomen NERO, who are better known under the latter name. — The plebeian Claudii were divided into several families, of which the most celebrated was that of MARCELLUS.

Claudĭānus, Claudĭus, the last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. He was a native of Alexandria and removed to Rome, where we find him in A. D. 395. He enjoyed the patronage of the all-powerful Stilicho, by whom he was raised to offices of honour and emolument. A statue was erected to his honour in the Forum of Trajan by Arcadius and Honorius, the inscription on which was discovered at Rome in the 15th century. He also enjoyed the patronage of the empress Serena, through whose interposition he gained a wealthy wife. The last historical allusion in his writings belongs to 404; whence it is supposed that he may have been involved in the misfortunes of Stilicho, who was put to death 408. He was a heathen. His extant works are: — 1. The 3 panegyrics on the 3rd, 4th, and 6th consulships of Honorius. 2. A poem on the nuptials of Honorius and Maria. 3. Four short Fescennine lays on the same subject. 4. A panegyric on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius. 5. The praises of Stilicho, in 2 books, and a panegyric on his consulship, in 1 book. 6. The praises of Serena, the wife of Stilicho. 7. A panegyric on the consulship of Flavius Mallius Theodorus. 8. The Epithalamium of Palladius and Celerina. 9. An invective against Rufinus, in 2 books. 10. An invective against Eutropius, in 2 books. 11. De Bello Gildonico, the first book of an historical poem on the war in Africa against Gildo. 12. De Bello Getico, an historical poem on the successful campaign of Stilicho against Alaric and the Goths, concluding with the battle of Pollentia. 13. Raptus Proserpinae, 3 books of an unfinished epic on the rape of Proserpine. 14. Gigantomachia, a fragment extending to 128 lines only. 15. 5 short epistles. 16. Eidyllia, a collection of 7 poems chiefly on subjects connected with natural history. 17. Epigrammata, a collection of short occasional pieces. — The Christian hymns found among his poems in most editions are certainly spurious. — The poems of Claudian are distinguished by purity of language, and real poetical genius. The best edition is by Burmann, Amst. 1760.

Claudiŏpŏlis (Κλαυδιόπολις), the name of some cities called after the emperor Claudius, the chief of which were: 1. In Bithynia [BITHYNIUM]. 2. A colony in the district of Cataonia, in Cappadocia.

Claudĭus, patrician. See CLAUDIA GENS. — 1. App. Claudĭus Sabīnus Regillensis, a Sabine of the town of Regillum or Regilli, who in his own country bore the name of Attus Clausus, being the advocate of peace with the Romans, when hostilities broke out between the two nations, withdrew with a large train of followers to Rome, B. C. 504. He was received into the ranks of the patricians, and lands beyond the Anio were assigned to his followers, who were formed into a new tribe called the Claudian. He exhibited the characteristics which marked his descendants, and showed the most bitter hatred towards the plebeians. He was consul 495, and his conduct towards the plebeians led to their secession to the Mons Sacer 494. — 2. App. Cl. Sab. Regill., son of No. 1, consul 471, treated the soldiers whom he commanded with such severity, that his troops deserted him. Next year he was impeached by 2 of the tribunes, but, according to the common story, he died or killed himself before the trial. — 3. C. Cl. Sab. Regill., brother of No. 2, consul 460, when App. Herdonius seized the Capitol. Though a staunch supporter of the patricians, he warned the decemvir Appius against an immoderate use of his power. His remonstrances being of no avail, he withdrew to Regillum, but returned to defend Appius when impeached. — 4. App. Cl. Crassus Regill. Sab., the decemvir, commonly considered son of No. 2, but more probably the same person. He was consul 451, and on the appointment of the decemvirs in that year, he became one of them, and was reappointed the following year. His real character now betrayed itself in the most tyrannous conduct towards the plebeians, till his attempt against Virginia led to the overthrow of the decemvirate. App. was impeached by Virginius, but did not live to abide his trial. He either killed himself, or was put to death in prison by order of the tribunes. — 5. App. Claudius Caecus, became blind before his old age. In his censorship (312), to which he was elected without having been consul previously, he built the Appian aqueduct, and commenced the Appian road, which was continued to Capua. He retained the censorship 4 years in opposition to the law which limited the length of the office to 18 months. He was twice consul in 307 and 296; and in the latter year he fought against the Samnites and Etruscans. In his old age, Appius by his eloquent speech induced the senate to reject the terms of peace which Cineas had proposed on behalf of Pyrrhus. Appius was the earliest Roman writer in prose and verse whose name has come down to us. He was the author of a poem known to Cicero through the Greek, and he also wrote a legal treatise, De Usurpationibus. He left 4 sons and 5 daughters. — 6. App. Cl. Caudex, brother of No. 5, derived his surname from his attention to naval affairs. He was consul 264, and conducted the war against the Carthaginians in Sicily. — 7. P. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 5, consul 249, attacked the Carthaginian fleet in the harbour of Drepana, in defiance of the auguries, and was defeated, with the loss of almost all his forces. He was recalled and commanded to appoint a dictator, and thereupon named M. Claudius Glycias or Glicia, the son of a freedman, but the nomination was immediately superseded. He was impeached and condemned. — 8. C. Cl. Centho or Cento, son of No. 5, consul 240, and dictator 213. — 9. Tib. Cl. Nero, son of No. 5. An account of his descendants is given under Nero. — 10. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 7, aedile 217, fought at Cannae 216, and was praetor 215, when he was sent into Sicily. He was consul 212, and died 211 of a wound which he received in a battle with Hannibal before Capua. — 11. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 10, served in Greece for some years under Flamininus, Baebius, and Glabrio (197—191). He was praetor 187 and consul 185, when he gained some advantages over the Ingaunian Ligurians. He was sent as ambassador to Greece 184 and 176. — 12. P. Cl. Pulcher, brother of No. 11, curule aedile 189, praetor 188, and consul 184. — 13. C. Cl. Pulcher, brother of Nos. 11 and 12, praetor 180 and consul 177, when he defeated the Istrians and Ligurians. He was censor 160 with Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. He died 167. — 14. App. Cl. Cento, aedile 178 and praetor 175, when he fought with success against the Celtiberi in Spain. He afterwards served in Thessaly (173), Macedonia (172), and Illyricum (170). — 15. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 11, consul 143, defeated the Salassi, an Alpine tribe. On his return a triumph was refused him; and when one of the tribunes attempted to drag him from his car, his daughter Claudia, one of the Vestal Virgins, walked by his side up to the capitol. He was censor 136. He gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tib. Gracchus, and in 133 with Tib. and C. Gracchus was appointed triumvir for the division of the lands. He died shortly after Tib. Gracchus. — 16. C. Claudius Pulcher, curule aedile 99, praetor in Sicily 95, consul in 92. — 17. App. Cl. Pulcher, consul 79, and afterwards governor of Macedonia. — 18. App. Cl. Pulcher, praetor 89, belonged to Sulla's party, and perished in the great battle before Rome 82. — 19. App. Cl. Pulcher, eldest son of No. 18. In 70 he served in Asia under his brother-in-law, Lucullus; in 57 he was praetor, and though he did not openly oppose Cicero's recall from banishment, he tacitly abetted the proceedings of his brother Publius. In 56 he was propraetor in Sardinia; and in 54 was consul with L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, when a reconciliation was brought about between him and Cicero, through the intervention of Pompey. In 53 he went as proconsul to Cilicia, which he governed with tyranny and rapacity. In 51 he was succeeded in the government by Cicero, whose appointment Appius received with displeasure. On his return to Rome he was impeached by Dolabella, but was acquitted. In 50 he was censor with L. Piso, and expelled several of Caesar's friends from the senate. On the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he fled with Pompey from Italy, and died in Greece before the battle of Pharsalia. He was an augur, and wrote a work on the augural discipline, which he dedicated to Cicero. He was also distinguished for his legal and antiquarian knowledge. — 20. C. Cl. Pulcher, second son of No. 18, was a legatus of Caesar, 58, praetor 56, and propraetor in Asia 55. On his return he was accused of extortion by M. Servilius, who was bribed to drop the prosecution. He died shortly afterwards. — 21. P. Cl. Pulcher, usually called Clodius and not Claudius, the youngest son of No. 18, the notorious enemy of Cicero, and one of the most profligate characters of a profligate age. In 70 he served under his brother-in-law, L. Lucullus in Asia; but displeased at not being treated by Lucullus with the distinction he had expected, he encouraged the soldiers to mutiny. He then betook himself to his other brother-in-law, Q. Marcius Rex, proconsul in Cilicia, and was entrusted by him with the command of the fleet. He fell into the hands of the pirates, who however dismissed him without ransom, through fear of Pompey. He next went to Antioch, and joined the Syrians in making war on the Arabians. On his return to Rome in 65 he impeached Catiline for extortion in his government of Africa, but was bribed by Catiline to let him escape. In 64 he accompanied the propaetor L. Murena to Gallia Transalpina, where he resorted to the most nefarious methods of procuring money.

In 62 he profaned the mysteries of the Bona Dea, which were celebrated by the Roman matrons in the house of Caesar, who was then praetor, by entering the house disguised as a female musician, in order to meet Pompeia, Caesar's wife, with whom he had an intrigue. He was discovered, and next year, 61, when quaestor, was brought to trial, but obtained an acquittal by bribing the judges. He had attempted to prove an alibi, but Cicero's evidence shewed that Clodius was with him in Rome only 3 hours before he pretended to have been at Interamna. Cicero attacked Clodius in the senate with great vehemence. In order to revenge himself upon Cicero, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family that he might obtain the formidable power of a tribune of the plebs. He was tribune 58, and, supported by the triumvirs Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus, drove Cicero into exile; but notwithstanding all his efforts he was unable to prevent the recall of Cicero in the following year. [CICERO.] In 56 Clodius was aedile and attempted to bring his enemy Milo to trial. Each had a large gang of gladiators in his pay, and frequent fights took place in the streets of Rome between the 2 parties. In 53, when Clodius was a candidate for the praetorship, and Milo for the consulship, the contests between them became more violent and desperate than ever. At length, on the 20th of January, 52, Clodius and Milo met, apparently by accident, on the Appian road near Bovillae. An affray ensued between their followers, in which Clodius was murdered. The mob was infuriated at the death of their favourite; and such tumults followed at the burial of Clodius, that Pompey was appointed sole consul in order to restore order to the state. For the proceedings which followed see MILO. The second wife of Clodius was the notorious FULVIA. — 22. App. Cl. Pulcher, the elder son of No. 20, was one of the accusers of Milo on the death of P. Clodius, 52. — 23. App. Cl. Pulcher, brother of No. 21, joined his brother in prosecuting Milo. As the two brothers both bore the praenomen Appius, it is probable that one of them was adopted by their uncle Appius. [No. 19]. — 24. Sex. Clodius, probably a descendant of a freedman of the Claudia gens, was a man of low condition, and the chief instrument of P. Clodius in all his acts of violence. On the death of the latter in 52, he urged on the people to revenge the death of his leader. For his acts of violence on this occasion, he was brought to trial, was condemed, and after remaining in exile 8 years, was restored in 44 by M. Antoninus.

Claudĭus I., Roman emperor A. D. 41—54. His full name was TIB. CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO GERMANICUS. He was the younger son of Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and of Antonia, and was born on August 1st, B. C. 10, at Lyons in Gaul. In youth he was weak and sickly, and was neglected and despised by his relatives. When he grew up he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits, but was not allowed to take any part in public affairs. He had reached the age of 50, when he was suddenly raised by the soldiers to the imperial throne after the murder of Caligula. Claudius was not cruel, but the weakness of his character made him the slave of his wives and freedmen, and thus led him to consent to acts of tyranny which he would never have committed of his own accord. He was married 4 times. At the time of his accession he was married to his 3rd wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, who governed him for some years, together with the freedmen Narcissus, Pallas, and others. After the execution of Messalina, 48, a fate which she richly merited, Claudius was still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece Agrippina. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son, Nero, that she might secure the succession for the latter. Claudius soon after regretted this step, and was in consequence poisoned by Agrippina, 54. — Several public works of great utility were executed by Claudius. He built, for example, the famous Claudian aquaeduct (Aqua Claudia), the port of Ostia, and the emissary by which the water of lake Fucinus was carried into the river Liris. In his reign the southern part of Britain was made a Roman province, and Claudius himself went to Britain in 43, where he remained, however, only a short time, leaving the conduct of the war to his generals. — Claudius wrote several historical works, all of which have perished. Of these one of the most important was a history of Etruria, in the composition of which he made use of genuine Etruscan sources.

Claudĭus II. (M. AURELIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed GOTHICUS), Roman emperor A. D. 268—270, was descended from an obscure family in Dardania or Illyria, and by his military talents rose to distinction under Decius, Valerian, and Gallienus. He succeeded to the empire on the death of Gallienus (268), and soon after his accession defeated the Alemanni in the N. of Italy. Next year he gained a great victory over an immense host of Goths near Naissus in Dardania, and received in consequence the surname Gothicus. He died at Sirmium in 270, and was succeeded by Aurelian.

Clazŏmĕnae (αἱ Κλαζομεναί: Κλαζομένιος: Kelisman), an important city of Asia Minor, and a member of the Ionian Dodecapolis, lay on the N. coast of the Ionian peninsula, upon the gulf of Smyrna. The city was said to have been founded by the Colophonians under Paralus, on the site of the later town of Chytrium, but to have been removed further E., as a defence against the Persians, to a small island, which Alexander afterwards united to the mainland by a causeway. It was one of the weaker members of the Ionian league, and was chiefly peopled, not by Ionians, but by Cleonaeans and Phliasians. Under the Romans it was a free city. It had a considerable commerce, and was celebrated for its temple of Apollo, Artemis, and Cybele, and still more as the birthplace of Anaxagoras.

Clĕander (Κλέανδρος). 1. Tyrant of Gela, reigned 7 years, and was murdered B. C. 498. He was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, one of whose sons was also called Cleander. The latter was deposed by Gelon when he seized the government, 491. — 2. A Lacedaemonian, harmost at Byzantium 400, when the Cyrean Greeks returned from Asia. — 3. One of Alexander's officers, was put to death by Alexander in Carmania, 325, in consequence of his oppressive government in Media. — 4. A Phrygian slave, and subsequently the profligate favourite and minister of Commodus. In a popular tumult, occasioned by a scarcity of corn, he was torn to death by the mob.

Clĕanthes (Κλεάνθης). 1. A Stoic, born at Assos in Troas about B. C. 300. He entered life as a boxer, and had only 4 drachmas of his own when he began to study philosophy. He first placed himself under Crates, and then under Zeno, whose disciple he continued for 19 years. In order to support himself, he worked all night at drawing water from gardens; but as he spent the whole day in philosophical pursuits, and had no visible means of support, he was summoned before the Areopagus to account for his way of living. The judges were so delighted by the evidence of industry which he produced, that they voted him 10 minae, though Zeno would not permit him to accept them. He was naturally slow, but his iron industry overcame all difficulties; and on the death of Zeno in 263, Cleanthes succeeded him in his school. He died about 220, at the age of 80, of voluntary starvation. A hymn of his to Zeus is still extant, and contains some striking sentiments. Edited by Sturz, 1785, and Mersdorf, Lips. 1835. — 2. An ancient painter of Corinth.

Clĕarchus (Κλέαρχος). 1. A Spartan, distinguished himself in several important commands during the latter part of the Peloponnesian war, and at the close of it persuaded the Spartans to send him as general to Thrace, to protect the Greeks in that quarter against the Thracians. But having been recalled by the Ephors, and refusing to obey their orders, he was condemned to death. He thereupon crossed over to Cyrus, collected for him a large force of Greek mercenaries, and marched with him into Upper Asia, 401, in order to dethrone his brother Artaxerxes, being the only Greek who was aware of the prince's real object. After the battle of Cunaxa and the death of Cyrus, Clearchus and the other Greek generals were made prisoners by the treachery of Tissaphernes, and were put to death. — 2. A citizen of Heraclēa on the Euxine, obtained the tyranny of his native town, B. C. 365, by putting himself at the head of the popular party. He governed with cruelty, and was assassinated 353, after a reign of 12 years. He is said to have been a pupil both of Plato and of Isocrates. — 3. Of Soli, one of Aristotle's pupils, author of a number of works, none of which are extant, on a great variety of subjects. — 4. An Athenian poet of the new comedy, whose time is unknown.

Clēmens. 1. T. Flavīus, cousin of the emperor Domitian, by whom he was put to death. He appears to have been a Christian. — 2. Romānus, bishop of Rome at the end of the first century, probably the same as the Clement whom St. Paul mentions (Phil. iv. 3). He wrote 2 epistles in Greek to the Corinthian Church, of which the 1st and part of the 2nd are extant. The 2nd, however, is probably not genuine. The Recognitiones, which bear the name of Clement, were not written by him. The epistles are printed in the Patres Apostolici, of which the most convenient editions are by Jacobson, Oxford, 1838; and by Hefele, Tübingen, 1839. — 3. Alexandrīnus, so called from his long residence at Alexandria, was ardently devoted in early life to the study of philosophy, which had a great influence upon his views of Christianity. He embraced Christianity through the teaching of Pantaenus at Alexandria, was ordained presbyter about A. D. 190, and died about 220. Hence he flourished under the reigns of Severus and Caracalla, 193—217. His 3 principal works constitute parts of a whole. In the Hortatory Address to the Greeks (Λόγος Προτρεπτικός, &c.) his design was to convince the Heathens and to convert them to Christianity. The Paedagogue (Παιδαγωγός) takes up the new convert at the point to which he is supposed to have been brought by the hortatory address, and furnishes him with rules for the regulation of his conduct. The Stromata (Στρωματεῖς) are in 8 books: the title (Stromata, i. e. patch-work) indicates its miscellaneous character. It is rambling and discursive, but contains much valuable information on many points of antiquity, particularly the history of philosophy. The principal information respecting Egyptian hieroglyphics is contained in the 5th book. The object of the work was to delineate the perfect Christian or Gnostic, after he had been instructed by the Teacher and thus prepared by sublime speculations in philosophy and theology. — Editions. By Potter, Oxon. 1715, fol. 2 vols.; by Klotz, Lips. 1830—34, 8vo. 4 vols.

Cleŏbis. [BITON.]

Clĕŏbūlīnē (Κλεοβουλίνη), or Clĕŏbūlē (Κλεοβούλη), daughter of Cleobulus of Lindus, celebrated for her skill in riddles, of which she composed a number in hexameter verse; to her is ascribed a well-known one on the subject of the year: — "A father has 12 children, and each of these 30 daughters, on one side white, and on the other side black, and though immortal they all die."

Cleobūlus (Κλεόβουλος), one of the Seven Sages, of Lindus in Rhodes, son of Evagoras, lived about B. C. 580. He wrote lyric poems, as well as riddles, in verse; he was said by some to have been the author of the riddle on the year, generally attributed to his daughter Cleobuline. He was greatly distinguished for strength and beauty of person.

Cleŏchăres (Κλεοχάρης), a Greek orator of Myrlea in Bithynia, contemporary with the orator Demochares and the philosopher Arcesilas, towards the close of the 3rd century B. C.

Cleombrŏtus (Κλεόμβροτος). 1. Son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, became regent after the battle of Thermopylae, B. C. 480, for Plistarchus, infant son of Leonidas, but died in the same year, and was succeeded in the regency by his son Pausanias. — 2. I. King of Sparta, son of Pausanias, succeeded his brother Agesipolis I., and reigned B. C. 380—371. He commanded the Spartan troops several times against the Thebans, and fell at the battle of Leuctra (371), after fighting most bravely. — 3. II. King of Sparta, son-in-law of Leonidas II., in whose place he was made king by the party of AGIS IV. about 243. On the return of Leonidas, Cleombrotus was deposed and banished to Tegea, about 240. — 4. An Academic philosopher of Ambracia, said to have killed himself, after reading the Phaedon of Plato; not that he had any sufferings to escape from, but that he might exchange this life for a better.

Cleomēdes (Κλεομήδης). 1. Of the island Astypalaea, an athlete of gigantic strength. — 2. A Greek mathematician, probably lived in the 2nd and 3rd centuries of the Christian aera; the author of a Greek treatise in 2 books on the Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies (Κυκλικῆς Θεωρίας Μετεώρων Βίβλια δύο), which is still extant. It is rather an exposition of the system of the universe than of the geometrical principles of astronomy. Edited by Balfour, Burdigal. 1605; by Bake, Lugd. Bat. 1820; and by Schmidt, Lips. 1832.

Cleomĕnes (Κλεομένης). 1. King of Sparta, son of Anaxandrides, reigned B. C. 520—491. He was a man of an enterprising but wild character.

His greatest exploit was his defeat of the Argives, in which 6000 Argive citizens fell; but the date of this event is doubtful. In 510 he commanded the forces by whose assistance Hippias was driven from Athens, and not long after he assisted Isagoras and the aristocratical party, against Clisthenes. By bribing the priestess at Delphi, he effected the deposition of his colleague DEMARATUS, 491. Soon afterwards he was seized with madness and killed himself. — 2. King of Sparta, son of Cleombrotus I., reigned 370—309; but during this long period we have no information about him of any importance. — 3. King of Sparta, son of Leonidas II., reigned 236—222. While still young, he married Agiatis, the widow of Agis IV.; and following the example of the latter, he endeavoured to restore the ancient Spartan constitution, and to regenerate the Spartan character. He was endowed with a noble mind, strengthened and purified by philosophy, and possessed great energy of purpose. His first object was to gain for Sparta her old renown in war; and for that purpose he attacked the Achaeans, and carried on war with the League with great success. Having thus gained military renown he felt himself sufficiently strong in the winter of 226—225 to put the Ephors to death and restore the ancient constitution. The Achaeans now called in the aid of Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and for the next 3 years Cleomenes carried on war against their united forces. He was at length completely defeated at the battle of Sellasia (222), and fled to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Ptolemy Euergetes, but on the death of that king he was imprisoned by his successor Philopator. He escaped from prison, and attempted to raise an insurrection, but finding no one join him, he put himself to death, 220.

Cleomĕnes. 1. A Greek of Naucratis in Egypt, appointed by Alexander the Great nomarch of the Arabian district (νόμος) of Egypt, and receiver of the tribute from the districts of Egypt, B. C. 331. His rapacity knew no bounds, and he collected immense wealth by his extortions. After Alexander's death he was put to death by Ptolemy, who took possession of his treasures. — 2. A sculptor, son of Apollodorus of Athens, executed the celebrated statue of the Venus de Medici, as appears from an inscription on the pedestal. He lived between B. C. 363 and 146.

Clĕōn (Κλέων), son of Cleaenetus, was originally a tanner, and first came forward in public as an opponent of Pericles. On the death of this great man, B. C. 429, Cleon became the favourite of the people, and for about 6 years of the Peloponnesian war (428—422) was the head of the party opposed to peace. He is represented by Aristophanes as a demagogue of the lowest kind, mean, ignorant, cowardly, and venal; and this view of his character is confirmed by Thucydides. But much weight cannot be attached to the satire of the poet; and the usual impartiality of the historian may have been warped by the sentence of his banishment, if it be true, as has been conjectured with great probability, that it was through Cleon that Thucydides was sent into exile. Cleon may be considered as the representative of the middle classes of Athens, and by his ready, though somewhat coarse, eloquence, gained great influence over them. In 427 he strongly advocated in the assembly that the Mytilenaeans should be put to death. In 424 he obtained his greatest glory by taking prisoners the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria, and bringing them in safety to Athens. Puffed up by this success, he obtained the command of an Athenian army, to oppose Brasidas in Thrace; but he was defeated by Brasidas, under the walls of Amphipolis, and fell in the battle, 422. — The chief attack of Aristophanes upon Cleon was in the Knights (424), in which Cleon figures as an actual dramatis persona, and, in default of an artificer bold enough to make the mask, was represented by the poet himself with his face smeared with wine lees.

Cleōnae (Κλεωναί: Κλεωναῖος). 1. An ancient town in Argolis, on the road from Corinth to Argos, on a river of the same name which flows into the Corinthian gulf, and at the foot of Mt. Apesas; said to have been built by Cleones, son of Pelops. — 2. A town in the peninsula Athos in Chalcidice. — 3. Hyampolis.

Cleōnȳmus (Κλεώνυμος). 1 An Athenian, frequently attacked by Aristophanes as a pestilent demagogue. — 2. A Spartan, son of Sphodrias, much beloved by Archidamus, the son of Agesilaus: he fell at Leuctra, B. C. 371. — 3. Younger son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, was excluded from the throne on his father's death, 309, in consequence of his violent and tyrannical temper. In 303 he crossed over to Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Lucanians. He afterwards withdrew from Italy, and seized Corcyra; and in 272 he invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Sparta. [ACROTATUS.]

Cleopatra (Κλεοπάτρα). 1. (Myth.) Daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Meleager, is said to have hanged herself after her husband's death, or to have died of grief. Her real name was Alcyone. — 2. (Hist.) Niece of Attalus, married Philip, B. C. 337, on whose murder she was put to death by Olympias. — 3. Daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexander, king of Epirus, 336. It was at the celebration of her nuptials that Philip was murdered. Her husband died 326. After the death of her brother she was sought in marriage by several of his generals, and at length promised to marry Ptolemy; but having attempted to escape from Sardis, where she had been kept for years in a sort of honourable captivity, she was assassinated by Antigonus. — 4. Daughter of Antiochus III. the Great, married Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, 193. — 5. Daughter of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes and No. 4, married her brother Ptolemy VI. Philometor, and on his death, 146, her other brother Ptolemy VI. Physcon. She was soon afterwards divorced by Physcon, and fled into Syria. — 6. Daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and of No. 5, married first Alexander Balas (150), the Syrian usurper, and on his death Demetrius Nicator. During the captivity of the latter in Parthia, jealous of the connexion which he there formed with Rhodogune, the Parthian princess, she married Antiochus VII. Sidetes, his brother, and also murdered Demetrius on his return. She likewise murdered Seleucus, her son by Nicator, who on his father's death assumed the government without her consent. Her other son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII. Grypus, succeeded to the throne (125) through her influence; and he compelled her to drink the poison which she had prepared for him also. [ANTIOCHUS VIII.] She had a son by Sidetes, Antiochus IX., surnamed Cyzicenus. — 7. Another daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and No. 5, married her uncle Physcon, when the latter divorced her mother. On the death of Physcon she reigned in conjunction with her elder son, Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and then in conjunction with her younger son Alexander. She was put to death by the latter in 89. — 8. Daughter of Ptolemy Physcon and No. 7, married first her brother Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and next Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus. She was put to death by Tryphaena, her own sister, wife of Antiochus Grypus. — 9. Usually called Selene, another daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, married 1st her brother Lathyrus (on her sister No. 8 being divorced), 2dly Antiochus XI. Epiphanes, and 3rdly Antiochus X. Eusebes. — 10. Daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, usually called Berenice. [BERENICE, No. 4.] — 11. Eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, celebrated for her beauty and fascination, was 17 at the death of her father (51), who appointed her heir of his kingdom in conjunction with her younger brother, Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. She was expelled from the throne by Pothinus and Achillas, his guardians. She retreated into Syria, and there collected an army with which she was preparing to enter Egypt, when Caesar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey, 47. Her charms gained for her the support of Caesar, who replaced her on the throne in conjunction with her brother. This led to the Alexandrine war, in the course of which young Ptolemy perished. Cleopatra thus obtained the undivided rule. She was, however, associated by Caesar with another brother of the same name, and still quite a child, to whom she was also nominally married. She had a son by Caesar, called CAESARION, and she afterwards followed him to Rome, where she appears to have been at the time of his death, 44. She then returned to Egypt, and in 41 she met Antony in Cilicia. She was now in her 28th year, and in the perfection of matured beauty, which, in conjunction with her talents and eloquence, completely won the heart of Antony, who henceforth appears as her devoted lover and slave. He returned with her to Egypt, but was obliged to leave her for a short time, in order to marry Octavia, the sister of Augustus. But Octavia was never able to gain his affections; he soon deserted his wife and returned to Cleopatra, upon whom he conferred the most extravagant titles and honours. In the war between Octavian and Antony, Cleopatra accompanied her lover, and was present at the battle of Actium (31), in the midst of which she retreated with her fleet, and thus hastened the loss of the day. She fled to Alexandria, where she was joined by Antony. Seeing Antony's fortunes desperate, she entered into negotiations with Augustus, and promised to make away with Antony. She fled to a mausoleum she had built, and then caused a report of her death to be spread. Antony, resolving not to survive her, stabbed himself, and was drawn up into the mausoleum, where he died in her arms. She then tried to gain the love of Augustus, but her charms failed in softening his colder heart. Seeing that he determined to carry her captive to Rome, she put an end to her own life, either by the poison of an asp, or by a poisoned comb, the former supposition being adopted by most writers. She died in the 39th year of her age (B. C. 30), and with her ended the dynasty of the Ptolemies in Egypt, which was now made a Roman province. — 12. Daughter of Antony and No. 11, born with her twin brother Alexander in 40, along with whom she was carried to Rome after the death of her parents. Augustus married her to Juba, king of Numidia. — 13. A daughter of Mithridates, married Tigranes, king of Armenia.

Cleopatris. [ARSINOE, No. 6.]

Clĕŏphon (Κλεοφῶν), an Athenian demagogue, of obscure, and, according to Aristophanes, of Thracian origin, vehemently opposed peace with Sparta in the latter end of the Peloponnesian war. During the siege of Athens by Lysander, B. C. 404, he was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned and put to death.

Cleostrătus (Κλεόστρατος), an astronomer of Tenedos, said to have introduced the division of the Zodiac into signs, probably lived between B. C. 548 and 432.

Clevum, also Glevum and Glebon (Gloucester), a Roman colony in Britain.

Clīdes (αἱ Κλεῖδες: C. S. Andre), "the Keys," a promontory on the N. E. of Cyprus, with 2 islands of the same name lying off it.

Clīmax (Κλῖμαξ: Ekder), the name applied to the W. termination of the Taurus range, which extends along the W. coast of the Pamphylian Gulf, N. of Phaselis in Lycia. Alexander made a road between it and the sea. There were other mountains of the same name in Asia and Africa.

Climberrum. [AUSCI.]

Clīnĭas (Κλεινίας). 1. Father of the famous Alcibiades, fought at Artemisium B. C. 480, in a ship built and manned at his own expense: he fell 447, at the battle of Coronea. — 2. A younger brother of the famous Alcibiades. — 3. Father of Aratus of Sicyon, was murdered by Abantidas, who seized the tyranny, 264. — 4. A Pythagorean philosopher, of Tarentum, a contemporary and friend of Plato.

Clīo. [MUSAE.]

Clīsthĕnes (Κλεισθένης). 1. Tyrant of Sicyon. In B. C. 595, he aided the Amphictyons in the sacred war against Cirrha, which ended, after 10 years, in the destruction of the guilty city. He also engaged in war with Argos. His death cannot be placed earlier than 582, in which year he won the victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games. His daughter Agarista was given in marriage to Megacles the Alcmaeonid. — 2. An Athenian, son of Megacles and Agarista, and grandson of No. 1, appears as the head of the Alcmaeonid clan on the banishment of the Pisistratidae. Finding, however, that he could not cope with his political rival Isagoras except through the aid of the commons, he set himself to increase the power of the latter. The principal change which he introduced was the abolition of the 4 ancient tribes and the establishment of 10 new ones in their stead, B. C. 510. He is also said to have instituted ostracism. Isagoras and his party called in the aid of the Spartans, but Clisthenes and his friends eventually triumphed. — 3. An Athenian, whose foppery and effeminate profligacy brought him under the lash of Aristophanes.

Clitarchus (Κλείταρχος). 1. Tyrant of Eretria in Euboea, was supported by Philip against the Athenians, but was expelled from Eretria by Phocion, B. C. 341. — 2. Son of the historian Dinon, accompanied Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition, and wrote a history of it. This work was deficient in veracity and inflated in style, but appears nevertheless to have been much read.

Cliternum or Cliternia (Cliterninus), a town of the Frentani, in the territory of Larinum.

Clitomachus (Κλειτόμαχος), a Carthaginian by birth, and called Hasdrubal in his own language, came to Athens in the 40th year of his age, and there studied under Carneades, on whose death he became the head of the New Academy, B. C. 129. Of his works, which amounted to 400 books, only a few titles are preserved. His main object in writing them was to make known the philosophy of his master Carneades. When Carthage was taken in 146, he wrote a work to console his unfortunate countrymen.

Clitor or Clitorium (Κλείτωρ: Κλειτόριος: nr. Mazi, Ru.), a town in the N. of Arcadia on a river of the same name, a tributary of the Aroanius: there was a fountain in the neighbourhood, the waters of which are said to have given to persons who drank of them a dislike for wine. (Ov. Met. xv. 322.)

Clitumnus (Clitumno), a small river in Umbria, springs from a beautiful rock in a grove of cypress-trees, where was a sanctuary of the god Clitumnus, and falls into the Tinia, a tributary of the Tiber.

Clitus (Κλεῖτος or Κλειτός). 1. Son of Bardylis, king of Illyria, defeated by Alexander the Great, B. C. 335. — 2. A Macedonian, one of Alexander's generals and friends, surnamed the Black (Μέλας). He saved Alexander's life at the battle of Granicus, 334. In 328 he was slain by Alexander at a banquet, when both parties were heated with wine, and Clitus had provoked the king's resentment by insolent language. Alexander was inconsolable at his friend's death. — 3. Another of Alexander's officers, surnamed the White (Λευκός) to distinguish him from the above. — 4. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lamian war, 323, and defeated the Athenian fleet. In 321, he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Lydia, from which he was expelled by Antigonus, 319. He afterwards commanded the fleet of Polysperchon, and was at first successful, but his ships were subsequently destroyed by Antigonus, and he was killed on shore, 318.

Cloacina or Cluacina, the "Purifier" (from cloare or cluere, "to wash" or "purify"), a surname of Venus at Rome.

Clodius, another form of the name Claudius, just as we find both caudex and codex, claustrum and clostrum, cauda and coda. [CLAUDIUS.]

Clodius Albinus. [ALBINUS.]

Clodius Macer. [MACER.]

Cloelia, a Roman virgin, one of the hostages given to Porsena, is said to have escaped from the Etruscan camp, and to have swum across the Tiber to Rome. She was sent back by the Romans to Porsena, who was so struck with her gallant deed, that he not only set her at liberty, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages. Porsena also rewarded her with a horse adorned with splendid trappings, and the Romans with the statue of a female on horseback, which was erected in the Sacred Way.

Cloelia or Cluilia Gens, of Alban origin, said to have been received among the patricians on the destruction of Alba. A few of its members with the surname Siculus obtained the consulship in the early years of the republic.

Clonas (Κλονᾶς), a poet, and one of the earliest musicians of Greece, either an Arcadian, or a Boeotian, probably lived about B. C. 620.

Clonius (Κλόνιος), leader of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, slain by Agenor.

Clota Aestuarium (Frith of Clyde), on the W. coast of Scotland.

Clotho. [MOIRAE.]

Cluentius Habitus, A., of Larinum, accused in B. C. 74 his own step-father, Statius Albius Oppianicus, of having attempted to procure his death by poison. Oppianicus was condemned, and it was generally believed that the judges had been bribed by Cluentius. In 66, Cluentius was himself accused by young Oppianicus, son of Statius Albius who had died in the interval, of 3 distinct acts of poisoning. He was defended by Cicero in the oration still extant.

Clunia (Ru. on a hill between Coruña del Conde and Pennalba de Castro), a town of the Arevacae in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

Clupea or Clypea. [ASPIS.]

Clusium (Clusinus: Chiusi), one of the most powerful of the 12 Etruscan cities, situated on an eminence above the river Clanis, and S. W. of the Lacus Clusinus (L. di Chiusi). It was more anciently called Camers or Camars, whence we may conclude that it was founded by the Umbrian race of the Camertes. It was the royal residence of Porsena, and in its neighbourhood was the celebrated sepulchre of this king in the form of a labyrinth, of which such marvellous accounts have come down to us. (Dict. of Ant. art. Labyrinthus.) Subsequently Clusium was in alliance with the Romans, by whom it was regarded as a bulwark against the Gauls. Its siege by the Gauls, B. C. 391, led, as is well known, to the capture of Rome itself by the Gauls. Clusium probably became a Roman colony, since Pliny speaks of Clusini Veteres et Novi. In its neighbourhood were cold baths. (Hor. Ep. i. 15. 9.)

Clusius (Chiese), a river in Cisalpine Gaul, a tributary of the Ollius, forming the boundary between the Cenomani and Insubres.

Cluvius, a family of Campanian origin, of which the most important person was M. Cluvius Rufus, consul suffectus A.D. 45, and governor of Spain under Galba, A. D. 69, on whose death he espoused the cause of Vitellius. He was an historian, and wrote an account of the times of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

Clymene (Κλυμένη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of Iapetus, to whom she bore Atlas, Prometheus, and others. — 2. Daughter of Iphis or Minyas, wife of Phylacus or Cephalus, to whom she bore Iphiclus and Alcimede. According to Hesiod and others she was the mother of Phaëton by Helios. — 3. A relative of Menelaus and a companion of Helena, with whom she was carried off by Paris.

Clytaemnestra (Κλυταιμνήστρα), daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, sister of Castor, and half-sister of Pollux and Helena. She was married to Agamemnon. During her husband's absence at Troy she lived in adultery with Aegisthus, and on his return to Mycenae she murdered him with the help of Aegisthus. [AGAMEMNON.] She was subsequently put to death by her son Orestes, who thus avenged the murder of his father. For details see ORESTES.

Cnemis (Κνῆμις), a range of mountains on the frontiers of Phocis and Locris, from which the N. Locrians were called Epicnemidii. A branch of these mountains runs out into the sea, forming the promontory Cnēmīdes (Κνημῖδες), with a town of the same name upon it, opposite the promontory Cenaeum in Euboea.

Cnēph (Κνήφ), or Cnūphis (Κνοῦφις), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the form of a serpent, and regarded as the creator of the world.

Cnĭdus or Gnĭdus (Κνίδος: Κνίδιος: Ru. at Cape Krio), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, on the promontory of Triopium on the coast of Caria, was a Lacedaemonian colony, and the chief city of the Dorian Hexapolis. It was built partly on the mainland and partly on an island joined to the coast by a causeway, and had two harbours. It had a considerable commerce; and it was resorted to by travellers from all parts of the civilized world, that they might see the statue of Aphrodite by Praxiteles, which stood in her temple here. The city possessed also temples of Apollo and Poseidon. The great naval defeat of Pisander by Conon (B. C. 394) took place off Cnidus. Among the celebrated natives of the city were Ctesias, Eudoxus, Sostratus, and Agatharcides. It is said to have been also called, at an early period, Triopia, from its founder Triopas, and, in later times, Stadia.

Cnōsus or Gnōsus, subsequently Cnossus or Gnossus (Κνωσός, Γνωσός, Κνωσσός, Γνωσσός: Κνώσιος, Κνώσσιος: Makro Teikho), an ancient town of Crete, and the capital of king Minos, was situated in a fertile country on the river Caeratus (which was originally the name of the town), at a short distance from the N. coast. It was at an early time colonized by Dorians, and from it Dorian institutions spread over the island. Its power was weakened by the growing importance of Gortyn and Cydonia; and these towns, when united, were more than a match for Cnossus.— Cnossus is frequently mentioned by the poets in consequence of its connection with Minos, Ariadne, the Minotaur, and the Labyrinth; and the adjective Cnossius is frequently used as equivalent to Cretan.

Cōbus or Cohĭbus (Κῶβος), a river of Asia, flowing from the Caucasus into the E. side of the Euxine.

Cōcălus (Κώκαλος), a mythical king of Sicily, who kindly received Daedalus on his flight from Crete, and with the assistance of his daughters put Minos to death, when the latter came in pursuit of Daedalus.

Cocceius Nerva. [NERVA.]

Cōchē (Κωχή), a city on the Tigris, near Ctesiphon.

Cocinthum or Cocintum (Punta di Stilo), a promontory on the S. E. of Bruttium in Italy, with a town of the same name upon it.

Cocles, Horātius, that is, Horatius the "one-eyed," a hero of the old Roman lays, is said to have defended the Sublician bridge along with Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius against the whole Etruscan army under Porsena, while the Romans broke down the bridge behind them. When the work was nearly finished, Horatius sent back his 2 companions. As soon as the bridge was quite destroyed, he plunged into the stream and swam across to the city in safety amid the arrows of the enemy. The state raised a statue to his honour, which was placed in the comitium, and allowed him as much land as he could plough round in one day. Polybius relates that Horatius defended the bridge alone, and perished in the river.

Cocossates, a people in Aquitania in Gaul, mentioned along with the Tarbelli.

Cōcȳlium (Κοκύλιον), an Aeolian city in Mysia, whose inhabitants (Κοκυλῖται) are mentioned by Xenophon; but which was abandoned before Pliny's time.

Cōcȳtus (Κωκυτός), a river in Epirus, a tributary of the Acheron. Like the Acheron, the Cocytus was supposed to be connected with the lower world, and hence came to be described as a river in the lower world. Homer (Od. x. 513) makes the Cocytus a tributary of the Styx; but Virgil (Aen. vi. 295) represents the Acheron as flowing into the Cocytus.

Codānus Sinus, the S. W. part of the Baltic, whence the Danish islands are called Codanonia.

Codomannus. [DARIUS.]

Codrus (Κόδρος). 1. Son of Melanthus, and last king of Athens. When the Dorians invaded Attica from Peloponnesus (about B. C. 1068 according to mythical chronology), an oracle declared, that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. Codrus thereupon resolved to sacrifice himself for his country. He entered the camp of the enemy in disguise, commenced quarrelling with the soldiers, and was slain in the dispute. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they returned home. Tradition adds, that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and Medon, son of Codrus, was appointed archon for life instead.—2. A Roman poet, ridiculed by Virgil. Juvenal also speaks of a wretched poet of the same name. The name is probably fictitious, and appears to have been applied by the Roman poets to those poetasters who annoyed other people by reading their productions to them.

Coela (τὰ κοῖλα τῆς Εὐβοίας), "the Hollows of Euboea," the W. coast of Euboea, between the promontories Caphareus and Chersonesus, very dangerous to ships: here a part of the Persian fleet was wrecked, B. C. 480.

Coelē (Κοίλη), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, a little way beyond the Melitian gate at Athens: here Cimon and Thucydides were buried.

Coelēsȳrĭa (ἡ Κοίλη Συρία, i. e. Hollow Syria), was the name given, after the Macedonian conquest, to the great valley (El-Bukaa), between the two ranges of M. Lebanon (Libanus and Anti-Libanus), in the S. of Syria, bordering upon Phoenicia on the W. and Palestine on the S. In the wars between the Ptolemies and the Seleucidae, the name was applied to the whole of the S. portion of Syria, which became subject for some time to the kings of Egypt; but, under the Romans, when Phoenicia and Judaea were made distinct provinces, the name of Coelesyria was confined to Coelesyria proper together with the district E. of Anti-Libanus, about Damascus, and a portion of Palestine E. of the Jordan; and this is the most usual meaning of the term. Under the later emperors, it was considered as a part of Phoenicia, and was called Phoenice Libanesia. The country was for the most part fertile, especially the E. district about the river Chrysarrhoas: the valley of Coelesyria proper was watered by the Leontes. The inhabitants were a mixt people of Syrians, Phoenicians, and Greeks, called Syrophoenicians (Συροφοίνικες).

Coelētae or Coelaletae, a people of Thrace, divided into Majores and Minores, in the district

Coeletica, between the Hebrus and the gulf of Melas.

Coelius. [CAELIUS.]

Coelossa (Κοίλωσσα), a mountain in the Sicyonian territory, near Phlius, an offshoot of the Arcadian mountain Cyllene.

Coelus (Κοιλὸς λίμην) or Coela (Κοῖλα), a seaport town in the Thracian Chersonese, near which was the Κυνὸς σῆμα, or the grave of Hecuba. [CYNOSSEMA.]

Coenus (Κοῖνος), son-in-law of Parmenion, one of the ablest generals of Alexander the Great, died on the Hyphasis, B. C. 327.

Coenyra (Κοίνυρα), a place in the island Thasos, opposite Samothrace.

Cōēs (Κώης), of Mytilene, dissuaded Darius Hystaspis, in his Scythian expedition, from breaking up his bridge of boats over the Danube. For this good counsel he was rewarded by Darius with the tyranny of Mytilene. On the breaking out of the Ionian revolt, B. C. 501, he was stoned to death by the Mytilenaeans.

Colăpis (Κόλωψ in Dion Cass.: Kulpa), a river in Pannonia, flows into the Savus: on it dwelt the Colapiani.

Colchis (Κολχίς: Κόλχος), a country of Asia, bounded on the W. by the Euxine, on the N. by the Caucasus, on the E. by Iberia; on the S. and S.W. the boundaries were somewhat indefinite, and were often considered to extend as far as Trapezus (Trebizond). The land of Colchis (or Aea), and its river Phasis are famous in the Greek mythology. [ARGONAUTAE.] The name of Colchis is first mentioned by Aeschylus and Pindar. The historical acquaintance of the Greeks with the country may be ascribed to the commerce of the Milesians. It was a very fertile country, and yielded timber, pitch, hemp, flax, and wax, as articles of commerce; but it was most famous for its manufactures of linen, on account of which, and of certain physical resemblances, Herodotus supposed the Colchians to have been a colony from Egypt. The land was governed by its native princes, until Mithridates Eupator made it subject to the kingdom of Pontus. After the Mithridatic war, it was overrun by the Romans, but they did not subdue it till the time of Trajan. Under the later emperors the country was called Lazica, from the name of one of its principal tribes, the Lazi.

Cōlĭas (Κωλιάς), a promontory on the W. coast of Attica, 20 stadia S. of Phalerum, with a temple of Aphrodite, where some of the Persian ships were cast after the battle of Salamis. Colias is usually identified with the cape called the Three Towers (Τρεῖς Πύργοι), but it ought to be placed S.E. near Ἅγιος Κοσμᾶς.

Collātĭa (Collatīnus). 1. (Castellaccio), a Sabine town in Latium, near the right bank of the Anio, taken by Tarquinius Priscus. — 2. A town in Apulia, only mentioned under the empire.

Collatīnus, L. Tarquinius, son of Egerius, and nephew of Tarquinius Priscus, derived the surname Collatīnus from the town Collatia, of which his father had been appointed governor. He was married to Lucretia, and it was the rape of the latter by Sex. Tarquinius that led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus. Collatinus and L. Junius Brutus were the first consuls; but as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatinus resigned his office and retired from Rome to Lavinium.

Collīna Porta. [ROMA.]

Collȳtus (Κολλυτός, also Κολυττός: Κολλυτεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, was included within the walls of Athens, and formed one of the districts into which the city was divided: it was the demus of Plato and the residence of Timon the misanthrope.

Cŏlōnae (Κολωναί), a small town in the Troad, mentioned in Greek history, but destroyed before the time of Pliny.

Cŏlōnĭa Agrippīna or Agrippīnensis (Cologne on the Rhine), originally the chief town of the Ubii, and called Oppidum or Civitas Ubiorum, was a place of small importance till A. D. 51, when a Roman colony was planted in the town by the emperor Claudius, at the instigation of his wife Agrippina, who was born here, and from whom it derived its new name. Its inhabitants received the jus Italicum. It soon became a large and flourishing city, and was the capital of Lower Germany. At Cologne there are still several Roman remains, an ancient gate, with the inscription C. C. A. A. i. e. Colonia Claudia Augusta Agrippinensis, the foundations of the Roman walls, &c.

Colōnĭa Equestris. [NOVIODUNUM.]

Colōnus (Κολωνός: Κολωνεύς -νίτης, -νιάτης), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, afterwards to the tribe Antiochis, 10 stadia, or a little more than a mile N.W. of Athens; near the Academy, lying on and round a hill; celebrated for a temple of Poseidon (hence called Κολωνὸς Ἵππειος), a grove of the Eumenides, and the tomb of Oedipus. Sophocles, who was a native of this demus, has described the scenery and religious associations of the spot, in his Oedipus Coloneus. — There was a hill at Athens called Colonus Agoraeus (Κολωνὸς ὁ ἀγοραῖος).

Cŏlŏphōn (Κολοφών: Zille, Ru.), one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded by Mopsus, a grandson of Tiresias. It stood about 2 miles from the coast, on the river Halesus, which was famous for the coldness of its water, between Lebedus and Ephesus, 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) from the former and 70 stadia (7 g. m.) from the latter: its harbour was called Notium. It was one of the most powerful members of the Ionian confederacy, possessing a considerable fleet and excellent cavalry; but it suffered greatly in war, being taken at different times by the Lydians, the Persians, Lysimachus, and the Cilician pirates. It was made a free city by the Romans after their war with Antiochus the Great. Besides claiming to be the birth-place of Homer, Colophon was the native city of Mimnermus, Hermesianax, and Nicander. It was also celebrated for the oracle of Apollo Clarius in its neighbourhood. [CLARUS.]

Cŏlossae (Κολοσσαί, aft. Κολάσσαι: Κολοσσηνός, Strab., Κολοσσαεύς, N. T.; Khonas, Ru.), a city of Great Phrygia on the river Lycus, once of great importance, but so reduced by the rise of the neighbouring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis, that the later geographers do not even mention it, and it might have been forgotten but for its place in the early history of the Christian Church. In the middle ages it was called Χῶναι, and hence the modern name of the village on its site.

Colōtes (Κολώτης). 1. Of Lampsacus, a hearer of Epicurus, against whom Plutarch wrote 2 of his works. — 2. A sculptor of Paros, flourished B. C. 444, and assisted Phidias in executing the colossus of Zeus at Olympia.

Cŏlŭmella, L. Junĭus Moderātus, a native of Gades in Spain, and a contemporary of Seneca. We have no particulars of his life; it appears, from his own account, that at some period of his life, he visited Syria and Cilicia; but Rome appears to have been his ordinary residence. He wrote a work upon agriculture (De Re Rustica), in 12 books, which is still extant. It treats not only of agriculture proper, but of the cultivation of the vine and the olive, of gardening, of rearing cattle, of bees, &c. The 10th book, which treats of gardening, is composed in dactylic hexameters, and forms a sort of supplement to the Georgics. There is also extant a work De Arboribus, in one book. The style of Columella is easy and ornate. The best edition of his works is by Schneider, in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae, 4 vols. 8vo., Lips. 1794.

Columnae Herculis. [ABYLA; CALPE.]

Colūthus (Κόλουθος), a Greek epic poet of Lycopolis in Egypt, lived at the beginning of the 6th century of our era. He is the author of an extinct poem on "The Rape of Helen" (Ἑλένης ἁρπαγή), consisting of 392 hexameter lines. Edited by Bekker, Berl. 1816, and Schaefer, Lips. 1825.

Colyttus. [COLLYTUS.]

Comāna (Κόμανα). 1. C. Pontica (Guminik, Ru.), a flourishing city of Pontus, upon the river Iris, celebrated for its temple of Artemis Taurica, the foundation of which tradition ascribed to Orestes. The high-priests of this temple took rank next after the king, and their domain was increased by Pompey after the Mithridatic war.— 2. Cappadociae, or C. Chryse (Bostan), lay in a narrow valley of the Anti-Taurus, in Cataonia, and was also celebrated for a temple of Artemis Taurica, the foundation of which was likewise ascribed by tradition to Orestes.

Combrēa (Κώμβρεια), a town in the Macedonian district of Crossaea.

Comĭnĭum, a town in Samnium, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars.

Commăgēne (Κομμαγηνή), the N. E.-most district of Syria, was bounded on the E. and S. E. by the Euphrates, on the N. and N.W. by the Taurus, and on the S. by Cyrrhestice. It formed a part of the Greek kingdom of Syria, after the fall of which it maintained its independence under a race of kings who appear to have been a branch of the family of the Seleucidae, and was not united to the Roman empire till the reign of Vespasian. Under Constantine, if not earlier, it was made a part of Cyrrhestice. The district was remarkable for its fertility.

Commĭus, king of the Atrebates, was advanced to that dignity by Caesar, who had great confidence in him. He was sent by Caesar to Britain to accompany the ambassadors of the British states on their return to their native country, but he was cast into chains by the Britons, and was not released till the Britons had been defeated by Caesar, and found it expedient to sue for peace. In B. C. 52 he joined the other Gauls in their great revolt against the Romans, and continued in arms even after the capture of Alesia.

Commŏdus, L. Ceiōnĭus, was adopted by Hadrian, A. D. 136, when he took the name of L. AELIUS VERUS CAESAR. His health was weak; he died on the 1st of January, 138, and was interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian. His son L. Aurelius Verus was the colleague of Antoninus Pius in the empire. [VERUS.]

Commŏdus, L. Aurēlĭus, Roman emperor, A. D. 180—192, son of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born at Lanuvium, 161, and was thus scarcely 20, when he succeeded to the empire. He was an unworthy son of a noble father. Notwithstanding the great care which his father had bestowed upon his education, he turned out one of the most sanguinary and licentious tyrants that ever disgraced a throne. It was after the suppression of the plot against his life, which had been organised by his sister Lucilla, 183, that he first gave uncontrolled sway to his ferocious temper. He resigned the government to various favourites who followed each other in rapid succession (Perennis, Cleander, Laetus, and Eclectus), and abandoned himself without interruption to the most shameless debauchery. But he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity, and sought to gain popular applause by fighting as a gladiator, and slew many thousands of wild beasts in the amphitheatre with bow and spear. In consequence of these exploits he assumed the name of Hercules, and demanded that he should be worshipped as that god, 191. In the following year his concubine Marcia found on his tablets, while he was asleep, that she was doomed to perish along with Laetus and Eclectus and other leading men in the state. She forthwith administered poison to him, but as its operation was slow, Narcissus, a celebrated athlete, was introduced, and by him Commodus was strangled, Dec. 31st, 192.

Comnēna. [ANNA COMNENA.]

Complūtum, a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Segovia and Bilbilis.

Compsa (Compsānus: Conza), a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, near the sources of the Aufidus.

Cōmum (Comensis: Como), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, at the S. extremity of the W. branch of the Lacus Larius (L. di Como). It was originally a town of the Insubrian Gauls, and was colonized by Pompeius Strabo, by Cornelius Scipio, and by Julius Caesar. Caesar settled there 6000 colonists, among whom were 500 distinguished Greek families; and this new population so greatly exceeded the number of the old inhabitants, that the town was called Novum Comum, a name, however, which it did not retain. Comum was celebrated for its iron-manufactories: it was the birthplace of the younger Pliny.

Cōmus, the god of festive mirth and joy, is represented as a winged youth.

Concordĭa, a Roman goddess, the personification of concord, had several temples at Rome. The earliest was built by Camillus in commemoration of the reconciliation between the patricians and plebeians, after the enactment of the Licinian rogations, B. C. 367. In this temple the senate frequently met. Concordia is represented on coins as a matron, holding in her left hand a cornucopia, and in her right either an olive branch or a patera.

Condāte, the name of many Celtic towns, said to be equivalent in meaning to Confluentes, i. e. the union of two rivers.

Condrūsi, a German people in Gallia Belgica, the dependents of the Treviri, dwelt between the Eburones and the Treviri in the district of Condros on the Maas and Ourthe.

Confluentes (Coblenz), a town in Germany at the confluence of the Moselle and the Rhine.

Conisalus (Κονίσαλος), a deity worshipped at Athens along with Priapus.

Cŏnōn (Κόνων). 1. A distinguished Athenian general, held several important commands in the latter part of the Peloponnesian war. After the defeat of the Athenians by Lysander at Aegos Potami (B. C. 405), Conon, who was one of the generals, escaped with 8 ships, and took refuge with Evagoras in Cyprus, where he remained for some years. He was subsequently appointed to the command of the Persian fleet along with Pharnabazus, and in this capacity was able to render the most effectual service to his native country. In 394 he gained a decisive victory over Pisander, the Spartan admiral, off Cnidus. After clearing the Aegean of the Spartans, he returned to Athens in 393, and commenced restoring the long walls and the fortifications of Piraeus. When the Spartans opened their negotiations with Tiribazus, the Persian satrap, Conon, was sent by the Athenians to counteract the intrigues of Antalcidas, but was thrown into prison by Tiribazus. According to some accounts, he was sent into the interior of Asia, and there put to death. But according to the most probable account, he escaped to Cyprus, where he died. — 2. Son of Timotheus, grandson of the preceding, lived about 318. — 3. Of Samos, a distinguished mathematician and astronomer, lived in the time of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Euergetes (B. C. 283—222), and was the friend of Archimedes, who praises him in the highest terms. None of his works are preserved — 4. A grammarian of the age of Augustus, author of a work entitled Διηγήσεις, a collection of 50 narratives relating to the mythical and heroic period. An epitome of the work is preserved by Photius.

Cōnōpa (Κωνώπα; Κωνωπεύς—πίτης—παῖος), a village in Aetolia on the Achelous, enlarged by Arsinoë, wife of Ptolemy II., and called after her name.

Consentes Dii, the 12 Etruscan gods who formed the council of Jupiter. They consisted of 6 male and 6 female divinities: we do not know the names of all of them, but it is certain that Juno, Minerva, Summanus, Vulcan, Saturn, and Mars were among them.

Consentĭa (Consentīnus: Cosenza), chief town of the Bruttii on the river Crathis: here Alaric died.

P. Consentĭus, a Roman grammarian, probably flourished in the 5th century of the Christian era, and is the author of 2 extant grammatical works, one published in the Collection of grammarians by Putschius, Hanov. 1605 (De Duabus Partibus Orationis, Nomine et Verbo), and the other by Buttman, Berol. 1817.

C. Consĭdĭus Longus, propraetor in Africa, left his province shortly before the breaking out of the civil war B. C. 49, entrusting the government to Q. Ligarius. He returned to Africa soon afterwards, and held Adrumetum for the Pompeian party. After the defeat of the Pompeians at Thapsus, he attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was murdered by the Gaetulians.

Constans, youngest of the 3 sons of Constantine the Great and Fausta, received after his father's death (A. D. 337) Illyricum, Italy, and Africa as his share of the empire. After successfully resisting his brother Constantine, who was slain in invading his territory (340), Constans became master of the whole West. His weak and profligate character rendered him an object of contempt, and he was slain in 350 by the soldiers of the usurper MAGNENTIUS.

Constantĭa. 1. Daughter of Constantius Chlorus and half-sister of Constantine the Great, married to Licinius, the colleague of Constantine in the empire. — 2. Daughter of Constantius II. and grand-daughter of Constantine the Great, married the emperor Gratian.

Constantĭa, the name of several cities, all of which are either of little consequence, or better known by other names. 1. In Cyprus, named after Constantius [SALAMIS]. 2. In Phoenicia, after the same [ANTARADUS]. 3. In Palestine, the port of GAZA, named after the sister of Constantine the Great, and also called Magiuna. 4. In Mesopotamia. [ANTONINOPOLIS.]

Constantīna, daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married to Hannibalianus, and after the death of the latter to Gallus Caesar.

Constantīna, the city. [CIRTA.]

Constantīnŏpŏlis (Κωνσταντίνου πόλις: Constantinople), built on the site of the ancient BYZANTIUM by Constantine the Great, who called it after his own name and made it the capital of the Roman empire. It was solemnly consecrated A. D. 330. It was built in imitation of Rome. Thus it covered 7 hills, was divided into 14 regiones, and was adorned with various buildings in imitation of the capital of the Western world. Its extreme length was about 3 Roman miles; and its walls included eventually a circumference of 13 or 14 Roman miles. It continued the capital of the Roman empire in the E. till its capture by the Turks in 1453. An account of its topography and history does not fall within the scope of the present work.

Constantīnus. 1. I. Surnamed "the Great," Roman emperor, A. D. 306—337, eldest son of the emperor Constantius Chlorus and Helena, was born A. D. 272, at Naissus (Nissa), a town in upper Moesia. He was early trained to arms, and served with great distinction under Galerius in the Persian war. Galerius became jealous of him and detained him for some time in the E.; but Constantine at last contrived to join his father in Gaul just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts, 306. His father died at York in the same year, and Constantine laid claim to a share of the empire. Galerius, who dreaded a struggle with the brave legions of the West, acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Caesar only The commencement of Constantine's reign, however, is placed in this year, though he did not receive the title of Augustus till 308. Constantine took up his residence at Treviri (Trèves), where the remains of his palace are still extant. He governed with justice and firmness, beloved by his subjects, and feared by the neighbouring barbarians. It was not long however before he became involved in war with his rivals in the empire. In the same year that he had been acknowledged Caesar (306), Maxentius, the son of Maximian, had seized the imperial power at Rome. Constantine entered into a close alliance with Maxentius by marrying his sister Fausta. But in 310 Maximian formed a plot against Constantine, and was put to death by his son-in-law at Massilia. Maxentius resented the death of his father, and began to make preparations to attack Constantine in Gaul. Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy at the head of a large army. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at the village of Saxa Rubra near Rome, October 27th, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. It was in this campaign that Constantine is said to have been converted to Christianity. On his march from the N. to Rome, either at Autun in Gaul, or near Andernach on the Rhine, or at Verona, he is said to have seen in the sky a luminous cross with the inscription ἐν τούτῳ νίκα, By this, Conquer; and on the night before the last and decisive battle with Maxentius, a vision is said to have appeared to Constantine in his sleep, bidding him inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the sacred monogram of the name of Christ. The tale of the cross seems to have grown out of that of the vision, and even the latter is not entitled to credit. It was Constantine's interest to gain the affections of his numerous Christian subjects in his struggle with his rivals; and it was probably only self-interest which led him at first to adopt Christianity. But whether sincere or not in his conversion, his conduct did little credit to the religion which he professed. The miracle of his conversion was commemorated by the imperial standard of the Labarum, at the summit of which was the monogram of the name of Christ. Constantine, by his victory over Maxentius, became the sole master of the W. Meantime important events took place in the E. On the death of Galerius in 311, Licinius and Maximinus had divided the East between them; but in 313 a war broke out between them, Maximin was defeated, and died at Tarsus. Thus there were only two emperors left, Licinius in the E. and Constantine in the W.; and between them also war broke out in 314, although Licinius had married in the preceding year Constantia, the sister of Constantine. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia and afterwards at Adrianople. Peace was then concluded on condition that Licinius should resign to Constantine Illyricum, Macedonia, and Achaia, 314. This peace continued undisturbed for 9 years, during which time Constantine was frequently engaged in war with the barbarians on the Danube and the Rhine. In these wars his son Crispus greatly distinguished himself. In 323 the war between Constantine and Licinius was renewed. Licinius was again defeated in 2 great battles, first near Adrianople, and again at Chalcedon. He surrendered himself to Constantine on condition of having his life spared, but he was shortly afterwards put to death at Thessalonica by order of Constantine. Constantine was now sole master of the empire. He resolved to remove the seat of empire to Byzantium, which he called after his own name Constantinople, or the city of Constantine. The new city was solemnly dedicated in 330. Constantine reigned in peace for the remainder of his life. In 325 he supported the orthodox bishops at the great Christian council of Nicaea (Nice), which condemned the Arian doctrine by adopting the word ὁμοούσιον. In 324 he put to death his eldest son Crispus on a charge of treason, the truth of which however seems very doubtful. He died in May, 337, and was baptized shortly before his death by Eusebius. His three sons Constantine, Constantius and Constans succeeded him in the empire.—2. II. Roman emperor, 337—340, eldest of the 3 sons of Constantine the Great, by Fausta, received Gaul, Britain, Spain, and part of Africa at his father's death. Dissatisfied with his share of the empire, he made war upon his younger brother Constans, who governed Italy, but was defeated and slain near Aquileia.—3. An usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, 407. He also obtained possession of Gaul and Spain, and took up his residence in the former country. He reigned 4 years, but was defeated in 411 by Constantius, the general of Honorius, was taken prisoner and carried to Ravenna, where he was put to death.—4. Constantine is likewise the name of many of the later emperors of Constantinople. Of these Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, who reigned 911—959, was celebrated for his literary works, many of which have come down to us.

Constantius. 1. I. Surnamed Chlorus, "the pale," Roman emperor, A. D. 305–306, was the son of Eutropius, a noble Dardanian, and of Claudia, daughter of Crispus, brother of Claudius II. He was one of the two Caesars appointed by Maximian and Diocletian in 292, and received the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain with Treviri (Trèves) as his residence. At the same time he married Theodora, the daughter of the wife of Maximian, divorcing for that purpose his wife Helena. As Caesar he rendered the empire important services. His first effort was to reunite Britain to the empire, which after the murder of Carausius was governed by Allectus. After a struggle of 3 years (293—296) with Allectus, Constantius established his authority in Britain. He was equally successful against the Alemanni, whom he defeated with great loss. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, in 305, Constantius and Galerius became the Augusti. Constantius died 15 months afterwards (July, 306) at Eboracum (York) in Britain, on an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantine, afterwards the Great, who succeeded him in his share of the government.—2. II. Roman emperor, 337—361, third son of Constantine the Great by his second wife Fausta. On the death of his father in 337, he received the E. as his share of the empire. Upon his accession he became involved in a serious war with the Persians, which was carried on with a few interruptions during the greater part of his reign. This war prevented him from taking any part in the struggle between his brothers Constantine and Constans, which ended in the defeat and death of the former, and the accession of the latter to the sole empire of the W., 340. After the death of Constans in 350, Constantius marched into the W. in order to oppose Magnentius and Vetranio, both of whom had assumed the purple. Vetranio submitted to Constantius, and Magnentius was finally crushed in 353. Thus the whole empire again became subject to one ruler. In 354 Constantius put to death his cousin Gallus, whom he had left in command of the E., while he marched against the usurpers in the W. In 355 Constantius made Julian, the brother of Gallus, Caesar, and sent him into Gaul to oppose the barbarians. In 360 Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the soldiers at Paris. Constantius prepared for war and set out for Europe, but died on his march in Cilicia, 361. He was succeeded by Julian.—3. III. Emperor of the West (A. D. 421), a distinguished general of Honorius. He defeated the usurper Constantine in 411, and also fought successfully against the barbarians. He was rewarded for these services with the hand of Placidia, the sister of Honorius. In 421 he was declared Augustus by Honorius, but died in the 7th month of his reign.

Consus, an ancient Roman divinity, who was identified by some in later times with Neptune. Hence Livy (i. 9) calls him Neptunus Equestris. He was regarded by some as the god of secret deliberations, but he was most probably a god of the lower world. Respecting his festival of the Consualia, see Dict. of Ant. s. v.

Contrebĭa, one of the chief towns of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, S. E. of Saragossa.

Convĕnae, a people in Aquitania near the Pyrenees and on both sides of the Garumna, a mixed race which had served under Sertorius, and were settled in Aquitania by Pompey. They possessed the Jus Latii. Their chief town was Lugdunum (St. Bertrand de Comminges), situated on a solitary rock: in its neighbourhood were celebrated warm baths, Aquae Convenarum (Bagnères).

Cōpae (Κῶπαι: Κωπαιεύς: nr. Topoglia), an ancient town in Boeotia on the N. side of the lake Copais, which derived its name from this place. It was originally situated on an island in the lake, which island was subsequently connected with the mainland by a mole.

Copāis (Κωπαῒς λίμνη), a lake in Boeotia, and the largest lake in Greece, formed chiefly by the river Cephisus, the waters of which are emptied into the Euboean sea by several subterraneous canals, called Katabothra by the modern Greeks. The lake was originally called Cephisis, under which name it occurs in Homer, and subsequently different parts of it were called after the towns situated on it, Haliartus, Orchomenus, Onchestus, Copae, &c.; but the name Copais eventually became the most common, because near Copae the waters of the lake are the deepest and are never dried up. In the summer the greater part of the lake is dry, and becomes a green meadow, in which cattle are pastured. The eels of this lake were much prized in antiquity, and they retain their celebrity in modern times.

Cophenor, Cophes (Κωφήν, Arrian., Κώφης Strab. Cabul), the only grand tributary river which flows into the Indus from the W. It was the boundary between India and Ariana.

C. Copōnĭus, praetor B. C. 49, fought on the side of Pompey; he was proscribed by the triumvirs in 43, but his wife obtained his pardon from Antony by the sacrifice of her honour.

Coprātes (Κοπράτης: Abzal), a river of Susiana, flowing from the N. into the Pasitigris on its W. side.

Copreus (Κοπρεύς), son of Pelops, who after murdering Iphitus, fled from Elis to Mycenae, where he was purified by Eurystheus.

Coptos (Κοπτός: Koft, Ru.), a city of the Thebaïs or Upper Egypt, lay a little to the E. of the Nile, some distance below Thebes. Under the Ptolemies, it was the central point of the commerce with Arabia and India, by way of Berenice and Myos-Hormos. It was destroyed by Diocletian, but again became a considerable place. The neighbourhood was celebrated for its emeralds and other precious stones, and produced also a light wine.

Cora (Coranus: Cori), an ancient town in Latium in the Volscian mountains, S.E. of Velitrae, said to have been founded by the Argive Corax. At Cori there are remains of Cyclopian walls and of an ancient temple.

Cŏrăcēsĭum (Κορακήσιον: Alaya), a very strong city of Cilicia Aspera, on the borders of Pamphylia, standing upon a steep rock, and possessing a good harbour. It was the only place in Cilicia which opposed a successful resistance to Alexander, and, after its strength had been tried more than once in the wars of the Seleucidae, it became at last the head-quarters of the Cilician pirates, and was taken by Pompey.

Corassĭae (Κορασσίαι), a group of small islands in the Icarian sea, S.W. of Icaria. They must not be confounded, as they often are, with the islands Corsĕae or Corsĭae (Κόρσεαι or Κόρσιαι), off the Ionian coast and opposite the promontory Ampelos in Samos.

Cŏrax (Κόραξ), a Sicilian rhetorician, who acquired so much influence over the citizens by his oratorical powers, that he became the leading man in Syracuse, after the expulsion of Thrasybulus, B. C. 467. He wrote the earliest work on the art of rhetoric, and his treatise (entitled Τέχνη) was celebrated in antiquity.

Corbŭlo, Cn. Domĭtĭus, a distinguished general under Claudius and Nero. In A. D. 47 he carried on war in Germany with success, but his fame rests chiefly upon his glorious campaigns against the Parthians in the reign of Nero. Though beloved by the army he continued faithful to Nero, but his only reward was death. Nero, who had become jealous of his fame and influence, invited him to Corinth. As soon as he landed at Cenchreae, he was informed that orders had been issued for his death, whereupon he plunged his sword into his breast, exclaiming, "Well deserved!"

Corcȳra (Κέρκυρα, later Κόρκυρα: Κερκυραῖος: Corfu from the Byzantine Κορυφώ), an island in the Ionian sea, off the coast of Epirus, about 38 miles in length, but of very unequal breadth. It is generally mountainous, but possesses many fertile vallies. Its two chief towns were Corcyra, the modern town of Corfu, in the middle of the E. coast, and Cassiope, N. of the former. The ancients universally regarded this island as the Homeric Scheria (Σχερίη), where the enterprising and sea-loving Phaeacians dwelt, governed by their king Alcinous. The island is said to have also borne the name of Drepane (Δρεπάνη) or the "Sickle" in ancient times. About B. C. 700 it was colonised by the Corinthians under Chersicrates, one of the Bacchiadae, who drove out the Liburnians, who were then inhabiting the island. It soon became rich and powerful by its extensive commerce; it founded many colonies on the opposite coast, Epidamnus, Apollonia, Leucas, Anactorium; and it exercised such influence in the Ionian and Adriatic seas as to become a formidable rival to Corinth. Thus the two states early became involved in war, and about B. C. 664 a battle was fought between their fleets, which is memorable as the most ancient sea-fight on record. At a later period Corcyra by invoking the aid of Athens against the Corinthians became one of the proximate causes of the Peloponnesian war, 431. Shortly afterwards her power declined in consequence of civil dissensions, in which both the aristocratical and popular parties were guilty of the most horrible atrocities against each other. At last it became subject to the Romans with the rest of Greece. — Corfu is at present one of the 7 Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain and the seat of government.

Corcȳra Nigra (Curzola, in Slavonic Karkar)

an island off the coast of Illyricum, surnamed the "Black," on account of its numerous forests, to distinguish it from the more celebrated Corcyra. It contained a Greek town of the same name founded by Cnidos.

Cordŭba (Cordova), one of the largest cities in Spain, and the capital of Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis; made a Roman colony B. C. 152, and received the surname Patricia, because some Roman patricians settled there; taken by Caesar in 45 because it sided with the Pompeians; birthplace of the two Senecas and of Lucan. In the middle ages it was the capital of the kingdom of the Moors, but is now a decaying place with 55,000 inhabitants.

Corduēnē. [Gordyene.]

Cordus, Cremūtius, a Roman historian under Augustus and Tiberius, was accused in A. D. 25 of having praised Brutus and denominated Cassius "the last of the Romans." As the emperor had determined upon his death, he put an end to his own life by starvation. His works were condemned to be burnt, but some copies were preserved by his daughter Marcia and by his friends.

Cŏrē (Κόρη), the Maiden, a name by which Persephone is often called. [Persephone.]

Coressus (Κόρεσσος). 1. A lofty mountain in Ionia, 40 stadia (4 geog. miles) from Ephesus, with a place of the same name at its foot. — 2. A town in the island of Ceos.

Coressus. [Ceos.]

Corfinium (Corfiniensis), chief town of the Peligni in Samnium, not far from the Aternus, strongly fortified, and memorable as the place which the Italians in the Social war destined to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome, on which account it was called Italica.

Cŏrinna (Κόριννα), a Greek poetess, of Tanagra in Boeotia, sometimes called the Theban on account of her long residence in Thebes. She flourished about B. C. 490, and was a contemporary of Pindar, whom she is said to have instructed, and over whom she gained a victory at the public games at Thebes. Her poems were written in the Aeolic dialect. They were collected in 5 books, and were chiefly lyrical. Only a few fragments have been preserved.

Corinthiăcus Isthmus (Ἰσθμὸς Κορίνθου), often called simply the Isthmus, lay between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, and connected the Peloponnesus with the mainland or Hellas proper. In its narrowest part it was 40 stadia or 5 Roman miles across: here was the temple of Poseidon and the Isthmian games were celebrated: and here also was the Diolcos (Δίολκος), or road by which ships were dragged across from the bay of Schoenus to the harbour of Lechaeum. Four unsuccessful attempts were made to dig a canal across the Isthmus, namely, by Demetrius Poliorcetes, Julius Caesar, Caligula, and Nero.

Corinthiăcus Sinus (Κορινθιακὸς or Κορίνθιος κόλπος: G. of Lepanto), the gulf between the N. of Greece and Peloponnesus, begins, according to some, at the mouth of the Achelous in Aetolia and the promontory Araxus in Achaia, according to others, at the straits between Rhium and Antirrhium. In early times it was called the Crissaean Gulf (Κρισσαῖος κόλπος), and its eastern part the Alcyonian Sea (ἡ Ἀλκυονὶς θάλασσα).

Cŏrinthus (Κόρινθος: Κορίνθιος), called in Homer Ephyra (Ἐφύρη), a city on the above-mentioned Isthmus. Its territory, called Corinthia (Κορινθία), embraced the greater part of the Isthmus with the adjacent part of the Peloponnesus: it was bounded N. by Megaris and the Corinthian gulf, S. by Argolis, W. by Sicyonia and Phliasia, and E. by the Saronic gulf. In the N. and S. the country is mountainous, but in the centre it is a plain with a solitary and steep mountain rising from it, the Acrocorinthus (Ἀκροκόρινθος), 1900 feet in height, which served as the citadel of Corinth. The city itself was built on the N. side of this mountain; and the walls, which included the Acrocorinthus, were 86 stadia in circumference. It had 2 harbours, Cenchreae on the E. or Saronic gulf, and Lechaeum on the W. or Crissaean gulf. Its favourable position between two seas, the difficulty of carrying goods round Peloponnesus, and the facility with which they could be transported across the Isthmus, raised Corinth in very early times to great commercial prosperity, and made it the emporium of the trade between Europe and Asia. Its navy was numerous and powerful. At Corinth the first triremes were built, and the first sea-fight on record was between the Corinthians and their colonists the Corcyraeans. Its greatness at an early period is attested by numerous colonies, Ambracia, Corcyra, Apollonia, Potidaea, &c. It was adorned with magnificent buildings, and in no other city of Greece, except Athens, were the fine arts prosecuted with so much vigour and success. Its commerce brought great wealth to its inhabitants; but with their wealth, they became luxurious and licentious. Thus the worship of Aphrodite (Venus) prevailed in this city, and in her temples a vast number of courtezans was maintained. — Corinth was originally inhabited by the Aeolic race. Here ruled the Aeolic Sisyphus and his descendants. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the royal power passed into the hands of the Heraclid Alētes. The conquering Dorians became the ruling class, and the Aeolian inhabitants subject to them. After Aletes and his descendants had reigned for 5 generations, royalty was abolished; and in its stead was established an oligarchical form of government, confined to the powerful family of the Bacchiadae. This family was expelled B. C. 655 by Cypselus, who became tyrant and reigned 30 years. He was succeeded, 625, by his son Periander, who reigned 40 years. On the death of the latter, 585, his nephew Psammetichus reigned for 3 years, and on his fall in 581, the government again became an aristocracy. In the Peloponnesian war Corinth was one of the bitterest enemies of Athens. In 346 Timophanes attempted to make himself master of the city, but he was slain by his brother Timoleon. It maintained its independence till the time of the Macedonian supremacy, when its citadel was garrisoned by Macedonian troops. This garrison was expelled by Aratus in 243, whereupon Corinth joined the Achaean league, to which it continued to belong, till it was taken and destroyed in 146 by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, who treated it in the most barbarous manner. Its inhabitants were sold as slaves; its works of art, which were not destroyed by the Roman soldiery, were conveyed to Rome; its buildings were razed to the ground; and thus was destroyed the lumen totius Graeciae, as Cicero calls the city. For a century it lay in ruins; only the buildings on the Acropolis and a few temples remained standing. In 46 it was rebuilt by Caesar, who peopled it with a colony of veterans and descendants of freedmen. It was now called Colonia Julia Corinthus; it became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and soon recovered much of its ancient prosperity, but at the same time it became noted for its former licentiousness, as we see from St. Paul's epistles to the inhabitants. — The site of Corinth is indicated by 7 Doric columns, which are the only remains of the ancient city.

Cŏrĭŏlānus, the hero of one of the most beautiful of the early Roman legends. His original name was C. or Cn. Marcius, and he received the surname Coriolanus from the heroism he displayed at the capture of the Volscian town of Corioli. His haughty bearing towards the commons excited their fear and dislike, and when he was a candidate for the consulship, they refused to elect him. After this, when there was a famine in the city, and a Greek prince sent corn from Sicily, Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile, B. C. 491. He now took refuge among the Volscians, and promised to assist them in war against the Romans. Attius Tullius, the king of the Volscians, appointed Coriolanus general of the Volscian army. Coriolanus took many towns, and advanced unresisted till he came to the fossa Cluilia, or Cluilian dyke close to Rome, 489. Here he encamped, and the Romans in alarm sent to him embassy after embassy, consisting of the most distinguished men of the state. But he would listen to none of them. At length the noblest matrons of Rome, headed by Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, and Volumnia his wife, with his 2 little children, came to his tent. His mother's reproaches, and the tears of his wife and the other matrons, bent his purpose. He led back his army, and lived in exile among the Volscians till his death; though other traditions relate that he was killed by the Volscians on his return to their country.

Cŏrĭŏli (Coriolānus), a town in Latium, capital of the Volsci, from the capture of which in B. C. 493, C. Marcius obtained the surname of Coriolanus.

Cormăsa (Κόρμασα), an inland town of Pamphylia, or of Pisidia, taken by the consul Manlius.

Cornēlĭa. 1. One of the noble women at Rome, guilty of poisoning the leading men of the state, B. C. 331. — 2. Elder daughter of P. Scipio Africanus the elder, married to P. Scipio Nasica. — 3. Younger sister of No. 2, married to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, censor 169, was by him the mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. She was virtuous and accomplished, and united in her person the severe virtues of the old Roman matron, with the superior knowledge and refinement which then began to prevail in the higher classes at Rome. She superintended with the greatest care the education of her sons, whom she survived. She was almost idolized by the people, who erected a statue to her, with the inscription CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI. — 4. Daughter of L. Cinna, married to C. Caesar, afterwards dictator. She bore him his daughter Julia, and died in his quaestorship, 68. — 5. Daughter of Metellus Scipio, married first to P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir, who perished in the expedition against the Parthians, 53. Next year she married Pompey the Great, by whom she was tenderly loved. She accompanied Pompey to Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him murdered. She afterwards returned to Rome, and received from Caesar the ashes of her husband, which she preserved on his Alban estate.

Cornēlĭa Orestilla. [ORESTILLA.]

Cornēlĭa Gens, the most distinguished of all the Roman gentes. All its great families belonged to the patrician order. The names of the patrician families are: — ARVINA, CETHEGUS, CINNA, COSSUS, DOLABELLA, LENTULUS, MALUGINENSIS, MAMMULA, MERULA, RUFINUS, SCIPIO, SISENNA, and SULLA. The names of the plebeian families are BALBUS and GALLUS, and we also find various cognomens, as CHRYSOGONUS, &c. given to freedmen of this gens.

Cornēlĭus Nepos. [NEPOS.]

Cornĭcŭlum (Corniculānus), a town in Latium in the mountains N. of Tibur, taken and destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus, and celebrated as the residence of the parents of Servius Tullius.

Cornĭfĭcĭus. 1. Q., a friend of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 69, and one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship in 64. When the Catilinarian conspirators were arrested, Cethegus was committed to his care. — 2. Q., son of No. 1. In the civil war (48) he was quaestor of Caesar, who sent him into Illyricum with the title of propraetor: he reduced this province to obedience. In 45 he was appointed by Caesar governor of Syria, and in 44 governor of the province of Old Africa, where he was at the time of Caesar's death. He maintained this province for the senate, but on the establishment of the triumvirate was defeated and slain in battle by T. Sextius. Cornificius was well versed in literature. Many have attributed to him the authorship of the "Rhetorica ad Herennium," usually printed with Cicero's works; but this is only a conjecture. The Cornificius who is mentioned by Quintilian as the author of a work on rhetoric, was probably a different person from the one we are speaking of. — 3. L., one of the generals of Octavianus in the war against Sex. Pompey, and consul 35.

Cornus, a town on the W. of Sardinia.

Cornūtus, L. Annaeus, a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was born at Leptis in Libya. He came to Rome, probably as a slave, and was emancipated by the Annaei. He was the teacher and friend of the poet Persius, who has dedicated his 5th satire to him, and who left him his library and money. He was banished by Nero, A. D. 68, for having too freely criticised the literary attempts of the emperor. He wrote a large number of works, all of which are lost: the most important of them was on Aristotle's Categories.

Coroebus (Κόροιβος). 1. A Phrygian, son of Mygdon, loved Cassandra, and for that reason fought on the side of the Trojans: he was slain by Neoptolemus or Diomedes. — 2. An Elean, who gained the victory in the stadium at the Olympic games, B. C. 776: from this time the Olympiads begin to be reckoned.

Cŏrōnē (Κορώνη: Κορωνεύς -ναιεύς), a town in Messenia on the W. side of the Messenian gulf, founded B. C. 371 by the Messenians after their return to their native country, with the assistance of the Thebans: it possessed several public buildings, and in its neighbourhood was a celebrated temple of Apollo.

Cŏrōnēa (Κορώνεια: Κορωναῖος, Κορώνειος, -νιος),

1. A town in Boeotia, S.W. of the lake Copais, situate on a height between the rivers Phalarus and Curalius; a member of the Boeotian League; in its neighbourhood was the temple of Athena Itorica, where the festival of the Pamboeotia was celebrated. Near Coronea the Boeotians gained a memorable victory over the Athenians under Tolmides, B. C. 447; and here Agesilaus defeated the allied Greeks, 394. — 2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly.

Corōnis (Κορωνίς). 1. The mother of AESCULAPIUS. — 2. Daughter of Phoroneus, king of Phocis, metamorphosed by Athena into a crow, when pursued by Poseidon.

Corsēae. [CORASSIAE.]

Corsīa (Κορσεία, also Κορσιαί), a town in Boeotia on the borders of Phocis.

Corsīca, called Cyrnus by the Greeks (Κύρνος: Κύρνιος, Κυρναῖος, Corsus: Corsica), an island N. of Sardinia, spoken of by the ancients as one of the 7 large islands in the Mediterranean. The ancients, however, exaggerate for the most part the size of the island; its greatest length is 116 miles, and its greatest breadth about 51. It is mountainous and was not much cultivated in antiquity. A range of mountains running from S. to N. separates it into 2 parts, of which the E. half was more cultivated, while the W. half was covered almost entirely with wood. Honey and wax were the principal productions of the island; but the honey had a bitter taste from the yew-trees with which the island abounded. (Cyrneas taxos, Virg. Ecl. ix. 30.) The inhabitants were a rude mountain race, addicted to robbery, and paying little attention to agriculture. Even in the time of the Roman empire their character had not much improved, as we see from the description of Seneca, who was banished to this island. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Iberians; but in early times Ligurians, Tyrrhenians, Carthaginians, and even Greeks [ALERIA], settled in the island. It was subject to the Carthaginians at the commencement of the 1st Punic war, but soon afterwards passed into the hands of the Romans, and subsequently formed a part of the Roman province of Sardinia. The Romans founded several colonies in the island, of which the most important were MARIANA and ALERIA.

Corsōtē (Κορσωτή: Ersey, Ru.), a city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the Mascas or Saocoras (Wady-el-Seba), which Xenophon found already deserted.

Cortōna. (Cortonensis: Cortona), one of the 12 cities of Etruria, lay N.W. of the Trasimene lake, and was one of the most ancient cities in Italy. It is said to have been orginally called Corythus from its reputed founder Corythus, who is represented as the father of Dardanus. It is also called Croton, Cothornia, Cyrtonium, &c. The Creston mentioned by Herodotus (i. 57) was probably Creston in Thrace and not Cortona, as many modern writers have supposed. Crotona is said to have been originally founded by the Umbrians, then to have been conquered by the Pelasgians, and subsequently to have passed into the hands of the Etruscans. It was afterwards colonized by the Romans, but under their dominion sunk into insignificance. The remains of the Peasgic walls of this city are some of the most remarkable in all Italy: there is one fragment 120 feet in length, composed of blocks of enormous magnitude.

Coruncānius, Ti., consul B. C. 280, with P. Valerius Laevinus, fought with success against the Etruscans and Pyrrhus. He was the first plebeian who was created pontifex maximus. He was one of the most remarkable men of his age, possessed a profound knowledge of pontifical and civil law, and was the first person at Rome who gave regular instruction in law.

Corvīnus Messala. [MESSALA.]

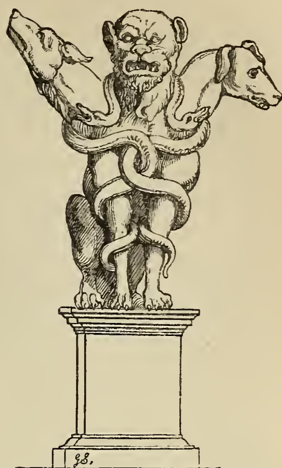
Corvus, M. Vălĕrius, one of the most illustrious men in the early history of Rome. He obtained the surname of Corvus, or "Raven," because, when serving as military tribune under Camillus, B. C. 349, he accepted the challenge of a gigantic Gaul to single combat, and was assisted in the conflict by a raven which settled upon his helmet, and flew in the face of the barbarian. He was 6 times consul, B. C. 348, 346, 343, 335, 300, 299, and twice dictator, 342, 301, and by his military abilities rendered the most memorable services to his country. His most brilliant victories were gained in his third consulship, 343, when he defeated the Samnites at Mt. Gaurus and at Suessula; and in his other consulships he repeatedly defeated the Etruscans and other enemies of Rome. He reached the age of 100 years, and is frequently referred to by the later Roman writers as a memorable example of the favours of fortune.

Cŏrybantes, priests of Cybele or Rhea in Phrygia, who celebrated her worship with enthusiastic dances, to the sound of the drum and the cymbal. They are often identified with the Curetes and the Idaean Dactyli, and thus are said to have been the nurses of Zeus in Crete. They were called Galli at Rome.

Cōrycia (Κωρυκία or Κωρυκίς), a nymph, who became by Apollo the mother of Lycorus or Lycoreus, and from whom the Corycian cave in mount Parnassus was believed to have derived its name. The Muses are sometimes called by the poets Corycides Nymphae.

Cōrycus (Κώρυκος: Κωρύκιος, Corycius). 1. (Koraka), a high rocky hill on the coast of Ionia, forming the S.W. promontory of the Erythraean peninsula. — 2. A city of Pamphylia, near Phaselis and Mt. Olympus; colonized afresh by Attalus II. Philadelphus; taken, and probably destroyed, by P. Servilius Isauricus. — 3. (Ru. opp. the island of Khorgos), a city in Cilicia Aspera, with a good harbour, between the mouths of the Lamus and the Calycadnus. 20 stadia (2 geog. miles) from the city, was a grotto or glen in the mountains, called the Corycian Cave (Κωρύκιον ἄντρον) celebrated by the poets, and also famous for its saffron. At the distance of 100 stadia (10 geog. miles) from Corycus, was a promontory of the same name.

Corydallus (Κορυδαλλός: Κορυδαλλεύς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, situate on the mountain of the same name, which divides the plain of Athens from that of Eleusis.



Coryphasīum (Κορυφάσιον), a promontory in Messenia, enclosing the harbour of Pylos on the N., with a town of the same name upon it.

Cŏrythus (Κόρυθος), an Italian hero, son of Jupiter, husband of Electra, and father of Iasius and Dardanus, is said to have founded Corythus (Cortona).

Cōs, Cōŏs, Cōüs (Κῶς, Κόως; Κῷος, Coüs; Kos, Stanco), one of the islands called Sporades, lay off the coast of Caria, at the mouth of the Ceramic Gulf, opposite to Halicarnassus. In early times it was called Merŏpis and Nymphaea. It was colonized by Aeolians, but became a member of the Dorian confederacy. Its chief city, Cos, stood on the N.E. side of the island, in a beautiful situation, and had a good harbour. Near it stood the Asclepiēum, or temple of Asclepius, to whom the island was sacred, and from whom its chief family, the Asclepiadae, claimed their descent. The island was very fertile; its chief productions were wine, ointments, and the light transparent dresses called "Coae vestes." It was the birthplace of the physician Hippocrates, who was an Asclepiad, of the poet Philetas, and of the painter Apelles, whose pictures of Antigonus and of Venus Anadyomene adorned the Asclepiēum. Under the Romans, Cos was favoured by Claudius, who made it a free state, and by Antoninus Pius, who rebuilt the city of Cos after its destruction by an earthquake.

Cŏsa or Cossa (Cossānus). 1. (Ansedonia, about 5 miles S. E. of Orbetello), a city of Etruria near the sea, with a good harbour, called Herculis Portus, was a very ancient place; and after the fall of Falerii one of the 12 Etruscan cities. It was colonized by the Romans B. C. 273, and received in 197 an addition of 1000 colonists. There are still extensive ruins of its walls and towers, built of polygonal masonry. — 2. A town in Lucania near Thurii.

Coscōnius. 1. C., praetor in the Social war, B. C. 89, defeated the Samnites. — 2. C., praetor in the consulship of Cicero 63; governed in the following year the province of Further Spain; was one of the 20 commissioners, in 59, to carry into execution the agrarian law of Julius Caesar, but died in this year. — 3. C., tribune of the plebs 59, aedile 57, and one of the judices at the trial of P. Sextius, 56.

Cosmas (Κοσμᾶς), commonly called INDICOPLEUSTES (Indian navigator), an Egyptian monk, flourished in the reign of Justinian, about A. D. 535. In early life he followed the employment of a merchant, and visited many foreign countries, of which he gave an account in his Τοπογραφία Χριστιανική, Topographia Christiana, in 12 books, of which the greater part is extant.

Cosrōes. 1. King of Parthia. [ARSACES XXV.] — 2. King of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

Cossaea (Κοσσαία), a district in and about M. Zagros, on the N.E. side of Susiana, and on the confines of Media and Persis, inhabited by a rude, warlike, predatory people, the Cossaei (Κοσσαῖοι), whom the Persian kings never subdued, but on the contrary, purchased their quiet by paying them tribute. Alexander conquered them (B.C. 325–24), and with difficulty kept them in subjection; after his death, they soon regained their independence. Their name is supposed to have been the origin of the modern name of Susiana, Khuzistan, and is possibly connected with the Cush of the O. T.

Cossus, Cornēlius, the name of several illustrious Romans in the early history of the republic. Of these the most celebrated was Ser. Cornelius Cossus, consul B. C. 428, who killed Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Veii, in single combat, and dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius — the 2nd of the 3 instances in which the spolia opima were won.

Cossutius, a Roman architect, who rebuilt at the expense of Antiochus Epiphanes the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens, about B. C. 168, in the most magnificent Corinthian style.

Cosȳra (Pantelaria), also written Cossyra, Cosyrus, Cosura, Cossura, a small island in the Mediterranean near Malta.

Cōthon. [CARTHAGO.]

Cōtiso, a king of the Dacians, conquered in the reign of Augustus by Lentulus.

Cotta, Aurēlius. 1. C., consul B. C. 252 and 248, in both of which years he fought in Sicily against the Carthaginians with success. — 2. C., consul 200, fought against the Boii and the other Gauls in the N. of Italy. — 3. L., tribune of the plebs 154, and consul 144. — 4. L., consul 119, opposed C. Marius, who was then tribune of the plebs. — 5. C., was accused under the lex Varia, 91, of supporting the claims of the Italian allies, and went into voluntary exile. He returned to Rome when Sulla was dictator, 82; and in 75 he was consul with L. Octavius. He obtained the government of Gaul, and died immediately after his return to Rome. He was one of the most distinguished orators of his time, and is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in the De Oratore, and the De Natura Deorum, in the latter of which works he maintains the cause of the Academics. — 6. M., brother of No. 5, consul 74, with L. Licinius Lucullus, obtained Bithynia for his province, and was defeated by Mithridates near Chalcedon. — 7. L., brother of Nos. 5 and 6, praetor 70, when he carried the celebrated law (lex Aurelia judiciaria) which entrusted the judicia to the senators, equites, and tribuni aerarii. He was consul 65 with L. Manlius Torquatus, after the consuls elect, P. Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, had been condemned of ambitus. He supported Cicero during his consulship, and proposed his recall from exile. In the civil war he joined Caesar, whom he survived.

Cotta, L. Aurunculēius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, perished along with Sabinus in the attack made upon them by Ambiorix, B. C. 54. [AMBIORIX.]

Cottius, son of Donnus, king of several Ligurian tribes in the Cottian Alps, which derived their name from him. [ALPES.] He submitted to Augustus, who granted him the sovereignty over 12 of these tribes, with the title of Praefectus. Cottius thereupon made roads over the Alps, and erected (B. C. 8) at Segusio (Suza), a triumphal arch in honour of Augustus, extant at the present day. His authority was transmitted to his son, upon whom Claudius conferred the title of king. On his death, his kingdom was made a Roman province by Nero.

Cottus, a giant with 100 hands, son of Uranus and Gaea.

Cotȳla, L. Varius, one of Antony's most intimate friends, fought on his side at Mutina, B. C. 43.

Cōtylus (Κότυλος), the highest peak of M. Ida in the Troad, containing the sources of the rivers Scamander, Granicus, and Aesepus.

Cōtyōra (Κοτύωρα), a colony of Sinope, in the territory of the Tibareni, on the coast of Pontus Polemoniacus, at the W. end of a bay of the same name, celebrated as the place where the 10,000 Greeks embarked for Sinope. The foundation of Pharnacia reduced it to insignificance.

Cŏtys or Cŏtytto (Κότυς or Κοτυττώ), a Thracian divinity, whose festival, the Cotyttia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), resembled that of the Phrygian Cybele, and was celebrated with licentious revelry. In later times her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth. Those who celebrated her festival were called Baptae, from the purifications which were originally connected with the solemnity.

Cŏtys (Κότυς). 1. King of Thrace, B. C. 382—358, was for a short time a friend of the Athenians, but carried on war with them towards the close of his reign. He was cruel and sanguinary, and was much addicted to gross luxury and drunkenness. He was murdered by two brothers whose father he had injured.—2. King of the Odrysae in Thrace, assisted Perseus against Rome, B. C. 168. His son was taken prisoner and carried to Rome, whereupon he sued for peace and was pardoned by the Romans. —3. A king of Thrace, who took part against Caesar with Pompey, 48. — 4. King of Thrace, son of Rhoemetalces, in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He carried on war with his uncle Rhescuporis, by whom he was murdered, A. D. 19. Ovid, during his exile at Tomi, addressed an epistle to him (Ex Pont. ii. 9).

Crăgus (Κράγος), a mountain consisting of 8 summits, being a continuation of Taurus to the W., and forming, at its extremity, the S.W. promontory of Lycia (Yedy-Booroon, i. e. Seven Capes). Some of its summits show traces of volcanic action, and the ancients had a tradition to the same effect. At its foot was a town of the same name, on the sea-shore, between Pydna and Patara. Parallel to it, N. of the river Glaucus, was the chain of Anticrăgus. The greatest height of Cragus exceeds 3000 feet.

Cranae (Κρανάη), the island to which Paris first carried Helen from Peloponnesus (Hom. Il. iii. 445), is said by some to be an island off Gythium in Laconia, by others to be the island Helena off Attica, and by others again to be Cythera.

Cranăus (Κραναός), king of Attica, the son-in-law and successor of Cecrops. He was deprived of his kingdom by his son-in-law Amphictyon.

Cranii-ium (Κράνιοι, Κράνιον: Κράνιος: Krania nr. Argostoli), a town of Cephallenia on the S. coast.

Crānōn or Crannōn (Κρανών, Κραννών: Κραννώνιος), in ancient times Ephyra, a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, not far from Larissa.

Crantor (Κράντωρ), of Soli in Cilicia, an Academic philosopher, studied at Athens under Xenocrates and Polemo, and flourished B. C. 300. He was the author of several works, all of which are lost, and was the first who wrote commentaries on Plato's works. Most of his writings related to moral subjects (Hor. Ep. i. 2. 4). One of his most celebrated works was On Grief, of which Cicero made great use in the 3rd book of his Tusculan Disputations, and in the Consolatio, which he composed on the death of his daughter, Tullia.

Crassĭpes, Furĭus, Cicero's son-in-law, the second husband of Tullia, whom he married B. C. 56, but from whom he was shortly afterwards divorced.

Crassus, Licinĭus. 1. P., praetor B.C. 176, and consul 171, when he carried on the war against Perseus. — 2. C., brother of No. 1, praetor 172, and consul 168. — 3. C., probably son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 145, was distinguished as a popular leader. — 4. P., surnamed Dives or Rich, elected pontifex maximus 212, curule aedile 211, praetor 208, and consul 205 with Scipio Africanus, when he carried on war against Hannibal in the S. of Italy. He died 183.— 5. P., surnamed Dives Mucianus, son of P. Mucius Scaevola, was adopted by the son of No. 4. In 131 he was consul and pontifex maximus, and was the first priest of that rank who went beyond Italy. He carried on war against Aristonicus in Asia, but was defeated and slain. He was a good orator and jurist. — 6. M., surnamed Agelastus, because he is said never to have laughed, was grandfather of Crassus the triumvir. — 7. P., surnamed Dives, son of No. 6, and father of the triumvir. He was the proposer of the lex Licinia, to prevent excessive expense in banquets, but in what year is uncertain. He was consul 97, and carried on war in Spain for some years. He was censor 89 with L. Julius Caesar. In the civil war he took part with Sulla, and put an end to his own life, when Marius and Cinna returned to Rome at the end of 87. — 8. M., surnamed Dives, the triumvir, younger son of No. 7. His life was spared by Cinna, after the death of his father; but fearing Cinna, he afterwards escaped to Spain, where he concealed himself for 8 months. On the death of Cinna in 84, he collected some forces and crossed over into Africa, whence he passed into Italy in 83 and joined Sulla, on whose side he fought against the Marian party. On the defeat of the latter, he was rewarded by donations of confiscated property, and thus greatly increased his patrimony. His ruling passion was money, and he devoted all his energies to its accumulation. He was a keen and sagacious speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and, in order to increase their value, had them instructed in lucrative arts. He worked silver mines, cultivated farms, and built houses, which he let at high rents. In 71 he was appointed praetor in order to carry on the war against Spartacus and the gladiators; he defeated Spartacus, who was slain in the battle, and he was honoured with an ovation. In 70 Crassus was consul with Pompey; he entertained the populace at a banquet of 10,000 tables, and distributed corn enough to supply the family of every citizen for 3 months. He did not, however, co-operate cordially with Pompey, of whose superior influence he was jealous. He was afterwards reconciled to Pompey by Caesar's mediation, and thus was formed between them, in 60, the so-called triumvirate. [See p. 133, b.] In 55 Crassus was again consul with Pompey, and received the province of Syria, where he hoped both to increase his wealth and to acquire military glory by attacking the Parthians. He set out for his province before the expiration of his consulship, and continued his march notwithstanding the unfavourable omens which occurred to him at almost every step. After crossing the Euphrates in 54, he did not follow up the attack upon Parthia, but returned to Syria, where he passed the winter. In 53 he again crossed the Euphrates; he was misled by a crafty Arabian chieftain to march into the plains of Mesopotamia, where he was attacked by Surenas, the general of the Parthian king, Orodes. In the battle which followed Crassus was defeated with immense slaughter, and retreated with the remainder of his troops to Carrhae (the Haran of Scripture). The mutinous threats of his troops compelled him to accept a perfidious invitation from Surenas, who offered a pacific interview, at which he was slain either by the enemy, or by some friend who desired to save him from the disgrace of becoming a prisoner. His head was cut off and sent to Orodes, who caused melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying, "Sate thyself now with that metal of which in life thou wert so greedy." — 9. M., surnamed Dives, son of No. 8, served under Caesar in Gaul, and at the breaking out of the civil war in 49, was praefect in Cisalpine Gaul. — 10. P., younger son of No. 8., was Caesar's legate in Gaul from 58 to 55. In 54 he followed his father to Syria, and fell in the battle against the Parthians. — 11. L., the celebrated orator. At the age of 21 (B. C. 119), he attracted great notice by his prosecution of C. Carbo. He was consul in 95 with Q. Scaevola, when he proposed a law to compel all who were not citizens to depart from Rome: the rigour of this law was one of the causes of the Social war. He was afterwards proconsul of Gaul. In 92 he was censor, when he caused the schools of the Latin rhetoricians to be closed. He died in 91, a few days after opposing in the senate the consul L. Philippus, an enemy of the aristocracy. Crassus was fond of elegance and luxury. His house upon the Palatium was one of the most beautiful at Rome, and was adorned with costly works of art. As an orator he surpassed all his contemporaries. In the treatise De Oratore Cicero introduces him as one of the speakers, and he is understood to express Cicero's own sentiments.

Crastĭnus, one of Caesar's veterans, commenced the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48, and died fighting bravely in the foremost line.

Cratĕrus (Κρατερός). 1. A distinguished general of Alexander the Great, on whose death (B. C. 323) he received in common with Antipater the government of Macedonia and Greece. He arrived in Greece in time to render effectual assistance to Antipater in the Lamian war. At the close of this war he married Phila, the daughter of Antipater. Soon after he accompanied Antipater in the war against the Aetolians, and in that against Perdiccas in Asia. He fell in a battle against Eumenes, in 321. — 2. Brother of Antigonus Gonatas, compiled historical documents relative to the history of Attica. — 3. A Greek physician, who attended the family of Atticus, mentioned also by Horace (Sat. ii. 3. 161).

Crătēs (Κράτης). 1. An Athenian poet of the old comedy, began to flourish B. C. 449, and was one of the most celebrated of the comic poets. He excelled chiefly in mirth and fun, and was the first Attic poet who brought drunken persons on the stage. — 2. Of Tralles, an orator or rhetorician of the school of Isocrates. — 3. Of Thebes, a pupil of the Cynic Diogenes, and one of the most distinguished of the Cynic philosophers, flourished about 320. Though heir to a large fortune, he renounced it all, and lived and died as a true Cynic, disregarding all external pleasures, and restricting himself to the most absolute necessaries. He received the surname of the "Door-opener," because it was his practice to visit every house at Athens, and rebuke its inmates. He married Hipparchia, the daughter of a family of distinction, who threatened to commit suicide when her parents opposed her union with the philosopher. He wrote several works which are lost, for the epistles extant under his name are not genuine. — 4. Of Athens, the pupil and friend of Polemo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy, about 270. He was the teacher of Arcesilaüs, Theodorus, and Bion Borysthenites. — 5. Of Mallus in Cilicia, a celebrated grammarian. He was brought up at Tarsus. whence he removed to Pergamos, where he founded the Pergamene school of grammar, in opposition to the Alexandrian. He wrote a commentary on the Homeric poems, in opposition to Aristarchus, and supported the system of anomaly (ἀνωμαλία) against that of analogy (ἀναλογία). He also wrote commentaries on the other Greek poets, and works on other subjects, of which only fragments have come down to us. In 157 he was sent by Attalus as an ambassador to Rome, where he introduced for the first time the study of grammar.

Crăthis (Κρᾶθις). 1. (Crata), a river in Achaia, rises in a mountain of the same name in Arcadia, receives the Styx flowing down from Nonacris, and falls into the sea near Aegae. — 2. (Crati), a river in lower Italy, forming the boundary on the E. between Lucania and Bruttii, and falling into the sea near Sybaris. At its mouth was a celebrated temple of Minerva: its waters were fabled to dye the hair blond.

Cratīnus (Κρατῖνος). 1. One of the most celebrated of the Athenian poets of the old comedy, was born B. C. 519, but did not begin to exhibit till 454, when he was 65 years of age. He exhibited 21 plays and gained 9 victories. He was the poet of the old comedy. He gave it its peculiar character, and he did not, like Aristophanes, live to see its decline. Before his time the comic poets had aimed at little beyond exciting the laughter of their audience: he was the first who made comedy a terrible weapon of personal attack, and the comic poet a severe censor of public and private vice. He is frequently attacked by Aristophanes, who charges him with habitual intemperance, an accusation which was admitted by Cratinus himself, who treated the subject in a very amusing way in his Πυτίνη. This play was acted in 423, when the poet was 96 years of age; it gained the prize over the Connus of Amipsias and the Clouds of Aristophanes. Cratinus died in the following year, at the age of 97. — 2. The younger, an Athenian poet of the middle comedy, a contemporary of Plato the philosopher, flourished as late as 324.

Crătippus (Κράτιππος). 1. A Greek historian and contemporary of Thucydides, whose work he completed. — 2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene, a contemporary of Pompey and Cicero, the latter of whom praises him highly. He accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. He afterwards settled at Athens, where young M. Cicero was his pupil in 44. Through the influence of Cicero, Cratippus obtained from Caesar the Roman citizenship.

Crătos (Κράτος), the personification of strength, a son of Uranus and Ge.

Cratўlus (Κράτυλος), a Greek philosopher, a pupil of Heraclitus, and one of Plato's teachers. Plato introduces him as one of the speakers in the dialogue which bears his name.

Cremĕra, a small river in Etruria, which falls into the Tiber a little above Rome: memorable for the death of the 300 Fabii.

Cremna (Κρῆμνα: Gherme, Ru.), a strongly fortified city of Pisidia, built on a precipitous rock in the Taurus range, and noted for repeated obstinate defences: a colony under Augustus.

Cremni (Κρημνοί), an emporium of the free Scythians on the W. side of the Palus Maeotis.

Cremōna (Cremonensis: Cremona), a Roman colony in the N. of Italy, N. of the Po, and at no great distance from the confluence of the Addua and the Po, was founded together with Placentia B. C. 219 as a protection against the Gauls and Hannibal's invading army. It soon became a place of great importance and one of the most flourishing cities in the N. of Italy; but having espoused the cause of Vitellius, it was totally destroyed by the troops of Vespasian, A. D. 69. It was rebuilt by Vespasian, but never recovered its former greatness.

Cremōnis Jugum. [Alpes.]

Cremūtius Cordus. [Cordus.]

Creōn (Κρέων). 1. King of Corinth, son of Lycaethus, whose daughter, Glauce or Creusa, married Jason. Medēa, thus forsaken, sent Glauce a garment which burnt her to death when she put it on; the palace took fire, and Creon perished in the flames. — 2. Son of Menoecus, and brother of Jocaste, the wife of Laius. After the death of Laius, Creon governed Thebes for a short time, and then surrendered the kingdom to Oedipus, who had delivered the country from the Sphinx. [Oedipus.] When Eteocles and Polynīces, the sons of Oedipus, fell in battle by each other's hands, Creon became king of Thebes. His cruelty in forbidding burial to the corpse of Polynīces, and his sentencing Antigone to death for disobeying his orders, occasioned the death of his own son Haemon. For details see Antigone.

Creōphўlus (Κρεώφυλος), of Chios, one of the earliest epic poets, said to have been the friend or son-in-law of Homer. The epic poem Οἰχαλία or Οἰχαλίας ἅλωσις, ascribed to him, related the contest which Hercules, for the sake of Iole, undertook with Eurytus, and the capture of Oechalia.

Cresphontes (Κρησφόντης), an Heraclid, son of Aristomachus, and one of the conquerors of Peloponnesus, obtained Messenia for his share. During an insurrection of the Messenians, he and two of his sons were slain. A third son, Aepytus, avenged his death. [Aepytus.]

Crestōnĭa (Κρηστωνία: ἡ Κρηστωνική), a district in Macedonia between the Axius and Strymon, near Mt. Cercine, inhabited by the Crestonaei (Κρηστωναῖοι), a Thracian people: their chief town was Creston or Crestōne (Κρήστων, Κρηστώνη), founded by the Pelasgians. This town is erroneously supposed by some writers to be the same as Cortona in Italy.

Crēta (Κρήτη: Κρηταῖος: Candia), one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean sea, nearly equidistant from Europe, Asia, and Africa, but always reckoned as part of Europe. Its length from E. to W. is about 160 miles: its breadth is very unequal, being in the widest part about 35 miles, and in the narrowest only 6. A range of mountains runs through the whole length of the island from E. to W., sending forth spurs N. and S.: in the centre of the island rises Mt. Ida far above all the others. [Ida.] The rivers of Crete are numerous, but are little more than mountain-torrents, and are for the most part dry in summer. The country was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility and salubrity. — Crete was inhabited at an early period by a numerous and civilized population. Homer speaks of its hundred cities (Κρήτη ἑκατόμπολις, Il. ii. 649); and before the Trojan war mythology told of a king Minos, who resided at Cnossus, and ruled over the greater part of the island. He is said to have given laws to Crete, and to have been the first prince who had a navy, with which he suppressed piracy in the Aegaean. After his descendants had governed the island for some generations, royalty was abolished, and the cities became independent republics, of which Cnossus and Gortyna were the most important, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the rest. The ruling class were the Dorians who settled in Crete about 60 years after the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, and reduced the former inhabitants, the Pelasgians and Achaeans, to subjection. The social and political institutions of the island thus became Dorian, and many of the ancients supposed that the Spartan constitution was borrowed from Crete. The chief magistrates in the cities were the Cosmi, 10 in number, chosen from certain families: there was also a Gerusia, or senate; and an Ecclesia or popular assembly, which, however, had very little power. (For details, see Dict. of Ant. art. Cosmi.) At a later time the power of the aristocracy was overthrown and a democratical form of government established. The ancient Doric customs likewise disappeared, and the people became degenerate in their morals and character. The historian Polybius accuses them of numerous vices, and the Apostle Paul, quoting the Cretan poet Epimenides, describes them as "alway liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (Titus, i. 12). — The Cretans were celebrated as archers, and frequently served as mercenaries in the armies of other nations. The island was conquered by Q. Metellus, who received in consequence the surname Creticus (B. C. 68—66), and it became a Roman province. Crete and Cyrenaica subsequently formed one province.

Crēteus or Catreus (Κρητεύς), son of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and father of Althemenes.

Crētheus (Κρηθεύς), son of Aeolus and Enarete, wife of Tyro, and father of Aeson, Pheres, Amythaon, and Hippolyte: he was the founder of Iolcus.

Crētŏpŏlis (Κρητόπολις), a town in the district of Milyas in Asia Minor, assigned sometimes to Pisidia, sometimes to Pamphylia.

Crĕūsa (Κρέουσα). 1. A Naiad, daughter of Oceanus, became by Peneus the mother of Hypseus and Stilbe. — 2. Daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithea, wife of Xuthus, and mother of Achaeus and Ion. She is said to have been beloved by Apollo, whence Ion is sometimes called her son by this god. — 3. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Aeneas, and mother of Ascanius. She perished on the night of the capture of Troy, having been separated from her husband in the confusion. — 4. Daughter of Creon, who fell a victim to the vengeance of Medea. [Creon, No. 1.]

Creusis or Creūsa (Κρεῦσις, Κρέουσα: Κρευσιεύς), a town on the E. coast of Boeotia, the harbour of Thespiae.

Crimīsa or Crimissa (Κρίμισα, Κρίμισσα: C. dell' Alice), a promontory on the E. coast of Bruttium, with a town of the same name upon it, said to have been founded by Philoctetes, a little S. of the river Crimisus.

Crimīsus or Crimissus (Κριμισός, Κριμισσός), a river in the W. of Sicily, falls into the Hypsa: on its banks Timoleon defeated the Carthaginians, B. C. 339.

Crinăgŏras (Κριναγόρας), of Mytilene, the author of 50 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Augustus.

Crispīnus, a person ridiculed by Horace (Sat. i. 1. 120), is said to have written bad verses on the Stoic philosophy, and to have been surnamed Aretalogus.

Crispus, Flavĭus Julĭus, eldest son of Constantine the Great, was appointed Caesar A. D. 317, and gained great distinction in a campaign against the Franks and in the war with Licinius. But having excited the jealousy of his step-mother Fausta, he was put to death by his father, 326.

Crispus Passiēnus, husband of Agrippina, and step-father of the emperor Nero, was distinguished as an orator.

Crispus, Vībĭus, of Vercelli, a contemporary of Quintilian, and a distinguished orator.

Crissa or Crisa (Κρίσσα, Κρίσα: Κρισσαῖος), and Cirrha (Κίῤῥα: Κιῤῥαῖος), towns in Phocis, regarded by some ancient, as well as by some modern writers as the same; but it seems most probable that Crissa was a town inland S.W. of Delphi, and that Cirrha was its port in the Crissaean gulf. The inhabitants of these towns levied contributions upon the pilgrims frequenting the Delphic oracle, in consequence of which the Amphictyons declared war against them, B.C. 595, and eventually destroyed them. Their territory, the rich Crissaean plain, was declared sacred to the Delphic god, and was forbidden to be cultivated. The cultivation of this plain by the inhabitants of Amphissa led to the Sacred War, in which Philip was chosen general of the Amphictyons, 338. Crissa remained in ruins, but Cirrha was afterwards rebuilt, and became the harbour of Delphi.

Crĭtĭas (Κριτίας). 1. Son of Dropides, a contemporary and relation of Solon's. — 2. Son of Callaeschrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the pupils of Socrates, by whose instructions he profited but little in a moral point of view. He was banished from Athens, and on his return he became leader of the oligarchical party. He was one of the 30 tyrants established by the Spartans B.C. 404, and was conspicuous above all his colleagues for rapacity and cruelty. He was slain at the battle of Munychia in the same year, fighting against Thrasybulus and the exiles. He was a distinguished orator, and some of his speeches were extant in the time of Cicero. He also wrote poems, dramas, and other works. Some fragments of his elegies are still extant.

Crĭtŏlāus (Κριτόλαος). 1. Of Phaselis in Lycia, studied philosophy at Athens under Ariston of Ceos, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school. In B.C. 155 he was sent by the Athenians as ambassador to Rome with Carneades and Diogenes. [CARNEADES.] He lived upwards of 82 years, but we have no further particulars of his life. — 2. General of the Achaean League, 147, distinguished by his bitter enmity to the Romans. He was defeated by Metellus, and was never heard of after the battle.

Crĭton (Κρίτων). 1. Of Athens, a friend and disciple of Socrates, whom he supported with his fortune. He had made every arrangement for the escape of Socrates from prison, and tried, in vain, to persuade him to fly, as we see from Plato's dialogue named after him. Criton wrote 17 dialogues on philosophical subjects, which are lost. — 2. A physician at Rome in the 1st or 2nd century after Christ, perhaps the person mentioned by Martial (Epigr. xi. 60.6): he wrote several medical works.

Criū-mĕtōpon (Κριοῦ μέτωπον), i.e. "Ram's Front." — 1. A promontory at the S. of the Tauric Chersonesus. — 2. A promontory at the S.W. of Crete.

Crīus (Κρῖος), one of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge.

Crŏcŏdīlŏpŏlis (Κροκοδείλων πόλις). 1. (Embeshunda?), a city of Upper Egypt, in the Nomos Aphroditopolites. — 2. [ARSINOË, No. 7.]

Crŏcus, the beloved friend of Smilax, was changed by the gods into a saffron plant.

Crocylēa (τὰ Κροκύλεια), according to Homer (Il. ii. 633), a place in Ithaca, but according to Strabo, in Leucas in Acarnania.

Croesus (Κροῖσος), last king of Lydia, son of Alyattes, reigned B.C. 560—546, but was probably associated in the kingdom during his father's life. The early part of his reign was most glorious. He subdued all the nations between the Aegaean and the river Halys, and made the Greeks in Asia Minor tributary to him. The fame of his power and wealth drew to his court at Sardis all the wise men of Greece, and among them Solon, whose interview with the king was celebrated in antiquity. In reply to the question who was the happiest man he had ever seen, the sage taught the king that no man should be deemed happy till he had finished his life in a happy way. Alarmed at the growing power of the Persians, Croesus sent to consult the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, whether he should march against the Persians. Upon the reply of the oracle, that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, he collected a vast army and marched against Cyrus. Near Sinope an indecisive battle was fought between the two armies; whereupon he returned to Sardis, and disbanded his forces, commanding them to reassemble in the following spring. But Cyrus appeared unexpectedly before Sardis; Croesus led out the forces still remaining with him, but was defeated, and the city was taken after a siege of 14 days. Croesus, who was taken alive, was condemned to be burnt to death. As he stood before the pyre, the warning of Solon came to his mind, and he thrice uttered the name of Solon. Cyrus inquired who it was that he called on; and, upon hearing the story, repented of his purpose, and not only spared the life of Croesus, but made him his friend. Croesus survived Cyrus, and accompanied Cambyses in his expedition against Egypt.

Crommȳōn or Cromȳōn (Κρομμυών, Κρομυών), a town in Megaris on the Saronic gulf, afterwards belonged to Corinth; celebrated in mythology on account of its wild sow, which was slain by Theseus.

Cronĭus Mons (Κρόνιον ὄρος), a mountain in Elis near Olympia, with a temple of Cronus.

Crŏnus (Κρόνος), the youngest of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge, father by Rhea of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, Poseidon, and Zeus. At the instigation of his mother, Cronus unmanned his father for having thrown the Cyclopes, who were likewise his children by Ge, into Tartarus. Out of the blood thus shed sprang up the Erinnyes. When the Cyclopes were delivered from Tartarus, the government of the world was taken from Uranus and given to Cronus, who in his turn lost it through Zeus, as was predicted to him by Ge and Uranus. [ZEUS.] The Romans identified their Saturnus with Cronus. [SATURNUS.]

Cropīa (Κρωπεία), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Leontis.

Crŏtōn or Crotōna (Crotoniensis, Crotonensis, Crotoniata: Crotona), a Greek city on the E. coast of Bruttium, on the river Aesarus, and in a very healthy locality, was founded by the Achaeans under Myscellus of Aegae, assisted by the Spartans, B. C. 710. Its extensive commerce, the virtue of its inhabitants, and the excellence of its institutions, made it the most powerful and flourishing town in the S. of Italy. It owed much of its greatness to Pythagoras, who established his school here. Gymnastics were cultivated here in greater perfection than in any other Greek city; and one of its citizens, Milo, was the most celebrated athlete in Greece. It attained its greatest power by the destruction of Sybaris in 510; but it subsequently declined in consequence of the severe defeat it sustained from the Locrians on the river Sagras. It suffered greatly in the wars with Dionysius, Agathocles, and Pyrrhus; and in the 2nd Punic war a considerable part of it had ceased to be inhabited. It received a colony from the Romans in 195.

Crustumĕrĭa, -rĭum, also Crustumĭum (Crustumīnus), a town of the Sabines, situated in the mountains near the sources of the Allia, was conquered both by Romulus and Tarquinius Priscus, and is not mentioned in later times.

Cteatus. [Moliones.]

Ctēsĭas (Κτήσιας), of Cnidus in Caria, a contemporary of Xenophon, was private physician of Artaxerexes Mnemon, whom he accompanied in his war against his brother Cyrus, B. C. 401. He lived 17 years at the Persian court, and wrote in the Ionic dialect a great work on the history of Persia (Περσικὰ), in 23 books. The first 6 contained the history of the Assyrian monarchy down to the foundation of the kingdom of Persia. The next 7 contained the history of Persia down to the end of the reign of Xerxes, and the remaining 10 carried the history down to the time when Ctesias left Persia, i. e. to the year 398. All that is now extant is a meagre abridgment in Photius and a number of fragments preserved in Diodorus and other writers. The work of Ctesias was compiled from Oriental sources, and its statements are frequently at variance with those of Herodotus. Ctesias also wrote a work on India (Ἰνδικά) in one book, of which we possess an abridgment in Photius. This work contains numerous fables, but it probably gives a faithful picture of India, as it was conceived by the Persians. The abridgment which Photius made of the Persica and Indica of Ctesias has been printed separately by Lion, Göttingen, 1823, and by Bähr, Frankfort, 1824.

Ctēsĭbĭus (Κτησίβιος), celebrated for his mechanical inventions, lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, about B. C. 250. His father was a barber, but his own taste led him to devote himself to mechanics. He is said to have invented a clepsydra or water-clock, a hydraulic organ (ὕδραυλις), and other machines, and to have been the first to discover the elastic force of air and apply it as a moving power. He was the teacher, and has been supposed to have been the father of Hero Alexandrinus.

Ctēsĭphōn (Κτησιφῶν), son of Leosthenes of Anaphlystus, was accused by Aeschines for having proposed the decree, that Demosthenes should be honoured with the crown. [Aeschines.]

Ctēsĭphon (Κτησιφῶν: Κτησιφώντιος: Takti Kesra, Ru.), a city of Assyria, on the E. bank of the Tigris, 3 Roman miles from Seleucia on the W. bank, first became an important place under the Parthians, whose kings used it for some time as a winter residence, and afterwards enlarged and fortified it, and made it the capital of their empire. It is said to have contained at least 100,000 inhabitants. In the wars of the Romans with the Parthians and Persians, it was taken, first by Trajan (A. D. 115), and by several of the later emperors, but Julian did not venture to attack it, even after his victory over the Persians before the city.

Ctesippus (Κτήσιππος). 1. Two sons of Hercules, one by Deianira, and the other by Astydamia. — 2. Son of Polytherses of Same, one of the suitors of Penelope, killed by Philoetius, the cow-herd.

Culăro, afterwards called Gratianŏpŏlis (Grenoble) in honour of the emperor Gratian, a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the Isara (Isère).

Cullĕo or Culĕo, Q. Terentĭus. 1. A senator of distinction, was taken prisoner in the second Punic war, and obtained his liberty at the conclusion of the war, B. C. 201. To show his gratitude to P. Scipio, he followed his triumphal car, wearing the pileus or cap of liberty, like an emancipated slave. In 187 he was praetor peregrinus, and in this year condemned L. Scipio Asiaticus, on the charge of having misappropriated the money gained in the war with Antiochus. — 2. Tribune of the plebs, 58, exerted himself to obtain Cicero's recall from banishment. In the war which followed the death of Caesar (43), Culleo was one of the legates of Lepidus.

Cūmae (Κύμη: Κυμαῖος, Cumānus), a town in Campania, and the most ancient of the Greek colonies in Italy and Sicily, was founded by Cumae in Aeolis, in conjunction with Chalcis and Eretria in Euboea. Its foundation is placed in B. C. 1050, but this date is evidently too early. It was situated on a steep hill of Mt. Gaurus, a little N. of the promontory Misenum. It became in early times a great and flourishing city; its commerce was extensive; its territory included a great part of the rich Campanian plain; its population was at least 60,000; and its power is attested by its colonies in Italy and Sicily, — Puteoli, Palaeopolis, afterwards Neapolis, Zancle, afterwards Messana. But it had powerful enemies to encounter in the Etruscans and the Italian nations. It was also weakened by internal dissensions, and one of its citizens Aristodemus made himself tyrant of the place. Its power became so much reduced that it was only saved from the attacks of the Etruscans by the assistance of Hiero, who annihilated the Etruscan fleet, 474. It maintained its independence till 417, when it was taken by the Campanians and most of its inhabitants sold as slaves. From this time Capua became the chief city of Campania; and although Cumae was subsequently a Roman municipium and a colony, it continued to decline in importance. At last the Acropolis was the only part of the town that remained, and this was eventually destroyed by Narses in his wars with the Goths. — Cumae was celebrated as the residence of the earliest Sibyl, and as the place where Tarquinius Superbus died.—Its ruins are still to be seen between the Lago di Patria and Fusaro.

Cūnaxa (Κούναξα), a small town in Babylonia, on the Euphrates, famous for the battle fought here between the younger Cyrus and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, in which the former was killed (B. C. 401). Its position is uncertain. Plutarch (Artax. 8) places it 500 stadia (50 geog. miles) above Babylon; Xenophon, who does not mention it by name, makes the battle field 360 stadia (36 geog. miles) from Babylon.

Cupiennĭus, attacked by Horace (Sat. i. 2. 36), is said by the Scholiast to have been a friend of Augustus, but is probably a fictitious name.

Cupra (Cuprensis). 1. Maritima (Marano at the mouth of the Monecchia), a town in Picenum, with an ancient temple of Juno, founded by the Pelasgians and restored by Hadrian. — 2. Montana, a town near No. 1 in the mountains.

Cŭres (Gen. Curium), an ancient town of the Sabines, celebrated as the birth-place of T. Tatius and Numa Pompilius: from this town the Romans are said to have derived the name of Quirites.

Cūrētes (Κουρῆτες), a mythical people, said to be the most ancient inhabitants of Acarnania and Aetolia; the latter country was called Curetis from them. They also occur in Crete as the priests of Zeus, and are spoken of in connexion with the Corybantes and Idaean Dactyli. The infant Zeus was entrusted to their care by Rhea; and by clashing their weapons in a warlike dance, they drowned the cries of the child, and prevented his father Cronus from ascertaining the place where he was concealed.

Curias. [CURIUM.]

Cŭrĭātĭi, a celebrated Alban family. 3 brothers of this family fought with 3 Roman brothers, the Horatii, and were conquered by the latter. In consequence of their defeat, Alba became subject to Rome.

Curiātius Maternus. [MATERNUS.]

Cūrio, C. Scribonĭus. 1. Praetor B.C. 121, was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. — 2. Son of No. 1, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 90; afterwards served under Sulla in Greece; was praetor 82; consul 76; and after his consulship obtained the province of Macedonia, where he carried on war against the barbarians as far N. as the Danube. He was a personal enemy of Caesar, and supported P. Clodius, when the latter was accused of violating the sacra of the Bona Dea. In 57 he was appointed pontifex maximus, and died 53. He had some reputation as an orator, and was a friend of Cicero. — 3. Son of No. 2, also a friend of Cicero, was a most profligate character. He was married to Fulvia, afterwards the wife of Antony. He at first belonged to the Pompeian party, by whose influence he was made tribune of the plebs, 50; but he was bought over by Caesar, and employed his power as tribune against his former friends. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), he was sent by Caesar to Sicily with the title of propraetor. He succeeded in driving Cato out of the island, and then crossed over to Africa, where he was defeated and slain by Juba and P. Attius Varus.

Curiosolītae, a Gallic people on the Ocean in Armorica near the Veneti, in the country of the modern Corseult near St. Malo.

Curĭum (Κούριον: Κουριεύς: nr. Piscopia Ru.), a town on the S. coast of Cyprus, near the promontory Curias, W. of the mouth of the Lycus.

Cŭrĭus Dentātus. [DENTATUS.]

Cŭrĭus, M.', an intimate friend of Cicero and Atticus, lived for several years as a negotiator at Patrae in Peloponnesus. In his will he left his property to Atticus and Cicero. Several of Cicero's letters are addressed to him.

Cursor, L. Pāpīrius. 1. A distinguished Roman general in the 2nd Samnite war, was 5 times consul (B.C. 333, 320, 319, 315, 313), and twice dictator (325, 309). He frequently defeated the Samnites, but his greatest victory over them was gained in his 2nd dictatorship. Although a great general, he was not popular with the soldiers on account of his severity. — 2. Son of No. 1, was, like his father, a distinguished general. In both his consulships (293, 272) he gained great victories over the Samnites, and in the 2nd he brought the 3rd Samnite war to a close.

Curtĭus, Mettus or Mettĭus, a distinguished Sabine, fought with the rest of his nation against Romulus. According to one tradition, the Lacus Curtius, which was part of the Roman forum, was called after him; because in the battle with the Romans he escaped with difficulty from a swamp, into which his horse had plunged. But the more usual tradition respecting the name of the Lacus Curtius related that in B.C. 362 the earth in the forum gave way, and a great chasm appeared, which the soothsayers declared could only be filled up by throwing into it Rome's greatest treasure; that thereupon M. Curtius, a noble youth, mounted his steed in full armour; and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen, leaped into the abyss, upon which the earth closed over him.

Curtĭus Montānus. [MONTANUS.]

Curtĭus Rūfus, Q., the Roman historian of Alexander the Great. Respecting his life, and the time at which he lived, nothing is known with certainty. Some critics place him as early as the time of Vespasian, and others as late as Constantine; but the earlier date is more probable than the later. The work itself, entitled De Rebus Gestis Alexandri Magni, consisted of 10 books, but the first 2 are lost, and the remaining 8 are not without considerable gaps. It is written in a pleasing though somewhat declamatory style. It is taken from good sources, but the author frequently shows his ignorance of geography, chronology, and tactics. The best editions are by Zumpt, Berlin, 1826, and Mützell, Berlin, 1843.

Cutĭlĭae Aquae. [AQUAE, No. 3.]

Cȳănē (Κυάνη), a Sicilian nymph and playmate of Proserpine, changed into a fountain through grief at the loss of the goddess.

Cyanĕae Insŭlae (Κυανέαι νῆσοι or πέτραι, Urek-Jaki), 2 small rocky islands at the entrance of the Thracian Bosporus into the Euxine, the Planctae (Πλάγκται) and Symplēgădes (Συμπληγάδες) of mythology, so called because they are said to have been once moveable and to have rushed together, and thus destroyed every ship that attempted to pass through them. After the ship Argo had passed through them in safety, they became stationary. [See p. 76, a.]

Cyaxares (Κυαξάρης), king of Media B.C. 634—594, son of Phraortes, and grandson of Deioces. He was the most warlike of the Median kings, and introduced great military reforms. He defeated the Assyrians, who had slain his father in battle, and he laid siege to Ninus (Nineveh). But while he was before the city, he was defeated by the Scythians, who held the dominion of Upper Asia for 28 years (634—607), but were at length driven out of Asia by Cyaxares. After the expulsion of the Scythians, Cyaxares again turned his arms against Assyria, and with the aid of the king of Babylon (probably the father of Nebuchadnezzar), he took and destroyed Ninus, in 606. He subsequently carried on war for 5 years against Alyattes, king of Lydia. [ALYATTES.] Cyaxares died in 594, and was succeeded by his son Astyages. — Xenophon speaks of a Cyaxares II., king of Media, son of Astyages, respecting whom see CYRUS.

Cўbēlē. [RHEA.]

Cybistra (τὰ Κυϐιστρα), an ancient city of Asia Minor, several times mentioned by Cicero (Ep. ad Fam. xv. 2, 4, ad Att. v. 18, 20), who describes it as lying at the foot of Mt. Taurus, in the part of Cappadocia bordering on Cilicia. Strabo places it 300 stadia (30 geog. miles) from Tyana. Mention is made of a place of the same name (now Kara Hissar), between Tyana and Caesarea ad Argaeum; but this latter can hardly be believed to be identical with the former.

Cyclădes (Κυκλάδες), a group of islands in the Aegaean sea, so called because they lay in a circle (ἐν κύκλῳ) around Delos, the most important of them. According to Strabo they were 12 in number; but their number is increased by other writers. The most important of them were DELOS, CEOS, CYTHNOS, SERIPHOS, RHENIA, SIPHNOS, CIMOLOS, NAXOS, PAROS, SYROS, MYCONOS, TENOS, ANDROS.

Cyclōpes (Κύκλωπες), that is, creatures with round or circular eyes, are described differently by different writers. Homer speaks of them as a gigantic and lawless race of shepherds in Sicily, who devoured human beings and cared nought for Zeus: each of them had only one eye in the centre of his forehead: the chief among them was POLYPHEMUS. According to Hesiod the Cyclops were Titans, sons of Uranus and Ge, were 3 in number, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, and each of them had only one eye on his forehead. They were thrown into Tartarus by Cronus, but were released by Zeus, and in consequence they provided Zeus with thunderbolts and lightning, Pluto with a helmet, and Poseidon with a trident. They were afterwards killed by Apollo for having furnished Zeus with the thunderbolts to kill Aesculapius. A still later tradition regarded the Cyclopes as the assistants of Hephaestus. Volcanoes were the workshops of that god, and Mt. Aetna in Sicily and the neighbouring isles were accordingly considered as their abodes. As the assistants of Hephaestus they make the metal armour and ornaments for gods and heroes. Their number is no longer confined to 3; and besides the names mentioned by Hesiod, we also find those of Pyracmon and Acamas. The name of Cyclopian walls was given to the walls built of great masses of unhewn stone, of which specimens are still to be seen at Mycenae and other parts of Greece, and also in Italy. They were probably constructed by the Pelasgians; and later generations, being struck by their grandeur, ascribed their building to a fabulous race of Cyclops.

Cycnus (Κύκνος). 1. Son of Apollo by Hyrie, lived in the district between Pleuron and Calydon, and was beloved by Phyllius; but as Phyllius refused him a bull, Cycnus leaped into a lake and was metamorphosed into a swan. — 2. Son of Poseidon, was king of Colonae in Troas, and father of Tenes and Hemithea. His second wife Philonome fell in love with Tenes, her step-son, and as he refused her offers, she accused him to his father, who threw Tenes with Hemithea in a chest into the sea. Tenes escaped and became king of Tenedos. [TENES.] In the Trojan War both Cycnus and Tenes assisted the Trojans, but both were slain by Achilles. As Cycnus could not be wounded by iron, Achilles strangled him with the thong of his helmet, or killed him with a stone. When Achilles was going to strip Cycnus of his armour, the body disappeared, and was changed into a swan. — 3. Son of Ares and Pelopia, slain by Hercules at Itone. — 4. Son of Ares and Pyrene, likewise killed by Hercules. — 5. Son of Sthenelus, king of the Ligurians, and a friend and relation of Phaethon. While he was lamenting the fate of Phaethon on the banks of the Eridanus, he was metamorphosed by Apollo into a swan, and placed among the stars.

Cydĭas, a celebrated painter from the island of Cythnus, B. C. 364, whose picture of the Argonauts was exhibited in a porticus by Agrippa at Rome.

Cўdippē. [ACONTIUS.]

Cydnus (Κύδνος: Tersoos-Chai), a river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in the Taurus, and flowing through the midst of the city of Tarsus, where it is 120 feet wide (Kinneir: Xenophon says 2 plethra=202 feet). It was celebrated for the clearness and coldness of its water, which was esteemed useful in gout and nervous diseases, but by bathing in which Alexander nearly lost his life. At its mouth the river spread into a lagune, which formed the harbour of Tarsus, but which is now choked with sand. In the middle ages the river was called Hierax.

Cydōnĭa, more rarely Cydōnis (Κυδωνία, Κυδωνίς: Κυδωνιάτης: Khania), one of the chief cities of Crete, the rival and opponent of CNOSSUS and GORTYNA, was situated on the N. W. coast, and derived its name from the Cydōnes (Κύδωνες), a Cretan race, placed by Homer in the W. part of the island. At a later time a colony of Zacynthians settled in Cydonia; they were driven out by the Samians about B. C. 524; and the Samians were in their turn expelled by the Aeginetans. Cydonia was the place from which quinces (Cydonia mala) were first brought to Italy, and its inhabitants were some of the best Cretan archers (Cydonio arcu, Hor. Carm. iv. 19. 17).

Cyllărus (Κύλλαρος), a beautiful centaur, killed at the wedding feast of Pirithous. The horse of Castor was likewise called Cyllarus.

Cyllēnē (Κυλλήνη). 1. (Zyria), the highest mountain in Peloponnesus on the frontiers of Arcadia and Achaia, sacred to Hermes (Mercury), who had a temple on the summit, was said to have been born there, and was hence called Cyllenius. — 2. A sea-port town of Elis.

Cylon (Κύλων), an Athenian of noble family, married the daughter of Theagenes, tyrant of Megara, and gained an Olympic victory B. C. 640. Encouraged by the Delphic oracle, he seized the Acropolis, intending to make himself tyrant of Athens. Pressed by famine, Cylon and his adherents were driven to take refuge at the altar of Athena, whence they were induced to withdraw by the archon Megacles, the Alcmaeonid, on a promise that their lives should be spared. But their enemies put them to death as soon as they had them in their power.

Cўmē (Κύμη: Κυμαῖος: Sandakli), the largest of the Aeolian cities of Asia Minor, stood upon the coast of Aeolis, on a bay named after it, Cumaeus (also Elaïticus) Sinus (ὁ Κυμαῖος κόλπος: Gulf of Sandakli), and had a good harbour. It was founded by a colony of Locrians from Mt. Phricius, and hence it had the epithet Φρικωνίς. It was the native place of Hesiod and Ephorus, and the mother city of Side in Pamphylia and Cumae in Campania.

Cyna. [CYNANE.]

Cynaegīrus (Κυναίγειρος), brother of the poet Aeschylus, distinguished himself by his valour at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. According to Herodotus, when the Persians were endeavouring to escape by sea, Cynaegirus seized one of their ships to keep it back, but fell with his right hand cut off. In the later versions of the story Cynaegirus is made to perform still more heroic deeds.

Cynaetha (Κύναιθα: Κυναιθεύς, -θαιεύς), a town in the N. of Arcadia, whose inhabitants, unlike the other Arcadians, had a dislike to music, to which circumstance Polybius attributes their rough and demoralized character.

Cynane, Cyna, or Cynna (Κυνάνη, Κύνα, Κύννα), half-sister to Alexander the Great, daughter of Philip by Audata, an Illyrian woman. She was married to her cousin Amyntas; and after the death of Alexander she crossed over to Asia, intending to marry her daughter Eurydice to Arrhidaeus, who had been chosen king. Her project alarmed Perdiccas, by whose order she was put to death.

Cynēsii or Cynētes (Κυνήσιοι, Κύνητες), a people, according to Herodotus, dwelling in the extreme W. of Europe, beyond the Celts, apparently in Spain.

Cynisca (Κυνίσκα), daughter of Archidamus II. king of Sparta, was the first woman who kept horses for the games, and the first who gained an Olympic victory.

Cȳnŏpŏlis (Κυνὸς πόλις: Samallout), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on an island in the Nile; the chief seat of the worship of Anubis. There was a city of the same name in the Delta.

Cynos (Κῦνος: Κύνιος, Κυναῖος), the chief seaport in the territory of the Locri Opuntii.

Cynosarges (τὸ Κυνόσαργες), a gymnasium, sacred to Hercules, outside Athens, E. of the city and before the gate Dioměa, for the use of those who were not of pure Athenian blood: here taught Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school.

Cynoscĕphălae (Κυνὸς κεφαλαί), "Dog's Heads." 1. Two hills near Scotussa in Thessaly, where Flaminius gained his celebrated victory over Philip of Macedonia, B.C. 197. — 2. A hill between Thebes and Thespiae in Boeotia.

Cynossēma (Κυνὸς σῆμα), "Dog's Tomb," a promontory in the Thracian Chersonesus near Madytus, so called because it was supposed to be the tomb of Hecuba, who had been previously changed into a dog.

Cynosūra (Κυνοσουρά), an Idaean nymph, and one of the nurses of Zeus, who placed her among the stars. [ARCTOS.]

Cynosūra (Κυνόσουρα), "Dog's Tail," a promontory in Attica, S. of Marathon.

Cynthĭa and Cynthĭus (Κυνθία and Κύνθιος), surnames respectively of Artemis and Apollo, which they derived from Mt. Cynthus in the island of Delos, their birthplace.

Cynūrĭa (Κυνουρία: Κυνούριος), a district on the frontiers of Argolis and Laconia, for the possession of which the Argives and Spartans carried on frequent wars, and which the Spartans at length obtained about B. C. 550. [See p. 77, a.] The inhabitants were Ionians.

Cyparissĭa (Κυπαρισσία). 1. A town in Messenia on the W. coast, S. of the river Cyparissus, and on a promontory and bay of the same name. Homer (Il. ii. 593) speaks of a town Cyparissēeis (Κυπαρισσήεις) subject to Nestor, which is probably the same as the preceding, though Strabo places it in Triphylia. — 2. A town in Laconia on a peninsula near the Asopus.

Cyparissus (Κυπάρισσος), son of Telephus, beloved by Apollo or Silvanus. Having inadvertently killed his favourite stag, he was seized with immoderate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress.

Cyparissus (Κυπάρισσος), a small town in Phocis on Parnassus near Delphi.

Cyphanta (τὰ Κύφαντα), a town on the E. coast of Laconia near Brasiae.

Cypria, Cypris, surnames of Aphrodite, from the island of CYPRUS.

Cyprĭānus, a celebrated father of the Church, was a native of Africa. He was a Gentile by birth, and before his conversion to Christianity he taught rhetoric with distinguished success. He was converted about A. D. 246, was ordained a presbyter 247, and was raised to the bishopric of Carthage 248. When the persecution of Decius burst forth (250), Cyprian fled from the storm, and remained 2 years in retirement. A few years afterwards the emperor Valerian renewed the persecution against the Christians. Cyprian was banished by Paternus the proconsul to the maritime city of Curubis, where he resided 11 months. He was then recalled by the new governor, Galerius Maximus, and was beheaded in a spacious plain without the walls A. D. 258. He wrote several works which have come down to us. They are characterised by lucid arrangement, and eloquent, though declamatory style. The best editions are by Fell, Oxford, 1682, fol., to which are subjoined the Annales Cyprianici of Pearson; and that commenced by Baluze, and completed by a monk of the fraternity of St. Maur, Paris, 1726, fol.

Cyprus (Κύπρος: Κύπριος: Cyprus, called by the Turks Kebris), a large island in the Mediterranean, S. of Cilicia and W. of Syria. It is called by various names in the poets, Cerastia or Cerastis, Macaria, Sphecia, Acamantis, Amathusia, and also Paphos. The island is of a triangular form: its length from E. to W. is about 140 miles; its greatest breadth, which is in the W. part, is about 50 miles from N. to S., but it gradually narrows towards the E. A range of mountains, called Olympus by the ancients, runs through the whole length of the island from E. to W., and rises in one part more than 7000 feet in height. The plains are chiefly in the S. of the island, and were celebrated in ancient as well as in modern times for their fertility. The largest plain, called the Salaminian plain, is in the E. part of the island near Salamis. The rivers are little more than mountain torrents, mostly dry in summer. — Cyprus was colonized by the Phoenicians at a very early period; and Greek colonies were subsequently planted in the island, according to tradition soon after the Trojan war. We read at first of 9 independent states, each governed by its own king, SALAMIS, CITIUM, AMATHUS, CURIUM, PAPHOS, MARIUM, SOLI, LAPETHUS, CERYNIA. The island was subdued by Amāsis, king of Egypt, about B. C. 540. Upon the downfal of the Egyptian monarchy, it became subject to the Persians; but EVAGORAS of Salamis, after a severe struggle with the Persians, established its independence about 385, and handed down the sovereignty to his son NICOCLES. It eventually fell to the share of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and was governed by them, sometimes united to Egypt, and sometimes by separate princes of the royal family. In 58 the Romans made Cyprus one of their provinces, and sent M. Cato to take possession of it. — Cyprus was one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus), who is hence called Cypris or Cypria, and whose worship was introduced into the island by the Phoenicians.

Cypsĕla (τὰ Κύψελα: Κυψελῖνος, -ληνός). 1. A town in Arcadia on the frontiers of Laconia. — 2. A town in Thrace on the Hebrus and the Egnatia Via.

Cypsĕlus (Κύψελος). 1. Father of Merope and grandfather of Aepytus. [AEPYTUS.] — 2. Of Corinth, son of Aeëtion. The mother of Cypselus belonged to the house of the Bacchiadae, that is, to the Doric nobility of Corinth. According to tradition, she married Aeëtion, because, being ugly, she met with no one among the Bacchiadae who would have her as his wife. As the oracle of Delphi had declared that her son would prove formidable to the ruling party at Corinth, the Bacchiadae attempted to murder the child. But his mother concealed him in a chest (κυψέλη), from which he derived his name, Cypselus. When he had grown up to manhood, he expelled the Bacchiadae, with the help of the people, and then established himself as tyrant. He reigned 30 years, B. C. 655—625, and was succeeded by his son Periander. The celebrated chest of Cypselus, consisting of cedar wood, ivory, and gold, and richly adorned with figures in relief, is described at length by Pausanias (v. 17, &c.).

Cyraunis (Κύραυνις), an island off the N. coast of Africa mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 95); probably the same as CERCINE.

Cȳrēnăĭca (ἡ Κυρηναία, ἡ Κυρηναίη χώρη, Herod: Dernah or Jebel-Akhdar, i. e. the Green Mountain, the N. E. part of Tripoli), a district of N. Africa, between Marmarica on the E. and the Regio Syrtica on the W., was considered to extend in its widest limits from the Philaenorum Arae at the bottom of the Great Syrtis to the Chersonesus Magna or N. headland of the Gulf of Platea (G. of Bomba), or even to the Catabathmus Magnus (Marsa Sollum); but the part actually possessed and cultivated by the Greek colonists can only be considered as beginning at the N. limit of the sandy shores of the Great Syrtis, at Boreum Pr. (Ras Teyonas, S. of Ben-Ghazi), between which and the Chersonesus Magna the country projects into the Mediterranean in the form of a segment of a circle, whose chord is above 150 miles long and its arc above 200. From its position, formation, climate, and soil, this region is perhaps one of the most delightful on the surface of the globe. Its centre is occupied by a moderately elevated table-land, whose edge runs parallel to the coast, to which it sinks down in a succession of terraces, clothed with verdure, intersected by mountain streams running through ravines filled with the richest vegetation, exposed to the cool sea-breezes from the N., and sheltered by the mass of the mountain from the sands and hot winds of the Sahara. These slopes produced the choicest fruits, vegetables, and flowers, and some very rare plants, such as the silphium and the ὀπὸς Κυρηναῖος. The various harvests, at the different elevations, lasted for 8 months of the year. With these physical advantages, the people naturally became prone to luxury. The country was, however, exposed to annual ravages by locusts. The belt of mountainous land extends inwards from the coast about 70 or 80 miles. — The first occupation of this country by the Greeks, of which we have any clear account, was effected by BATTUS, who led a colony from the island of Thera, and first established himself on the island of Platea at the E. extremity of the district, and afterwards built CYRENE (B. C. 631), where he founded a dynasty, which ruled over the country during 8 reigns, though with comparatively little power over some of the other Greek cities. Of these the earliest founded were TEUCHIRA and HESPERIS, then BARCA, a colony from Cyrene; and these, with Cyrene itself and its port APOLLONIA, formed the original Libyan Pentapolis, though this name seems not to have come into general use till under the Ptolemies. The comparative independence of Barca, and the temporary conquest of the country by the Persians under Cambyses, diminished the power of the later kings of Cyrene, and at last the dynasty was overthrown and a republic established in the latter part of the 5th century B. C. When Alexander invaded Egypt, the Cyrenaeans formed an alliance with him; but their country was made subject to Egypt by Ptolemy the son of Lagus. It appears to have flourished under the Ptolemies, who pursued their usual policy of raising new cities at the expense of the ancient ones, or restoring the latter under new names. Thus Hesperis became Berenice, Teuchira was called Arsinoë, Barca was entirely eclipsed by its port, which was raised into a city under the name of Ptolemaïs, and Cyrene suffered from the favours bestowed upon its port Apollonia. The country was now usually called Pentapolis, from the 5 cities of Cyrene, Apollonia, Ptolemaïs, Arsinoë, and Berenice. In B. C. 95, the last Egyptian governor, Apion, an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, made the country over to the Romans, who at first gave the cities their freedom, and afterwards formed the district, under the name of Cyrenaica, with the island of Crete, into a province. Under Constantine Cyrenaica was separated from Crete, and made a distinct province, under the name of Libya Superior. The first great blow to the prosperity of the country was given by the murderous conflict which ensued on an insurrection of the Jews (who had long settled here in great numbers) in the reign of Trajan. As the Roman empire declined, the attacks of the native Libyan tribes became more frequent and formidable, and the sufferings caused by their inroads and by locusts, plague, and earthquakes, are most pathetically described by Synesius, bishop of Ptolemaïs, in the 5th century. In the 7th century the country was overrun by the Persians, and soon afterwards it fell a final prey to the great Arabian invasion.

Cȳrēnē (Κυρήνη), daughter of Hypseus, mother of Aristaeus by Apollo, was carried by the god from Mt. Pelion to Libya, where the city of Cyrene derived its name from her.

Cȳrēnē (Κυρήνη: Κυρηναῖος: Ghrennah, very large Ru.), the chief city of CYRENAICA in N. Africa, was founded by Battus (B. C. 631) over a fountain consecrated to Apollo, and called Cyre (Κύρη: Ἀπόλλωνος κρήνη), which supplied the city with water, and then ran down to the sea through a beautiful ravine. The city stood 80 stadia (8 geog. miles) from the coast, on the edge of the upper of two terraces of table land, at the height of 1800 feet above the sea, in one of the finest situations in the world. The road which connected it with its harbour, Apollonia, still exists, and the ruins of Cyrene, though terribly defaced, are very extensive, comprising streets, aqueducts, temples, theatres, tombs, paintings, sculpture, and inscriptions. In the face of the terrace on which the city stands is a vast subterraneous necropolis. For the history of the city and surrounding country, see CYRENAICA. Among its celebrated natives were the philosopher Aristippus, the poet Callimachus, and the Christian bishop and orator Synesius.

Cyreschăta or Cyrŏpŏlis (Κυρέσχατα, Κύρα, Κύρου πόλις), a city of Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, the furthest of the colonies founded by Cyrus, and the extreme city of the Persian empire: destroyed, after many revolts, by Alexander. Its position is doubtful, but it was probably not far from Alexandreschata (Kokand).

Cyrillus (Κύριλλος). — 1. Bishop of Jerusalem, A. D. 351—386, was a firm opponent of the Arians, by whose influence he was banished 3 times from Jerusalem. His works are not numerous. The most important are lectures to catechumens, &c., and a letter to the emperor Constantius, giving an account of the luminous cross which appeared at Jerusalem, 351. The best editions are by Milles, Oxford, 1703, fol., and by Touttee, Paris, 1720, fol. — 2. Bishop of Alexandria, A. D. 412—444, of which city he was a native. He was fond of power, and of a restless and turbulent spirit. He persecuted the Jews, whom he expelled from Alexandria; and after a long protracted struggle he procured the deposition of Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople. He was the author of a large number of works, many of which are extant; but in a literary view they are almost worthless. The best edition is by Aubert, Paris, 1638, 6 vols. fol.

Cyrrhestĭcē (Κυῤῥεστική), the name given under the Seleucidae to a province of Syria, lying between Commagene on the N. and the plain of Antioch on the S., between Mt. Amanus on the W. and the Euphrates on the E. After the time of Constantine, it was united with Commagene into one province, under the name of Euphratesia.

Cyrrhus or Cyrus (Κύῤῥος, Κύρος: Korus?), a city of Syria, founded under the Seleucidae, and called after the city of the same name in Macedonia; chiefly remarkable as the residence and see of Theodoret, who describes its poverty, which he did much to relieve. Justinian rebuilt the walls, and erected an aqueduct.

Cyrrhus, a town in Macedonia, near Pella.

Cȳrus (Κῦρος). 1. The Elder, the founder of the Persian empire. The history of his life was overlaid in ancient times with fables and romances, and is related differently by Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon. The account of Herodotus best preserves the genuine Persian legend, and is to be preferred to those of Ctesias and Xenophon. It is as follows: — Cyrus was the son of Cambyses, a noble Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of the Median king Astyages. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that his grandson should be master of Asia, Astyages sent for his daughter, when she was pregnant; and upon her giving birth to a son, he committed it to Harpăgus, his confidential attendant, with orders to kill it. Harpagus gave it to a herdsman of Astyages, who was to expose it. But the wife of the herdsman having brought forth a still-born child, they substituted the latter for the child of Mandane, who was reared as the son of the herdsman. When he was 10 years old, his true parentage was discovered by the following incident. In the sports of his village, the boys chose him for their king. One of the boys, the son of a noble Median named Artembares, disobeyed his commands, and Cyrus caused him to be severely scourged. Artembares complained to Astyages, who sent for Cyrus, in whose person and courage he discovered his daughter's son. The herdsman and Harpagus, being summoned before the king, told him the truth. Astyages forgave the herdsman, but revenged himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. As to his grandson, by the advice of the Magians, who assured him that his dreams were fulfilled by the boy's having been a king in sport, he sent him back to his parents in Persia. When Cyrus grew up, he conspired with Harpagus to dethrone his grandfather. He induced the Persians to revolt from the Median supremacy, and at their head marched against Astyages. The latter had given the command of his forces to Harpagus, who deserted to Cyrus. Astyages thereupon placed himself at the head of his troops, but was defeated by Cyrus and taken prisoner, B. C. 559. The Medes accepted Cyrus for their king, and thus the supremacy which they had held passed to the Persians. It was probably at this time that Cyrus received that name, which is a Persian word (Kohr), signifying the Sun. — Cyrus now proceeded to conquer the other parts of Asia. In 546 he overthrew the Lydian monarchy, and took Croesus prisoner. [CROESUS.] The Greek cities in Asia Minor were subdued by his general Harpagus. He next turned his arms against the Assyrian empire, of which Babylon was then the capital. After defeating the Babylonians in battle, he laid siege to the city, and after a long time he took it by diverting the course of the Euphrates, which flowed through the midst of it, so that his soldiers entered Babylon by the bed of the river. This was in 538. Subsequently he crossed the Araxes, with the intention of subduing the Massagetae, a Scythian people, but he was defeated and slain in battle. Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetae, cut off his head, and threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. He was killed in 529. He was succeeded by his son CAMBYSES. — Xenophon represents Cyrus as brought up at his grandfather's court, as serving in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages, of whom Herodotus and Ctesias know nothing; as making war upon Babylon simply as the general of Cyaxares; as marrying the daughter of Cyaxares; and at length dying quietly in his bed, after a sage and Socratic discourse to his children and friends. Xenophon's account is preserved in the Cyropaedīa, in which he draws a picture of what a wise and just prince ought to be. The work must not be regarded as a genuine history. — In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured. His sepulchre at Pasargadae was visited by Alexander the Great. The tomb has perished, but his name is found on monuments at Murghab, N. of Persepolis. — 2. The Younger, the 2nd of the 4 sons of Darius Nothus, king of Persia, and of Parysatis, was appointed by his father commander of the maritime parts of Asia Minor, and satrap of Lydia, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, B. C. 407. He assisted Lysander and the Lacedaemonians with large sums of money in their war against the Athenians. Cyrus was of a daring and ambitious temper. On the death of his father and the accession of his elder brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, 404, Cyrus formed a plot against the life of Artaxerxes. His design was betrayed by Tissaphernes to the king, who condemned him to death; but, on the intercession of Parysatis, he spared his life and sent him back to his satrapy. Cyrus now gave himself up to the design of dethroning his brother. He collected a powerful native army, but he placed his chief reliance on a force of Greek mercenaries. He set out from Sardis in the spring of 401, and, having crossed the Euphrates at Thapsacus, marched down the river to the plain of Cunaxa, 500 stadia from Babylon. Here he found Artaxerxes prepared to meet him. Artaxerxes had from 400,000 to a million of men; Cyrus had about 100,000 Asiatics and 13,000 Greeks. The battle was at first altogether in favour of Cyrus. His Greek troops on the right routed the Asiatics who were opposed to them; and he himself pressed forward in the centre against his brother, and had even wounded him, when he was killed by one of the king's body-guard. Artaxerxes caused his head and right hand to be struck off, and sought to have it believed that Cyrus had fallen by his hand. The character of Cyrus is drawn by Xenophon in the brightest colours. It is enough to say that his ambition was gilded by all those brilliant qualities which win men's hearts. — 3. An architect at Rome, who died on the same day as Clodius, 52.

Cyrus (Κῦρος: Kour), one of the two great rivers of Armenia, rises in the Caucasus, flows through Iberia, and after forming the boundary between Albania and Armenia, unites with the Araxes, and falls into the W. side of the Caspian. — There were small rivers of the same name in Media and Persis.

Cȳta or Cȳtaea (Κύτα, Κύταια: Κυταῖος, Κυταιεύς), a town in Colchis on the river Phasis, where Medēa was said to have been born.

Cȳthēra (Κύθηρα: Κυθήριος: Cerigo), a mountainous island off the S. E. point of Laconia, with a town of the same name in the interior, the harbour of which was called Scandēa (Σκανδεία). It was colonized at an early time by the Phoenicians, who introduced the worship of Aphrodite into the island, for which it was celebrated. This goddess was hence called Cytheraea, Cytherēis; and, according to some traditions, it was in the neighbourhood of this island that she first rose from the foam of the sea. The Argives subsequently took possession of Cythera, but were driven out of it by the Lacedaemonians, who added it to their dominions.

Cȳthēris, a celebrated courtezan, the mistress of Antony, and subsequently of the poet Gallus, who mentioned her in his poems under the name of Lycoris.

Cythērus (Κύθηρος: Κυθήριος), one of the 12 ancient towns of Attica and subsequently a demus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis.

Cythnus (Κύθνος: Κύθνιος: Thermia), an island in the Aegaean sea, one of the Cyclades, with a town of the same name, celebrated for its cheese, and also for its warm springs, whence its modern name.

Cytinĭum (Κυτίνιον: Κυτινιάτης), one of the 4 cities in Doris, on Parnassus.

Cȳtōrus or -um (Κύτωρος or -ον: Kidros), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Amastris and the promontory Carambis, was a commercial settlement of the people of Sinope. It stood upon or near the mountain of the same name, which is mentioned by the Romans as abounding in box-trees.

Cȳzĭcus (Κύζικος), son of Aeneus and Aenete, the daughter of Eusorus, or son of Eusorus, or son of Apollo by Stilbe. He was king of the Doliones at Cyzicus on the Propontis. For his connection with the Argonauts see p. 75, b.

Cȳzĭcus (Κύζικος: Κυζικηνός: Bal Kiz or Chizico, Ru.), one of the most ancient and powerful of the Greek cities in Asia Minor, stood upon an island of the same name in the Propontis (Sea of Marmara). This island, the earlier name of which was Arctonnēsus (Ἄρκτων νῆσος), lay close to the shore of Mysia, to which it was united by two bridges, and afterwards (under Alexander the Great) by a mole, which has accumulated to a considerable isthmus. The city of Cyzicus stood on the S. side of the island, at the N. end of the isthmus, on each side of which it had a port. Tradition ascribed the foundation of the city to the Doliones, a tribe of Thessalian Pelasgians, who had been driven from their homes by the Aeolians. It was said to have been afterwards colonized by the Milesians. It was one of the finest cities of the ancient world, for the beauty of its situation and the magnificence of its buildings: it possessed an extensive commerce, and was celebrated for the excellence of its laws and government. Its staters were among the most esteemed gold coins current in Greece. It took no conspicuous place in history till about 22 years after the peace of Antalcidas, when it made itself independent of Persia. It preserved its freedom under Alexander and his successors, and was in alliance with the kings of Pergamus, and afterwards with the Romans. Its celebrated resistance against Mithridates, when he besieged it by sea and land (B. C. 75), was of great service to the Romans, and obtained for it the rank of a "libera civitas," which it lost again under Tiberius. Under Constantine it became the chief city of the new province of Hellespontus. It was greatly injured by an earthquake in A. D. 443, and finally ruined by its conquest by the Arabians in 675.

Dāae. [DAHAE.]

Dachinabādes (Δαχιναβάδης), a general name for the S. part of the Indian peninsula, derived from the Sanscrit dakshina, the S. wind, and connected with the modern name Deccan.

Dācĭa (Dācus), as a Roman province, was bounded on the S. by the Danube, which separated it from Moesia, on the N. by the Carpathian mountains, on the W. by the river Tysia (Theiss), and on the E. by the river Hierasus (Pruth), thus comprehending the modern Transylvania, Wallachia, Moldavia, and part of Hungary. The Daci were of the same race and spoke the same language as the Getae, and are therefore usually said to be of Thracian origin. They were a brave and warlike people. In the reign of Augustus they crossed the Danube and plundered the allies of Rome, but were defeated and driven back into their own country by the generals of Augustus. In the reign of Domitian they became so formidable under their king DECEBALUS, that the Romans were obliged to purchase a peace of them by the payment of tribute. Trajan delivered the empire from this disgrace; he crossed the Danube, and after a war of 5 years (A. D. 101—106), conquered the country, made it a Roman province, and colonized it with inhabitants from all parts of the empire. At a later period Dacia was invaded by the Goths; and as Aurelian considered it more prudent to make the Danube the boundary of the empire, he resigned Dacia to the barbarians, removed the Roman inhabitants to Moesia, and gave the name of Dacia (Aureliani) to that part of the province along the Danube where they were settled.

Dactўli (Δάκτυλοι), fabulous beings to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it by means of fire was ascribed. Their name Dactyls, that is, Fingers, is accounted for in various ways; by their number being 5 or 10, or by the fact of their serving Rhea just as the fingers serve the hand, or by the story of their having lived at the foot (ἐν δακτύλοις) of mount Ida. Most authorities describe mount Ida in Phrygia as the original seat of the Dactyls, whence they are usually called Idaean Dactyls. In Phrygia they were connected with the worship of Rhea. They are sometimes confounded or identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, Cabiri, and Telchines. This confusion with the Cabiri also accounts for Samothrace being in some accounts described as their residence. Other accounts transfer them to mount Ida in Crete, of which island they are said to have been the original inhabitants. Their number appears to have been originally 3: Celmis (the smelter), Damnameneus (the hammer), and Acmon (the anvil). Their number was afterwards increased to 5, 10 (5 male and 5 female), 52 and 100.

Dadastāna (ἡ Δαδαστάνα: Torbaleh or Kestabeg?), a fortress on the borders of Bithynia and Galatia, where the emperor Jovian died suddenly, A. D. 364.

Daedāla (τὰ Δαίδαλα), a city in Asia Minor, upon the Gulf of Glaucus, on the borders of Caria and Lycia. The same name was given to a mountain overhanging the town.

Daedālus (Δαίδαλος). 1. A mythical personage, under whose name the Greek writers personified the earliest development of the arts of sculpture and architecture, especially among the Athenians and Cretans. The ancient writers generally represent Daedalus as an Athenian, of the royal race of the Erechthīdae. Others called him a Cretan, on account of the long time he lived in Crete. He is said to have been the son of Metion, the son of Eupalamus, the son of Erechtheus. Others make him the son of Eupalamus, or of Palamaon. His mother is called Alcippe, or Iphinoë, or Phrasimede. He devoted himself to sculpture, and made great improvements in the art. He instructed his sister's son, Calos, Talus, or Perdix, who soon came to surpass him in skill and ingenuity, and Daedalus killed him through envy. [PERDIX.] Being condemned to death by the Areopagus for this murder, he went to Crete, where the fame of his skill obtained for him the friendship of Minos He made the well-known wooden cow for Pasiphaë; and when Pasiphaë gave birth to the Minotaur, Daedalus constructed the labyrinth, at Cnossus, in which the monster was kept. For his part in this affair, Daedalus was imprisoned by Minos; but Pasiphaë released him, and, as Minos had seized all the ships on the coast of Crete, Daedalus procured wings for himself and his son Icarus, and fastened them on with wax. Daedalus himself flew safe over the Aegean, but, as Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax by which his wings were fastened on was melted, and he dropped down and was drowned in that part of the Aegean which was called after him the Icarian sea. Daedalus fled to Sicily, where he was protected by Cocalus, the king of the Sicani. When Minos heard where Daedalus had taken refuge, he sailed with a great fleet to Sicily, where he was treacherously murdered by Cocalus or his daughters. According to some accounts Daedalus first alighted in his flight from Crete at Cumae in Italy, where he erected a temple to Apollo, in which he dedicated the wings with which he had fled from Crete. Several other works of art were attributed to Daedalus, in Greece, Italy, Libya, and the islands of the Mediterranean. They belong to the period when art began to be developed. The name of Daedala was given by the Greeks to the ancient wooden statues, ornamented with gilding and bright colours and real drapery, which were the earliest known forms of the images of the gods, after the mere blocks of wood or stone, which were at first used for symbols of them. — 2. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze, son and disciple of Patrocles, flourished B. C. 400.

Dăhae (Δάαι), a great Scythian people, who led a nomad life over a great extent of country on the E. of the Caspian, in Hyrcania (which still bears the name of Daghestan), on the banks of the Margus, the Oxus, and even the Jaxartes. Some of them served as cavalry and horse-archers in the armies of Darius Codomannus, Alexander, and Antiochus the Great, and they also made good foot-soldiers.

Daimăchus (Δαΐμαχος), of Plataeae, was sent by Seleucus as ambassador to Sandrocottus, king of India, about B. C. 312, and wrote a work on India, which is lost.

Dalmătĭa or Delmătĭa (Δαλματία: Δαλμάτης, more anciently Δαλματεύς, Dalmata), a part of the country along the E. coast of the Adriatic sea included under the general name of Illyricum, was separated from Liburnia on the N. by the Titius (Kerka), and from Greek Illyria on the S. by the Drilo (Drino), and extended inland to the Bebian mountains and the Drinus, thus nearly corresponding to the modern Dalmatia. The capital was Dalminium or Delminium, from which the country derived its name. The next most important town was SALONA, the residence of Diocletian. The Dalmatians were a brave and warlike people, and gave much trouble to the Romans. In B. C. 119 their country was overrun by L. Metellus, who assumed in consequence the surname Dalmaticus, but they continued independent of the Romans. In 39 they were defeated by Asinius Pollio, of whose Dalmaticus triumphus Horace speaks (Carm. ii. 1. 16); but it was not till the year 23 that they were finally subdued by Statilius Taurus. They took part in the great Pannonian revolt under their leader Bato, but after a 3 years' war were again reduced to subjection by Tiberius, A. D. 9.

Dalmatius. [DELMATIUS.]

Dalminium. [DALMATIA.]

Damagētus (Δαμάγητος), king of Ialysus in Rhodes, married, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, the daughter of Aristomenes of Messene, and from this marriage sprang the family of the Diagoridae, who were celebrated for their victories at Olympia. [ARISTOMENES.]

Dămălis or Bous (Δάμαλις, ἡ Βοῦς), a small place in Bithynia, on the shore of the Thracian Bosporus, N. of Chalcedon; celebrated by tradition as the landing-place of Io, the memory of whose passage was preserved by a bronze cow set up here by the Chalcedonians.

Damarātus. [DEMARATUS.]

Damascius (Δαμάσκιος), the Syrian, of Damascus, whence he derived his name, the last of the renowned teachers of the Neo-Platonic philosophy at Athens, was born about A. D. 480. He first studied at Alexandria and afterwards at Athens, under Marinus and Zenodotus, whom he succeeded. When Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens in 529, Damascius emigrated to King Chosroës of Persia. He afterwards returned to the W., since Chosroës had stipulated in a treaty that the heathen adherents of the Platonic Philosophy should be tolerated by the Byzantine emperor. The only work of Damascius which has been printed, is entitled "Doubts and Solutions of the first Principles," edited by Kopp, Francof. 1828, 8vo.

Damascus (ἡ Δαμασκός: Δαμασκηνός: Dameshk, Damascus, Esh-Sham), one of the most ancient cities of the world, mentioned as existing in the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15), stood in the district afterwards called Coele-Syria, upon both banks of the river Chrysorrhoas or Bardines (Burada), the waters of which, drawn off by canals and aqueducts, fertilised the plain around the city. This plain is open on the S. and E., and sheltered on the W. and N. by an offshoot of the Antilibanus; its fruits were celebrated in ancient, as in modern times; and altogether the situation of the city is one of the finest on the globe. In the earliest times, except during the short period for which David subjected it to the Hebrew monarchy, Damascus was the seat of an independent kingdom, called the kingdom of Syria, which was subdued by the Assyrians, and passed successively under the dominion of the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greek kings of Syria, and the Romans, the last of whom obtained possession of it after the conquest of Tigranes, and assigned it to the province of Syria. It flourished greatly under the emperors, and is called by Julian (Epist. 24) "the Eye of all the East." Diocletian established in it a great factory for arms; and hence the origin of the fame of Damascus blades. Its position on one of the high roads from Lower to Upper Asia gave it a considerable trade. The surrounding district was called Δαμασκηνή.

Damasippus, L. Junius Brutus. [BRUTUS, No. 10.]

Damasippus, Licinius. 1. A Roman senator, fought on the side of the Pompeians in Africa, and perished B. C. 47. — 2. A contemporary of Cicero, who mentions him as a lover of statues, and speaks of purchasing a garden from Damasippus. He is probably the same person as the Damasippus ridiculed by Horace. (Sat. ii. 3. 16, 64.) It appears from Horace that Damasippus had become bankrupt, in consequence of which he intended to put an end to himself; but he was prevented by the Stoic Stertinius, and then turned Stoic himself, or at least affected to be one by his long beard. — The Damasippus mentioned by Juvenal (Sat. viii. 147, 151, 167) is a fictitious name, under which the satirist ridiculed some noble lover of horses.

Damastes (Δαμάστης), of Sigēum, a Greek historian, and a contemporary of Herodotus and Hellanicus of Lesbos: his works are lost.

Damia. [AUXESIA.]

Damnŏnii. 1. Or Dumnonii or Dumnunii, a powerful people in the S.W. of Britain, inhabiting Cornwall, Devonshire, and the W. part of Somersetshire, from whom was called the promontory Damnonium, also Ocrinum (C. Lizard) in Cornwall. — 2. Or Damnii, a people in N. Britain, inhabiting parts of Perth, Argyle, Stirling, and Dubmarton-shires.

Damo (Δαμώ), a daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, to whom Pythagoras entrusted his writings, and forbad her to give them to any one. This command she strictly observed, although she was in extreme poverty, and received many requests to sell them.

Dāmocles (Δαμοκλῆς), a Syracusan, one of the companions and flatterers of the elder Dionysius. Damocles having extolled the great felicity of Dionysius on account of his wealth and power, the tyrant invited him to try what his happiness really was, and placed him at a magnificent banquet, in the midst of which Damocles saw a naked sword suspended over his head by a single horse-hair — a sight which quickly dispelled all his visions of happiness. The story is alluded to by Horace. (Carm. iii. 1. 17.)

Dāmōn (Δάμων). 1. Of Athens, a celebrated musician and sophist. He was a pupil of Lamprus and Agathocles, and the teacher of Pericles, with whom he lived on the most intimate terms. He is also said to have taught Socrates, but this statement is more doubtful. In his old age he was banished from Athens, probably on account of the part he had taken in politics. — 2. A Pythagorean, and friend of Phintias (not Pythias). When the latter was condemned to die for a plot against Dionysius I. of Syracuse, he asked leave of the tyrant to depart for the purpose of arranging his domestic affairs, promising to find a friend who would be pledge for his appearance at the time appointed for his punishment. To the surprise of Dionysius, Damon unhesitatingly offered himself to be put to death instead of his friend, should he fail to return. Phintias arrived just in time to redeem Damon, and Dionysius was so struck with this instance of firm friendship on both sides, that he pardoned the criminal, and entreated to be admitted as a third into their bond of brotherhood.

Damŏxĕnus (Δαμόξενος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, and perhaps partly of the middle.

Dana (Δάνα), a great city of Cappadocia (Xen. Anab. i. 2. § 20), probably the same as the later TYANA.

Dănăē (Δανάη), daughter of Acrisius and mother of Perseus. [ACRISIUS.] An Italian legend related that Danae came to Italy, built the town of Ardea, and married Pilumnus, by whom she became the mother of Daunus, the ancestor of Turnus.

Danăi. [Danaus.]

Dănăïdes (Δαναΐδες), the 50 daughters of Danaus. [Danaus.]

Danăla (τὰ Δάναλα), a city in the territory of the Trocini, in the N. E. of Galatia, notable in the history of the Mithridatic War as the place where Lucullus resigned the command to Pompey.

Danapris. [Borysthenes.]

Danastris. [Tyras.]

Dănăus (Δαναός), son of Belus and twin-brother of Aegyptus. Belus had assigned Libya to Danaüs, but the latter, fearing his brother and his brother's sons, fled with his 50 daughters to Argos. Here he was elected king by the Argives in place of Gelanor, the reigning monarch. The story of the murder of the 50 sons of Aegyptus by the 50 daughters of Danaüs (the Danaides) is given under Aegyptus. There was one exception to the murderous deed. The life of Lynceus was spared by his wife Hypermnestra ; and according to the common tradition he afterwards avenged the death of his brothers by killing his father-in-law, Danaüs. According to the poets the Danaides were punished in Hades by being compelled everlastingly to pour water into a sieve (inane lymphae dolium fundo pereuntis imo, Hor. Carm. iii. 11. 26). — From Danaüs the Argives were called Danai, which name, like that of the Argives, was often applied by the poets to the collective Greeks.

Danŭbĭus (Danube, in Germ. Donau), also Danuvius on coins and inscriptions, called Ister (Ἴστρος) by the Greeks, one of the chief rivers of Europe, rises in the Black Forest, and after flowing 1770 miles falls into the Black sea. It is mentioned by Hesiod, but the Greeks knew very little about it. According to Herodotus it rises at the city Pyrene among the Celts and flows through the whole of Europe. The Romans first obtained some accurate information concerning the river at the commencement of the empire. Tiberius in his campaign against the Vindelicians, visited the sources of the Danube, which, according to Tacitus, rises in M. Abnoba. The Danube formed the N. boundary of the empire, with the exception of the time that Dacia was a Roman province. In the Roman period the upper part of the river from its source as far as Vienna was called Danubius, while the lower part to its entrance in the Black Sea was named Ister.

Daorsi or Daorizi, a tribe in Dalmatia.

Daphnae Pĕlūsĭae (Δάφναι αἱ Πελούσιαι : Safnas), a border fortress of Lower Egypt against Arabia and Syria, stood on the right hand of the Nile, 16 Roman miles S.W. of Pelusium. Many Jews settled here after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

Daphnē (Δάφνη). 1. Daughter of the river-god Ladon in Arcadia, by Ge (the earth), or of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly. She was extremely beautiful, and was loved by Apollo and Leucippus, son of Oenomaus, but she rejected both their suits. In order to win her, Leucippus disguised himself as a maiden, but Apollo's jealousy caused his discovery and he was killed by the companions of Daphne. Apollo now pursued Daphne, and as she was on the point of being overtaken by him, she prayed for aid, and was metamorphorsed into a laurel-tree (δάφνη), which became in consequence the favourite tree of Apollo. — 2. Daughter of Tiresias, better known under the name of Manto.

Daphnē (Δάφνη). 1. (Beit-el-Moie, or Babyla?), a beautiful spot, 5 miles S. of Antioch in Syria, to which it formed a sort of park or pleasure garden. Here was a grove of laurels and cypresses, 80 stadia in circuit, watered by fresh springs and consecrated by Seleucus Nicator to Apollo, to whom also a magnificent temple was built by Antiochus Epiphanes, and adorned with a splendid statue of the god by Bryaxis. To this temple were attached periodical games and the privilege of asylum. Daphne was a royal residence of the Seleucidae and of the later Roman emperors, and a favourite resort of the people of Antioch, who, however, carried the pleasures they enjoyed here so far beyond the bounds of moderation, that the phrase Daphnici mores passed into a proverb. It was from this place that Antioch received its distinguishing name, Ἀ. ἐπὶ Δάφνης. — 2. A place in Upper Galilee on the lake Semechonitis.

Daphnis (Δαφνίς), a Sicilian hero, to whom the invention of bucolic poetry is ascribed. He was the son of Hermes by a nymph. His mother placed him when an infant in a charming valley in a laurel grove, from which he received his name of Daphnis. He was brought up by nymphs ; was taught by Pan to play on the flute ; he became a shepherd, and tended his flocks on Mt. Aetna winter and summer. A Naiad fell in love with him, and made him swear that he would never love any other maiden, threatening him with blindness if he broke his oath. For a time the handsome shepherd resisted the numerous temptations to which he was exposed, but at last he forgot himself, having been made intoxicated by a princess. The Naiad accordingly punished him with blindness, or, as others relate, changed him into a stone. Previous to this time he had composed bucolic poetry, and with it delighted Artemis during the chase. After having become blind, he invoked his father to help him. The god accordingly raised him up to heaven, and caused a well to gush forth on the spot where this happened. The well bore the name of Daphnis, and at it the Sicilians offered an annual sacrifice.

Daphnūs (Δαφνοῦς -οῦντος : Δαφνούσιος), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the coast, in earlier times belonging to Phocis.

Darădax (Δαράδαξ : Abu-Ghalgal?), a river of Upper Syria, flowing into the Euphrates, 30 parasangs from the R. Chalos, and 15 from Thapsacus.

Dardăni (Δάρδανοι), a people in Upper Moesia, who also occupied part of Illyricum, and extended as far as the frontiers of Macedonia.

Dardănĭa (Δαρδανία), a district of the Troad, lying along the Hellespont, S.W. of Abydos, and adjacent on the land side to the territories of Ilium and Scepsis. Its people (Δάρδανοι) appear in the Trojan War, under Aeneas, in close alliance with the Trojans, with whose name theirs is often interchanged, especially by the Roman poets. [Dardanus.]

Dardănus (Δάρδανος), son of Zeus and Electra. His native place in the various traditions is Arcadia, Crete, Troas, or Italy. Dardanus is the mythical ancestor of the Trojans, and through them of the Romans. The Greek traditions usually made him a king in Arcadia. He first emigrated to Samothrace, and afterwards passed over to Asia, where he received a tract of land from king Teucer, on which he built the town of Dardania. He married Batea, daughter of Teucer, or Arisbe of Crete, by whom he became the father of Erichthonius. His grandson was Tros, who removed to Troy the Palladium, which had belonged to his grandfather. According to the Italian traditions, Dardanus was the son of Corythus, an Etruscan prince of Corythus (Cortona), or of Zeus by the wife of Corythus; and, as in the Greek tradition, he afterwards emigrated to Phrygia.

Dardănus (ἡ Δάρδανος: Δαρδανεύς), also, -um and -ium, a Greek city in the Troad on the Hellespont, near the Prom. Dardanis or Dardanium and the mouth of the river Rhodius, 12 Roman miles from Ilium, and 9 (or 70 stadia) from Abydus. It was built by Aeolian colonists, at some distance from the site of the ancient city Dardania (Δαρδανίη), which is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 216) as founded by Dardanus before the building of Ilium. The Romans, after the war with Antiochus the Great, made Dardanus and Ilium free cities, as an act of filial piety. The peace between Sulla and Mithridates was made here, B. C. 84. From Dardanus arose the name of the Castles of the Dardanelles, after which the Hellespont is now called.

Dărēs (Δάρης), a priest of Hephaestus at Troy, mentioned in the Iliad (v. 9), to whom was ascribed in antiquity an Iliad, which was believed to be more ancient than the Homeric poems. This work, which was undoubtedly the composition of a sophist, is lost; but there is extant a Latin work in prose in 44 chapters, on the destruction of Troy, bearing the title Daretis Phrygii de Excidio Trojae Historia, and purporting to be a translation of the work of Dares by Cornelius Nepos. But the Latin work is evidently of much later origin; it is the production of a person of little education and of bad taste; and it is supposed by some to have been written even as late as the 12th century. It is usually printed with Dictys Cretensis: the best edition is by Dederich, Bonn, 1837, 8vo.

Darīus (Δαρεῖος). I. King of Persia, B. C. 521—485, was the son of Hystaspes, satrap of the province of Persis, and of the royal family of the Achaemenidae. He was one of the 7 Persian chiefs who destroyed the usurper SMERDIS. The 7 chiefs agreed that the one of them whose horse neighed first at an appointed time and place, should become king; and as the horse of Darius neighed first, he was declared king. He married Atossa and Artystone, the 2 daughters of Cyrus, and Parmys, the daughter of Cyrus's son Smerdis, and Phaedime, the daughter of Otanes, one of the 7 chiefs. He then began to set in order the affairs of his vast empire, which he divided into 20 satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persis proper was exempted from all taxes, except those which it had formerly been used to pay. It was in the reign of Darius that the consolidation of the empire was effected, for Cyrus and Cambyses had been engaged in continual wars. — A few years after his accession the Babylonians revolted, but after a siege of 20 months, Babylon was taken by a stratagem of ZOPYRUS, about 516. The reduction of Babylon was followed by the invasion of Scythia (about 508). Darius crossed the Danube, and marched far into the interior of modern Russia; but after losing a large number of men by famine, and being unable to meet with the enemy, he was obliged to retreat. On his return to Asia, he sent part of his forces, under Megabazus, to subdue Thrace and Macedonia, which thus became subject to the Persian empire. The most important event in the reign of Darius was the commencement of the great war between the Persians and the Greeks. The history of this war belongs to the biographies of other men. In 501 the Ionian Greeks revolted; they were assisted by the Athenians, who burnt Sardis, and thus provoked the hostility of Darius. [ARISTAGORAS; HISTIAEUS.] In 492 Mardonius was sent with a large army to invade Greece, but he lost a great part of his fleet off Mt. Athos, and the Thracians destroyed a vast number of his land forces. [MARDONIUS.] He was, in consequence, recalled, and Datis and Artaphernes appointed to the command of the invading army. They took Eretria in Euboea, and landed in Attica, but were defeated at Marathon by the Athenians under the command of Miltiades. [MILTIADES.] Darius now resolved to call out the whole force of his empire for the purpose of subduing Greece; but, after 3 years of preparation, his attention was called off by the rebellion of Egypt. He died in 485, leaving the execution of his plans to his son XERXES. — II. King of Persia, 424—405, named Ochus (Ὦχος) before his accession, and then surnamed Nothus (Νόθος), or the Bastard, from his being one of the bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. Darius obtained the crown by putting to death his brother SOGDIANUS, who had murdered Xerxes II. He married Parysatis, daughter of Xerxes I., by whom he had 2 sons, Artaxerxes II., who succeeded him, and Cyrus the younger. Darius was governed by eunuchs, and the weakness of his government was shown by repeated insurrections of his satraps. In 414 the Persians were expelled from Egypt by Amyrtaeus, who reigned there 6 years, and at whose death (408) Darius was obliged to recognise his son Pausiris as his successor. — III. Last king of Persia, 336—331, named Codomannus before his accession, was the son of Arsames and Sisygambis, and a descendant of Darius II. He was raised to the throne by Bagoas, after the murder of ARSES. The history of his conquest by Alexander the Great, and of his death, is given in the life of ALEXANDER.

Dascon (Δάσκων: Δασκώνιος), a fortress near Syracuse, situated on a bay of the same name.

Dascy̆līum (Δασκύλιον or -εῖον: Δασκυλίτης: Diaskili), a town of Bithynia, on the Propontis, near a lake called Dascylītis.

Dasēa (Δασέα, also Δασέαι: Δασεάτης), a small town in Arcadia near Megalopolis.

Dassarētii or Dassarītae, Dassarētae (Δασσαρήτιοι, Δασσαρῖται), a people in Greek Illyria on the borders of Macedonia: their chief town was Lychnidus (Λύχνιδος) on a hill, on the N. side of the lake Lychnītis, which was so called after the town.

Datămes (Δατάμης), a distinguished Persian general, a Carian by birth, son of Camissares by a Scythian mother. He succeeded his father as satrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), but, in consequence of the machinations of his enemies at the Persian court, he threw off his allegiance to the king, and made common cause with the other satraps who had revolted from Persia. He defeated the generals who were sent against him, but was assassinated by Mithridates, son of Ariobarzanes, about B. C. 362. Cornelius Nepos, who has written his life, calls him the bravest and most able of all barbarian generals, except Hamilcar and Hannibal.

Artaphernes, the Persian army of Darius, which was defeated at Marathon, B. C. 490.

Datum or Datus (Δάτον, Δάτος: Δατηνός), a Thracian town on the Strymonic gulf, subject to Macedonia, with gold mines in Mt. Pangaeus in the neighbourhood, whence came the proverb a "Datum of good things."

Daulis or Daulia (Δαυλίς -ίδος, Δαυλία: Δαυλιεύς, Δαύλιος), an ancient town in Phocis on the road from Chaeronēa and Orchomenus to Delphi, situated on a lofty hill: celebrated in mythology as the residence of the Thracian king TEREUS, and as the scene of the tragic story of PHILOMELA and PROCNE. Hence Daulias (Δαυλιάς) is the surname both of Procne and Philomela.

Daunĭa. [APULIA.]

Daunus (Δαῦνος). 1. Son of Lycaon, and brother of Iapyx and Peucetius. The 3 brothers crossed over from Illyria, and settled in Apulia, which was divided into 3 parts, and named after them. The poets sometimes gave the name of Daunia to the whole of Apulia: Horace (Carm. i. 22. 14) uses the adjective Daunias (sc. terra). — 2. Son of Pilumnus and Danaë, wife of Venilia, and ancestor of Turnus.

Decĕbălus (Δεκέβαλος), a celebrated king of the Dacians during the reigns of Domitian and Trajan. For 4 years (A. D. 86—90) he carried on war against the Romans with such success, that Domitian was at length glad to conclude peace with him by the payment of an annual tribute. Trajan refused to continue this disgraceful payment, and renewed the war. He defeated the Dacians, and compelled Decebalus to sue for peace, which was granted (101—103). But in 104 the war broke out again; Decebalus was again defeated, and put an end to his own life; and Dacia became a Roman province, 106.

Dĕcĕlēa or -īa (Δεκέλεια: Δεκελεύς: Biala-Castro), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoöntis, lay N.W. of Athens, on the borders of Boeotia, near the sources of the Cephissus. In the 19th year of the Peloponnesian War (B. C. 413), the Peloponnesians under Agis seized and fortified Decelea, and thereby annoyed the Athenians in many ways during the remainder of the war.

Decentĭus Magnus, brother or cousin of Magnentius, by whom he was created Caesar, A. D. 351. After the death of MAGNENTIUS, he put an end to his own life, 353.

Decetĭa (Desize), a city of the Aedui, in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island in the Liger (Loire).

Dĕcĭātes, a Ligurian people on the coast and about the sources of the Druentia (Durance). Their chief city, Deciātum (Δεκίητον), lay between Nicaea and Antipolis.

Decĭdĭus Saxa. [SAXA.]

P. Dĕcĭus Mūs, plebeians. 1. Consul B.C. 340 with T. Manlius Torquatus in the great Latin war. Each of the consuls had a vision in the night before fighting with the Latins, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were devoted to death. The consuls thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waver should devote himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. Decius commanded the left wing, which began to give way, whereupon he devoted himself and the army of the enemy to destruction, according to the formula prescribed by the pontifex maximus, then rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans. — 2. Son of the preceding, 4 times consul, 312, 308, 297, and 295. In his 4th consulship he commanded the left wing at the battle of Sentinum, where he was opposed to the Gauls, and when his troops began to give way, he imitated the example of his father, devoted himself and the enemy to destruction, and fell as a sacrifice for his nation. — 3. Son of No. 2, consul 279, in the war against Pyrrhus. According to some he sacrificed himself in battle like his father and grandfather, but this is not true, for he survived the war with Pyrrhus.

Dĕcĭus, Roman emperor, A. D. 249—251, whose full name was C. MESSIUS QUINTUS TRAJANUS DECIUS, was born at Bubalia in Pannonia. He was sent by the emperor Philippus in 249 to restore subordination in the army of Moesia, but the troops compelled him to accept the purple under threats of death. Decius still assured Philippus of his fidelity; but the latter not trusting these professions, hastened to meet his rival in the field, was defeated near Verona, and slain. The short reign of Decius was chiefly occupied in warring against the Goths. He fell in battle against the Goths together with his son in 251. In his reign the Christians were persecuted with great severity.

Dĕcŭmātes Agri. [AGRI DECUMATES.]

Dēĭănīra (Δηϊάνειρα), daughter of Althaea by either Oeneus, or Dionysus, or Dexamenus, and sister of Meleager. Achelous and Hercules both loved Deïanira, and fought for the possession of her. Hercules was victorious, and she became his wife. She was the unwilling cause of her husband's death by presenting him with the poisoned robe, which the centaur Nessus gave her. In despair she put an end to her own life. For details see HERCULES.

Dēĭdămīa (Δηϊδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Lycomedes in the island of Scyrus. When Achilles was concealed there in maiden's attire, she became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. — 2. Wife of Pirithous, commonly called HIPPODAMIA. — 3. Sister of Pyrrhus, married Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Dēĭŏcēs (Δηϊόκης), first king of Media, after the Medes had thrown off the supremacy of the Assyrians, was the son of Phraortes, and reigned B. C. 709—656. He built the city of Ecbatana, which he made the royal residence. His administration of justice was severe, and he kept a body of spies and informers throughout the whole country. He was succeeded by his son, PHRAORTES.

Dēĭon (Δηΐων), son of Aeolus and Enarete, king in Phocis, husband of Diomede, and father of Asteropia, Aenetus, Actor, Phylacus, and Cephalus.

Dēĭŏnē (Δηϊώνη), mother of Miletus, who is hence called Deionides. (Ov. Met. ix. 442.)

Deiŏtărus (Δηϊόταρος). 1. Tetrarch of Galatia, adhered firmly to the Romans in their wars in Asia against Mithridates, and was rewarded by the senate with the title of king, and the addition of Armenia Minor to his dominions. In the civil war he sided with Pompey, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. In 47 he applied to Domitius Calvinus, Caesar's legate in Asia, for aid against Pharnaces, who had taken possession of Armenia Minor. When Caesar, in the same year, came into Asia from Egypt, Deiotarus received him with submission, and endeavoured to excuse the aid he had given to Pompey. Caesar deprived him of part of his dominions, but allowed him to retain his regal title. Two years afterwards (45) his grandson Castor accused him of having formed a design against Caesar's life, when he received Caesar in Galatia. He was defended by Cicero before Caesar, in the house of the latter at Rome, in the speech (pro Rege Deiotaro) still extant. The result of the trial is not known. After Caesar's death he obtained from Antony the restitution of his dominions by paying Fulvia a large sum of money. In 42, he joined the party of Brutus and Cassius, and died shortly afterwards at a great age. — 2. Son and successor of the above. In the war between Antony and Octavian he took part with the former, but went over from him to the enemy in the battle of Actium, 31.

Dēĭphŏbē (Δηϊφόβη), the Sibyl at Cumae, daughter of Glaucus. [Sibylla.]

Dēĭphŏbus (Δηΐφοβος), a son of Priam and Hecuba, and next to Hector, the bravest among the Trojans. He always supported Paris in his refusal to deliver up Helen to the Trojans; and he married her after the death of Paris. Accordingly, on the fall of Troy, the vengeance of the Greeks was chiefly directed against him. His house was one of the first committed to the flames, and he was slain and fearfully mangled by Menelaus. In this dreadful condition he was found in the lower world by Aeneas, who erected a monument to him on cape Rhoeteum.

Dēiphontes (Δηϊφόντης), son of Antimachus, and husband of Hyrnetho, the daughter of Temenus the Heraclid, became king of Argos, after Temenus had been murdered by his own sons. Pausanias (ii. 19) gives a different account.

Dēlĭum (Δήλιον: Dhilessi), a town on the coast of Boeotia, in the territory of Tanagra, near the Attic frontier, named after a temple of Apollo similar to that at Delos. The Athenians used it as a fortress in the early part of the Peloponnesian War, and in B. C. 424 they were defeated here by the Boeotians.

Dēlĭus and Dēlĭa (Δήλιος, Δηλία), surnames of Apollo and Artemis respectively, from the island of Delos.

Dellĭus, Q., a Roman eques, who frequently changed sides in the civil wars. In B. C. 44 he joined Dolabella in Asia, afterwards went over to Cassius, and then united himself to M. Antony. He deserted to Octavian shortly before the battle of Actium, 31. He appears to have become a personal friend of Octavian and Maecenas, and is therefore addressed by Horace in one of his Odes (ii. 3). He wrote a history of Antony's war against the Parthians, in which he had himself fought.

Delmātĭus or Dalmātĭus. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora. From his half-brother, Constantine the Great, he received the title of censor: he died before A. D. 335. — 2. Son of the preceding, was created Caesar by Constantine the Great, 335; and, upon the division of the empire, received Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia, as his portion. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine.

Dēlos or Dēlus (ἡ Δῆλος: Δήλιος: Delo, Deli, Dili, or Sdilli, Ru.), the smallest of the islands called Cyclades, in the Aegean Sea, lay in the strait between Rhenea and Myconus. It was also called, in earlier times, Asteria, Ortygia, and Chlamydia. According to a legend, founded perhaps on some tradition of its late volcanic origin, it was called out of the deep by the trident of Poseidon, but was a floating island until Zeus fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place to Leto, for the birth of Apollo and Artemis. Apollo afterwards obtained possession of Delos, by giving Calauria to Poseidon in exchange for it; and it became the most holy seat of the worship of Apollo. Such is the mythical story: we learn from history that Delos was peopled by the Ionians, for whom it was the chief centre of political and religious union in the time of Homer: it was also the seat of an Amphictyony, comprising the surrounding islands. In the time of Pisistratus, Delos became subject to the Athenians; it was made the common treasury of the Greek confederacy for carrying on the war with Persia; but the transference of the treasury to Athens, and the altered character of the league, reduced the island to a condition of absolute political dependence upon Athens. It still possessed, however, a very extensive commerce, which was increased by the downfal of Corinth, when Delos became the chief emporium for the trade in slaves; and it was one of the principal seats of art in Greece, especially for works in bronze, of which metal one of the most esteemed mixtures was called the Delian. An especial sanctity was attached to Delos from its connection with the worship of Apollo; and the peculiar character assigned to the island by the traditions of its origin was confirmed by the remarkable fact that, though of volcanic origin, and in the midst of islands very subject to earthquakes, Delos enjoyed an almost entire exemption from such visitations, so that its being shaken by an earthquake was esteemed a marked prodigy. The city of Delos stood on the W. side of the island, at the foot of Mt. Cynthus (whence the god's surname of Cynthius), near a little river called Inopus. It contained a temple of Leto, and the great temple of Apollo. The latter was built near the harbour, and possessed an oracle. Though enriched with offerings from all Greece, and defended by no fortifications, it was so protected from plunder by the sanctity of the place, that even the Persians, when sailing against Greece, not only passed it by uninjured, but sent rich presents to the god. With this temple were connected games, called Delia, which were celebrated every 4 years, and were said to have been founded by Theseus. A like origin is ascribed to the sacred embassy (θεωρία) which the Athenians sent to Delos every year. (Dict. of Ant. art. Theori.) The temple and oracle were visited by pilgrims from every quarter, even from the regions of Scythia. The greatest importance was attached to the preservation of the sanctity of the island. It was twice purified by the Athenians; once under Pisistratus, when all tombs within sight of the temple were taken away; and again in B. C. 426, when all human and animal remains were removed entirely from the island, which was henceforth forbidden to be polluted by births or deaths, or by the presence of dogs: all persons about to die or bring forth children were to be removed to the adjacent island of Rhenea. Delos continued in a flourishing condition, and under the rule of the Athenians, who were confirmed in the possession of it by the Romans, until the Mithridatic War, when Menophanes, one of the generals of Mithridates, inflicted upon it a devastation, from which it never again recovered.

Delphi (οἱ Δελφοί: Δελφός: Kastri), a small town in Phocis, but one of the most celebrated in Greece, on account of its oracle of Apollo. It was 16 stadia in circumference, was situated on a steep declivity on the S. slope of Mt. Parnassus, and its site resembled the cavea of a great theatre. It was shut in on the N. by a barrier of rocky mountains, which were cleft in the centre into 2 great cliffs with peaked summits, between which issued the waters of the Castalian spring. It was originally called Pytho (Πυθώ), by which name it is alone mentioned in Homer. The origin of the name of Delphi is uncertain. The ancients derived it from an eponymous hero, Delphus, a descendant of Deucalion; but it has been conjectured, with great probability, that Delphi is connected with adelphos, "brother," and that it was indebted for its name to the twin peaks mentioned above. Delphi was colonised at an early period by Doric settlers from the neighbouring town of Lycorēa, on the heights of Parnassus. The government was an oligarchy, and was in the hands of a few distinguished families of Doric origin. From them were taken the chief magistrates, the priests, and a senate consisting of a very few members. Delphi was regarded as the central point of the whole earth, and was hence called the "navel of the earth." It was said that 2 eagles sent forth by Jupiter, one from the E. and the other from the W., met at Delphi at the same time. — Delphi was the principal seat of the worship of Apollo. Besides the great temple of Apollo, it contained numerous sanctuaries, statues, and other works of art. The Pythian games were also celebrated here, and it was one of the 2 places of meeting of the Amphictyonic council. — The temple of Apollo was situated at the N.W. extremity of the town. The first stone temple was built by Trophonius and Agamedes; and when this was burnt down B.C. 548, it was rebuilt by the Amphictyons with still greater splendour. The expense was defrayed by voluntary subscriptions, to which even Amasis, king of Egypt, contributed. The architect was Spintharus of Corinth; the Alcmaeonidae contracted to build it, and liberally substituted Parian marble for the front of the building, instead of the common stone which they had agreed to employ. The temple contained immense treasures; for not only were rich offerings presented to it by kings and private persons, who had received favourable replies from the oracle, but many of the Greek states had in the temple separate thesauri, in which they deposited, for the sake of security, many of their valuable treasures. The wealth of the temple attracted Xerxes, who sent part of his army into Phocis to obtain possession of its treasures, but the Persians were driven back by the god himself, according to the account of the Delphians. The Phocians plundered the temple to support them in the war against Thebes and the other Greek states (357—346); and it was robbed at a later time by Brennus and by Sulla. — In the centre of the temple there was a small opening (χάσμα) in the ground, from which, from time to time, an intoxicating vapour arose, which was believed to come from the well of Cassotis. No traces of this chasm or of the mephitic exhalations are now any where observable. Over this chasm there stood a tripod, on which the priestess, called Pythia, took her seat whenever the oracle was to be consulted. The words which she uttered after exhaling the vapour, were believed to contain the revelations of Apollo. They were carefully written down by the priests, and afterwards communicated in hexameter verse to the persons who had come to consult the oracle. If the Pythia spoke in prose, her words were immediately turned into verse by a poet employed for the purpose. The oracle is said to have been discovered by its having thrown into convulsions some goats which had strayed to the mouth of the cave. — For details respecting the oracle and its influence in Greece, see Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.

Delphīnes. [Delphinius.]

Delphīnium (Δελφίνιον). 1. A temple of Apollo Delphinius at Athens, said to have been built by Aegeus, in which the Ephetae sat for trying cases of intentional, but justifiable homicide. — 2. The harbour of Oropus in Attica, on the borders of Boeotia, called ὁ ἱερὸς λίμην. — 3. A town on the E. coast of the island Chios.

Delphīnius (Δελφίνιος), a surname of Apollo, derived either from his slaying the dragon Delphines (usually called Python), or because in the form of a dolphin (δελφίς) or riding on a dolphin, he showed the Cretan colonists the way to Delphi.

Delphus (Δελφός). 1. Son of Poseidon and Melantho, to whom the foundation of Delphi was ascribed. — 2. Son of Apollo and Celaeno, who is also said to have founded Delphi.

Delta. [Aegyptus.]

Dēmādes (Δημάδης, a contraction of Δημεάδης), an Athenian orator, was of very low origin, but rose by his talents to a prominent position at Athens. He belonged to the Macedonian party, and was a bitter enemy of Demosthenes. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Chaeronēa, B.C. 338, but was dismissed by Philip with distinguished marks of honour. After Philip's death he was the subservient supporter of Alexander, but notwithstanding frequently received bribes from the opposite party. He was put to death by Antipater in 318, because the latter had discovered a letter of Demades, urging the enemies of Antipater to attack him. Demades was a man without principle, and lived in a most profligate and dissolute manner. But he was a brilliant orator. He always spoke extempore, and with such irresistible force that he was a perfect match for Demosthenes himself. There is extant a large fragment of an oration bearing the name of Demades (περὶ δωδεκαετίας), in which he defends his conduct during the period of Alexander's reign. It is printed in the collections of the Attic orators, but its genuineness is doubtful. Cicero and Quintilian both state that Demades left no orations behind him.

Dēmarātus (Δημάρατος, Dor. Δαμάρατος). 1. King of Sparta, reigned from about B.C. 510 to 491. He was at variance with his unscrupulous colleague Cleomenes, who at length accused him before the Ephors of being an illegitimate son of Ariston, and obtained his deposition by bribing the Delphic oracle, B.C. 491. Demaratus thereupon repaired to the Persian coast, where he was kindly received by Darius. He accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, and recommended the king not to rely too confidently upon his countless hosts. His family continued long in Asia. — 2. A merchant-noble of Corinth, and one of the Bacchiadae. When the power of his clan had been overthrown by Cypselus, about B.C. 657, he fled from Corinth, and settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had 2 sons, Aruns and Lucumo, afterwards L. Tarquinius Priscus.

Dēmĕtae, a people of Britain, in the S.W. of Wales: their chief towns were Maridunum (Carmarthen) and Luentinum.

Dēmētēr (Δημήτηρ), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was the goddess of the earth, and her name probably signified Mother-Earth (γῆ μήτηρ). She was the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth. She was the daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and sister of Zeus, by whom she became the mother of Persephone (Proserpina). Zeus, without the knowledge of Demeter, had promised Persephone to Aïdoneus (Pluto); and while the unsuspecting maiden was gathering flowers in the Nysian plain in Asia, the earth suddenly opened and she was carried off by Aïdoneus. Her mother, who heard only the echo of her voice, immediately set out in search of her daughter. For 9 days she wandered about without obtaining any tidings of her, but on the tenth she met Hecate, who told her that she had heard the cries of Persephone, but did not know who had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios (the Sun), who revealed to them that it was Aïdoneus who had carried off Persephone with the consent of Zeus. Thereupon Demeter in her anger avoided Olympus, and dwelt upon earth among men, conferring blessings wherever she was kindly received, and severely punishing those who repulsed her. In this manner she came to Celeus at Eleusis. [CELEUS.] As the goddess still continued angry, and did not allow the earth to produce any fruits, Zeus first sent Iris and then all the gods to persuade Demeter to return to Olympus. But she was deaf to all their entreaties, and refused to return to Olympus, and to restore fertility to the earth, till she had seen her daughter again. Zeus accordingly sent Hermes into Erebus to fetch back Persephone. Aïdoneus consented, but gave Persephone part of a pomegranate to eat. Hermes then took her to Eleusis to her mother, who received her with unbounded joy. At Eleusis both were joined by Hecate, who henceforth became the attendant of Persephone. Demeter now returned to Olympus with her daughter, but as the latter had eaten in the lower world, she was obliged to spend one third of the year with Aïdoneus, but was allowed to continue with her mother the remainder of the year. The earth now brought forth fruit again. Before Demeter left Eleusis, she instructed Triptolemus, Diocles, Eumolpus, and Celeus in the mode of her worship and in the mysteries. This is the ancient legend as preserved in the Homeric hymn, but it is variously modified in later traditions. In the Latin poets the scene of the rape is near Enna in Sicily; and Ascalaphus, who had alone seen Persephone eat any thing in the lower world, revealed the fact and was in consequence turned into an owl by Demeter. [ASCALAPHUS.] In the Iliad and Odyssey there is no mention of this legend, and there appears no connexion between Demeter and Persephone. The meaning of the legend is obvious. Persephone, who is carried off to the lower world, is the seed-corn, which remains concealed in the ground part of the year; Persephone, who returns to her mother, is the corn which rises from the ground and nourishes men and animals. Later philosophical writers, and perhaps the mysteries also, referred the disappearance and return of Persephone to the burial of the body of man and the immortality of his soul.—The other legends about Demeter are of less importance. To escape the pursuit of Poseidon she changed herself into a mare, but the god effected his purpose, and she became the mother of the celebrated horse Arion [ARION, No. 2.] According to some traditions she also bore to Poseidon a daughter Despoena (i. e. Persephone). — She fell in love with Iasion and lay with him in a thrice-ploughed field in Crete: their offspring was Plutus (Wealth). [IASION.] — She punished with fearful hunger Erysichthon, who had cut down her sacred grove. [ERYSICHTHON.] — The chief seats of the worship of Demeter and Persephone were Attica, Arcadia and Sicily. In Attica she was worshipped with great splendour. The Athenians pretended that agriculture was first practised in their country, and that Triptolemus of Eleusis, the favourite of Demeter, was the first who invented the plough and sowed corn. [TRIPTOLEMUS.] Every year at Athens the festival of the Eleusinia was celebrated in honour of these goddesses. The festival of the Thesmophoria was also celebrated in her honour as well at Athens as in other parts of Greece: it was intended to commemorate the introduction of the laws and the regulations of civilised life, which were ascribed to Demeter, since agriculture is the basis of civilisation. (Dict. of Ant. arts. Eleusinia, Thesmophoria.) — In works of art Demeter was represented sometimes in a sitting attitude, sometimes walking, and sometimes riding in a chariot drawn by horses or dragons, but always in full attire. Around her head she wore a garland of corn-ears or a simple riband, and in her hand she held a sceptre, corn-ears or a poppy, sometimes also a torch and the mystic basket. — The Romans received from Sicily the worship of Demeter, to whom they gave the name of Ceres. The first temple of Ceres at Rome was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius Albinus, in B.C. 496, for the purpose of averting a famine with which Rome was threatened during a war with the Latins. The Romans instituted a festival with games in honour of her (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Cerealia). She was looked upon by the Romans much in the same light as Tellus. Pigs were sacrificed to both divinities, in the seasons of sowing and in harvest time, and also at the burial of the dead. Her worship acquired considerable political importance at Rome. The property of traitors against the republic was often made over to her temple. The decrees of the senate were deposited in her temple for the inspection of the tribunes of the people. If we further consider that the aediles had the special superintendence of this temple, it is very probable that Ceres, whose worship was, like the plebeians themselves, introduced at Rome from without, had some peculiar relation to the plebeian order.

Dēmētrīas (Δημητριάς: Δημητριεύς). 1. A town in Magnesia in Thessaly, on the innermost recess of the Pagasaean bay, founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and peopled by the inhabitants of Iolcus and the surrounding towns: it soon became one of the most important towns in the N. of Greece, and is frequently mentioned in the wars between the Macedonians and Romans. — 2. A town in Assyria, not far from Arbela. — 3. An Athenian tribe, added to the 10 old tribes, B.C. 307, and named in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Dēmētrīus (Δημήτριος). 1. A Greek of the island of Pharos in the Adriatic. He was a general of Teuta, the Illyrian queen, and treacherously surrendered Corcyra to the Romans, who rewarded him with a great part of the dominions of Teuta, 228. Subsequently he ventured on many acts of piratical hostility against the Romans, thinking that they were too much occupied with the Gallic war and the impending danger of Hannibal's invasion to take notice of him. The Romans, however, immediately sent the consul L. Aemilius Paulus over to Illyria (219), who took Pharos itself, and obliged Demetrius to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. At the court of this prince he spent the remainder of his life. — 2. Younger son of Philip V., king of Macedonia, was sent as a hostage to Rome after the battle of Cynoscephalae (198). Five years afterwards he was restored to his father, who subsequently sent him as his ambassador to Rome. But having incurred the jealousy of his father and his brother, Perseus, by the favourable reception he had met with from the Romans, he was secretly put to death by his father's order.

I. Kings of Macedonia. 1. Surnamed Poliorcetes (Πολιορκητής), or the Besieger, son of Antigonus, king of Asia, and Stratonice. At an early age he gave proofs of distinguished bravery. He accompanied his father in his campaigns against Eumenes (B. C. 317, 316), and a few years afterwards was left by his father in the command of Syria, which he had to defend against Ptolemy. In 312 he was defeated by Ptolemy near Gaza, but soon after retrieved his disaster in part by defeating one of the generals of Ptolemy. In 311 a general peace was concluded among the successors of Alexander, but it was only of short duration. In 307 Demetrius was despatched by his father with a powerful fleet and army to wrest Greece from Cassander and Ptolemy. He met with great success. At Athens he was received with enthusiasm by the people as their liberator. Demetrius the Phalerean, who had governed the city for Cassander, was expelled, and the fort at Munychia taken. Demetrius took up his abode for the winter at Athens, where divine honours were paid him under the title of "the Preserver" (ὁ Σωτήρ). He was recalled from Athens by his father to take the command of the war in Cyprus against Ptolemy. Here also he was successful, and in a great naval battle he annihilated the fleet of Ptolemy (306). Next year (305) he laid siege to Rhodes, because the Rhodians had refused to support him against Ptolemy. It was in consequence of the gigantic machines which Demetrius constructed to assail the walls of Rhodes, that he received the surname of Poliorcetes. But all his exertions were unavailing, and after the siege had lasted above a year, he at length concluded a treaty with the Rhodians (304). — Demetrius then crossed over to Greece, which had meanwhile been almost conquered by Cassander. He soon compelled Cassander to evacuate all Greece S. of Thermopylae, and for the next 2 years continued to prosecute the war with success. But in 302 he was obliged to return to Asia in order to support his father Antigonus. In 301 their combined forces were totally defeated by those of Lysimachus and Seleucus in the battle of Ipsus, and Antigonus himself slain. Demetrius, to whose impetuosity the loss of the battle would seem to be in great measure owing, fled to Ephesus, and from thence set sail for Athens; but the Athenians declined to receive him into their city. The jealousies of his enemies soon changed the face of his affairs; and Ptolemy having entered into a closer union with Lysimachus, Seleucus married Stratonice, daughter of Demetrius. By this alliance Demetrius obtained possession of Cilicia, and he had never lost Cyprus, Tyre, and Sidon. In 297 he determined to make an effort to recover his dominions in Greece. He appeared with a fleet on the coast of Attica, but was at first unsuccessful. The death of Cassander, however, in the course of the same year gave a new turn to affairs. Demetrius made himself master of Aegina, Salamis, and finally of Athens, after a long blockade (295). In 294 he marched into Peloponnesus against the Spartans, and was on the point of taking their city when he was suddenly called away by the state of affairs in Macedonia. Here the dissensions between Antipater and Alexander, the 2 sons of Cassander, had led Alexander to call in foreign aid to his support; and he sent embassies at once to Demetrius and to Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus was the nearest at hand, and had already defeated Antipater and established Alexander on the throne, when Demetrius arrived with his army. He was received with apparent friendliness, but mutual jealousies quickly arose. Demetrius caused the young king to be assassinated at a banquet, and was thereupon acknowledged as king by the Macedonian army. Demetrius kept possession of Macedonia for 7 years (294—287). His reign was a series of wars. In 292 he marched against the Thebans, who had risen against him, and took their city. In 291 he took advantage of the captivity of Lysimachus among the Getae to invade Thrace; but he was recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Boeotia. He repulsed Pyrrhus, who had attempted by invading Thessaly to effect a diversion in favour of the Boeotians, and again took Thebes after a long siege (290). In 289 he carried on war against Pyrrhus and the Aetolians, but he concluded peace with Pyrrhus that he might march into Asia with the view of recovering his father's dominions. His adversaries however forestalled him. In 287 Ptolemy sent a powerful fleet against Greece, while Pyrrhus (notwithstanding his recent treaty) on the one side and Lysimachus on the other simultaneously invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was deserted by his own troops, who proclaimed Pyrrhus king of Macedonia. He then crossed over to Asia, and after meeting with alternate success and misfortune, was at length obliged to surrender himself prisoner to Seleucus (286). That king kept him in confinement, but did not treat him with harshness. Demetrius died in the 3rd year of his imprisonment and the 56th of his age (283). He was one of the most remarkable characters of his age: in restless activity of mind, fertility of resource, and daring promptitude in the execution of his schemes, he has perhaps never been surpassed. His besetting sin was his unbounded licentiousness. Besides Lamia and his other mistresses, he was regularly married to 4 wives, Phila, Eurydice, Deïdamia, and Ptolemaïs, by whom he left 4 sons. The eldest of these, Antigonus Gonatas, eventually succeeded him on the throne of Macedonia. — 2. Son of Antigonus Gonatas, succeeded his father, and reigned B. C. 239—229. He carried on war against the Aetolians, and was opposed to the Achaean League. He was succeeded by Antigonus Doson.

II. Kings of Syria 1. Soter (reigned B. C. 162

—150), was the son of Seleucus IV. Philopator and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child, he had been sent to Rome by his father as a hostage, and remained there during the whole of the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. After the death of Antiochus, being now 23 years old, he demanded of the senate to be set at liberty; but as his request was refused by the senate, he fled secretly from Rome, by the advice of the historian Polybius, and went to Syria. The Syrians declared in his favour; and the young king Antiochus V. Eupator, with his tutor Lysias, was seized by his own guards and put to death. By valuable presents Demetrius obtained from the Romans his recognition as king. But having alienated his own subjects by his luxury and intemperance, they sided with an impostor of the name of Balas, who took the title of Alexander. By him Demetrius was defeated in battle and slain. He left 2 sons, Demetrius Nicator and Antiochus Sidetes, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne.—2. Nicator (B. C. 146—142, and again 128—125), son of Demetrius Soter. He had been sent by his father for safety to Cnidus, when Alexander Balas invaded Syria; and after the death of his father he continued in exile for some years. With the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor he defeated Balas, and recovered his kingdom; but, having like his father rendered himself odious to his subjects by his vices and cruelties, he was driven out of Syria by Tryphon, who set up Antiochus, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a pretender against him. Demetrius retired to Babylon, and from thence marched against the Parthians, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner, 138. He remained as a captive in Parthia 10 years, but was kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithridates (Arsaces VI.), who gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Meanwhile, his brother, Antiochus VII. Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates, the successor of Mithridates, brought forward Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. In the same year Antiochus fell in battle, and Demetrius again obtained possession of the Syrian throne, 128. Having engaged in an expedition against Egypt, Ptolemy Physcon set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune in Parthia, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemaïs, and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated, 125.—3. Eucaerus, son of Antiochus VIII. Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius II. During the civil wars that followed the death of Antiochus Grypus (96), Demetrius and his brother Philip for a time held the whole of Syria. But war broke out between them; Demetrius was taken prisoner and sent to Parthia, where he remained in captivity till his death.

III. Literary. 1. Of Adramyttium, surnamed Ixion, a Greek grammarian of the time of Augustus, lived partly at Pergamus and partly at Alexandria, and wrote commentaries on Homer and Hesiod and other works.—2. Magnes, that is, of Magnesia, a Greek grammarian, and a contemporary of Cicero and Atticus. He wrote a work On concord (περὶ ὁμονοίας), and another on poets and other authors who bore the same name (Περὶ ὁμωνύμων ποιητῶν καὶ συγγραφέων).—3. Phalereus, so called from his birthplace, the Attic demos of Phalerus, where he was born about B. C. 345. His parents were poor, but by his talents and perseverance he rose to the highest honours at Athens, and became distinguished both as an orator, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, in the school of Theophrastus. He began his public career about 325, and acquired great reputation by his eloquence. In 317 the government of Athens was entrusted to him by Cassander, and he discharged the duties of his office for 10 years with such general satisfaction, that the Athenians conferred upon him the most extraordinary distinctions, and erected no less than 360 statues to his honour. But during the latter period of his administration he seems to have become intoxicated with his good fortune, and he abandoned himself to dissipation. When Demetrius Poliorcetes approached Athens, in 307, Demetrius Phalereus was obliged to take to flight, and his enemies induced the Athenians to pass sentence of death upon him. He went to Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria, with whom he lived for many years on the best terms; and it was probably owing to the influence of Demetrius that the great Alexandrine library was formed. His successor, Ptolemy Philadelphus, was hostile towards Demetrius, because he had advised his father to appoint another of his sons as his successor. He banished Demetrius to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died from the bite of a snake.—Demetrius Phalereus was the last among the Attic orators worthy of the name; but even his orations bore evident marks of the decline of oratory, and were characterised rather by grace and elegance than by force and sublimity. His numerous writings, the greater part of which were probably composed in Egypt, embraced subjects of the most varied kinds; but none of them has come down to us, for the work on elocution (περὶ ἑρμηνείας), extant under his name, is probably the work of an Alexandrine sophist of the name of Demetrius.—4. Of Scepsis, a Greek grammarian of the time of Aristarchus, wrote a learned commentary on the Catalogue in the 2nd book of the Iliad.—5. Of Sunium, a Cynic philosopher, lived from the reign of Caligula to that of Domitian, and was banished from Rome in consequence of the freedom with which he rebuked the powerful.

Dēmŏcēdes (Δημοκήδης), a celebrated physician of Crotona. He practised medicine successively at Aegina, Athens, and Samos. He was taken prisoner along with Polycrates, in B. C. 522, and was sent to Susa to the court of Darius. Here he acquired great reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen Atossa. Notwithstanding his honours at the Persian court, he was always desirous of returning to his native country. In order to effect this, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured by means of Atossa that he should be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and ascertain in what parts it might be most successfully attacked. When they arrived at Tarentum, the king, Aristophilides, out of kindness to Democedes, seized the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician an opportunity of escaping to Crotona. Here he settled, and married the daughter of the famous wrestler, Milo; the Persians having followed him to Crotona, and in vain demanded that he should be restored.

Dēmŏchăres (Δημοχάρης), an Athenian, son of the sister of Demosthenes. He was probably trained by his uncle in oratory, and inherited his patriotic sentiments. After the restoration of the Athenian democracy in B.C. 307 by Demetrius Poliorcetes, Demochares was at the head of the patriotic party and took an active part in public affairs for the next 20 or 30 years. He left behind him several orations, and an extensive history of his own times.

Dēmŏcles (Δημοκλῆς), an Attic orator, and an opponent of Demochares.

Dēmŏcrătes (Δημοκράτης), a Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known, the author of an extant collection of moral maxims, called the golden sentences (γνῶμαι χρυσαῖ). They are printed with DEMOPHILUS.

Dēmŏcrĭtus (Δημόκριτος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born at Abdera in Thrace, about B.C. 460. His father, Hegesistratus,—or, as others called him, Damasippus or Athenocritus,—was possessed of so large a property, that he was able to entertain Xerxes on his march through Abdera. Democritus spent the inheritance, which his father left him, on travels into distant countries, which he undertook to satisfy his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and spent some time in Egypt. The many anecdotes preserved about Democritus show that he was a man of a most sterling and honourable character. His diligence was incredible: he lived exclusively for his studies, and his disinterestedness, modesty, and simplicity, are attested by many features which are related of him. Notwithstanding the great property he had inherited from his father, he died in poverty, but highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens. He died in 361, at a very advanced age. There is a tradition that he deprived himself of his sight, that he might be less disturbed in his pursuits; but this tradition is one of the inventions of a later age, which was fond of piquant anecdotes. It is more probable that he may have lost his sight by too severe application to study. This loss, however, did not disturb the cheerful disposition of his mind, which prompted him to look, in all circumstances, at the cheerful side of things, which later writers took to mean, that he always laughed at the follies of men. His knowledge was most extensive. It embraced not only the natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics, grammar, music, and philosophy, but various other useful arts. His works were composed in the Ionic dialect, though not without some admixture of the local peculiarities of Abdera. They are nevertheless much praised by Cicero on account of the liveliness of their style, and are in this respect compared even with the works of Plato. The fragments of them are collected by Mullach, Democriti Abderitae Operum Fragmenta, Berlin, 1843. Leucippus appears to have had most influence upon the philosophical opinions of Democritus, and these 2 philosophers were the founders of the theory of atoms. In order to explain the creation of all existing things, Democritus maintained that there were in infinite space an infinite number of atoms or elementary particles, homogeneous in quality, but heterogeneous in form. He further taught that these atoms combine with one another, and that all things arise from the infinite variety of the form, order, and position of the atoms in forming combinations. The cause of these combinations he called chance (τύχη), in opposition to the νοῦς of Anaxagoras; but he did not use the word chance in its vulgar acceptation, but to signify the necessary succession of cause and effect. In his ethical philosophy Democritus considered the acquisition of peace of mind (εὐθυμία) as the end and ultimate object of our actions.

Dēmŏdŏcus (Δημόδοκος), the celebrated bard at the court of Alcinoüs who sang of the loves of Ares and Aphrodite, while Ulysses sat at the banquet of Alcinoüs. He is also mentioned as the bard who advised Agamemnon to guard Clytaemnestra, and to expose Aegisthus in a desert island. Later writers, who looked upon this mythical minstrel as an historical person, related that he composed a poem on the destruction of Troy, and on the marriage of Hephaestus and Aphrodite.

Dēmōnax (Δημῶναξ), of Cyprus, a Cynic philosopher in the time of Hadrian. We owe our knowledge of his character to Lucian, who has painted it in the most glowing colours, representing him as almost perfectly wise and good. Demonax appears to have been free from the austerity and moroseness of the sect, though he valued their indifference to external things. He was nearly 100 years old at the time of his death.

Dēmŏnēsi Insŭlae (Δημόνησοι), a group of islands in the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), belonging to Bithynia: of these the most important were Pityōdes and Chalcitis, also called Demonesus.

Dēmŏphĭlus (Δημόφιλος). 1. Son of Ephorus, continued his father's history by adding to it the history of the Sacred War.—2. An Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, from whose Ὀναγός Plautus took his Asinaria.—3. A Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known, wrote a work entitled βίου θεράπεια, part of which is extant, in the form of a selection, entitled γνωμικὰ ὁμοιώματα. Best edition by Orelli, in his Opusc. Graec. Vet. Sentent. Lips. 1819.

Dēmŏphŏn or Dēmŏphŏōn (Δημοφῶν or Δημοφόων). 1. Son of Celeus and Metanīra, whom Demeter wished to make immortal. For details see CELEUS.—2. Son of Theseus and Phaedra, accompanied the Greeks against Troy, and there procured the liberation of his grandmother Aethra, who lived with Helen as a slave. On his return from Troy, he gained the love of Phyllis, daughter of the Thracian king Sithon, and promised to marry her. Before the nuptials were celebrated, he went to Attica to settle his affairs, and as he tarried longer than Phyllis had expected, she thought that she was forgotten, and put an end to her life; but she was metamorphosed into a tree. Demophon became king of Athens. He marched out against Diomedes, who on his return from Troy had landed on the coast of Attica, and was ravaging it. He took the Palladium from Diomedes, but had the misfortune to kill an Athenian in the struggle. For this murder he was summoned before the court ἐπὶ Παλλαδίῳ—the first time that a man was tried by that court.

Dēmosthĕnes (Δημοσθένης). 1. Son of Alcisthenes, a celebrated Athenian general in the Peloponnesian War. In B.C. 426 he was sent with a fleet to ravage the coast of Peloponnesus: he afterwards landed at Naupactus, and made a descent into Aetolia; he was at first unsuccessful, and was obliged to retreat; but he subsequently gained a brilliant victory over the Ambraciots. In 425, though not in office, he sailed with the Athenian fleet, and was allowed by the Athenian commanders to remain with 5 ships at Pylos, which he fortified in order to assail the Lacedaemonians in their own territories. He defended Pylos against all the attempts of the Lacedaemonians, till he was relieved by an Athenian fleet of 40 ships. The Spartans, who in their siege of the place had occupied the neighbouring island of Sphacteria, were now cut off and blockaded. Later in the same year he rendered important assistance to Cleon, in making prisoners of the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria, though the whole glory of the success was given to Cleon. In 413 he was sent with a large fleet to Sicily, to assist Nicias. Fortune was unfavourable to the Athenians. Demosthenes now counselled an immediate departure, but Nicias delayed returning till it was too late. The Athenian fleet was destroyed, and when Demosthenes and Nicias attempted to retreat by land, they were obliged to surrender to the enemy with all their forces. Both commanders were put to death by the Syracusans. — 2. The greatest of Athenian orators, was the son of Demosthenes, and was born in the Attic demos of Paeania, about B. C. 385. At 7 years of age he lost his father, who left him and his younger sister to the care of 3 guardians, Aphobus and Demophon, 2 relations, and Therippides, an old friend. These guardians squandered the greater part of the property of Demosthenes, and neglected his education to a great extent. He nevertheless received instruction from the orator Isaeus; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether he was taught by Plato and Isocrates, as some of the ancients stated. At the age of 18 Demosthenes called upon his guardians to render him an account of their administration of his property; but by intrigues they contrived to defer the business for 2 years. At length, in 364, Demosthenes accused Aphobus before the archon, and obtained a verdict in his favour. Aphobus was condemned to pay a fine of 10 talents. Emboldened by this success, Demosthenes ventured to come forward as a speaker in the public assembly. His first effort was unsuccessful, and he is said to have been received with ridicule; but he was encouraged to persevere by the actor Satyrus, who gave him instruction in action and declamation. In becoming an orator, Demosthenes had to struggle against the greatest physical disadvantages. His voice was weak and his utterance defective; he could not pronounce the ρ, and constantly stammered, whence he derived the nickname of βάταλος. It was only owing to the most unwearied exertions that he succeeded in overcoming the obstacles which nature had placed in his way. Thus it is said that he spoke with pebbles in his mouth, to cure himself of stammering; that he repeated verses of the poets as he ran up hill, to strengthen his voice; that he declaimed on the sea-shore to accustom himself to the noise and confusion of the popular assembly; that he lived for months in a cave under ground, engaged in constantly writing out the history of Thucydides, to form a standard for his own style. These tales are not worthy of much credit; but they nevertheless attest the common tradition of antiquity respecting the great efforts made by Demosthenes to attain to excellence as an orator. — It was about 355 that Demosthenes began to obtain reputation as a speaker in the public assembly. It was in this year that he delivered the oration against Leptines, and from this time we have a series of his speeches on public affairs. His eloquence soon gained him the favour of the people. The influence which he acquired he employed for the good of his country, and not for his own aggrandisement. He clearly saw that Philip had resolved to subjugate Greece, and he therefore devoted all his powers to resist the aggressions of the Macedonian monarch. For 14 years he continued the struggle against Philip, and neither threats nor bribes could turn him from his purpose. It is true he failed; but the failure must not be considered his fault. The history of his struggle is best given in the life of Philip. [PHILIPPUS.] It is sufficient to relate here that it was brought to a close by the battle of Chaeronēa (338), by which the independence of Greece was crushed. Demosthenes was present at the battle, and fled like thousands of others. His enemies reproached him with his flight, and upbraided him as the cause of the misfortunes of his country; but the Athenians judged better of his conduct, requested him to deliver the funeral oration upon those who had fallen at Chaeronea, and celebrated the funeral feast in his house. At this time many accusations were brought against him. Of these one of the most formidable was the accusation of Ctesiphon by Aeschines, but which was in reality directed against Demosthenes himself. Aeschines accused Ctesiphon for proposing that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre. Aeschines maintained that the proposal was not only made in an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to such a distinction. The trial was delayed for reasons unknown to us till 330, when Demosthenes delivered his oration on the crown (περὶ στεφάνου). Aeschines was defeated and withdrew from Athens. [AESCHINES.] — Meantime important events had taken place in Greece. The death of Philip in 336 roused the hopes of the patriots, and Demosthenes, although he had lost his daughter only 7 days before, was the first to proclaim the joyful tidings of the king's death, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against Macedonia. But Alexander's energy, and the frightful vengeance which he took upon Thebes, compelled Athens to submit and sue for peace. Alexander demanded the surrender of Demosthenes and the other leaders of the popular party, and with difficulty allowed them to remain at Athens. During the life of Alexander, Athens made no open attempt to throw off the Macedonian supremacy. In 325 Harpalus fled from Babylon with the treasure entrusted to his care by Alexander, and came to Athens, the protection of which he purchased by distributing his gold among the most influential demagogues. The reception of such an open rebel was viewed as an act of hostility towards Macedonia itself; and accordingly Antipater called upon the Athenians to deliver up the rebel and to try those who had accepted his bribes. Demosthenes was one of those who were suspected of having received money from Harpalus. His guilt is doubtful; but he was condemned, and thrown into prison, from which however he escaped, apparently with the connivance of the Athenian magistrates. He now resided partly at Troezene and partly in Aegina, looking daily across the sea towards his beloved native land. But his exile did not last long. On the death of Alexander (323) the Greek states rose in arms against Macedonia. Demosthenes was recalled from exile; a trireme was sent to Aegina to fetch him, and his progress to the city was a glorious trumph. But in the following year (322) the confederate Greeks were defeated by Antipater at the battle of Cranon, and were obliged to sue for peace. Antipater demanded the surrender of Demosthenes, who thereupon fled to the island of Calauria, and took refuge in the temple of Poseidon. Here he was pursued by the emissaries of Antipater; he thereupon took poison, which he had for some time carried about his person, and died in the temple, 322.—There existed 65 orations of Demosthenes in antiquity; but of these only 61 have come down to us, including the letter of Philip, which is strangely enough counted as an oration. Several of the orations, however, are spurious, or at least of very doubtful authenticity. Besides these orations, there are 56 Exordia to public orations, and 6 letters which bear the name of Demosthenes, but are probably spurious.—The orations may be divided into the following classes: (I.) 17 Political orations (λόγοι συμβουλευτικοὶ), of which the 12 Philippic orations are the most important. They bear the following titles:—1. The 1st Philippic, delivered 352. 2—4. The 3 Olynthiac orations, delivered 349. 5. On the Peace, 346. 6. The 2nd Philippic, 344. 7. On Halonesus, 343, not genuine, probably written by Hegesippus. 8. On the affairs of the Chersonesus, 342. 9. The 3rd Philippic, 342. 10. The 4th Philippic, not genuine, 341. 11. On the letter of Philip, 340, also spurious. 12. The letter of Philip.—(II.) 42 Judicial Orations (λόγοι δικανικοί), of which the most important are: Against Midias, written 355, but never delivered; Against Leptines, 355; On the dishonest conduct of Aeschines during his embassy to Philip (Περὶ τῆς Παραπρεσβείας), 342; On the Crown, 330.—(III.) 2 Show Speeches (λόγοι ἐπιδεικτικοί), namely the Ἐπιτάφιος and Ἐρωτικός, both of which are spurious. The orations of Demosthenes are contained in the collections of the Attic orators by Reiske, Lips. 1770—1775; Bekker, Oxon. 1823; Dobson, Lond. 1828; Baiter and Sauppe, Turic. 1845.

Denselētae or Denthelētae, a Thracian people on the Haemus, between the Strymon and Nessus.

Dentātus, M'. Curius, a favourite hero of the Roman republic, was celebrated in later times as a noble specimen of old Roman frugality and virtue. He was of Sabine origin, and the first of his family who held any of the high offices of state (consequently a homo novus). He was consul B.C. 290 with P. Cornelius Rufinus. The 2 consuls defeated the Samnites, and brought the Samnite wars to a close. In the same year Dentatus also defeated the Sabines, who appear to have supported the Samnites. In 283 he fought as praetor against the Senones. In 275 he was consul a second time, and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum and in the Arusinian plain so completely, that the king was obliged to quit Italy. The booty which he gained was immense, but he would keep nothing for himself. In 274 he was consul a third time, and conquered the Lucanians, Samnites, and Bruttians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. Dentatus now retired to his small farm in the country of the Sabines, and cultivated the land with his own hands. Once the Samnites sent an embassy to him with costly presents; they found him sitting at the hearth and roasting turnips. He rejected their presents, telling them that he preferred ruling over those who possessed gold, to possessing it himself. He was censor in 272, and in that year executed public works of great importance. He commenced the aquaeduct which carried the water from the river Anio into the city (Aniensis Vetus); and by a canal he carried off the water of the lake Velinus into the river Nar, in consequence of which the inhabitants of Reate gained a large quantity of excellent land.

Dēō (Δηώ), another name for Demeter: hence her daughter Persephone is called by the patronymic Dēōis and Dēōine.

Derbē (Δέρβη: Δερβήτης, Δερβαῖος), a town in Lycaonia, on the frontiers of Isauria. It is first mentioned as the residence of the tyrant Antipater of Derbe, a friend of Cicero, whom Amyntas put to death.

Derbiccae or Derbīces, a Scythian people in Margiana, dwelling on the Oxus, near its entrance into the Caspian sea. They worshipped the earth as a goddess, neither sacrificed nor ate any female animals, and killed and ate all their old men above 70 years of age.

Dercĕtis, Dercĕto (Δερκέτις, Δερκετώ), also called Atargatis, a Syrian goddess. She offended Aphrodite (Venus), who in consequence inspired her with love for a youth, to whom she bore a daughter Semiramis; but ashamed of her frailty, she killed the youth, exposed her child in a desert, and threw herself into a lake near Ascalon. Her child was fed by doves, and she herself was changed into a fish. The Syrians thereupon worshipped her as a goddess. The upper part of her statue represented a beautiful woman, while the lower part terminated in the tail of a fish. She appears to be the same as Dagon mentioned in the Old Testament as a deity of the Philistines.

Dercyllĭdas (Δερκυλλίδας), a Spartan, succeeded Thimbron, B.C. 399, in the command of the army which was employed in the protection of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia. He carried on the war with success. Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus were at length glad to sue for peace. In 396 he was superseded by Agesilaus.

Dertōna (Tortona), an important town in Liguria, and a Roman colony with the surname Julia, on the road from Genua to Placentia.

Dertōsa (Tortosa), a town of the Ilercaones on the Iberus in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

Despoena (Δέσποινα), the mistress, a surname of several divinities, as Aphrodite, Demeter, and more especially Persephone, who was worshipped under this name in Arcadia.

Deucălīon (Δευκαλίων). 1. Son of Prometheus and Clymene, king of Phthia, in Thessaly. When Zeus, after the treatment he had received from Lycaon, had resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha were, on account of their piety, the only mortals saved. On the advice of his father, Deucalion built a ship, in which he and his wife floated in safety during the 9 days' flood, which destroyed all the other inhabitants of Hellas. At last the ship rested on mount Parnassus in Phocis, or, according to other traditions, on mount Othrys in Thessaly, on mount Athos, or even on Aetna in Sicily. When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus Phyxius (Φύξιος), and he and his wife then consulted the sanctuary of Themis how the race of man might be restored. The goddess bade them cover their heads and throw the bones of their mother behind them. After some doubts and scruples respecting the meaning of this command, they agreed in interpreting the bones of their mother to mean the stones of the earth. They accordingly threw stones behind them, and from those thrown by Deucalion there sprang up men, from those thrown by Pyrrha women. Deucalion then descended from Parnassus, and built his first abode at Opus or at Cynus. Deucalion became by Pyrrha the father of Hellen, Amphictyon, Protogenia, and others. — 2. Son of Minos and Pasiphaë, and father of Idomeneus, was an Argonaut and one of the Calydonian hunters.

Deva. 1. (Chester), the principal town of the Cornavii in Britain, on the Seteia (Dee), and the head-quarters of the Legio XX. Victrix. — 2. (Dee), an estuary in Scotland, on which stood the town Devana, near the modern Aberdeen.

Dexămĕnus (Δεξάμενος), a Centaur who lived in Bura in Achaia. According to others, he was king of Olenus, and father of Deïanīra, who is usually represented as daughter of Oeneus.

Dexippus (Δέξιππος). 1. Called also Dioxippus, a physician of Cos, one of the pupils of Hippocrates, lived about B. C. 380, and attended the children of Hecatomnus, prince of Caria. — 2. P. Herennius, a Greek rhetorician and historian, was a native of Attica, and held the highest offices at Athens. He distinguished himself in fighting against the Goths, when they invaded Greece in A. D. 262. He was the author of 3 historical works: — 1. A history of Macedonia from the time of Alexander. 2. A chronological history from the mythical ages down to the accession of Claudius Gothicus, A. D. 268. 3. An account of the war of the Goths or Scythians, in which Dexippus himself had fought. The fragments of Dexippus, which are considerable, are published by Bekker and Niebuhr in the first volume of the Scriptores Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn, 1829, 8vo. — 3. A disciple of the philosopher Iamblichus, lived about A. D. 350, and wrote a commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, of which a Latin translation appeared at Paris, 1549, 8vo., and at Venice, 1546, fo. after the work of Porphyry In Praedicam.

Dia (Δία), daughter of Deioneus and wife of Ixion. By Ixion, or according to others, by Zeus, she became the mother of Pirithous.

Dīa (Δία). 1. The ancient name of Naxos. — 2. An island near Amorgos. — 3. A small island off Crete, opposite the harbour of Cnossus. — 4. An island in the Arabian gulf, on the W. coast of Arabia.

Diablintes. [Aulerci.]

Diacrīa (ἡ Διακρία), a mountainous district in the N. E. of Attica, including the plain of Marathon. [Attica.] The inhabitants of this district (Διακριεῖς, Διάκριοι), formed one of the 3 parties into which the inhabitants of Attica were divided in the time of Solon: they were the most democratical of the 3 parties.

Diadumeniānus or Diadumĕnus, son of the emperor Macrinus, received the title of Caesar, when his father was elevated to the purple, A. D. 217, and was put to death in the following year about the same time with Macrinus.

Diaeus (Δίαιος), of Megalopolis, general of the Achaean league B. C. 149 and 147, took an active part in the war against the Romans. On the death of Critolaüs in 146, he succeeded to the command of the Achaeans, but was defeated by Mummius near Corinth, whereupon he put an end to his own life, after slaying his wife to prevent her falling into the enemy's power.

Diăgŏras (Διαγόρας). 1. Son of Damagetus, of Ialysus in Rhodes, was very celebrated for his own victories and those of his sons and grandsons, in the Grecian games, His fame was celebrated by Pindar in the 7th Olympic ode. He was victor in boxing twice in the Olympian games, four times in the Isthmian, twice in the Nemean, and once at least in the Pythian. He had therefore the high honour of being a περιοδονίκης, that is, one who had gained crowns at all the 4 great festivals. When an old man, he accompanied his sons, Acusilaüs and Damagetus, to Olympia. The young men, having both been victorious, carried their father through the assembly, while the spectators showered garlands upon him, and congratulated him as having reached the summit of human happiness. He gained his Olympic victory, B. C. 464. — 2. Surnamed the Atheist (Ἄθεος), a Greek philosopher and poet, was the son of Teleclides, and was born in the island of Melos, one of the Cyclades. He was a disciple of Democritus of Abdera, and in his youth he acquired considerable reputation as a lyric poet. He was at Athens as early as B. C. 424, for Aristophanes in the Clouds (830), which were performed in that year, alludes to him as a well-known character. In consequence of his attacks upon the popular religion, and especially upon the Eleusinian mysteries, he was formally accused of impiety B. C. 411, and fearing the results of a trial, fled from Athens. He was condemned to death in his absence, and a reward set upon his head. He first went to Pallene, and afterwards to Corinth, where he died. One of the works of Diagoras was entitled Φρύγιοι λόγοι, in which he probably attacked the Phrygian divinities.

Diāna, an ancient Italian divinity, whom the Romans identified with the Greek Artemis. Her worship is said to have been introduced at Rome by Servius Tullius, who dedicated a temple to her on the Aventine; and she appears to have been originally worshipped only by the plebeians. At Rome Diana was the goddess of light, and her name contains the same root as the word dies. As Dianus (Janus), or the god of light, represented the sun, so Diana, the goddess of light, represented the moon. The attributes of the Greek Artemis were afterwards ascribed to the Roman Diana. See Artemis.

Diānĭum. 1. (Gianuti), a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea, opposite the gulf of Cosa. — 2. (Denia), called Hemeroscopīon (Ἡμεροσκοπεῖον) by Strabo, a town in Hispania Tarraconensis on a promontory of the same name (C. Martin) founded by the Massilians. Here stood a celebrated temple of Diana, from which the town derived its name; and here Sertorius kept most of his military stores.

Dicaea (Δίκαια), a town in Thrace, on the lake Bistonis.

Dicaearchīa. [Puteoli.]

Dicaearchus (Δικαίαρχος), a celebrated Peripatetic philosopher, geographer, and historian, was born at Messana in Sicily, but passed the greater part of his life in Greece Proper, and especially in Peloponnesus. He was a disciple of Aristotle and a friend of Theophrastus. He wrote a vast number of works, of which only fragments are extant. His most important work was entitled Βίος τῆς Ἑλλάδος: it contained an account of the geography, history, and moral and religious condition of Greece. See Fuhr, Dicaearchi Messenii quae supersunt composita et illustrata, Darmstadt, 1841.

Dīcē (Δίκη), the personification of justice, a daughter of Zeus and Themis, and the sister of Eunomia and Eirene. She was considered as one of the Horae, and is frequently called the attendant or councillor (πάρεδρος or ξύνεδρος) of Zeus. In the tragedians, she appears as a divinity who severely punishes all wrong, watches over the maintenance of justice, and pierces the hearts of the unjust with the sword made for her by Aesa. In this capacity she is closely connected with the Erinnyes, though her business is not only to punish injustice, but also to reward virtue.

Dictaeus. [Dicte.]

Dictamnum (Δίκταμνον), a town on the N. coast of Crete with a sanctuary of Dictynna, from whom the town itself was also called Dictynna.

Dictē (Δίκτη), a mountain in the E. of Crete, where Zeus is said to have been brought up. Hence he bore the surname Dictaeus. The Roman poets frequently employ the adjective Dictaeus as synonymous with Cretan.

Dictynna (Δίκτυννα), a surname both of Britomartis and Diana, which two divinities were subsequently identified. The name is connected with δίκτυον, a hunting-net, and was borne by Britomartis and Diana as goddesses of the chase. One tradition related that Britomartis was so called, because when she had thrown herself into the sea to escape the pursuit of Minos, she was saved in the nets of fishermen.

Dictys Cretensis, the reputed author of an extant work in Latin on the Trojan war, divided into 6 books, and entitled Ephemeris Belli Trojani, professing to be a journal of the leading events of the war. In the preface to the work we are told that it was composed by Dictys of Cnossus, who accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and was inscribed in Phoenician characters on tablets of lime wood or paper made from the bark. The work was buried in the same grave with the author, and remained undisturbed till the sepulchre was burst open by an earthquake in the reign of Nero, and the work was discovered in a tin case. It was carried to Rome by Eupraxis, whose slaves had discovered it, and it was translated into Greek by order of Nero. It is from this Greek version that the extant Latin work professes to have been translated by a Q. Septimius Romanus. Although its alleged origin and discovery are quite unworthy of credit, it appears nevertheless to be a translation from a Greek work, which we know to have been extant under the name of Dictys, since it is frequently quoted by the Byzantine writers. The work was probably written in Greek by Eupraxis in the reign of Nero, but at what time the Latin translation was executed is quite uncertain. The work contains a history of the Trojan war, from the birth of Paris down to the death of Ulysses. The compiler not unfrequently differs widely from Homer, adding many particulars, and recording many events of which we find no trace elsewhere. All miraculous events and supernatural agency are entirely excluded. The compilations ascribed to Dictys and Dares [Dares], are of considerable importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountains from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the middle ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany.—The best edition of Dictys is by Dederich, Bonn, 1835.

Dĭdĭus. 1. T., praetor in Macedonia, B. C. 100, where he defeated the Scordiscans, consul 98, and subsequently proconsul in Spain, where he defeated the Celtiberians. He fell in the Marsic war, 89.—2. C., a legate of Caesar, fell in battle in Spain fighting against the sons of Pompey, 46.—3. M. Didius Salvĭus Juliānus, bought the Roman empire of the praetorian guards, when they put up the empire for sale after the death of Pertinax, A. D. 193. Flavius Sulpicianus, praefect of the city, and Didius bid against each other, but it was finally knocked down to Didius, upon his promising a donative to each soldier of 25,000 sesterces. Didius, however, held the empire for only 2 months, from March 28th to June 1st, and was murdered by the soldiers when Severus was marching against the city.

Dīdo (Διδώ), also called Elissa, the reputed founder of Carthage. She was daughter of the Tyrian king Belus or Agenor or Mutgo, and sister of Pygmalion, who succeeded to the crown after the death of his father. Dido was married to her uncle, Acerbas or Sichaeus, a priest of Hercules, and a man of immense wealth. He was murdered by Pygmalion, who coveted his treasures; but Dido secretly sailed from Tyre with the treasures, accompanied by some noble Tyrians, who were dissatisfied with Pygmalion's rule. She first went to Cyprus, where she carried off 80 maidens to provide the emigrants with wives, and then crossed over to Africa. Here she purchased as much land as might be covered with the hide of a bull; but she ordered the hide to be cut up into the thinnest possible stripes, and with them she surrounded a spot, on which she built a citadel called Byrsa (from βύρσα, i. e. the hide of a bull). Around this fort the city of Carthage arose, and soon became a powerful and flourishing place. The neighbouring king Hiarbas, jealous of the prosperity of the new city, demanded the hand of Dido in marriage, threatening Carthage with war in case of refusal. Dido had vowed eternal fidelity to her late husband; but seeing that the Carthaginians expected her to comply with the demands of Hiarbas, she pretended to yield to their wishes, and under pretence of soothing the manes of Acerbas by expiatory sacrifices, she erected a funeral pile, on which she stabbed herself in presence of her people. After her death she was worshipped by the Carthaginians as a divinity.—Virgil has inserted in his Aeneid the legend of Dido with various modifications. According to the common chronology, there was an interval of more than 300 years between the capture of Troy (B. C. 1184) and the foundation of Carthage (B. C. 853); but Virgil nevertheless makes Dido a contemporary of Aeneas, with whom she falls in love on his arrival in Africa. When Aeneas hastened to seek the new home which the gods had promised him, Dido in despair destroyed herself on a funeral pile.

Didyma. [Branchidae.]

Dĭdymē. [Aeoliae Insulae.]

Didўmus (Δίδυμος), a celebrated Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus, was a follower of the school of Aristarchus, and received the surname χαλκέντερος, on account of his indefatigable and unwearied application to study. He is said to have written 4000 works, the most important of which were commentaries on Homer. The greater part of the extant Scholia minora on Homer was at one time considered the work of Didymus, but is really taken from the commentaries of Didymus and of other grammarians.

Diespĭter. [JUPITER.]

Dīgentĭa (Licenza), a small stream in Latium, beautifully cool and clear, which flows into the Anio near the modern Vicovaro. It flowed through the Sabine farm of Horace. Near its source, which was also called Digentia (fons etiam rivo dare nomen idoneus, Hor. Ep. i. 16. 12), stood the house of Horace (vicinus tecto jugis aquae fons, Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 2).

Dimallum, a town in Greek Illyria.

Dīnarchus (Δείναρχος), the last and least important of the 10 Attic orators, was born at Corinth about B. C. 361. He was brought up at Athens, and studied under Theophrastus. As he was a foreigner, he could not come forward himself as an orator, and was therefore obliged to content himself with writing orations for others. He belonged to the friends of Phocion and the Macedonian party. When Demetrius Poliorcetes advanced against Athens in 307, Dinarchus fled to Chalcis in Euboea, and was not allowed to return to Athens till 292, where he died at an advanced age. Only 3 of his speeches have come down to us: they all refer to the question about HARPALUS. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators.

Dindȳmēne. [DINDYMUS.]

Dindȳmus or Dindȳma, -ōrum (Δίνδυμος: τὰ Δίνδυμα). 1. A mountain in Phrygia on the frontiers of Galatia, near the town Pessinus, sacred to Cybele, the mother of the gods, who is hence called Dindymēne. — 2. A mountain in Mysia near Cyzicus, also sacred to Cybele.

Dīnocrătes (Δεινοκράτης), a distinguished Macedonian architect in the time of Alexander the Great. He was the architect of the new temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was built after the destruction of the former temple by Herostratus. He was employed by Alexander, whom he accompanied into Egypt, in the building of Alexandria. He formed a design for cutting mount Athos into a statue of Alexander; but the king forbad the execution of the project. The right hand of the figure was to have held a city, and in the left there would have been a basin, in which the water of all the mountain streams was to pour, and thence into the sea. He commenced the erection of a temple to Arsinoë, the wife of Ptolemy II., of which the roof was to be arched with loadstones, so that her statue made of iron might appear to float in the air, but he died before completing the work.

Dīnŏmăchus (Δεινόμαχος), a philosopher, who agreed with CALLIPHON in considering the chief good to consist in the union of virtue with bodily pleasure.

Dīnŏmĕnes (Δεινομένης), a statuary, whose statues of Io and Callisto stood in the Acropolis at Athens in the time of Pausanias: he flourished B. C. 400.

Dinon (Δείνων, Δίνων), father of the historian Clitarchus, wrote himself a history of Persia.

Dio. [DION.]

Diocaesarēa (Διοκαισάρεια: Sefurich), more anciently Sepphŏris (Σεπφώρις), in Galilee, was a small place until Herodes Antipas made it the capital of Galilee, under the name of Diocaesarea. It was destroyed in the 4th century by Gallus, on account of an insurrection which had broken out there.

Dioclea or Doclea (Δόκλεα), a place in Dalmatia, near Salona, the birth-place of Diocletian.

Diŏcles (Διοκλῆς). 1. A brave Athenian, who lived in exile at Megara. Once in a battle he protected with his shield a youth whom he loved, but he lost his own life in consequence. The Megarians rewarded him with the honours of a hero, and instituted the festival of the Dioclea, which they celebrated in the spring of every year. — 2. A Syracusan, the leader of the popular party in opposition to Hermocrates. In B. C. 412 he was appointed with several others to draw up a new code of laws. This code, which was almost exclusively the work of Diocles, became very celebrated, and was adopted by many other Sicilian cities. — 3. Of Carystus in Euboea, a celebrated Greek physician, lived in the 4th century B. C. He wrote several medical works, of which only some fragments remain.

Diocletĭānŏpŏlis. [CELETRUM.]

Dioclētĭānus, Valĕrĭus, Roman emperor, A. D. 284—305, was born near Salona in Dalmatia, in 245, of most obscure parentage. From his mother, Doclea, or Dioclea, who received her name from the village where she dwelt, he inherited the appellation of Docles or Diocles, which, after his assumption of the purple, was expanded into Diocletianus, and attached as a cognomen to the high patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army, he served with high reputation under Probus and Aurelian, followed Carus to the Persian war, and, after the fate of Numerianus became known at Chalcedon, was proclaimed emperor by the troops, 284. He slew with his own hands Arrius Aper, who was arraigned of the murder of Numerianus, in order, according to some authorities, that he might fulfil a prophecy delivered to him in early youth by a Gaulish Druidess, that he should mount a throne as soon as he had slain the wild-boar (Aper). Next year (285) Diocletian carried on war against Carinus, on whose death he became undisputed master of the empire. But as the attacks of the barbarians became daily more formidable, he resolved to associate with himself a colleague in the empire, and accordingly selected for that purpose Maximianus, who was invested with the title of Augustus in 286. Maximian had the care of the Western empire, and Diocletian that of the Eastern. But as the dangers which threatened the Roman dominions from the attacks of the Persians in the E., and the Germans and other barbarians in the W., became still more imminent, Diocletian made a still further division of the empire. In 292, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius were proclaimed Caesars, and the government of the Roman world was divided between the 2 Augusti and the 2 Caesars. Diocletian had the government of the E. with Nicomedia as his residence; Maximian, Italy, and Africa, with Milan, as his residence; Constantius, Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treves, as his residence; Galerius, Illyricum, and the whole line of the Danube, with Sirmium, as his residence. The wars in the reign of Diocletian are related in the lives of his colleagues, since Diocletian rarely commanded the armies in person. It is sufficient to state here that Britain, which had maintained its independence for some years under Carausius and Allectus, was restored to the empire (296); that the Persians were defeated and obliged to sue for peace (298); and that the Marcomanni and other barbarians in the N. were also driven back from the Roman dominions. But after an anxious reign of 21 years Diocletian longed for repose. Accordingly on 1st of May, 305, he abdicated at Nicomedia, and compelled his reluctant colleague Maximian to do the same at Milan. Diocletian retired to his native Dalmatia, and passed the remaining 8 years of his life near Salona in philosophic retirement, devoted to rural pleasures and the cultivation of his garden. He died 313. One of the most memorable events in the reign of Diocletian was his fierce persecution of the Christians (303), to which he was instigated by his colleague Galerius.

Diŏdōrus (Διόδωρος). 1. Surnamed Cronus, of Iasus in Caria, lived at Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, who is said to have given him the surname of Cronus on account of his inability to solve at once some dialectic problem proposed by Stilpo, when the 2 philosophers were dining with the king. Diodorus is said to have taken that disgrace so much to heart, that after his return from the repast, and writing a treatise on the problem, he died in despair. According to another account he derived his surname from his teacher Apollonius Cronus. He belonged to the Megaric school of philosophy, of which he was the head. He was celebrated for his great dialectic skill, for which he is called ὁ διαλεκτικός, or διαλεκτικώτατος. — 2. Siculus, of Agyrium in Sicily, was a contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus. In order to collect materials for his history, he travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia, and lived a long time at Rome. He spent altogether 30 years upon his work. It was entitled Βιβλιοθήκη ἱστορική, The Historical Library, and was an universal history, embracing the period from the earliest mythical ages down to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. It was divided into 3 great sections and into 40 books. The 1st section, which consisted of the first 6 books, contained the history of the mythical times previous to the Trojan war. The 2nd section, which consisted of 11 books, contained the history from the Trojan war down to the death of Alexander the Great. The 3rd section, which contained the remaining 23 books, treated of the history from the death of Alexander down to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. Of this work only the following portions are extant entire: the first 5 books, which contain the early history of the Eastern nations, the Egyptians, Aethiopians, and Greeks; and from book 11 to book 20, containing the history from the 2nd Persian war, B. C. 480, down to 302. Of the remaining portion there are extant a number of fragments and the Excerpta, which are preserved partly in Photius, and partly in the Eclogae made at the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. The work of Diodorus is constructed upon the plan of annals, and the events of each year are placed one after the other without any internal connection. In compiling his work Diodorus exercised no judgment or criticism. He simply collected what he found in his different authorities, and thus jumbled together history, mythus, and fiction: he frequently misunderstood authorities, and not seldom contradicts in one passage what he has stated in another. But nevertheless the compilation is of great importance to us, on account of the great mass of materials which are there collected from a number of writers whose works have perished. The best editions are by Wesseling, Amsterd. 1746, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Bipont, 1793, &c., 11 vols. 8vo.; and by Dindorf, Lips. 1828, 6 vols. 8vo. — 3. Of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, flourished 353. — 4. Of Tyre, a peripatetic philosopher, a disciple and follower of Critolaüs, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He flourished B. C. 110.

Diŏdŏtus (Διόδοτος), a Stoic philosopher and a teacher of Cicero, in whose house he lived for many years at Rome. In his later years, Diodotus became blind: he died in Cicero's house, B. C. 59, and left to his friend a property of about 100,000 sesterces.

Diŏgĕnes (Διογένης). 1. Of Apollonia in Crete, an eminent natural philosopher, lived in the 5th century B. C., and was a pupil of Anaximenes. He wrote a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Περὶ Φύσεως, On Nature, in which he appears to have treated of physical science in the largest sense of the words. — 2. The Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Seleucia in Babylonia, was educated at Athens under Chrysippus, and succeeded Zeno of Tarsus as the head of the Stoic school at Athens. He was one of the 3 ambassadors sent by the Athenians to Rome in B. C. 155. [Carneades: Critolaus.] He died at the age of 88. — 3. The Cynic philosopher, was born at Sinope in Pontus, about B. C. 412. His father was a banker named Icesias or Icetas, who was convicted of some swindling transaction, in consequence of which Diogenes quitted Sinope and went to Athens. His youth is said to have been spent in dissolute extravagance; but at Athens his attention was arrested by the character of Antisthenes, who at first drove him away. Diogenes, however, could not be prevented from attending him even by blows, but told him that he would find no stick hard enough to keep him away. Antisthenes at last relented, and his pupil soon plunged into the most frantic excesses of austerity and moroseness. In summer he used to roll in hot sand, and in winter to embrace statues covered with snow; he wore coarse clothing, lived on the plainest food, slept in porticoes or in the street, and finally, according to the common story, took up his residence in a tub belonging to the Metroum, or temple of the Mother of the Gods. The truth of this latter tale has, however, been reasonably disputed. In spite of his strange eccentricities, Diogenes appears to have been much respected at Athens, and to have been privileged to rebuke anything of which he disapproved. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Ulysses, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves about the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practise it. — On a voyage to Aegina he was taken prisoner by pirates, and carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, "How to command men." He was purchased by Xeniades of Corinth, over whom he acquired such influence, that he soon received from him his freedom, was entrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence at Corinth his celebrated interview with Alexander the Great is said to have taken place. The conversation between them begun by the king's saying, "I am Alexander the Great;" to which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." Alexander then asked whether he could oblige him in any way, and received no answer except, "Yes, you can stand out of the sunshine." We are further told that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, "If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes." Diogenes died at Corinth at the age of nearly 90, B. C. 323. — 4. Laertĭus, of Laërte in Cilicia, of whose life we have no particulars, probably lived in the 2nd century after Christ. He wrote the Lives of the Philosophers in 10 books: the work is entitled περὶ βίων, δογμάτων, καὶ ἀποφθεγμάτων τῶν ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ εὐδοκιμησάντων. According to some allusions which occur in it, he wrote it for a lady of rank, who occupied herself with philosophy, and who, according to some, was Arria, the friend of Galen. In this work Diogenes divides the philosophy of the Greeks into the Ionic — which commences with Anaximander and ends with Clitomachus, Chrysippus, and Theophrastus — and the Italian, which was founded by Pythagoras, and ends with Epicurus. He reckons the Socratic school, with its various ramifications, as a part of the Ionic philosophy, of which he treats in the first 7 books. The Eleatics, with Heraclitus and the Sceptics, are included in the Italian philosophy, which occupies the 8th and 9th books. Epicurus and his philosophy are treated of in the 10th book with particular minuteness, which has led some writers to the belief that Diogenes himself was an Epicurean. The work is of great value to us, as Diogenes made use of a great number of writers on the history of philosophy, whose works are now lost; but it is put together without plan, criticism, or connection, and the author had evidently no conception of the real value and dignity of philosophy. The best editions are by Meibom, Amsterd. 1692, 2 vols. 4to., and Hübner, Lips. 2 vols. 8vo. 1828—1831. — 5. Oenomāus, a tragic poet, who began to exhibit at Athens B. C. 404.

Diogeniānus (Διογενειανός), of Heraclēa on the Pontus, a distinguished grammarian in the reign of Hadrian, wrote a Greek Lexicon, from which the Lexicon of Hesychius seems to have been almost entirely taken. A portion of it is still extant, containing a collection of proverbs first printed by Schottus, with the proverbs of Zenobius and Suidas, Antv. 1612, 4to., and subsequently in other editions of the Paroemiographi Graeci.

Diomēa (τὰ Διόμεια: Διομειεύς, Διομεύς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Aegeis, with a temple of Hercules; the Diomean gate in Athens led to this demus. [See p. 103, a.]

Diomedēae Insŭlae, 5 small islands in the Adriatic sea, N. of the promontory Garganum in Apulia, named after Diomedes. [DIOMEDES.] The largest of these, called Diomedea Insula or Trimerus (Tremiti), was the place where Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus, died.

Diomēdes (Διομήδης). 1. Son of Tydeus and Deïpyle, whence he is constantly called Tydīdes (Τυδείδης), succeeded Adrastus as king of Argos.— Homeric Story. Tydeus fell in the expedition against Thebes, while his son Diomedes was yet a boy; but Diomedes was afterwards one of the Epigoni who took Thebes. He went to Troy with 80 ships, and was, next to Achilles, the bravest hero in the Greek army. He enjoyed the especial protection of Athena; he fought against the most distinguished of the Trojans, such as Hector and Aeneas, and even with the gods who espoused the cause of the Trojans. He thus wounded both Aphrodite and Ares. — Later Stories. Diomedes and Ulysses carried off the palladium from the city of Troy, since it was believed that Troy could not be taken so long as the palladium was within its walls. Diomedes carried the palladium with him to Argos; but according to others it was taken from him by Demophon in Attica, where he landed one night on his return from Troy, without knowing where he was. [DEMOPHON.] Another tradition stated, that Diomedes restored the palladium to Aeneas. On his arrival in Argos Diomedes found his wife Aegialea living in adultery with Hippolytus, or, according to others, with Cometes or Cyllabarus. This misfortune befell him through the anger of Aphrodite, whom he had wounded before Troy. He therefore quitted Argos, either of his own accord, or he was expelled by the adulterers, and went to Aetolia. He subsequently attempted to return to Argos, but on his way home a storm threw him on the coast of Daunia in Italy, where he was kindly received by Daunus, the king of the country. Diomedes assisted Daunus in his war against the Messapians, married Euippe, the daughter of Daunus, and settled in Daunia, where he died at an advanced age. He was buried in one of the islands off cape Garganum, which were called after him the Diomedean islands. His companions were inconsolable at his loss, and were metamorphosed into birds (Aves Diomedēae), which, mindful of their origin, used to fly joyfully towards the Greek ships, but to avoid those of the Romans. According to others Diomedes returned to Argos, or disappeared in one of the Diomedean islands, or in the country of the Heneti. A number of towns in the E. part of Italy, such as Beneventum, Argos Hippion (afterwards Argyripa or Arpi), Venusia, Canusium, Venafrum, Brundusium, &c. were believed to have been founded by Diomedes. A plain of Apulia, near Salapia and Canusium, was called Diomedēi Campi after him. He was worshipped as a divine being, especially in Italy, where statues of him existed at Argyripa, Metapontum, Thurii, and other places. — 2. Son of Ares and Cyrene, king of the Bistones in Thrace, killed by Hercules on account of his mares, which he fed with human flesh.

Diomēdes, a Latin grammarian, probably lived in the 4th or 5th century after Christ, and is the author of an extant work, De Oratione et Partibus Orationis et Vario Genere Metrorum libri III., printed in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605.

Diŏmĕdon (Διομέδων), an Athenian commander during the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Arginusae (B. C. 406), and was put to death with 5 of his colleagues on his return to Athens.

Dion (Δίων), a Syracusan, son of Hipparinus, and a relation of Dionysius. His sister Aristomache was the second wife of the elder Dionysius ; and Dion himself was married to Arete, the daughter of Dionysius by Aristomache. Dion was treated by Dionysius with the greatest distinction, and was employed by him in many services of trust and confidence. Of this close connection and favour with the tyrant he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth. He made no opposition to the succession of the younger Dionysius to his father's power, but he became an object of suspicion to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion appears to have been naturally a man of a proud and stern character, and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysius, he carried to excess the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undisguised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavoured to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse ; but the philosopher, though received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysius; and the intrigues of the opposite party, headed by Philistus, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. Dion retired to Athens, where he lived in habitual intercourse with Plato and his disciples ; but Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he had a third time visited Syracuse), and Dionysius having confiscated his property, and compelled his wife to marry another person, he determined on attempting the expulsion of the tyrant by force. He sailed from Zacynthus with only a small force and obtained possession of Syracuse without opposition during the absence of Dionysius in Italy. Dionysius returned shortly afterwards, but found himself obliged to quit Syracuse and sail away to Italy, leaving Dion undisputed master of the city, B. C. 356. His despotic conduct however soon caused great discontent, and the people complained with justice that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. He caused his chief opponent, Heraclīdes, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries. Callippus, an Athenian, who had accompanied him from Greece, formed a conspiracy against him, and caused him to be assassinated in his own house, 353.

Dion Cassĭus, the historian, was the son of a Roman senator, Cassius Apronianus, and was born A. D. 155, at Nicaea in Bithynia. He also bore the surname Cocceianus, which he derived from the orator Dion Chrysostomus Cocceianus, his maternal grandfather. He was educated with great care ; he accompanied his father to Cilicia, of which he had the administration ; and after his father's death, he went to Rome, about 180. He was straightway made a senator, and frequently pleaded in the courts of justice. He was aedile and quaestor under Commodus, and praetor under Septimius Severus, 194. He accompanied Caracalla on his journey to the East; he was appointed by Macrinus to the government of Pergamus and Smyrna, 218 ; was consul about 220; proconsul of Africa 224, under Alexander Severus, by whom he was sent as legate to Dalmatia in 226, and to Pannonia in 227. In the latter province he restored strict discipline among the troops ; which excited the discontent of the praetorians at Rome, who demanded his life of Alexander Severus But the emperor protected him and raised him to his second consulship 229. Dion, however, retired to Campania, and shortly afterwards obtained permission of the emperor to return to his native town Nicaea, where he passed the remainder of his life and died.—Dion wrote several historical works, but the most important was a History of Rome (Ῥωμαική ἱστορία), in 80 books, from the landing of Aeneas in Italy to A. D. 229, the year in which Dion returned to Nicaea. Unfortunately, only a comparatively small portion of this work has come down to us entire. Of the first 34 books we possess only fragments ; but since Zonaras in his Annals chiefly followed Dion Cassius, we may regard the Annals of Zonaras as to some extent an epitome of Dion Cassius. Of the 35th book we possess a considerable fragment, and from the 36th book to the 54th the work is extant complete, and embraces the history from the wars of Lucullus and Cn. Pompey against Mithridates, down to the death of Agrippa, B. C. 10. Of the remaining books we have only the epitomes made by Xiphilinus and others. Dion Cassius treated the history of the republic with brevity, but gave a more minute account of these events, of which he had been himself an eyewitness. He consulted original authorities, and displayed great judgment and discrimination in the use of them. He had acquired a thorough knowledge of his subject, and his notions of the ancient Roman institutions were far more correct than those of some of his predecessors, such as Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The best editions are by Reimarus, Hamb. 1750—52, 2 vols. fol., and by Sturz, Lips. 1824, 9 vols. 8vo.

Dion Chrysostŏmus, that is, the golden-mouthed, a surname given to him on account of his eloquence. He also bore the surname Cocceianus, which he derived from the emperor Cocceius Nerva, with whom he was very intimate. He was born at Prusa in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era. He received a careful education, increased his knowledge by travelling in different countries, and came to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, but having incurred the suspicions of Domitian, was obliged to leave the city. On the advice of the Delphic oracle, he put on a beggar's dress, and in this condition visited Thrace, Mysia, Scythia, and the country of the Getae. After the murder of Domitian, A. D. 96, Dion used his influence with the army stationed on the frontier in favour of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. Trajan also entertained the highest esteem for Dion, and showed him the most marked favour. Dion died at Rome about A. D. 117.—Dion Chrysostom is the most eminent of the Greek rhetoricians and sophists in the time of the Roman empire. There are extant 80 of his orations ; but they are more like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects than real orations, of which they have only the form. We find among them λόγοι περὶ βασιλείας or λόγοι βασιλικοί, 4 orations addressed to Trajan on the virtues of a sovereign; Διογένης ἢ περὶ τυραννίδος, on the troubles to which men expose themselves by deserting the path of nature, and on the difficulties which a sovereign has to encounter ; essays on slavery and freedom ; on the means of attaining eminence as an orator ; political discourses addressed to various towns ; on subjects of ethics and practical philosophy; and lastly, orations on mythical subjects and show-speeches. All these orations are written in pure Attic Greek, and, although tainted with the rhetorical embellishments of the age, are distinguished by their refined and elegant style. The best editions are by Reiske, Lips. 1784, 2 vols. and by Emperius, Bruns. 1844.

Dionaea. [Dione.]

Diōnē (Διώνη), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Uranus and Ge, or of Aether and Ge. She was beloved by Zeus, by whom she became the mother of Aphrodite (Venus). She received her daughter in Olympus, when she was wounded by Diomedes. — Aphrodite is hence called Dionaea, and this epithet is frequently applied to any thing sacred to Aphrodite. Hence we find Dionaeum antrum (Hor. Carm. ii. 1. 39), and Dionaeus Caesar (Virg. Ecl. ix. 47), because Caesar claimed descent from Venus. Aphrodite is sometimes also called Dione.

Dionȳsĭus (Διονύσιος) I. Historical. — 1. The Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, son of Hermocrates, born B. C. 430. He was born in a private but not low station, and began life as a clerk in a public office. He was one of the partizans of Hermocrates, the leader of the aristocratical party, and was severely wounded in the attempt which Hermocrates made to effect by force his restoration from exile. He subsequently served in the great war against the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily under Hannibal, the son of Gisco, and successively reduced and destroyed Selinus, Himera, and Agrigentum. These disasters, and especially the failure of the Syracusan general, Daphnaeus, to relieve Agrigentum, had created a general spirit of discontent and alarm, of which Dionysius skilfully availed himself. He succeeded in procuring a decree for deposing the existing generals, and appointing others in their stead, among whom was Dionysius himself, B.C. 406. His efforts were from this time directed towards supplanting his new colleagues and obtaining the sole direction of affairs. These efforts were crowned with success. In the following year (405), the other generals were deposed, and Dionysius, though only 25 years of age, was appointed sole general, with full powers. From this period we may date the commencement of his reign, or tyranny, which continued without interruption for 38 years. His first step was to procure the appointment of a body-guard, which he speedily increased to the number of 1000 men: at the same time he induced the Syracusans to double the pay of all the troops, and took every means to ingratiate himself with the mercenaries. By his marriage with the daughter of Hermocrates he secured to himself the support of all the remaining partizans of that leader. He converted the island of Ortygia into a strong fortress, in which he took up his own residence. After concluding a peace with Carthage, and putting down a formidable insurrection in Syracuse, he began to direct his arms against the other cities of Sicily. Naxos, Catana, and Leontini, successively fell into his power, either by force or treachery. For several years after this he made preparations for renewing the war with Carthage. In 397 he declared war against Carthage. At first he met with great success, but in 395 his fleet was totally defeated, and he was obliged to shut himself up within the walls of Syracuse, where he was besieged by the Carthaginians both by sea and land. A pestilence shortly after broke out in the Carthaginian camp, and greatly reduced the enemy; whereupon Dionysius suddenly attacked the enemy both by sea and land, defeated the army, and burnt great part of their fleet. The Carthaginians were now obliged to withdraw. In 393 they renewed the war with no better success, and in 392 they concluded a peace with Dionysius. This treaty left Dionysius at leisure to continue the ambitious projects in which he had previously engaged against the Greek cities in Italy. He formed an alliance with the Lucanians, and crossed over into Italy. He subdued Caulonia, Hipponium, and Rhegium, 387. He was in close alliance with the Locrians; and his powerful fleets gave him the command both of the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic seas. He was now at the summit of his greatness, and during the 20 years that elapsed from this period to his death, he possessed an amount of power and influence far exceeding those enjoyed by any other Greek before the time of Alexander. During this time he was twice engaged again in war with Carthage, namely in 383, when a treaty was concluded, by which the river Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the two powers; and again in 368, in the middle of which war Dionysius died at Syracuse, 367. His last illness is said to have been brought on by excessive feasting; but according to some accounts, his death was hastened by his medical attendants, in order to secure the succession for his son. After the death of his first wife, Dionysius had married almost exactly at the same time — some said even on the same day — Doris, a Locrian of distinguished birth, and Aristomache, a Syracusan, the daughter of his supporter Hipparinus, and the sister of Dion. By Doris he had 3 children, of which the eldest was his successor, Dionysius. The character of Dionysius has been drawn in the blackest colours by many ancient writers; he appears indeed to have become a sort of type of a tyrant, in its worst sense. In his latter years he became extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have however an air of great exaggeration. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20.) He built the terrible prison, called Lautumiae, which was cut out of the solid rock in the part of Syracuse, named Epipolae. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Lautumiae.) Dionysius was fond of literature and the arts. He adorned Syracuse with splendid temples and other public edifices, so as to render it unquestionably the greatest of all Greek cities. He was himself a poet, and repeatedly contended for the prize of tragedy at Athens. Here he several times obtained the second and third prizes; and, finally, just before his death, bore away the first prize at the Lenaea, with a play called "The Ransom of Hector." He sought the society of men distinguished in literature and philosophy, entertaining the poet Philoxenus at his table, and inviting Plato to Syracuse. He however soon after sent the latter away from Sicily in disgrace; and though the story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as that of his having sent Philoxenus to the stone quarries for ridiculing his bad verses, are probably gross exaggerations, they may well have been so far founded in fact, that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence. — 2. The Younger, son of the preceding, succeeded his father as tyrant of Syracuse, B. C. 367. He was at this time under 30 years of age: he had been brought up at his father's court in idleness and luxury, and studiously precluded from taking any part in public affairs. The ascendancy which Dion, and through his means Plato, obtained for a time over his mind was undermined by flatterers and the companions of his pleasures. Yet his court was at this time a great place of resort for philosophers and men of letters: besides Plato, whom he induced by the most urgent entreaties to pay him a second visit, Aristippus of Cyrene, Eudoxus of Cnidus, Speusippus, and others, are stated to have spent some time with him at Syracuse; and he cultivated a friendly intercourse with Archytas and the Pythagoreans of Magna Graecia. Dion, who had been banished by Dionysius, returned to Sicily in 357, at the head of a small force, with the avowed object of dethroning Dionysius. The latter was absent from Syracuse at the time that Dion landed in Sicily; but he instantly returned to Syracuse, where the citadel still held out for him. But finding it impossible to retain his power, he sailed away to Italy with his most valuable property, and thus lost the sovereignty after a reign of 12 years, 356. He now repaired to Locri, the native city of his mother, Doris, where he was received in the most friendly manner; but he made himself tyrant of the city, and is said to have treated the inhabitants with the utmost cruelty. After remaining at Locri 10 years, he availed himself of the internal dissensions at Syracuse to recover possession of his power in that city, 346. The Locrians took advantage of his absence to revolt against him, and wreaked their vengeance in the most cruel manner on his wife and daughters. He continued to reign in Syracuse for the next 3 years, till Timoleon came to Sicily, to deliver the Greek cities of the island from the tyrants. As he was unable to resist Timoleon, he surrendered the citadel into the hands of the latter, on condition of being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth, 343. Here he spent the remainder of his life in a private condition, and is said to have frequented low company, and sunk gradually into a very degraded and abject state. According to some writers, he was reduced to support himself by keeping a school; others say, that he became one of the attendants on the rites of Cybele, a set of mendicant priests of the lowest class. — 3. Tyrant of Heraclēa on the Euxine, son of Clearchus, succeeded his brother Timotheus in the tyranny about B. C. 338. He is said to have been the mildest and justest of all the tyrants that had ever lived. He married Amastris, niece of Darius. In 306 he assumed the title of king, and died shortly afterwards at the age of 55. He is said to have been choked by his own fat.

II. Literary. 1. Surnamed Areopagita, because he was one of the council of the Areopagus, was converted by St. Paul's preaching at Athens. There are extant several works under his name, which however could scarcely have been written before the 5th century of our era. — 2. Cato. [CATO.] — 3. Surnamed Chalcus (ὁ Χαλκοῦς), an Attic poet and orator, who derived his surname from his having advised the Athenians to coin brass money for the purpose of facilitating traffic. Of his oratory we know nothing; but his poems, chiefly elegies, are often referred to and quoted. He was one of the leaders of the colony to Thurii in Italy, B. C. 444. — 4. Of Halicarnassus, a celebrated rhetorician, came to Rome about B. C. 29, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the Latin language and literature. He lived at Rome on terms of friendship with many distinguished men, such as Q. Aelius Tubero, and the rhetorician Caecilius; and he remained in the city for 22 years, till his death, B. C. 7. His principal work, which he composed at Rome at the later period of his life, was a history of Rome in 22 books, entitled Ῥωμαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία. It contained the history of Rome from the mythical times down to B. C. 264, in which year the history of Polybius begins with the Punic wars. The first 9 books alone are complete; of the 10th and 11th we have the greater part; and of the remaining 9 we possess nothing but fragments and extracts. Dionysius treated the early history of Rome with great minuteness. The 11 books extant do not carry the history beyond B. C. 441, so that the 11th book breaks off very soon after the decemviral legislation. This peculiar minuteness in the early history, however, was in a great measure the consequence of the object he had proposed to himself, and which, as he himself states, was to remove the erroneous notions which the Greeks entertained with regard to Rome's greatness. Dionysius had no clear notions about the early constitution of Rome, and was led astray by the nature of the institutions which he saw in his own day; and thus makes innumerable mistakes in treating of the history of the constitution. He introduces numerous speeches in his work, which, though written with artistic skill, nevertheless show that Dionysius was a rhetorician, not an historian, and still less a statesman. — Dionysius also wrote various rhetorical and critical works, which abound with the most exquisite remarks and criticisms on the works of the classical writers of Greece. They show that he was a greater critic than historian. The following are the extant works of this class: 1. Τέχνη ῥητορική, addressed to one Echecrates, part of which is certainly spurious. 2. Περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων, treats of oratorical power, and on the combination of words according to the different styles of oratory. 3. Τῶν ἀρχαίων κρίσις, contains characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides, of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Philistus, Xenophon, and Theopompus, and lastly, of some philosophers and orators. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ῥητόρων ὑπομνηματισμοί, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators, of which we now possess only the first 3 sections, on Lysias, Isocrates, and Isaeus. The other 3 sections treated of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Aeschines; but they are lost, with the exception of the 1st part of the 4th section, which treated of the oratorical power of Demosthenes. 5. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἀμμαῖον, a letter to his friend Ammaeus, in which he shows that most of the orations of Demosthenes had been delivered before Aristotle wrote his Rhetoric, and consequently that Demosthenes had derived no instruction from Aristotle. 6. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Γναῖον Πομπήϊον, was written by Dionysius with a view of justifying the unfavourable opinion which he had expressed upon Plato, and which Pompey had censured. 7. Περὶ τοῦ Θουκυδίδου χαρακτῆρος καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν τοῦ συγγραφέως ἰδιωμάτων, was written by Dionysius at the request of his friend Tubero for the purpose of explaining more minutely what he had written on Thucydides. As Dionysius in this work looks at the great historian from his rhetorical point of view, his judgment is often unjust and incorrect. 8. Περὶ τῶν τοῦ Θουκυδίδου ἰδιωμάτων, addressed to Ammaeus. 9. Δείναρχος, a very valuable treatise on the life and orations of Dinarchus. The best editions of the complete works of Dionysius are by Sylburg, Frankf. 1586, 2 vols. fol. reprinted at Leipzig, 1691; by Hudson, Oxon. 1704, 2 vols. fol.; and by Reiske, Lips. 1774. — 5. Of Heraclea, son of Theophantus, was a pupil of Zeno, and adopted the tenets of the Stoics. But in consequence of a most painful complaint, he abandoned the Stoic philosophy, and joined the Eleatics, whose doctrine, that ἡδονή and the absence of pain was the highest good, had more charms for him than the austere ethics of the Stoa. This renunciation of his former creed drew upon him the nickname of μεταθέμενος, i. e. the renegade. He died in his 80th year of voluntary starvation. He wrote several works, all of which are lost. Cicero censures him for having mixed up verses with his prose, and for his want of elegance and refinement. — 6. Of Magnesia, a distinguished rhetorician, taught in Asia between B. C. 79 and 77, when Cicero visited the E. — 7. Of Miletus, one of the earliest Greek historians, and a contemporary of Hecataeus, wrote a history of Persia. — 8. Of Mytilene, surnamed Scytobrachion, taught at Alexandria in the 1st century B.C. He wrote a prose work on the Argonauts, which was consulted by Diodorus Siculus. — 9. Surnamed Periēgētes, from his being the author of a περιήγησις τῆς γῆς, which is still extant; probably lived about A. D. 300. The work contains a description of the whole earth, in hexameter verse, and is written in a terse and elegant style. It enjoyed great popularity in ancient times. Two translations or paraphrases of it were made by Romans, one by Rufus Festus Avienus [AVIENUS], and the other by the grammarian Priscian. [PRISCIANUS.] The best edition of the original is by Bernhardy, Lips. 1828. — 10. Of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy. — 11. Surnamed Thrax, from his father being a Thracian, was himself a native either of Alexandria or Byzantium. He is also called a Rhodian, because at one time he resided at Rhodes, and gave instructions there. He also taught at Rome, about B. C. 80. He was a very celebrated grammarian; but the only one of his works come down to us is a small treatise, entitled τέχνη γραμματική, which became the basis of all subsequent grammars, and was a standard book in grammar schools for many centuries.

III. Artists. — 1. Of Argos, a statuary, flourished B. C. 476. — 2. Of Colophon, a painter, contemporary with Polygnotus of Thasos, whose works he imitated in every other respect except in grandeur. Aristotle (Poët. 2) says that Polygnotus painted the likenesses of men better than the originals, Pauson made them worse, and Dionysius just like them (ὁμοίους). It seems from this that the pictures of Dionysius were deficient in the ideal.

Dionȳsopŏlis (Διονύσου πόλις), a town in Phrygia, belonging to the conventus juridicus of Apamea, founded by Attalus and Eumenes.

Dionȳsus (Διόνυσος or Διώνυσος), the youthful, beautiful, but effeminate god of wine. He is also called both by Greeks and Romans Bacchus (Βάκχος), that is, the noisy or riotous god, which was originally a mere epithet or surname of Dionysus, and does not occur till after the time of Herodotus. According to the common tradition, Dionysus was the son of Zeus and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes; though other traditions give him a different parentage and a different birth-place. It was generally believed that when Semele was pregnant, she was persuaded by Hera, who appeared to her in disguise, to request the father of the gods to appear to her in the same glory and majesty in which he was accustomed to approach his own wife Hera. Zeus unwillingly complied, and appeared to her in thunder and lightning. Semele was terrified and overpowered by the sight, and being seized by the flames, she gave premature birth to a child. Zeus saved the child from the flames, sewed him up in his thigh, and thus preserved him till he came to maturity. Various epithets which are given to the god refer to that occurrence, such as πυριγενής, μηροῤῥαφής, μηροτραφής, and ignigena. After the birth of Dionysus, Zeus entrusted him to Hermes, or, according to others, to Persephone or Rhea, who took the child to Ino and Athamas at Orchomenos, and persuaded them to bring him up as a girl. Hera was now urged on by her jealousy to throw Ino and Athamas into a state of madness. Zeus, in order to save his child, changed him into a ram, and carried him to the nymphs of Mt. Nysa, who brought him up in a cave, and were afterwards rewarded by Zeus, by being placed as Hyades among the stars. Mt. Nysa, from which the god was believed to have derived his name, was placed in Thrace; but mountains of the same name are found in different parts of the ancient world where he was worshipped, and where he was believed to have introduced the cultivation of the vine. Various other nymphs are also said to have reared him. When he had grown up, Hera drove him mad, in which state he wandered about through various parts of the earth. He first went to Egypt, where he was hospitably received by king Proteus. He thence proceeded through Syria, where he flayed Damascus alive, for opposing the introduction of the vine. He then traversed all Asia, teaching the inhabitants of the different countries of Asia the cultivation of the vine, and introducing among them the elements of civilization. The most famous part of his wanderings in Asia is his expedition to India, which is said to have lasted several years. On his return to Europe, he passed through Thrace, but was ill received by Lycurgus, king of the Edones, and leaped into the sea to seek refuge with Thetis, whom he afterwards rewarded for her kind reception with a golden urn, a present of Hephaestus. All the host of Bacchantic women and Satyrs, who had accompanied him, were taken prisoners by Lycurgus, but the women were soon set free again. The country of the Edones thereupon ceased to bear fruit, and Lycurgus became mad and killed his own son, whom he mistook for a vine. After this his madness ceased, but the country still remained barren, and Dionysus declared that it would remain so till Lycurgus died. The Edones, in despair, took their king and put him in chains, and Dionysus had him torn to pieces by horses. He then returned to Thebes, where he compelled the women to quit their houses, and to celebrate Bacchic festivals on Mt. Cithaeron, or Parnassus. Pentheus, who then ruled at Thebes, endeavoured to check the riotous proceedings, and went out to the mountains to seek the Bacchic women; but his own mother, Agave, in her Bacchic fury, mistook him for an animal, and tore him to pieces. Dionysus next went to Argos, where the people first refused to acknowledge him, but after punishing the women with frenzy, he was recognised as a god and temples were erected to him. His last feat was performed on a voyage from Icaria to Naxos. He hired a ship which belonged to Tyrrhenian pirates; but the men, instead of landing at Naxos, steered towards Asia to sell him there as a slave. Thereupon the god changed the mast and oars into serpents, and himself into a lion; ivy grew around the vessel, and the sound of flutes was heard on every side; the sailors were seized with madness, leaped into the sea, and were metamorphosed into dolphins. After he had thus gradually established his divine nature throughout the world, he took his mother out of Hades, called her Thyone, and rose with her into Olympus. — Various mythological beings are described as the offspring of Dionysus; but among the women, both mortal and immortal, who won his love, none is more famous in ancient story than Ariadne. [ARIADNE.] The extraordinary mixture of traditions respecting the history of Dionysus seems evidently to have arisen from the traditions of different times and countries, referring to analogous divinities, and transferred to the Greek Dionysus. The worship of Dionysus was no part of the original religion of Greece, and his mystic worship is comparatively of late origin. In Homer he does not appear as one of the great divinities, and the story of his birth by Zeus and the Bacchic orgies are not alluded to in any way: Dionysus is there simply described as the god who teaches man the preparation of wine, whence he is called the "drunken god" (μαινόμενος), and the sober king Lycurgus will not, for this reason, tolerate him in his kingdom. (Hom. Il. vi. 132, Od. xviii. 406, comp. xi. 325.) As the cultivation of the vine spread in Greece, the worship of Dionysus likewise spread further; the mystic worship was developed by the Orphici, though it probably originated in the transfer of Phrygian and Lydian modes of worship to that of Dionysus. After the time of Alexander's expedition to India, the celebration of the Bacchic festivals assumed more and more their wild and dissolute character.—As far as the nature and origin of the god Dionysus is concerned, he appears in all traditions as the representative of the productive, overflowing, and intoxicating power of nature, which carries man away from his usual quiet and sober mode of living. Wine is the most natural and appropriate symbol of that power, and it is therefore called "the fruit of Dionysus." Dionysus is, therefore, the god of wine, the inventor and teacher of its cultivation, the giver of joy, and the disperser of grief and sorrow. As the god of wine, he is also both an inspired and an inspiring god, that is, a god who has the power of revealing the future to man by oracles. Thus, it is said, that he had as great a share in the Delphic oracle as Apollo, and he himself had an oracle in Thrace. Now, as prophetic power is always combined with the healing art, Dionysus is, like Apollo, called ἰατρός, or ὑγιατής, and is hence invoked as a θεὸς σωτήρ against raging diseases. The notion of his being the cultivator and protector of the vine was easily extended to that of his being the protector of trees in general, which is alluded to in various epithets and surnames given him by the poets of antiquity, and he thus comes into close connection with Demeter. This character is still further developed in the notion of his being the promoter of civilization, a law-giver, and a lover of peace. As the Greek drama had grown out of the dithyrambic choruses at the festivals of Dionysus, he was also regarded as the god of tragic art, and as the protector of theatres. The orgiastic worship of Dionysus seems to have been first established in Thrace, and to have thence spread southward to Mts. Helicon and Parnassus, to Thebes, Naxos, and throughout Greece, Sicily, and Italy, though some writers derived it from Egypt. Respecting his festivals and the mode of their celebration, and especially the introduction and suppression of his worship at Rome, see Dict. of Ant. art. Dionysia. — In the earliest times the Graces or Charites were the companions of Dionysus. This circumstance points out the great change which took place in the course of time in the mode of his worship, for afterwards we find him accompanied in his expeditions and travels by Bacchantic women, called Lenae, Maenades, Thyiades, Mimallones, Clodones, Bassarae or Bassarides, all of whom are represented in works of art as raging with madness or enthusiasm, in vehement motions, their heads thrown backwards, with dishevelled hair, and carrying in their hands thyrsus-staffs (entwined with ivy, and headed with pine-cones), cymbals, swords, or serpents. Sileni, Pans, satyrs, centaurs, and other beings of a like kind, are also the constant companions of the god.—The temples and statues of Dionysus were very numerous in the ancient world. The animal most commonly sacrificed to him was the ram. Among the things sacred to him, we may notice the vine, ivy, laurel, and asphodel; the dolphin, serpent, tiger, lynx, panther, and ass; but he hated the sight of an owl. In later works of art he appears in 4 different forms: 1. As an infant handed over by Hermes to his nurses, or fondled and played with by satyrs and Bacchae. 2. As a manly god with a beard, commonly called the Indian Bacchus. He there appears in the character of a wise and dignified Oriental monarch; his beard is long and soft, and his Lydian robes (βασσάρα) are long and richly folded. 3. The youthful or so-called Theban Bacchus was carried to ideal beauty by Praxiteles. The form of his body is manly and with strong outlines, but still approaches to the female form by its softness and roundness. The expression of the countenance is languid, and shows a kind of dreamy longing; the head, with a diadem, or a wreath of vine or ivy, leans somewhat on one side; his attitude is easy, like that of a man who is absorbed in sweet thoughts, or slightly intoxicated. He is often seen leaning on his companions, or riding on a panther, ass, tiger, or lion. The finest statue of this kind is in the villa Ludovisi. 4. Bacchus with horns, either those of a ram or of a bull. This representation occurs chiefly on coins, but never in statues.

Diophănes (Διοφάνης). 1. Of Mytilene, a distinguished Greek rhetorician, came to Rome, where he instructed Tib. Gracchus, and became his intimate friend. After the murder of Gracchus, Diophanes was also put to death. — 2. Of Nicaea, in Bithynia, in the 1st century B.C., abridged the agricultural work of Cassius Dionysius for the use of king Deiotarus.

Diophantus (Διόφαντος). 1. An Attic orator and contemporary of Demosthenes, with whom he opposed the Macedonian party. — 2. Of Alexandria, the only Greek writer on Algebra. His period is unknown; but he probably ought not to be placed before the end of the 5th century of our era. He wrote Arithmetica, in 13 books, of which only 6 are extant, and 1 book, De Multangulis Numeris, on polygonal numbers. These books contain a system of reasoning on numbers by the aid of general symbols, and with some use of symbols of operation; so that, though the demonstrations are very much conducted in words at length, and arranged so as to remind us of Euclid, there is no question that the work is algebraical: not a treatise on algebra, but an algebraical treatise on the relations of integer numbers, and on the solution of equations of more than one variable in integers. Editions by Bachet de Meziriac, Paris, 1621, fol., and by Fermat, Toulouse, 1670, fol.

Diopīthes (Διοπείθης). 1. A half-fanatic, half-impostor, who made at Athens an apparently thriving trade of oracles: he was much satirised by the comic poets. — 2. An Athenian general, father of the poet Menander, was sent out to the Thracian Chersonesus about B.C. 344, at the head of a body of Athenian settlers or κληροῦχοι. In the Chersonese he became involved in disputes with the Cardians, who were supported by Philip. The latter sent a letter of remonstrance to Athens, and Diopithes was arraigned by the Macedonian party, but was defended by Demosthenes in the oration, still extant, on the Chersonese, B.C. 341, in consequence of which he was permitted to retain his command.

Dioscōrĭdis Insula (Διοσκορίδου νῆσος: Socotra), an island off the S. coast of Arabia, near the promontory Syagrus. The island itself was marshy and unproductive, but it was a great commercial emporium; and the N. part of the island was inhabited by Arabian, Egyptian, and Greek merchants.

Dioscōrĭdes (Διοσκορίδης). 1. A disciple of Isocrates, and a Greek grammarian, wrote upon Homer. — 2. The author of 39 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, seems to have lived in Egypt about the time of Ptolemy Euergetes. — 3. Pedacius or Pedanius, of Anazarba in Cilicia, a Greek physician, probably lived in the 2nd century of the Christian era. He has left behind him a Treatise on Materia Medica (Περὶ Ὕλης Ἰατρικῆς), in 5 books, a work of great labour and research, and which for many ages was received as a standard production. It consists of a description of all the articles then used in medicine, with an account of their supposed virtues. The other works extant under the name of Dioscorides are probably spurious. The best edition is by Sprengel, Lips. 1829, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo. — 4. Surnamed Phacas on account of the moles or freckles on his face, probably lived in the 1st century B.C.

Dioscūri (Διόσκουροι), that is, sons of Zeus, the well-known heroes, Castor (Κάστωρ) and Pollux or Polydeuces (Πολυδεύκης). The two brothers were sometimes called Castōres by the Romans.—According to Homer they were the sons of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedaemon, and consequently brothers of Helen. Hence they are often called by the patronymic Tyndărĭdae. Castor was famous for his skill in taming and managing horses, and Pollux for his skill in boxing. Both had disappeared from the earth before the Greeks went against Troy. Although they were buried, says Homer, yet they came to life every other day, and they enjoyed honours like those of the gods. — According to other traditions both were the sons of Zeus and Leda, and were born at the same time with their sister Helen out of an egg. [LEDA.] According to others again, Pollux and Helen only were children of Zeus, and Castor was the son of Tyndareus. Hence, Pollux was immortal, while Castor was subject to old age and death like every other mortal. They were born, according to different traditions, at different places, such as Amyclae, mount Taygetus, the island of Pephnos or Thalamae.—The fabulous life of the Dioscuri is marked by 3 great events. 1. Their expedition against Athens. Theseus had carried off their sister Helen from Sparta, and kept her in confinement at Aphidnae, under the superintendence of his mother Aethra. While Theseus was absent from Attica, the Dioscuri marched into Attica, and ravaged the country round the city. Academus revealed to them that Helen was kept at Aphidnae; the Dioscuri took the place by assault, carried away their sister Helen, and made Aethra their prisoner. 2. Their part in the expedition of the Argonauts, as they had before taken part in the Calydonian hunt. During the voyage of the Argonauts, it once happened that when the heroes were detained by a vehement storm, and Orpheus prayed to the Samothracian gods, the storm suddenly subsided, and stars appeared on the heads of the Dioscuri. On their arrival in the country of the Bebryces, Pollux fought against Amycus, the gigantic son of Poseidon, and conquered him. During the Argonautic expedition they founded the town of Dioscurias. 3. Their battle with the sons of Aphareus. Once the Dioscuri, in conjunction with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus, had carried away a herd of oxen from Arcadia. Idas appropriated the herd to himself, and drove it to his home in Messene. The Dioscuri then invaded Messene, drove away the cattle of which they had been deprived, and much more in addition. Hence arose a war between the Dioscuri and the sons of Aphareus, which was carried on in Messene or Laconia. Castor, the mortal, fell by the hands of Idas, but Pollux slew Lynceus, and Zeus killed Idas by a flash of lightning. Pollux then returned to his brother, whom he found breathing his last, and he prayed to Zeus to be permitted to die with him. Zeus gave him the option, either to live as his immortal son in Olympus, or to share his brother's fate, and to live alternately one day under the earth, and the other in the heavenly abodes of the gods. According to a different form of the story, Zeus rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini. — These heroic youths received divine honours at Sparta. Their worship spread from Peloponnesus over Greece, Sicily, and Italy. Their principal characteristic was that of θεοὶ σωτῆρες, that is, mighty helpers of man, whence they were sometimes called ἄνακες or ἄνακτες. They were worshipped more especially as the protectors of travellers by sea, for Poseidon had rewarded their brotherly love by giving them power over winds and waves, that they might assist the shipwrecked. (Fratres Helenae, lucida sidera, Hor. Carm. i. 3.) Whenever they appeared they were seen riding on magnificent white steeds. They were regarded as presidents of the public games. They were further believed to have invented the war-dance and warlike music, and poets and bards were favoured by them. Owing to their warlike character, it was customary at Sparta for the 2 kings, whenever they went to war, to be accompanied by symbolic representations of the Dioscuri (δόκανα). Respecting their festivals, see Dict. of Ant., arts. Anaceia, Dioscuria. Their usual representation in works of art is that of 2 youthful horsemen with egg-shaped helmets, crowned with stars, and with spears in their hands.—At Rome, the worship of the Dioscuri was introduced at an early time. They were believed to have assisted the Romans against the Latins in the battle of Lake Regillus; and the dictator, A. Postumius Albinus, during the battle vowed a temple to them. It was erected in the Forum, on the spot where they had been seen after the battle, opposite the temple of Vesta. It was consecrated on the 15th of July, the anniversary of the battle of Regillus. The equites regarded the Dioscuri as their patrons. From the year B. C. 305, the equites went every year, on the 15th of July, in a magnificent procession on horseback, from the temple of Mars through the main streets of the city, across the Forum, and by the ancient temple of the Dioscuri.

Dioscūrias (Διοσκουριάς: Διοσκουριεύς: Iskuria or Isgaur), an important town in Colchis on the river Anthemus, N. W. of the Phasis, founded by the Milesians, was a great emporium for all the surrounding people: under the Romans it was called Sebastopolis.

Dios-Hiĕron (Διὸς Ἱερὸν: Διοσιερίτης), a small town on the coast of Ionia, between Lebedus and Colophon.

Diospŏlis (Διόσπολις: Διοσπολίτης). 1. D. Magna, the later name of Thebes in Egypt. [Thebae.]—2. D. Parva, called by Pliny Jovis Oppidum, the capital of the Nomos Diospolites in Upper Egypt.—3. A town in Lower Egypt in the Delta near Mendes, in the midst of marshes.—4. (Ludd, Lydd), the name given by the Greek and Roman writers to the Lydda of the Scriptures.—5. A town in Pontus, originally called Cabira.

Diovis, an ancient Italian (Umbrian) name of Jupiter.

Diphĭlus (Δίφιλος), one of the principal Athenian comic poets of the new comedy and a contemporary of Menander and Philemon, was a native of Sinope. He is said to have exhibited 100 plays. Though, in point of time, Diphilus belonged to the new comedy, his poetry seems to have had more of the character of the middle. This is shown, among other indications, by the frequency with which he chose mythological subjects for his plays, and by his bringing on the stage the poets Archilochus, Hipponax, and Sappho. The Roman comic poets borrowed largely from Diphilus. The Casina of Plautus is a translation of his Κληρούμενοι. His Συναποθνήσκοντες was translated by Plautus in the lost play of the Commorientes, and was partly followed by Terence in his Adelphi. The Rudens of Plautus is also a translation of a play of Diphilus, but the title of the Greek play is not known.

Dipoenus and Scyllis (Δίποινος καὶ Σκύλλις), very ancient Greek statuaries, who are always mentioned together, flourished about B. C. 560. They were natives of Crete, whence they went to Sicyon, which was for a long time the chief seat of Grecian art. Their disciples were Tectaeus and Angelion, Learchus of Rhegium, Doryclidas and his brother Medon, Dontas, and Theocles, who were all 4 Lacedaemonians. Dipoenus and Scyllis are sometimes called sons of Daedalus, by which we are only to understand that they belonged to the Daedalian style of art. [Daedalus.]

Dirae, a name of the Furiae. [Eumenides.]

Dircē (Δίρκη), daughter of Helios and wife of Lycus. Her story is related under Amphion.

Dirphys (Δίρφυς), a mountain in Euboea.

Dis, contracted from Dives, a name sometimes given to Pluto, and hence also to the lower world.

Dīum (Δῖον: Διεύς, Διαστής). 1. An important town in Macedonia on the Thermaic gulf, so called after a temple of Zeus. Here were placed the equestrian statues by Lysippus of the Macedonians who had fallen at the battle of the Granīcus.—2. A town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Strymonic gulf.—3. A town in Euboea, not far from the promontory Cenaeum.

Divĭco, the leader of the Helvetians in the war against L. Cassius in B. C. 107, was at the head of the embassy sent to Julius Caesar, nearly 50 years later, B. C. 58, when he was preparing to attack the Helvetians.

Divitiăcus, an Aeduan noble and brother of Dumnorix, was a warm adherent of the Romans and of Caesar, who, in consideration of his entreaties, pardoned the treason of Dumnorix in B. C. 58. In the same year he took the most prominent part among the Gallic chiefs in requesting Caesar's aid against Ariovistus; he had some time before gone even to Rome to ask the senate for their interference, but without success. During this visit he was the guest of Cicero.

Divodūrum (Metz), subsequently Mediomatrici, and still later Metis or Mettis, the capital of the Mediomatrici in Gallia Belgica.

Divōna. [Cadurci.]

Diyllus (Δίυλλος), an Athenian, who wrote a history of Greece and Sicily in 26 or 27 books, from the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus. The exact period at which he flourished cannot be ascertained, but he belongs to the age of the Ptolemies.

Dobērus (Δόβηρος), a town in Paeonia in Macedonia, E. of the river Echedorus.

Docimĭa or Docimēum (Δοκιμία, Δοκίμειον: Δοκιμεύς, Δοκιμηνός), a town in Phrygia, not far from Synnada: in its neighbourhood were celebrated marble quarries.

Dōdōna (Δωδώνη), the most ancient oracle in Greece, was situated in Epirus, and probably at the S. E. extremity of the lake of Joannina near Kastritza. It was founded by the Pelasgians, and was dedicated to Zeus. The responses of the oracle were given from lofty oaks or beech trees, probably from a grove consisting of these trees. The will of the god was declared by the wind rustling through the trees; and in order to render the sounds more distinct, brazen vessels were suspended on the branches of the trees, which being set in motion by the wind came in contact with one another. These sounds were in early times interpreted by men, but afterwards, when the worship of Dione became connected with that of Zeus, by 2 or 3 aged women, who were called πελείαδες or πέλαιαι, because pigeons were said to have brought the command to found the oracle. There were, however, also priests, called Selli or Helli, who had the management of the temple. The oracle of Dodona had less influence in historical times than in the heroic age. It was chiefly consulted by the neighbouring tribes, the Aetolians, Acarnanians, and Epirots, and by those who would not go to Delphi on account of its partiality for the Dorians. In B. C. 219, the temple was destroyed by the Aetolians, and the sacred oaks cut down. But the town continued to exist, and we hear of a bishop of Dodona in the council of Ephesus.

Dŏlābella, Cornēlĭus. 1. P., consul B. C. 283, conquered the Senones.—2. Cn., curule aedile 165, in which year he and his colleague, Sex. Julius Caesar, had the Hecyra of Terence performed at the festival of the Megalesia. In 159 he was consul.—3. Cn., a partizan of Sulla, by whom he was made consul, 81. He afterwards received Macedonia for his province. In 77 he was accused by the young Julius Caesar of having been guilty of extortion in his province, but he was acquitted.—4. Cn., praetor urbanus 81, when the cause of P. Quintius was tried: Cicero charges him with having acted on that occasion unjustly. The year after he had Cilicia for his province; C. Malleolus was his quaestor, and the notorious Verres his legate. Dolabella not only tolerated the extortions and robberies committed by them, but shared in their booty. On his return to Rome, Dolabella was accused by M. Aemilius Scaurus of extortion in his province, and on that occasion Verres deserted his accomplice and furnished the accuser with all the necessary information. Dolabella was condemned, and went into exile.—5. P., the son-in-law of Cicero, whose daughter Tullia he married after divorcing his wife Fabia, 51. He was one of the most profligate men of his age, and his conduct caused Cicero great uneasiness. On the breaking out of the civil war he joined Caesar and fought on his side at the battle of Pharsalia (48), in Africa (46), and in Spain (45). Caesar raised him to the consulship in 44, notwithstanding the opposition of Antony. After the murder of Caesar, he forthwith joined the assassins of his benefactor; but when Antony gave him the province of Syria, with the command against the Parthians, all his republican enthusiasm disappeared at once. On his way to his province he plundered the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, and at Smyrna he murdered Trebonius, who had been appointed by the senate proconsul of Asia. When his proceedings became known at Rome, he was declared a public enemy; and Cassius, who had received Syria from the senate, marched against him. Dolabella threw himself into Laodicēa, which was besieged by Cassius, who at length succeeded in taking it. Dolabella, in order not to fall into the hands of his enemies, ordered one of his soldiers to kill him, 43.

Dŏlĭchē (Δολίχη). 1. The ancient name of the island Icarus.—2. A town in Thessaly on the W. slope of Olympus.—3. A town in Commagene, between Zeugma and Germanicia, also called Doliche, celebrated for the worship of Jupiter.—4. Or Dulichium. [ECHINADES.]

Dolichistē (Δολιχίστη: Kakava), an island off the coast of Lycia, opposite the promontory Chimaera.

Doliŏnes (Δολίονες), a Pelasgic people in Mysia, who dwelt between the rivers Aesepus and Rhyndacus, and in the neighbourhood of Cyzicus, which was called after them Doliŏnis.

Dŏlŏn (Δόλων), a Trojan, sent by night to spy the Grecian camp, was taken prisoner by Ulysses and Diomedes, compelled to give intelligence respecting the Trojans, and then slain by Diomedes. The 10th book of the Iliad was therefore called Δολώνεια or Δολωνοφονία.

Dolonci (Δόλογκοι), a Thracian people in the Thracian Chersonesus.

Dolŏpes (Δόλοπες), a powerful people in Thessaly, dwelt on the Enipeus, and fought before Troy. (Hom. Il. ix. 484.) At a later time they dwelt at the foot of Mt. Pindus; and their country, called Dolopia (Δολοπία), was reckoned part of Epirus.

Domĭtĭa. 1. Sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus [AHENOBARBUS, No. 10], and consequently an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was the wife of Crispus Passienus, and was murdered in her old age by Nero, who wished to get possession of her property.—2. Lepĭda, sister of the preceding, wife of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, and mother of Messalina, was put to death by Claudius at the instigation of Agrippina.—3. Longīna, daughter of Domitius Corbulo, was first married to L. Lamia Aemilianus, and afterwards to the emperor Domitian. In consequence of her adulterous intercourse with Paris, an actor, Domitian repudiated her, but was afterwards reconciled to her. She was privy to Domitian's murder.

Domĭtĭa Gens, plebeian, was divided into the 2 illustrious families of AHENOBARBUS and CALVINUS.

Domĭtĭānus, or with his full name T. Flavius Domitianus Augustus, Roman emperor A. D. 81—96, was the younger son of Vespasian, and was born at Rome, A. D. 51. When Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the E. (69), Domitian, who was then at Rome, narrowly escaped being murdered by Vitellius, and concealed himself until the victory of his father's party was decided. After the fall of Vitellius, Domitian was proclaimed Caesar, and obtained the government of the city till the return of his father. In this short time he gave full proofs of his sanguinary and licentious temper. Vespasian entrusted Domitian with no public affairs, and during the 10 years of his reign (69—79), Domitian lived as a private person on an estate near the Alban Mount, surrounded by a number of courtezans, and devoting a great part of his time to the composition of poetry and the recitation of his productions. During the reign of his brother Titus (79-81), he was also not allowed to take any part in public affairs. On the death of Titus (81), which was in all probability the work of Domitian, he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. During the first few years of his reign he kept a strict superintendence over the governors of provinces, enacted several useful laws, endeavoured to correct the licentious conduct of the higher classes; and though he indulged himself in strange passions, his government was much better than had been expected. But his conduct was soon changed for the worse. His wars were mostly unfortunate; and his want of success both wounded his vanity and excited his fears, and thus led him to delight in the misfortunes and sufferings of others. In 83 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which was attended with no result, though on his return to Rome in the following year, he celebrated a triumph, and assumed the name of Germanicus. In 85 Agricola, whose success and merits excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome. [AGRICOLA.] From 86 to 90 he had to carry on war with Decebalus and the Dacians, who defeated the Roman armies, and at length compelled Domitian to purchase peace on very humiliating terms. [DECEBALUS.] It was after the Dacian war especially, that he gave full sway to his cruelty and tyranny. No man of distinction was safe, unless he would degrade himself to flatter the tyrant. The silent fear which prevailed in Rome and Italy during the latter years of Domitian's reign are briefly but energetically described by Tacitus in the introduction to his Life of Agricola, and his vices and tyranny are exposed in the strongest colours by the withering satire of Juvenal. All the philosophers who lived at Rome were expelled. Christian writers attribute to him a persecution of the Christians likewise, but there is some doubt upon the matter; and the belief seems to have arisen from the strictness with which he exacted the tribute from the Jews, and which may have caused much suffering to the Christians also. Many conspiracies had been formed against his life, and at length 3 officers of his court, assisted by Domitia, the emperor's wife, had him murdered by Stephanus, a freedman, on the 18th of September, 96.

Domitilla, Flāvia, the first wife of Vespasian, and mother of Titus, Domitian, and Domitilla.

Domitius Afer. [AFER.]

Domitius Corbŭlo. [CORBULO.]

Domitius Marsus. [MARSUS.]

Domitius Ulpiānus. [ULPIANUS.]

Domna, Julia, of Emesa, was born of humble parents, and married the emperor Septimius Severus, when he was in a private station. She was beautiful and profligate, but at the same time gifted with strong powers of mind, and fond of literature and of the society of literary men. She had great influence over her husband, and after his death was entrusted by her son Caracalla with the administration of the most important affairs of state. After the murder of Caracalla, she was at first kindly treated by Macrinus; but having incurred the suspicions of Macrinus, and being commanded to quit Antioch, she put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation, A. D. 217.

Donātus. 1. A celebrated grammarian, who taught at Rome in the middle of the 4th century, and was the preceptor of Saint Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin Grammar, which has formed the groundwork of most elementary treatises upon the same subject, from his own time to the present day. It has been usually published in the form of 2 separate tracts: 1. Ars s. Editio Prima, de literis, syllabis, pedibus, et tonis; 2. Editio Secunda, de octo partibus orationis; to which are commonly annexed De barbarismo, De soloecismo, De ceteris vitiis; De metaplasmo; De schematibus; De tropis; but in the recent edition of Lindemann (in Corpus Gramm. Latin. Lips. 1831) these are all combined under one general title, Donati Ars Grammatica tribus libris comprehensa. We also possess introductions (enarrationes) and scholia, by Donatus, to 5 out of the 6 plays of Terence, those to the Heautontimorumenos having been lost. They are attached to all complete editions of Terence. — 2. Tiberius Claudius, the author of a life of Virgil in 25 chapters, prefixed to many editions of Virgil. Nothing is known with regard to this Donatus; but it has been conjectured that some grammarian, who flourished about the commencement of the 5th century, may have drawn up a biography which formed the groundwork of the piece we now possess.

Donūsa or Donūsia (Δονουσία: Δονούσιος: Stenosa), one of the smaller Sporades in the Aegean sea, S. of Naxos, subject to the Rhodians in early times. It produced green marble, whence Virgil (Aen. iii. 125) calls the island viridis. Under the Roman emperors it was used as a place of banishment.

Dōra, Dōrus, Dōrum (τὰ Δῶρα, Δῶρος: Δωρίτης), called DOR in the O. T., the most southerly town of Phoenicia on the coast, on a kind of peninsula at the foot of Mt. Carmel. It was an ancient town, formerly the residence of a Canaanitish king, and afterwards belonged to the tribe of Manasseh. Under the Seleucidae it was a strong fortress, and was included in Coele-Syria. It subsequently fell into decay, but was restored and again made a fortified place by the Roman general Gabinius.

Dōrieus (Δωριεύς). 1. Eldest son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, by his first wife, was however born after the son of the second marriage, Cleomenes, and therefore excluded from the immediate succession. [ANAXANDRIDES.] On the accession of Cleomenes to the throne, Dorieus left Sparta to establish for himself a kingdom elsewhere. He led his colony first to Libya; but driven away thence, he passed over to Eryx in Sicily, where he fell in a battle with the Egestaeans and Carthaginians, about B. C. 508. — 2. Son of Diagoras of Rhodes [DIAGORAS], was celebrated for his victories in all the great Grecian games. He settled in Thurii, and from this place, after the defeat of the Athenians at Syracuse, he led 30 galleys to the aid of the Spartan cause in Greece, B. C. 412. He continued to take an active part in the war till 407, when he was captured by the Athenians; but the people, in admiration of his athletic size and noble beauty, dismissed him without so much as exacting a ransom. He is said at a later time to have been put to death by the Spartans.

Dōris (Δωρίς). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, wife of her brother Nereus, and mother of the Nereides. The Latin poets sometimes use the name of this divinity for the sea itself. (Virg. Eclog. x. 5.) — 2. One of the Nereides, daughter of the preceding.

Dōris (Δῶρις). 1. A small and mountainous country in Greece, formerly called Dryŏpis (Δρυοπίς), was bounded by Thessaly on the N., by Aetolia on the W., by Locris on the S., and by Phocis on the E. It contained 4 towns, Boum, Citinium, Erineus, and Pindus, which formed the Dorian tetrapolis. These towns never attained any consequence, and in the time of the Romans were in ruins; but the country is of importance as the home of the Dorians (Δωριεῖς: Dores), one of the great Hellenic races, who claimed descent from the mythical Dorus. [DORUS.] The Dorians, however, had not always dwelt in this land. Herodotus relates (i. 56), that they first inhabited Phthiotis in the time of Deucalion; that next, under Dorus, they inhabited Histiaeotis at the foot of Ossa and Olympus; that, expelled from thence by the Cadmeans, they settled on Mt. Pindus; and that they subsequently took up their abode in Dryopis, afterwards called Doris. Their 5th and last migration was to Peloponnesus, which they conquered, according to tradition, 80 years after the Trojan war. It was related that Aegimius, the king of the Dorians, had been driven from his dominions by the Lapithae, but was reinstated by Hercules; that the children of Hercules hence took refuge in this land when they had been expelled from Pelopon-nesus; and that it was to restore them to their rights that the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus. Accordingly, the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians is usually called the Return of the Heraclidae. See HERACLIDAE. — The Dorians were divided into 3 tribes: the Hylleis (Ὑλλεῖς), Pamphyli (Πάμφυλοι), and Dymanes (Δυμᾶνες). The first derived their name from Hyllus, son of Hercules, the two last from Pamphylus and Dymas, sons of Aegimius. The Dorians were the ruling class throughout Peloponnesus; the old inhabitants were reduced to slavery, or became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Perioeci (Περίοικοι). (Dict. of Antiq. art. Perioeci.) — 2. A district in Asia Minor consisting of the Dorian settlements on the coast of Caria and the neighbouring islands. 6 of these towns formed a league, called the Dorian hexapolis, consisting of Lindus, Ialȳsus, and Camīrus in the island of Rhodes, the island Cos, and Cnidus and Halicarnassus on the mainland. There were also other Dorian settlements in the neighbourhood, but they were never admitted to the league. The members of the hexapolis were accustomed to celebrate a festival with games on the Triopian promontory near Cnidus, in honour of the Triopian Apollo; the prizes in those games were brazen tripods, which the victors had to dedicate in the temple of Apollo; and Halicarnassus was struck out of the league, because one of her citizens carried the tripod to his own house instead of leaving it in the temple. The hexapolis thus became a pentapolis.

Doriscus (Δορίσκος), a town in Thrace at the mouth of the Hebrus, in the midst of an extensive plain of the same name, where Xerxes reviewed his vast forces.

Dorso, C. Fabius, greatly distinguished himself when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls, B. C. 390. The Fabian gens was accustomed to celebrate a sacrifice at a fixed time on the Quirinal hill, and accordingly, at the appointed time, C. Dorso, who was then a young man, descended from the Capitol, carrying the sacred things in his hands, passed in safety through the enemy's posts, and, after performing the sacrifice, returned in safety to the Capitol.

Dōrus (Δῶρος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, is described either as a son of Hellen, the nymph Orseïs, and a brother of Xuthus and Aeolus, or as a son of Apollo and Phthia, and a brother of Laodocus and Polypoetes.

Dorylaeum (Δορύλαιον: Δορυλαεύς: Eski-Shehr), a town in Phrygia Epictetus, on the river Thymbris, with warm baths which are used at the present day; important under the Romans as the place from which the roads diverged to Pessinus, Iconium, and Apamea.

Dosiădas (Δωσιάδας), of Rhodes, the author of 2 poems in the Greek Anthology, the verses of which are so arranged that each poem presents the profile of an altar.

Dosĭthĕus (Δωσίθεος), surnamed Magister, a Greek grammarian, taught at Rome about A. D. 207. He has left behind him a work entitled Ἑρμηνεύματα, of which the 1st and 2nd books contain a Greek grammar written in Latin, and Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek glossaries. The third book, which is the most important, contains translations from Latin authors into Greek, and vice versâ, and has been published separately by Böcking, Bonn, 1832.

Dossennus Fabius, or Dorsennus, an ancient Latin comic dramatist, censured by Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 173) on account of the exaggerated buffoonery of his characters. It appears that the name Dossennus (like that of Macchus) was appropriated to one of the standard characters in the Atellane farces. Hence some have supposed that Dossennus in Horace is not the name of a real person.

Dōtĭum (Δώτιον: Δωτιεύς), a town and plain in Thessaly S. of Mt. Ossa, on the lake Bobeis.

Drabescus (Δράβησκος, also Δράβισκος), a town in the district Edōnis in Macedonia, on the Strymon.

Dracănon (Δράκανον), a town and promontory in the island Icaria.

Dracon (Δράκων), the author of the first written code of laws at Athens, which were called θεσμοί, as distinguished from the νόμοι of Solon. In this code he affixed the penalty of death to almost all crimes — to petty thefts, for instance, as well as to sacrilege and murder — which gave occasion to the remark that his laws were written not in ink, but in blood. We are told that he himself defended this extreme harshness by saying that small offences deserved death, and that he knew no severer punishment for great ones. His legislation is placed in B. C. 621. After the legislation of Solon (594), most of the laws of Dracon fell into disuse; but some of them were still in force at the end of the Peloponnesian war, as for instance the law which permitted the injured husband to slay the adulterer, if taken in the act. We are told that Dracon died at Aegina, being smothered by the number of hats and cloaks showered upon him as a popular mark of honour in the theatre.

Drangiāna (Δραγγιανή: Sedjestân), a part of Ariana, was bounded by Gedrosia, Carmania, Arachosia, and Aria. It sometimes formed a separate satrapy, but was more usually united to the satrapies either of Arachosia or of Gedrosia, or of Aria. The chief product of the country was tin: the chief river was the Erymanthus or Erymandrus (Hilmend or Hindmend). In the N. of the country dwelt the Drangae (Δράγγαι), a warlike people, from whom the province derived its name: their capital was Prophthasia. The Zarangae, Sarangae, or Darandae, who are also mentioned as inhabitants of the country, are probably only other forms of the name Drangae. The Ariaspae inhabited the S. part of the province. [ARIASPAE.]

Draudăcum (Dardasso), a fortress of the Penestae in Greek Illyria.

Drāvus (Drave), a tributary of the Danube, rises in the Noric Alps near Aguntum, flows through Noricum and Pannonia; and, after receiving the Murius (Muhr), falls into the Danube E. of Mursa (Esseck).

Drĕcănum (Δρέκανον), a promontory on the W. side of the island Cos.

Drepănĭus, Latīnus Pacātus, a friend of Ausonius, and a correspondent of Symmachus, delivered a panegyric on the emperor Theodosius, A. D. 391, after the victory of the latter over Maximus. This panegyric, which is extant, is the 11th in the collection of the Panegyrici Veteres.

Drĕpănum (Δρέπανον: Δρεπανεύς), that is, a sickle. 1. Also Drepăna (τὰ Δρέπανα), more rarely Drĕpăne (Trapani), a seaport town in the N. W. corner of Sicily, so called because the land on which it was built was in the form of a sickle. It was founded by the Carthaginian Hamilcar, at the commencement of the 1st Punic War, and was one of the chief naval stations of the Carthaginians. Under the Romans it was an important commercial town. It was here that Anchises died, according to Virgil. — 2. A promontory in Achaia. [RHIUM.] — 3. The ancient name of CORCYRA. — 4. Also Drĕpăne, a town in Bithynia, on the Sinus Astacenus, the birth-place of Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, in whose honour it was called Helenopolis, and made an important place. In its neighbourhood were warm medicinal baths, which Constantine the Great frequently used in the latter part of his life.

Drepsa (Δρέψα, also Ἄδραψα, Δάραψα, Δράψακα: Anderab or Inderab), a town in the N.E. of Bactriana, on the frontiers of Sogdiana.

Drilae (Δρίλαι), a brave people in Pontus, on the frontiers of Colchis, near Trapezus.

Drilo, a river in Illyricum, flows into the Adriatic near Lissus.

Dromichaetes (Δρομιχαίτης), a king of the Getae, who took Lysimachus prisoner. [LYSIMACHUS.]

Drŏmos Achillēus. [ACHILLEUS DROMOS.]

Druentĭa (Durance), a large and rapid river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps, and flows into the Rhone near Avenio (Avignon).

Drūna (Drôme), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps, and flows into the Rhone S. of Valencia (Valence).

Drusilla. 1. Livia, mother of the emperor Tiberius and wife of Augustus. [LIVIA.] — 2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married 1st to L. Cassius Longinus, and afterwards to M. Aemilius Lepidus; but she lived in incestuous intercourse with her brother Caligula, whose passion for her exceeded all bounds. On her death, in A. D. 38, he commanded that she should be worshipped, by the name Panthea, with the same honours as Venus. — 3. Daughter of Herodes Agrippa I., king of the Jews, married 1st Azizus, king of Emesa, whom she divorced, and 2ndly Felix, the procurator of Judaea. She was present with her husband when St. Paul preached before Felix in A. D. 60.

Drūsus, the name of a distinguished family of the Livia gens. It is said that one of the Livii acquired the cognomen Drusus for himself and his descendants by having slain in close combat one Drausus, a Gallic chieftain; but this statement deserves little credit. — 1. M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs with C. Gracchus, B. C. 122. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and after putting his veto upon the laws proposed by Gracchus, he brought forward almost the very same measures, in order to gain popularity for the senate, and to impress the people with the belief that the optimates were their best friends. The success of this system earned for him the designation patronus senatus. Drusus was consul 112, obtained Macedonia as his province, and conquered the Scordisci. — 2. M. Livius Drusus, son of No. 1, an eloquent orator, and a man of great energy and ability. He was tribune of the plebs, 91, in the consulship of L. Marcius Philippus and Sex. Julius Caesar. Although, like his father, he belonged to the aristocratical party, he meditated the most extensive and organic changes in the Roman state. To conciliate the people he renewed several of the measures of the Gracchi. He proposed and carried laws for the distribution of corn or for its sale at a low price, and for the assignation of public land. He also gained the support of the Latini and the Socii by promising to secure for them the Roman citizenship. Thus strengthened, he proposed to transfer the judicia from the equites to the senate; but as a compensation to the former order, he further proposed that the senate, now reduced below the regular number of 300, should be reinforced by the introduction of an equal number of new members selected from the equites. This measure proved unsatisfactory to both parties. The Roman populace also were opposed to the Roman franchise being given to the Latins and the Socii. The senate, perceiving the dissatisfaction of all parties, voted that all the laws of Drusus, being carried against the auspices, were null and void from the beginning. Drusus now began to organise a formidable conspiracy against the government; but one evening as he was entering the hall of his own house, he was stabbed and died a few hours afterwards. The assassin was never discovered, and no attempts were made to discover him. Caepio and Philippus were both suspected of having suborned the crime; but Cicero attributes it to Q. Varius. The death of Drusus destroyed the hopes of the Socii, and was thus immediately followed by the Social War. — 3. Livius Drusus Claudianus, father of Livia, who was the mother of the emperor Tiberius. He was one of the gens Claudia, and was adopted by a Livius Drusus. It was through this adoption that the Drusi became connected with the imperial family. The father of Livia, after the death of Caesar, espoused the cause of Brutus and Cassius, and, after the battle of Philippi (42), being proscribed by the conquerors, he killed himself in his tent. — 4. Nero Claudius Drusus, commonly called by the moderns Drusus Senior, to distinguish him from No. 5, was the son of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, and younger brother of the emperor Tiberius. He was born in the house of Augustus 3 months after the marriage of Livia and Augustus, 38. Drusus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. His manners were affable, and his conduct without reproach. He married Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his fidelity to his wife was a theme of admiration in a profligate age. He was greatly trusted by Augustus, who employed him in important offices. He carried on the war against the Germans, and penetrated far into the interior of the country. In 12 he drove the Sicambri and their allies out of Gaul, crossed the Rhine, then followed the course of the river down to the ocean, and subdued the Frisians. It was apparently during this campaign that Drusus dug a canal (Fossa Drusiana) from the Rhine near Arnheim to the Yssel, near Doesberg; and he made use of this canal to sail from the Rhine into the ocean. In his 2nd campaign (11), Drusus subdued the Usipetes, invaded the country of the Sicambri, and passed on through the territory of the Cherusci as far as the Visurgis (Weser). On his return he was attacked by the united forces of the Germans, and defeated them with great slaughter. — In his 3rd campaign (10), he conquered the Chatti and other German tribes, and then returned to Rome, where he was made consul for the following year. — In his 4th campaign (9), which he carried on as consul, he advanced as far as the Albis (Elbe), sweeping every thing before him. It is said that he had resolved to cross the Elbe, but was deterred by the apparition of a woman of dimensions greater than human, who said to him in the Latin tongue, "Whither goest thou, insatiable Drusus? The Fates forbid thee to advance. Away! The end of thy deeds and thy life is nigh." On the return of the army to the Rhine, Drusus died in consequence of a fracture of his leg, which happened through a fall from his horse. Upon receiving tidings of the dangerous illness of Drusus, Tiberius immediately crossed the Alps, and after travelling with extraordinary speed arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. Tiberius brought the body to Italy: it was burnt in the field of Mars, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus. — 5. Drusus Caesar, commonly called by modern writers Drusus Junior, was the son of the emperor Tiberius by his 1st wife, Vipsania. He married Livia, the sister of Germanicus. After the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, he was sent into Pannonia to quell the mutiny of the legions. In 15 he was consul, and in 16 he was sent into Illyricum: he succeeded in fomenting dissension among the Germanic tribes, and destroyed the power of Maroboduus. In 21 he was consul a 2nd time; and in 22 he received the tribunicia potestas, by which he was pointed out as the intended successor to the empire. But Sejanus, the favourite of Tiberius, aspired to the empire. He seduced Livia, the wife of Drusus, and persuaded her to become the murderer of her husband. A poison was administered to Drusus, which terminated his life by a lingering disease, that was supposed at the time to be the consequence of intemperance, A. D. 23. — 6. Drusus, 2nd son of Germanicus and Agrippina. After the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius [No. 5], Drusus and his elder brother Nero became the heirs to the imperial throne. Sejanus therefore resolved to get rid of them both. He first engaged Drusus in the plots against his elder brother, which ended in the banishment and death of that prince. [NERO.] The turn of Drusus came next. He was accused in 30, and condemned to death as an enemy of the state. Tiberius kept him imprisoned for 3 years, and then starved him to death, 33.

Drўădes. [NYMPHAE.]

Drўas (Δρύας), father of the Thracian king Lycurgus, who is hence called Dryantīdes.

Drȳmaea or Drȳmus (Δρυμαία, Δρυμός: Δρυμιεύς: Baba ?), a town in Phocis, a little S. of the Cephissus, was destroyed by Xerxes.

Drȳmus (Δρυμός). 1. See DRYMAEA. — 2. A strong place in Attica, on the frontiers of Boeotia.

Drymussa (Δρυμοῦσσα: Δρυμουσσαῖος), an island in the Hermaean gulf, off the coast of Ionia, opposite Clazomenae; given by the Romans to Clazomenae.

Drȳŏpē (Δρυόπη), daughter of king Dryops, and the playmate of the Hamadryades on Mt. Oeta. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to gain possession of her, metamorphosed himself into a tortoise. Dryope took the creature into her lap, whereupon the god changed himself into a serpent. The nymphs fled away in affright, and thus Apollo remained alone with Dryope. Soon after she married Andraemon, but became, by Apollo, the mother of AMPHISSUS, who built the town of Oeta, and a temple to Apollo. Dryope was afterwards carried off by the Hamadryades, and became a nymph.

Drȳŏpes (Δρύοπες), a Pelasgic people, descended from a mythical ancestor Dryops, dwelt first in Thessaly, from the Sperchēus to Parnassus, and afterwards in Doris, which was called from them Dryopis (Δρυοπίς). Driven out of Doris by the Dorians, they migrated to other countries, and settled in Peloponnesus, Euboea, and Asia Minor.

Dryops (Δρύοψ), son of the river-god Sperchēus and the Danaid Polydora, or of Lycaon and Dia, the daughter of Lycaon, the mythical ancestor of the Dryopes.

Dryos Cephălae (Δρυὸς Κεφαλαί), a narrow pass of Mt. Cithaeron, between Athens and Plataeae.

Dūbis (Doubs), a river in Gaul, rises in M. Jurassus (Jura), flows past Vesontio (Besançon), and falls into the Arar (Saône) near Cabillonum (Châlons).

Dubris Portus (Dover), a seaport town of the Cantii, in Britain: here was a fortress erected by the Romans against the Saxon pirates.

Ducas, Michael, a Byzantine historian, held a high office under Constantine XIII., the last emperor of Constantinople. After the capture of Constantinople, A. D. 1453, he fled to Lesbos. His history extends from the death of John VI. Palaeologus, 1355, to the capture of Lesbos by the Turks, 1462. The work is written in barbarous Greek, but gives a clear and impartial account of events. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1834.

Dūcĕtĭus (Δουκέτιος), a chief of the Sicelians, or Sicels, the native tribes in the interior of Sicily, carried on a formidable war in the middle of the 5th century B. C. against the Greeks in the island. Having been at last defeated in a great battle by the Syracusans, he repaired to Syracuse as a suppliant, and placed himself at their mercy. The Syracusans spared his life, but sent him into an honourable exile at Corinth. He returned soon afterwards to Sicily, and founded the city of Calacte. He died about B. C. 440.

Duilĭus. 1. M., tribune of the plebs B. C. 471. He was one of the chief leaders of the plebeians, and it was on his advice that the plebeians migrated from the Aventine to the Mons Sacer, just before the overthrow of the decemvirs. He was then elected tribune of the plebs a 2nd time, 449. — 2. K., one of the decemvirs, 450, on whose overthrow he went into voluntary exile. — 3. C., consul 260, with Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina, in the 1st Punic War. In this year the Romans built their first fleet, using for their model a Carthaginian vessel which had been thrown on the coast of Italy. The command of this fleet was given to Scipio, who was defeated by the Carthaginians off Lipara. Thereupon Duilius was entrusted with the command, and as he perceived the disadvantages under which the clumsy ships of the Romans were labouring, he devised the well-known grappling-irons, by means of which the enemy's ships might be drawn towards his, and the sea-fight thus changed into a land-fight. By this means he gained a brilliant victory over the Carthaginian fleet near Mylae, and then prosecuted the war in Sicily with success, relieving Egesta, and taking Macella by assault. On his return to Rome, Duilius celebrated a splendid triumph, for it was the first naval victory that the Romans had ever gained, and the memory of it was perpetuated by a column which was erected in the forum, and adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships (Columna Rostrata). It is generally believed that the original inscription which adorned the basis of the column is still extant. It was dug out of the ground in the 16th century, in a mutilated condition, and it has since often been printed with attempts at restoration. There are, however, in that inscription some orthographical peculiarities, which suggest, that the present inscription is a later restoration of the original one. Duilius was further rewarded for this victory, by being permitted, whenever he returned home from a banquet at night, to be accompanied by a torch and a flute-player.

Dulgibīni, a people in Germany, dwelt S.E. of the Angrivarii, on the W. bank of the Weser.

Dulichĭum. [ECHINADES.]

Dumnŏrix, a chieftain of the Aedui, conspired against the Romans, B. C. 58, but was then pardoned by Caesar in consequence of the entreaties of his brother, Divitiacus. When Caesar was going to Britain in 54, he suspected Dumnorix too much to leave him behind in Gaul, and he insisted therefore on his accompanying him. Dumnorix, upon this, fled from the Roman camp with the Aeduan cavalry, but was overtaken and slain.

Dunium. [DUROTRIGES.]

Dūra (τὰ Δοῦρα: Δουρηνός). 1. A town in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, not far from Circesium, founded by the Macedonians, and hence surnamed Nicanoris; also called Eurōpus (Εὔρωπός) by the Greeks. In the time of Julian it was deserted.—2. (Dor), a town in Assyria, on the Tigris.

Dūrănĭus (Dordogne), a river in Aquitania, which falls into the Garumna.

Dūrĭa (Dora Baltea), a river which rises in the S. of the Alps, flows through the country of the Salassi, bringing gold dust with it, and falls into the Po.

Dūris (Δοῦρις), of Samos, the historian, was a descendant of Alcibiades, and lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He obtained the tyranny of his native island, though it is unknown by what means. He wrote a considerable number of works, of which the most important was a history of Greece, from B. C. 370 to 281. He does not appear to have enjoyed any very great reputation as an historian among the ancients. His fragments have been collected by Hulleman, Duridis Samii quae supersunt, Traject. ad Rhen. 1841.

Dūrĭus (Δούριος, Δώριος: Duero, Douro), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rises among the Pelendones, at the foot of M. Idubeda near Numantia, and flows into the Atlantic; it was auriferous, and is navigable a long way from its mouth.

Durobrivae (Rochester), a town of the Cantii in Britain.

Durocasis (Dreux) a town of the Carnutes in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Durocatelauni. [CATALAUNI.]

Durocortorum (Rheims), the capital of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, and subsequently called Remi, was a populous and powerful town.

Duronĭa, a town in Samnium in Italy, W. of the Caudine passes.

Durotrĭges, a people in Britain, in Dorsetshire and the W. of Somersetshire: their chief town was Dunium (Dorchester).

Durovernum or Darvernum (Canterbury), a town of the Cantii in Britain, afterwards called Cantuaria.

Dyardanes or Oedanes (Brahmaputra), a river in India, falls into the Ganges on the E. side.

Dȳmas (Δύμας), son of Aegimius, from whom the Dymanes, one of the 3 tribes of the Dorians, were believed to have derived their name.

Dȳmē or Dymae (Δύμη, Δῦμαι: Δυμαῖος, Dymaeus; nr. Karavostasi, Ru.), a town in the W. of Achaia, near the coast; one of the 12 Achaean towns; it founded, along with Patrae, the 2nd Achaean league; and was at a later time colonised by the Romans.

Dyras (Δύρας), a small river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, falls into the Sinus Maliacus.

Dyrrhăchĭum (Δυῤῥάχιον: Δυῤῥάχιος, Δυῤῥαχηνός, Dyrrachīnus: Durazzo), formerly called Epidamnus (Ἐπίδαμνος: Ἐπιδάμνιος), a town in Greek Illyria, on a peninsula in the Adriatic sea. It was founded by the Corcyraeans, and received the name Epidamnus; but since the Romans regarded this name a bad omen, as reminding them of damnum, they changed it into Dyrrhachium, when they became masters of the country. Under the Romans it became an important place; it was the usual place of landing for persons who crossed over from Brundisium. Commerce and trade were carried on here with great activity, whence it is called Taberna Adriae by Catullus (xxxvi.15); and here commenced the great Egnatia Via, leading to the E. In the civil war it was the head-quarters of Pompey, who kept all his military stores here. In A. D. 345 it was destroyed by an earthquake.

Dysōrum (τὸ Δύσωρον), a mountain in Macedonia with gold mines, between Chalcidice and Odomantice.

Dyspontĭum (Δυσπόντιον: Δυσπόντιος), an ancient town of Pisatis in Elis, N. of the Alpheus, was destroyed by the Eleans; whereupon its inhabitants removed to Epidamnus and Apollonia.

E.

Ebŏra. 1. Or Ebūra Cerealis, a small town in Hispania Baetica, perhaps in the neighbourhood of the modern Sta. Cruz.—2. Surnamed Liberalitas Julia (Evora), a Roman municipium in Lusitania. —3. Or Ebūra (S. Lucar de Barrameda), a town in Hispania Baetica, near the mouth of the Baetis. —4. A fortress of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Eborăcum or Eburăcum (York), a town of the Brigantes in Britain, was made a Roman station by Agricola, and soon became the chief Roman settlement in the whole island. It was both a municipium and a colony. It was the head-quarters of the sixth legion, and the residence of the Roman emperors when they visited Britain. Here the emperors Septimius Severus and Constantius Chlorus died. Part of the ancient Roman walls still exist at York; and many Roman remains have been found in the modern city.

Eborolăcum (Evreule on the river Sioule), a town in Aquitania.

Ebrodūnum (Embrun), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, in the Cottian Alps.

Ebūdae or Hebūdae (Hebrides), islands in the Western Ocean off Britain. They were 5 in number, according to Ptolemy, 2 called Ebudae, Maleus, Epidium, and Ricina.

Eburomăgus or Hebromagus (nr. Bram or Villerazons), a town in Gallia Narbonensis.

Eburōnes, a German people, who crossed the Rhine and settled in Gallia Belgica, between the Rhine and the Mosa (Maas) in a marshy and woody district. They were dependants (clientes) of the Treviri, and were in Caesar's time under the rule of Ambiorix and Cativolcus. Their insurrection against the Romans, B.C. 54, was severely punished by Caesar, and from this time they disappear from history.

Eburovīces. [AULERCI.]

Ebŭsus or Ebūsus (Iviza), the largest of the Pityusae insulae, off the E. coast of Spain, reckoned by some writers among the Baleares. It was celebrated for its excellent figs. Its capital, also called Ebusus, was a civitas foederata, possessed an excellent harbour, was well built, and carried on a considerable trade.

Ecbătănă (τὰ Ἐκβάτανα, Ion. and Poët. Ἀγβάτανα: Hamadan), a great city, most pleasantly situated, near the foot of Mt. Orontes, in the N. of Great Media, was the capital of the Median kingdom, and afterwards the summer residence of the Persian and Parthian kings. Its foundation was more ancient than any historical record: Herodotus ascribes it to Deioces, and Diodorus to Semiramis. It had a circuit of 240 stadia, and was surrounded by 7 walls, each overtopping the one before it, and crowned with battlements of different colours: these walls no longer existed in the time of Polybius. The citadel, of great strength, was used as the royal treasury. Below it stood a magnificent palace, the tiles of which were silver, and the capitals, entablatures, and wainscotings, of silver and gold; treasures which the Seleucidae coined into money, to the amount of 4000 talents. The circuit of this palace was 7 stadia.

Ecetra (Ecetranus), an ancient town of the Volsci, and, according to Dionysius, the capital of this people, was destroyed by the Romans at an early period.

Echedōrus (Ἐχέδωρος, in Herod. Ἐχείδωρος), a small river in Macedonia, rises in Crestonia, flows through Mygdonia, and falls into the Thermaic gulf.

Echĕlīdae (Ἐχελίδαι: Ἐχελίδης), an Attic demus E. of Munychia, called after a hero Echelus.

Echĕmus (Ἔχεμος), son of Aëropus and grandson of Cepheus, succeeded Lycurgus as king of Arcadia. In his reign the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus, and Echemus slew, in single combat, Hyllus, the son of Hercules. In consequence of this battle, which was fought at the Isthmus, the Heraclidae were obliged to promise not to repeat their attempt upon Peloponnesus for 50 years.

Echestrătus (Ἐχέστρατος), king of Sparta, son of Agis I., and father of Labotas or Leobotes.

Echetla (Ἐχέτλα), a town in Sicily, W. of Syracuse in the mountains.

Echĕtus (Ἔχετος), a cruel king of Epirus. His daughter, Metope or Amphissa, who had yielded to her lover Aechmodicus, was blinded by her father, and Aechmodicus was cruelly mutilated.

Echidna (Ἔχιδνα), daughter of Tartarus and Ge, or of Chrysaor and Callirrhoë, or of Peiras and Styx. The upper part of her body was that of a beautiful maiden with black eyes, while the lower part was that of a serpent, of a vast size. She was a horrible, and blood-thirsty monster. She became by Typhon the mother of the Chimaera, of the many-headed dog Orthus, of the hundred-headed dragon who guarded the apples of the Hesperides, of the Colchian dragon, of the Sphinx, of Cerberus (hence called Echidnēus canis), of Scylla, of Gorgon, of the Lernaean Hydra (Echidna Lernaea), of the eagle which consumed the liver of Prometheus, and of the Nemean lion. She was killed in her sleep by Argus Panoptes. According to Hesiod she lived with Typhon in a cave in the country of the Arimi, but another tradition transported her to Scythia, where she became by Hercules the mother of Agathyrsus, Gelonus, and Scythes. (Herod. iv. 8—10.)

Echīnădes (Ἐχινάδες or Ἐχῖναι: Curzolari), a group of small islands at the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to Acarnania, said to have been formed by the alluvial deposits of the Achelous. The legend related that they were originally Nymphs, who dwelt on the mainland at the mouth of the Achelous, and that on one occasion having forgotten to present any offerings to the god Achelous, when they sacrificed to the other gods, the river-god, in wrath, tore them away from the mainland with the ground on which they were sacrificing, carried them out to sea, and formed them into islands. — The Echinades appear to have derived their name from their resemblance to the Echinus or sea-urchin. — The largest of these islands was named Dulĭchĭum (Δουλίχιον). It is mentioned by Homer, and from it Meges, son of Phyleus, went to the Trojan War. At the present day it is united to the mainland.

Echīon (Ἐχίων). 1. One of the 5 surviving Sparti who had grown up from the dragon's teeth, which Cadmus had sown. He married Agave, by whom he became the father of Pentheus: he assisted Cadmus in the building of Thebes.—2. Son of Hermes and Antianīra, twin-brother of Erytus or Eurytus, with whom he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. — 3. A celebrated Grecian painter, flourished B.C. 352. One of his most noted pictures was Semiramis passing from the state of a handmaid to that of a queen; in this picture the modesty of the new bride was admirably depicted. The picture in the Vatican, known as "the Aldobrandini Marriage," is supposed by some to be a copy from the "Bride" of Echion.

Echo (Ἠχώ), an Oreade who, according to the legend related by Ovid, used to keep Juno engaged by incessantly talking to her, while Jupiter was sporting with the nymphs. Juno, however, found out the trick that was played upon her, and punished Echo by changing her into an echo, that is, a being with no control over its tongue, which is neither able to speak before anybody else has spoken, nor to be silent when somebody else has spoken. Echo in this state fell desperately in love with Narcissus; but as her love was not returned, she pined away in grief, so that in the end there remained of her nothing but her voice. (Ov. Met. iii. 356—401.)

Ecphantīdes (Ἐκφαντίδης), one of the earliest poets of the old Attic comedy, flourished about B.C. 460, a little before Cratinus. The meaning of the surname of Καπνίας, which was given to him by his rivals, seems to imply a mixture of subtilty and obscurity. He ridiculed the rudeness of the old Megaric comedy, and was himself ridiculed on the same ground by Cratinus and Aristophanes.

Edessa or Antiochīa Callirrhŏē (Ἔδεσσα, Ἀντιόχεια ἡ ἐπὶ Καλλιῤῥόῃ, or Ἀ. μιξοβάρβαρος: O.T. Ur: Urfah), a very ancient city in the N. of Mesopotamia, the capital of Osroëne, and the seat of an independent kingdom from B.C. 137 to A.D. 216. [ABGARUS.] It stood on the river Scirtus or Bardesanes, which often inundated and damaged the city. It was here that Caracalla was murdered.

Having suffered by an earthquake in the reign of Justin I., the city was rebuilt and named Justinopolis. — The Edessa of Strabo is evidently a different place, namely the city usually called Bambyce or Hierapolis.

Edētāni or Sedētāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, E. of the Celtiberi. Their chief towns were VALENCIA, SAGUNTUM, CAESARAUGUSTA, and Edeta, also called Liria (Lyria).

Edōni or Edōnes (Ἠδωνοί, Ἠδῶνες), a Thracian people, between the Nestus and the Strymon. They were celebrated for their orgiastic worship of Bacchus; whence Edōnis in the Latin poets signifies a female Bacchante, and Horace says (Carm. ii. 7. 26), Non ego sanius bacchabor Edonis.— The poets frequently use Edoni as synonymous with Thracians.

Eĕtĭon (Ἠετίων), king of the Placian Thebē in Cilicia, and father of Andromache, the wife of Hector. He and 7 of his sons were slain by Achilles, when the latter took Thebes.

Egelasta, a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Egĕrĭa. [AEGERIA.]

Egesta. [SEGESTA.]

Egnātĭa (Torre d' Anazzo), a town in Apulia, on the coast, called Gnatia by Horace (Sat. i. 5. 97), who speaks of it as Lymphis (i. e. Nymphis) iratis exstructa, probably on account of its bad or deficient supply of water. It was celebrated for its miraculous stone or altar, which of itself set on fire frankincense and wood; a prodigy which afforded amusement to Horace and his friends, who looked upon it as a mere trick. — Egnatia owed its chief importance to being situated on the great high road from Rome to Brundisium. This road reached the sea at Egnatia, and from this town to Brundisium it bore the name of the Via Egnatia. The continuation of this road on the other side of the Adriatic from Dyrrhachium to Byzantium also bore the name of the Via Egnatia. It was the great military road between Italy and the E. Commencing at Dyrrhachium, it passed by Lychnidus, Heraclēa, Lyncestis, Edessa, Thessalonica, Amphipolis, Philippi, and traversing the whole of Thrace, finally reached Byzantium.

Egnātĭi, a family of Samnite origin, some of whom settled at Teanum. 1. GELLIUS EGNATIUS, leader of the Samnites in the 3rd Samnite war, fell in battle against the Romans, B.C. 295.—2. MARIUS EGNATIUS, one of the leaders of the Italian allies in the Social War, was killed in battle, 89.—3. M. EGNATIUS RUFUS, aedile 20 and praetor 19, was executed in the following year, in consequence of his having formed a conspiracy against the life of Augustus.—4. P. EGNATIUS CELER. [BAREA.]

Eïon (Ἠϊών: Ἠϊονεύς: Contessa or Rendina), a town in Thrace, at the mouth of the Strymon, 25 stadia from Amphipolis, of which it was the harbour. Brasidas, after obtaining possession of Amphipolis, attempted to seize Eion also, but was prevented by the arrival of Thucydides with an Athenian fleet, B. C. 424.

Eïŏnes (Ἠϊόνες), a town in Argolis with a harbour, subject to Mycenae in the time of Homer, but not mentioned in later times.

Elaea (Ἐλαία: Kazlu), an ancient city on the coast of Aeolis in Asia Minor, said to have been founded by Mnestheus, stood 12 stadia S. of the mouth of the Caïcus, and 120 stadia (or 16 Roman miles) from Pergamus, to which city, in the time of the Pergamene kingdom, it served for a harbour (ἐπίνειον). It was destroyed by an earthquake in B. C. 90. The gulf on which it stood, which forms a part of the great Gulf of Adramyttium, was named after it Sinus Elaïticus (Ἐλαϊτικὸς κόλπος, G. of Chandeli).

Elaeūs (Ἐλαιοῦς, -οῦντος: Ἐλαιούσιος). 1. Or Elĕūs (Ἐλεοῦς: Critia), a town on the S.E. point of the Thracian Chersonese, with a harbour and an heroum of Protesilaus. — 2. (Mesolonghi), a town in Aetolia, S. of Pleuron. — 3. A town in Argolis. — 4. A demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis.

Elagabălus, Roman emperor, A. D. 218—222, son of Julia Soemias and Varius Marcellus, was born at Emesa about 205, and was originally called VARIUS AVITUS BASSIANUS. While almost a child he became, along with his first cousin Alexander Severus, priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phoenician Sun-god, to whose worship a temple was dedicated in his native city. It was from this circumstance that he obtained the name Elagabalus, by which he is usually known. He owed his elevation to the purple to the intrigues of his grandmother Julia Maesa, who circulated the report that Elagabalus was the offspring of a secret commerce between Soemias and Caracalla, and induced the troops in Syria to salute him as their sovereign by the title of M. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, the 16th of May, 218. Macrinus forthwith marched against Elagabalus, but was defeated near Antioch, June 8th, and was shortly afterwards put to death. Elagabalus was now acknowledged as emperor by the senate, and in the following year came to Rome. The reign of this prince, who perished at the age of 18, after having occupied the throne nearly 4 years, was characterised throughout by an accumulation of the most fantastic folly and superstition, together with impurity so bestial that the particulars almost transcend the limits of credibility. In 221 he adopted his first cousin Alexander Severus, and proclaimed him Caesar. Having become jealous of Alexander, he attempted to put him to death, but was himself slain along with his mother Soemias by the soldiers, with whom Alexander was a great favourite.

Elāna. [AELANA.]

Elăra (Ἐλάρα), daughter of Orchomenus or Minyas, bore to Zeus the giant Tityus. Zeus, from fear of Hera, concealed her under the earth.

Elatēa (Ἐλάτεια: Ἐλατεύς). 1. (Nr. Elephtha Ru.), a town in Phocis, and the most important place in the country next to Delphi, was situated near the Cephissus in a fertile valley, which was an important pass from Thessaly to Boeotia. Elatea was thus frequently exposed to hostile attacks. It is said to have been founded by Elatus, son of Arcas. — 2. A town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, near Gonni. — 3. Or Elatrēa, a town in Epirus, near the sources of the Cocytus.

Elătus (Ἔλατος). 1. Son of Arcas and Leanira, king of Arcadia, husband of Laodice, and father of Stymphalus, Aepytus, Cyllen, and Pereus. He resided on mount Cyllene, and went from thence to Phocis, where he founded the town of Elatea.— 2. A prince of the Lapithae at Larissa in Thessaly, husband of Hippēa, and father of Caeneus and Polyphemus. He is sometimes confounded with the Arcadian Elatus.

Elăver (Allier), subsequently Elaris or Elauris, a river in Aquitania, a tributary of the Liger.

Elbo (Ἐλβώ), an island on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, in the midst of the marshes between the Phatnitic and the Tanitic mouths of the Nile, was the retreat of the blind Pharoah Anysis from the Aethiopian Sabacon, and afterwards of Amyrtaeus from the Persians.

Elĕa. [VELIA.]

Electra (Ἠλέκτρα), i. e. the bright or brilliant one. 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Thaumas, and mother of Iris and the Harpies, Aëllo and Ocypete. — 2. Daughter of Atlas and Pleïŏne, one of the 7 Pleiades, and by Zeus mother of Iasion and Dardanus. According to an Italian tradition, she was the wife of the Italian king Corythus, by whom she had a son Iasion; whereas by Zeus she was the mother of Dardanus. It was through her means, according to another tradition, that the Palladium came to Troy; and when she saw the city of her son Dardanus perishing in flames, she tore out her hair for grief, and was placed among the stars as a comet. According to others, Electra and her 6 sisters were placed among the stars as the 7 Pleiades, and lost their brilliancy on seeing the destruction of Ilium. — 3. Sister of Cadmus, from whom the Electrian gate at Thebes was said to have received its name. — 4. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, also called Laodice, sister of Iphigenia and Orestes. After the murder of her father by her mother, she saved the life of her young brother Orestes, by sending him under the protection of a slave to king Strophius at Phanote in Phocis, who had the boy educated together with his own son Pylades. When Orestes had grown up to manhood, Electra excited him to avenge the death of Agamemnon, and assisted him in slaying their mother, Clytaemnestra. [ORESTES.] After the death of the latter, Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades. The history and character of Electra form the subject of the "Choëphori" of Aeschylus, the "Electra" of Euripides, and the "Electra" of Sophocles.

Electrĭdes Insŭlae. [ERIDANUS.]

Electrȳon (Ἠλεκτρύων), son of Perseus and Andromeda, king of Mycenae, husband of Anaxo, and father of Alcmene, the wife of Amphitryon. For details see AMPHITRYON.

Electrȳŏnē (Ἠλεκτρυώνη). 1. Daughter of Helios and Rhodos. — 2. A patronymic from Electryon, given to his daughter, Alcmene.

Elĕōn (Ἐλέων), a town in Boeotia, near Tanagra.

Elĕos (Ἔλεος), the personification of pity or mercy, worshipped by the Athenians alone.

Elĕphantīnē or Elephantis (Ἐλεφαντίνη, Ἐλεφαντίς: Jezirah-el-Zahir, or Jezirah-el-Assouan), an island in the Nile, with a city of the same name, opposite to Syene, and 7 stadia below the Little Cataract, was the frontier station of Egypt towards Ethiopia, and was strongly garrisoned under the Persians and the Romans. The island was extremely fertile, the vine and the fig-tree never shedding their leaves: it had also great quarries. Among the most remarkable objects in it were the temple of Cnuphis and a Nilometer; and it is still celebrated for the ruins of its rock-hewn temples.

Elephantis, a Greek poetess under the early Roman emperors, wrote certain amatory works (molles Elephantidos libelli), which are referred to by Martial and Suetonius.

Elĕphēnor (Ἐλεφήνωρ), son of Chalcodon and of Imenarĕte or Melanippe, and prince of the Abantes in Euboea, whom he led against Troy. He was one of the suitors of Helen: he was killed before Troy by Agenor.

Eleusis (Ἐλευσίς, later Ἐλευσίν: Ἐλευσίνιος: Leosina or Lessina), a town and demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, was situated N.W. of Athens, on the coast near the frontiers of Megara. It possessed a magnificent temple of Demeter, and it gave its name to the great festival and mysteries of the Eleusinia, which were celebrated in honour of Demeter and Persephone. The Eleusinia were originally a festival peculiar to Eleusis, which was an independent state; but after the Eleusinians had been conquered by the Athenians in the reign of Erechtheus, according to tradition, the Eleusinia became a festival common to both cities, though the superintendence of the festival remained with the descendants of Eumolpus, the king of Eleusis. For an account of the festival see Dict. of Antiq. art. Eleusinia.

Eleuthĕrae (Ἐλευθεραί: Ἐλευθερεύς), a town in Attica on the frontiers of Boeotia, originally belonged to the Boeotian confederacy, and afterwards voluntarily united itself to Attica.

Eleuthĕrĭus (Ἐλευθέριος), a surname of Zeus, as the Deliverer. (Dict. of Ant. art. Eleutheria.)

Eleutherna (Ἐλευθέρνα: Ἐλευθερναῖος), a town in the interior of Crete.

Eleuthĕrus (Ἐλεύθερος: Nahr-el-Kebir, i. e. Great River), a river forming the boundary between Syria and Phoenice, rose in Mt. Bargylus, the N. prolongation of Lebanon, and fell into the sea between Antaradus and Tripolis.

Elĭcĭus, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, where king Numa dedicated to Jupiter Elicius an altar on the Aventine. The origin of the name is referred to the Etruscans, who by certain prayers and sacrifices called forth (eliciebant or evocabant) lightning, or invited Jupiter to send lightning. The object of calling down lightning was according to Livy's explanation to elicit prodigies (ad prodigia elicienda, Liv. i. 20.).

Elimberrum. [AUSCI.]

Elimēa, -ia, or Elimiōtis (Ἐλίμεια, Ἐλιμία, Ἐλιμιῶτις), a district of Macedonia, on the frontiers of Epirus and Thessaly, originally belonged to Illyria, and was bounded by the Cambunian mountains on the S. and the Tymphaean mountains on the W. Its inhabitants, the Elimaei (Ἐλειμιῶται), were Epirots.

Elis (Ἦλις, Dor. Ἆλις, Ἠλεία: Ἠλεῖος, Dor. Ἄλιος, whence Alii in Plautus), a country on the W. coast of Peloponnesus, bounded by Achaia on the N., Arcadia on the E., Messenia on the S., and the Ionian sea on the W. The country was fertile, watered by the ALPHEUS and its tributaries, and is said to have been the only country in Greece which produced flax. The PENEUS is the only other river in Elis of any importance. Elis was divided into 3 parts: — 1. Elis Proper or Hollow Elis (ἡ Κοίλη Ἦλις), the N. part, watered by the Peneus, of which the capital was also called Elis. — 2. Pisātis (ἡ Πισᾶτις), the middle portion, of which the capital was PISA. — 3. Triphylĭa (ἡ Τριφυλία), the S. portion, of which PYLOS was the capital, lay between the Alpheus and the Neda. — In the heroic times we find the kingdom of Nestor and the Pelīdae in the S. of Elis; while the N. of the country was inhabited by the Epeans (Ἐπειοί), with whom some Aetolian tribes were mingled. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Heraclidae, the Aetolian chief Oxylus received Elis as his share of the conquest; and it was the union of his Aetolian and Dorian followers with the Epeans, which formed the subsequent population of the country, under the general name of Eleans. Elis owed its importance in Greece to the worship of Zeus at Olympia near Pisa, in honour of whom a splendid festival was held every 4 years. [OLYMPIA.] In consequence of this festival being common to the whole of Greece, the country of Elis was declared sacred, and its inhabitants possessed priestly privileges. Being exempt from war and the dangers of invasion, the Eleans became prosperous and wealthy; their towns were unwalled and their country was richly cultivated. The prosperity of their country was ruined by the Peloponnesian War; the Athenians were the first to disregard the sanctity of the country; and from that time it frequently had to take part in the other contests of the Greeks.— The town of Elis was situated on the Peneus, and was built at the time of the Persian War by the inhabitants of 8 villages, who united together, and thus formed one town. It originally had no walls, being sacred like the rest of the country, but subsequently it was fortified. The inhabitants of Elis formed a close alliance with the Spartans, and by their means destroyed the rival city of Pisa, and became the ruling city in the country, B. C. 572. In the Peloponnesian War they quarrelled with the Spartans, because the latter had espoused the cause of Lepraeum, which had revolted from Elis. The Eleans retaliated upon the Spartans by excluding them from the Olympic games.

Elīso. [ALISO.]

Elissa. [DIDO.]

Ellŏpĭa (Ἐλλοπία). 1. A district in the N. of Euboea, near the promontory Cenaeum, with a town of the same name which disappeared at an early period: the whole island of Euboea is sometimes called Ellopia. — 2. An ancient name of the district about Dodona in Epirus.

Elōnē (Ἠλώνη), a town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, afterwards called Limone (Λειμώνη).

Elpēnor (Ἐλπήνωρ), one of the companions of Ulysses, who were metamorphosed by Circe into swine, and afterwards back into men. Intoxicated with wine, Elpenor one day fell asleep on the roof of Circe's residence, and in his attempt to rise he fell down and broke his neck. When Ulysses was in the lower world, he met the shade of Elpenor, who implored him to burn his body. After his return to the upper world, Ulysses complied with this request of his friend.

Elpinīcē (Ἐλπινίκη), daughter of Miltiades, and sister of Cimon, married Callias. [CALLIAS.]

Elusātes, a people in Aquitania in the interior of the country. Their chief town was Elūsa. (Nr. Euse or Eause.) It was the birthplace of Rufinus, the minister of Arcadius.

Elȳmaei, Elȳmi. [ELYMAIS.]

Elymāïs, a district of Susiana, extending from the river Eulaeus on the W. to the Oroatis on the E., derived its name from the Elymaei or Elymi (Ἐλυμαῖοι, Ἔλυμοι), a warlike and predatory people, who are also found in the mountains of Great Media: in the Persian armies they served as archers. These Elymaei were probably among the most ancient inhabitants of the country N. of the head of the Persian Gulf: in the O. T. Susiana is called Elam.

Elymi. [ELYMUS.]

Elymiōtis. [ELIMEA.]

Elȳmus (Ἔλυμος), a Trojan, natural son of Anchises and brother of Eryx. Previous to the emigration of Aeneas, Elymus and Aegestus had fled from Troy to Sicily, and had settled on the banks of the river Crimisus. When afterwards Aeneas also arrived there, he built for them the towns of Aegesta and Elyme. The Trojans who settled in that part of Sicily called themselves Elymi, after Elymus.

Elȳrus (Ἔλυρος), a town in the W. of Crete, S. of Cydonia.

Elȳsium (Ἠλύσιον πεδίον, later simply Ἠλύσιον), the Elysian fields. In Homer (Od. iv. 563) Elysium forms no part of the realms of the dead; he places it on the W. of the earth, near Ocean, and describes it as a happy land, where there is neither snow, nor cold, nor rain, and always fanned by the delightful breezes of Zephyrus. Hither favoured heroes, like Menelaus, pass without dying, and live happy under the rule of Rhadamanthys. — The Elysium of Hesiod and Pindar are in the Isles of the Blessed (μακάρων νῆσοι), which they place in the Ocean. From these legends arose the fabulous island of ATLANTIS. — The Elysium of Virgil is part of the lower world, and the residence of the shades of the Blessed.

Emăthĭa (Ἠμαθία: Ἠμαθιεύς), a district of Macedonia, between the Haliacmon and the Axius, formerly part of Paeonia, and the original seat of the Macedonian monarchy. The poets frequently give the name of Emathia to the whole of Macedonia, and sometimes even to the neighbouring Thessaly.

Emăthĭdes, the 9 daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia.

Emăthĭon (Ἠμαθίων), son of Tithonus and Eos, brother of Memnon, was slain by Hercules.

Embŏlima (Ἐμβόλιμα), a city of the Paropamisadae in N. India, near the fortress of Aornos, 16 days' march from the Indus. (Q. Curt.)

Emēsa or Emissa (Ἔμεσα, Ἔμισσα: Ἐμεσηνός: Hums or Homs), a city of Syria, on the E. bank of the Orontes, in the province of Apamene, but afterwards the capital of Phoenice Libanesia, was in Strabo's time the residence of independent Arabian princes; but under Caracalla it was made a colony with the Jus Italicum. It is a remarkable place in the history of the Roman empire, being the native city of Julia Domna, the wife of Septimius Severus, of Elagabalus, who exchanged the high priesthood of the celebrated temple of the Sun in this city for the imperial purple, and of the emperor Alexander Severus; and also the scene of the decisive battle between Aurelian and Zenobia, A. D. 273.

Emmĕnĭdae (Ἐμμενίδαι), a princely family at Agrigentum, which traced their origin to the mythical hero Polynīces. Among its members we know Emmenides (from whom the family derived its name) the father of Aenesidamus, whose sons Theron and Xenocrates are celebrated by Pindar as victors at the great games of Greece.

Emōdi Montes, or -us, or -es, or -on (τὰ Ἠμωδὰ ὄρη, τὸ Ἠμωδὸν ὄρος, or ὁ Ἠμωδός: Himalaya M.), a range of mountains N. of India, forming the prolongation E.wards of the Paropamisus.

Empĕdŏcles (Ἐμπεδοκλῆς), of Agrigentum in Sicily, flourished about B. C. 444. Although he was descended from an ancient and wealthy family, he joined the revolution in which Thrasydaeus, the son and successor of Theron, was expelled. His zeal in the establishment of political equality is said to have been manifested by his magnanimous support of the poor, by his severity in persecuting the overbearing conduct of the aristocrats, and in his declining the sovereignty which was offered to him. His brilliant oratory, his penetrating knowledge of nature, and the reputation of his marvellous powers, which he had acquired by curing diseases, by his successful exertions in removing marshy districts and in averting epidemics and obnoxious winds, spread a lustre around his name. He was called a magician (γόης), and he appears to have attributed to himself miraculous powers. He travelled in Greece and Italy, and made some stay at Athens. His death is said to have been marvellous, like his life. One tradition represented him as having been removed from the earth, like a divine being; and another related that he threw himself into the flames of mount Aetna, that by his sudden disappearance he might be believed to be a god; but it was added that the volcano threw up one of his sandals, and thus revealed the manner of his death. The rhetorician Gorgias was a disciple of Empedocles. — The works of Empedocles were all in verse. The two most important were a didactic poem on nature (Περὶ Φύσεως), of which considerable fragments are extant, and a poem, entitled Καθαρμοί, which seems to have recommended good moral conduct as the means of averting epidemics and other evils. Lucretius, the greatest of all didactic poets, speaks of Empedocles with enthusiasm, and evidently makes him his model. Empedocles was acquainted with the theories of the Eleatics and the Pythagoreans; but he did not adopt the fundamental principles of either school, although he agreed with the latter in his belief in the migration of souls, and in a few other points. With the Eleatics he agreed in thinking that it was impossible to conceive any thing arising out of nothing. Aristotle with justice mentions him among the Ionic physiologists, and places him in very close relation to the atomistic philosophers and to Anaxagoras. Empedocles first established the number of 4 elements, which he called the roots of things.

Empŏrĭae or Emporium (Ἐμπορίαι, Ἐμπορεῖον, Ἐμπόριον: Ἐμπορίτης: Ampurias), a town of the Indigetes in Hispania Tarraconensis near the Pyrenees, was situated on the river Clodianus, which formed the harbour of the town. It was founded by the Phocaeans from Massilia, and was divided into 2 parts, at one time separated from each other by a wall: the part near the coast being inhabited by the Greeks, and the part towards the interior by the Indigetes. It was subsequently colonised by Julius Caesar. Its harbour was much frequented: here Scipio Africanus first landed when he came to Spain in the 2nd Punic War.

Empŭlum (Ampiglione?), a small town in Latium, near Tibur.

Empūsa (Ἔμπουσα), a monstrous spectre, which was believed to devour human beings. It could assume different forms, and was sent by Hecate to frighten travellers. It was believed usually to appear with one leg of brass and the other of an ass, whence it was called ὀνοσκελίς or ὀνοκώλη. The Lamiae and Mormolyceia, who assumed the form of handsome women for the purpose of attracting young men, and then sucked their blood like vampyrs and ate their flesh, were reckoned among the Empusae.

Enarēphŏrus (Ἐναρήφορος), son of Hippocoön, a passionate suitor of Helen, when she was yet quite young. Tyndareus, therefore, entrusted the maiden to the care of Theseus. Enarephorus had a heroum at Sparta.

Encĕlădus (Ἐγκέλαδος), son of Tartarus and Ge, and one of the hundred-armed giants who made war upon the gods. He was killed, according to some, by a flash of lightning, by Zeus, who buried him under mount Aetna; according to others, Athena killed him with her chariot, or threw upon him the island of Sicily.

Enchĕles (Ἐγχελεῖς, also Ἐγχελέαι, Ἐγχέλιοι), an Illyrian tribe.

Endoeus (Ἔνδοιος), an Athenian statuary, is called a disciple of Daedalus, whom he is said to have accompanied on his flight from Crete. This statement must be taken to express, not the time at which he lived, but the style of art which he practised. It is probable that he lived in the time of Pisistratus and his sons, about B.C. 560.

Endymĭon (Ἐνδυμίων), a youth distinguished by his beauty, and renowned in ancient story for his perpetual sleep. Some traditions about Endymion refer us to Elis, and others to Caria, and others again are a combination of the two. According to one set of legends, he was a son of Aëthlius and Calyce, or of Zeus and Calyce, and succeeded Aëthlius in the kingdom of Elis. Others related that he had come from Elis to mount Latmus in Caria, whence he is called the Latmian (Latmius). As he slept on Latmus, his surprising beauty warmed the cold heart of Selene (the moon), who came down to him, kissed him, and lay by his side. His eternal sleep on Latmus is assigned to different causes; but it was generally believed that Selene had sent him to sleep, that she might be able to kiss him without his knowledge. By Selene he had 50 daughters. There is a beautiful statue of a sleeping Endymion in the British Museum.

Engyum (Ἔγγυον or Ἐγγύϊον: Ἐγγυΐνος, Enguinus: Gangi), a town in the interior of Sicily near the sources of the Monalus, was originally a town of the Siculi, but is said to have been colonised by the Cretans under Minos: it possessed a celebrated temple of the great mother of the gods.

Enīpeus (Ἐνιπεύς). 1. A river in Thessaly, rises in Mt. Othrys, receives the Apidanus near Pharsalus, and flows into the Peneus. Poseidon assumed the form of the god of this river in order to obtain possession of Tyro, who was in love with Enipeus. She became by Poseidon the mother of Pelias and Neleus. Ovid relates (Met. vi. 116) that Neptune (Poseidon) having assumed the form of Enipeus, became by Iphimedīa the father of Otus and Ephialtes. — 2. A small river in Pisatis (Elis) flows into the Alpheus near its mouth. — 3. A small river in Macedonia, which rises in Olympus.

Enna or Henna (Ἔννα: Ἐνναῖος: Castro Giovanni), an ancient and fortified town of the Siculi in Sicily, on the road from Catana to Agrigentum, said to be the centre of the island (ὀμφαλὸς Σικελίας). It was surrounded by fertile plains, which bore large crops of wheat; it was one of the chief seats of the worship of Demeter (Ceres), and possessed a celebrated temple of this goddess. According to later tradition it was in a flowery meadow in the neighbourhood of Enna that Pluto carried off Proserpine, and the cave was shown through which the god passed as he carried off his prize. Its importance gradually declined from the time of the 2nd Punic war, when it was severely punished by the Romans, because it had attempted to revolt to the Carthaginians.

Ennĭus, Q., the Roman poet, was born at Rudiae, in Calabria, B. C. 239. He was a Greek by birth, but a subject of Rome, and served in the Roman armies. In 204 Cato, who was then quaestor, found Ennius in Sardinia, and brought him in his train to Rome. In 189 Ennius accompanied M. Fulvius Nobilior during the Aetolian campaign, and shared his triumph. Through the son of Nobilior, Ennius, when far advanced in life, obtained the rights of a Roman citizen. He dwelt in a humble house on the Aventine, and maintained himself by acting as a preceptor to the youths of the Roman nobles. He lived on terms of the closest intimacy with the elder Scipio Africanus. He died 169, at the age of 70. He was buried in the sepulchre of the Scipios, and his bust was allowed a place among the effigies of that noble house. Ennius was regarded by the Romans as the father of their poetry (alter Homerus, Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 50). Cicero calls him Summus poëta noster; and Virgil was not ashamed to borrow many of his thoughts, and not a few of his expressions. All the works of Ennius are lost with the exception of a few fragments. His most important work was an epic poem, in dactylic hexameters, entitled Annalium Libri XVIII., being a history of Rome, commencing with the loves of Mars and Rhea, and reaching down to his own times. The beautiful history of the kings in Livy may have been taken from Ennius. No great space, however, was allotted to the earlier records, for the contest with Hannibal, which was described with great minuteness, commenced with the 7th book, the first Punic war being passed over altogether. He wrote numerous tragedies, which appear to have been all translations or adaptations from the Greek, the metres of the originals being in most cases closely imitated. He wrote also a few comedies, and several other works, such as Satirae, composed in a great variety of metres, from which circumstance they probably received their name; a didactic poem, entitled Epicharmus; a panegyric on Scipio; Epigrams, &c. The best collection of the fragments of Ennius is by Hieronymus Columna, Neapol. 4to. 1590, reprinted with considerable additions, by Hesselius, Amstel. 4to. 1707.

Enŏpe (Ἐνόπη), a town in Messenia, mentioned by Homer, supposed to be the same as GERENIA.

Entella (Ἔντελλα: Entellinus, Entellensis: Entella), an ancient town of the Sicani in the interior of the island on the W. side, said to have been founded by Entellus, one of the companions of the Trojan Aegestus. It was subsequently seized and peopled by the Campanian mercenaries of Dionysius.

Enyălĭus (Ἐνυάλιος), the Warlike, frequently occurs in the Iliad (never in the Odyssey) as an epithet of Ares. At a later time Enyalius and Ares were distinguished as 2 different gods of war; Enyalius was looked upon as a son of Ares and Enyo, or of Cronos and Rhea. The name is evidently derived from ENYO.

Enўo (Ἐνυώ), the goddess of war, who delights in bloodshed and the destruction of towns, and accompanies Ares in battles. Respecting the Roman goddess of war, see BELLONA.

Eordaea (Ἐορδαία, also Ἐορδία), a district and town in the N. W. of Macedonia, inhabited by the Eordi (Ἐορδοί, also Ἐορδαῖοι).

Eōs (Ἠώς, Att. Ἕως), in Latin Aurōra, the goddess of the morning red, daughter of Hyperīon and Thia or Euryphassa; or of Pallas, according to Ovid. At the close of every night she rose from the couch of her spouse Tithonus, and on a chariot drawn by the swift horses Lampus and Phaëton she ascended up to heaven from the river Oceanus, to announce the coming light of the sun to the gods as well as to mortals. In the Homeric poems Eos not only announces the coming Sun, but accompanies him throughout the day, and her career is not complete till the evening; hence she came to be regarded as the goddess of the daylight, and was completely identified by the tragic writers with Hemera. She carried off several youths distinguished for their beauty, such as ORION, CEPHALUS, and TITHONUS, whence she is called by Ovid Tithonia conjux. She bore Memnon to Tithonus. [MEMNON.] By Astraeus she became the mother of Zephyrus, Boreas, Notus, Heosphorus, and other stars.

Epămīnondas (Ἐπαμεινώνδας, Ἐπαμινώνδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Polymnis, was born and reared in poverty, though his blood was noble. His close and enduring friendship with Pelopidas is said to have originated in the campaign in which they served together on the Spartan side against Mantinea, where Pelopidas having fallen in a battle, apparently dead, Epaminondas protected his body at the imminent risk of his own life, B. C. 385. After the Spartans had been expelled from Thebes, 379, Epaminondas took an active part in public affairs. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedaemonians, in which the success of Thebes is said to have been owing mainly to the tactics of Epaminondas. He it was who most strongly urged the giving battle, while he employed all the means in his power to raise the courage of his countrymen, not excluding even omens and oracles, for which, when unfavourable, he had but recently expressed his contempt. In 369 he was one of the generals in the 1st invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans; and before leaving Peloponnesus he restored the Messenians to their country and established a new city, named Messene. On their return home Epaminondas and Pelopidas were impeached by their enemies, on a capital charge of having retained their command beyond the legal term. The fact itself was true enough; but they were both honourably acquitted, Epaminondas having expressed his willingness to die if the Thebans would record that he had been put to death because he had humbled Sparta and taught his countrymen to face and to conquer her armies. In 368 he again led a Theban army into the Peloponnesus, but did not advance far, and, on his return, was repulsed by Chabrias in an attack which he made on Corinth. In the same year we find him serving, but not as general, in the Theban army which was sent into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas from Alexander of Pherae, and which was saved from utter destruction only by the ability of Epaminondas. In 367 he was sent at the head of another force to release Pelopidas, and accomplished his object without even striking a blow, and by the mere prestige of his name. In 366 he invaded the Peloponnesus for the 3rd time, and in 362 for the 4th time. In the latter year he gained a brilliant victory over the Lacedaemonians at Mantinēa; but in the full career of victory he received a mortal wound. He was told that his death would follow directly on the javelin being extracted from the wound; and he would not allow this to be done till he had been assured that his shield was safe, and that the victory was with his countrymen. It was a disputed point by whose hand he fell: among others, the honour was assigned to Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. Epaminondas was one of the greatest men of Greece. He raised Thebes to the supremacy of Greece, which she lost almost as soon as he died. Both in public and in private life he was distinguished by integrity and uprightness, and he carried into daily practice the lessons of philosophy, of which he was an ardent student.

Epaphrŏdītus (Ἐπαφρόδιτος). 1. A freedman and favourite of the emperor Nero. He assisted Nero in killing himself, and he was afterwards put to death by Domitian. The philosopher Epictetus was his freedman. — 2. M. Mettĭus Epaphrodītus, of Chaeronea, a Greek grammarian, the slave and afterwards the freedman of Modestus, the praefect of Egypt. He subsequently went to Rome, where he resided in the reign of Nero and down to the time of Nerva. He was the author of several grammatical works and commentaries.

Epăphus (Ἔπαφος), son of Zeus and Io, born on the river Nile, after the long wanderings of his mother. He was concealed by the Curetes, at the request of Hera, but was discovered by Io in Syria. He subsequently became king of Egypt, married Memphis, a daughter of Nilus, or, according to others, Cassiopea, and built the city of Memphis. He had a daughter Libya, from whom Libya (Africa) received its name.

Epēi. [Elis.]

Epĕtĭum (Ἐπέτιον: nr. Strobnecz, Ru.), a town of the Lissii in Dalmatia with a good harbour.

Epēus (Ἐπειός). 1. Son of Endymion, king in Elis, from whom the Epei are said to have derived their name. — 2. Son of Panopeus, went with 30 ships from the Cyclades to Troy. He built the wooden horse with the assistance of Athena.

Ephĕsus (Ἔφεσος: Ἐφέσιος: Ru. near Ayasaluk, i. e. Ἅγιος Θεόλογος, the title of St. John), the chief of the 12 Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded by Carians and Leleges, and to have been taken possession of by Androclus, the son of Codrus, at the time of the great Ionian migration. It stood a little S. of the river Caÿster, near its mouth, where a marshy plain, extending S. from the river, is bounded by two hills, Prion or Lepre on the E., and Coressus on the S. The city was built originally on Mt. Coressus, but, in the time of Croesus, the people transferred their habitations to the valley, whence Lysimachus, the general of Alexander, compelled them again to remove to M. Prion. On the N. side of the city was a lake, communicating with the Caÿster, and forming the inner harbour, now a marsh; the outer harbour (πάνορμος) was formed by the mouth of the river. In the plain, E. of the lake, and N.E. of the city, beyond its walls, stood the celebrated temple of Artemis, which was built in the 6th century B.C., by an architect named Chersiphron, and, after being burnt down by Herostratus in the night on which Alexander the Great was born (Oct. 13—14, B.C. 356), was restored by the joint efforts of all the Ionian states, and was regardĕd as one of the wonders of the world: nothing now remains of the temple, except some traces of its foundations. The temple was also celebrated as an asylum, till Augustus deprived it of that privilege. The other buildings at Ephesus, of which there are any ruins, are the agora, theatre, odeum, stadium, gymnasium, and baths, temples of Zeus Olympius and of Julius Caesar, and a large building near the inner harbour: the foundations of the walls may also be traced. — With the rest of Ionia, Ephesus fell under the power successively of Croesus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. It was always very flourishing, and became even more so as the other Ionian cities decayed. It was greatly favoured by its Greek rulers, especially by Lysimachus, who, in honour of his second wife, gave it her name, Arsinoë, which, however, it did not long retain. Attalus II. Philadelphus constructed docks for it, and improved its harbours. Under the Romans it was the capital of the province of Asia, and by far the greatest city of Asia Minor. It is conspicuous in the early history of the Christian Church, both St. Paul and St. John having laboured in it, and addressed epistles to the church of Ephesus; and at one time its bishop possessed the rank and power of a patriarch over the churches in the province of Asia. Its position, and the excellence of its harbours, made it the chief emporium for the trade of all Asia within the Taurus; and its downfall was chiefly owing to the destruction of its harbours by the deposits of the Caÿster. — In the earliest times Ephesus was called by various names, Alope, Ortygia, Morges, Smyrna Tracheia, Samornia, and Ptelea.

Ephialtes (Ἐφιάλτης). 1. One of the Aloïdae. [Aloeus.] — 2. A Malian, who in B.C. 480, when Leonidas was defending the pass of Thermopylae, guided a body of Persians over the mountain path, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks. — 3. An Athenian statesman, was a friend and partisan of Pericles, whom he assisted in carrying his political measures. He is mentioned in particular as chiefly instrumental in that abridgment of the power of the Areopagus, which inflicted such a blow on the oligarchical party, and against which the Eumenides of Aeschylus was directed. His services to the democratic cause excited the rancorous enmity of some of the oligarchs, and led to his assassination during the night, probably in 456.

Ephippus (Ἔφιππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the middle comedy. — 2. Of Olynthus, a Greek historian of Alexander the Great.

Ephŏrus (Ἔφορος), of Cymae in Aeolis, a celebrated Greek historian, was a contemporary of Philip and Alexander, and flourished about B.C. 340. He studied rhetoric under Isocrates, of whose pupils he and Theopompus were considered the most distinguished. On the advice of Theopompus he wrote A History (Ἱστορίαι) in 30 books, which began with the return of the Heraclidae, and came down to the siege of Perinthus in 341. It treated of the history of the barbarians as well as of the Greeks, and was thus the first attempt at writing a universal history that was ever made in Greece. It embraced a period of 750 years, and each of the 30 books contained a compact portion of the history, which formed a complete whole by itself.

Ephorus did not live to complete the work, and it was finished by his son Demophilus. Diyllus began his history at the point at which the work of Ephorus left off. Ephorus also wrote a few other works of less importance, of which the titles only are preserved by the grammarians. Of the history likewise we have nothing but fragments. It was written in a clear and polished style, but was at the same time deficient in power and energy. Ephorus appears to have been faithful and impartial in the narration of events; but he did not always follow the best authorities, and in the later part of his work he frequently differed from Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, on points on which they are entitled to credit. Diodorus Siculus made great use of the work of Ephorus. The fragments of his work have been published by Marx, Carlsruhe, 1815, and in Müller's Fragm. Historicor. Graec. Paris, 1841.

Ephўra (Ἐφύρα). 1. The ancient name of Corinth [CORINTHUS.] — 2. An ancient town of the Pelasgi near the river Selleis in Elis. — 3. A town in Thessaly, afterwards called CRANON. — 4. A town in Epirus, afterwards called CICHYRUS. — 5. A small town in the district of Agraea in Aetolia.

Epĭcastē (Ἐπικάστη), commonly called JOCASTE.

Epicēphēsĭa (Ἐπικηφησία: Ἐπικηφήσιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis.

Epĭcharmus (Ἐπίχαρμος), the chief comic poet among the Dorians, was born in the island of Cos, about B. C. 540. His father, Elothales, was a physician, of the race of the Asclepiads. At the age of 3 months, Epicharmus was carried to Megara, in Sicily; thence he removed to Syracuse, when Megara was destroyed by Gelon (484 or 483). Here he spent the remainder of his life, which was prolonged throughout the reign of Hieron, at whose court Epicharmus associated with the other great writers of the time, and among them with Aeschylus. He died at the age of 90 (450), or, according to Lucian, 97 (443). Epicharmus was a Pythagorean philosopher, and spent the earlier part of his life in the study of philosophy, both physical and metaphysical. He is said to have followed for some time his father's profession of medicine; and it appears that he did not commence writing comedies till his removal to Syracuse. Comedy had for some time existed at Megara in Sicily, which was a colony from Megara on the Isthmus, the latter of which towns disputed with the Athenians the invention of comedy. But the comedy at the Sicilian Megara before Epicharmus seems to have been little more than a low buffoonery. It was he, together with Phormis, who gave it a new form, and introduced a regular plot. The number of his comedies is differently stated at 52, or at 35. There are still extant 35 titles. The majority of them are on mythological subjects, that is, travesties of the heroic myths, and these plays no doubt very much resembled the satyric dramas of the Athenians. But besides mythology, Epicharmus wrote on other subjects, political, moral, relating to manners and customs, &c. The style of his plays appears to have been a curious mixture of the broad buffoonery which distinguished the old Megarian comedy, and of the sententious wisdom of the Pythagorean philosopher. His language was remarkably elegant: he was celebrated for his choice of epithets: his plays abounded, as the extant fragments prove, with philosophical and moral maxims. He was imitated by Crates, and also by Plautus, as we learn from the line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 58),—

"Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi."

The parasite, who forms so conspicuous a character in the plays of the new comedy, is first found in Epicharmus.

Epicnemidii Locri. [LOCRIS.]

Epicrătes (Ἐπικράτης). 1. An Athenian, took part in the overthrow of the 30 Tyrants; but afterwards, when sent on an embassy to the Persian king Artaxerxes, he was accused of corruption in receiving money from Artaxerxes. He appears to have been acquitted this time; but he was tried on a later occasion, on another charge of corruption, and only escaped death by a voluntary exile. He was ridiculed by the comic poets for his large beard, and for this reason was called σακεσφορός. — 2. Of Ambracia, an Athenian poet of the middle comedy.

Epictētus (Ἐπίκτητος), of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was a freedman of Epaphroditus, who was himself a freedman of Nero. [EPAPHRODITUS.] He lived and taught first at Rome, and, after the expulsion of the philosophers by Domitian, at Nicopolis in Epirus. Although he was favoured by Hadrian, he does not appear to have returned to Rome; for the discourses which Arrian took down in writing were delivered by Epictetus when an old man at Nicopolis. Only a few circumstances of his life are recorded, such as his lameness, which is spoken of in different ways, his poverty, and his few wants. Epictetus did not leave any works behind him, and the short manual (Enchiridion), which bears his name, was compiled from his discourses by his faithful pupil Arrian. Arrian also wrote the philosophical lectures of his master in 8 books, from which, though 4 are lost, we are enabled to gain a complete idea of the way in which Epictetus conceived and taught the Stoic philosophy. [ARRIANUS.] Being deeply impressed with his vocation as a teacher, he aimed in his discourses at nothing else but winning the minds of his hearers to that which was good, and no one was able to resist the impression which they produced.

Epictētus Phrygia. [PHRYGIA.]

Epicūrus (Ἐπίκουρος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, and the founder of a philosophical school called, after him, the Epicurean. He was a son of Neocles and Charestrata, and was born B. C. 342, in the island of Samos, where his father had settled as one of the Athenian cleruchi; but he belonged to the Attic demos of Gargettus, and hence is sometimes called the Gargettian. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 16.) At the age of 18 Epicurus came to Athens, and there probably studied under Xenocrates, who was then at the head of the academy. After a short stay at Athens he went to Colophon, and subsequently resided at Mytilene and Lampsacus, in which places he was engaged for 5 years in teaching philosophy. In 306, when he had attained the age of 35, he again came to Athens, where he purchased for 80 minae a garden—the famous Κῆποι Ἐπικούρου — in which he established his philosophical school. Here he spent the remainder of his life, surrounded by numerous friends and pupils. His mode of living was simple, temperate, and cheerful; and the aspersions of comic poets and of later philosophers, who were opposed to his philosophy and describe him as a person devoted to sensual pleasures, do not seem entitled to the least credit. He took no part in public affairs. He died in 270, at the age of 72, after a long and painful illness, which he endured with truly philosophical patience and courage. — Epicurus is said to have written 300 volumes. Of these the most important was one On Nature (Περὶ Φύσεως), in 37 books. All his works are lost; but some fragments of the work on Nature were found among the rolls at Herculaneum, and were published by Orelli, Lips. 1818. In his philosophical system, Epicurus prided himself in being independent of all his predecessors; but he was in reality indebted both to Democritus and the Cyrenaics. Epicurus made ethics the most essential part of his philosophical system, since he regarded human happiness as the ultimate end of all philosophy. His ethical theory was based upon the dogma of the Cyrenaics, that pleasure constitutes the highest happiness, and must consequently be the end of all human exertions. Epicurus, however, developed and ennobled this theory in a manner which constitutes the real merit of his philosophy, and which gained for him so many friends and admirers both in antiquity and in modern times. Pleasure with him was not a mere momentary and transitory sensation, but he conceived it as something lasting and imperishable, consisting in pure and noble mental enjoyments, that is, in ἀταραξία and ἀπονία, or the freedom from pain and from all influences which disturb the peace of our mind, and thereby our happiness, which is the result of it. The summum bonum, according to him, consisted in this peace of mind; and this was based upon φρόνησις, which he described as the beginning of everything good, as the origin of all virtues, and which he himself therefore occasionally treated as the highest good itself. — In the physical part of his philosophy, he followed the atomistic doctrines of Democritus and Diagoras. His views are well known from Lucretius's poem De Rerum Natura. We obtain our knowledge and form our conceptions of things, according to him, through εἴδωλα, i. e. images of things which are reflected from them, and pass through our senses into our minds. Such a theory is destructive of all absolute truth, and a mere momentary impression upon our senses or feelings is substituted for it. The deficiencies of his system are most striking in his views concerning the gods, which drew upon him the charge of atheism. His gods, like every thing else, consisted of atoms, and our notions of them are based upon the εἴδωλα which are reflected from them and pass into our minds. They were and always had been in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, which had not been disturbed by the laborious business of creating the world; and as the government of the world would interfere with their happiness, he conceived them as exercising no influence whatever upon the world or man. The pupils of Epicurus were very numerous, and were attached to their master in a manner which has rarely been equalled either in ancient or modern times. But notwithstanding the extraordinary devotion of his pupils, there is no philosopher in antiquity who has been so violently attacked as Epicurus. This has been owing partly to a superficial knowledge of his philosophy, and partly to the conduct of men who called themselves Epicureans, and who, taking advantage of the facility with which his ethical theory was made the handmaid of a sensual life, gave themselves up to the enjoyment of sensual pleasures.

Epicȳdes (Ἐπικύδης), a Syracusan by origin, but born and educated at Carthage. He served, together with his elder brother Hippocrates, with much distinction in the army of Hannibal, both in Spain and Italy; and when, after the battle of Cannae (B. C. 216), Hieronymus of Syracuse sent to make overtures to Hannibal, that general selected the 2 brothers as his envoys to Syracuse. They soon induced the young king to desert the Roman alliance. Upon the murder of Hieronymus shortly after, they were the leaders of the Carthaginian party at Syracuse, and eventually became masters of the city, which they defended against Marcellus. Epicydes fled to Agrigentum, when he saw that the fall of Syracuse was inevitable.

Epĭdamnus. [DYRRHACHIUM.]

Epĭdaurus (Ἐπίδαυρος: Ἐπιδαύριος). 1. (Epidauro), a town in Argolis on the Saronic gulf, formed with its territory Epidaurĭa (Ἐπιδαυρία), a district independent of Argos, and was not included in Argolis till the time of the Romans. It was originally inhabited by Ionians and Carians, whence it was called Epicarus, but it was subdued by the Dorians under Deiphontes, who thus became the ruling race. Epidaurus was the chief seat of the worship of Aesculapius, and was to this circumstance indebted for its importance. The temple of this god, which was one of the most magnificent in Greece, was situated about 5 miles S. W. of Epidaurus. A few ruins of it are still extant. The worship of Aesculapius was introduced into Rome from Epidaurus. See AESCULAPIUS. — 2. Surnamed Limēra (ἡ Λιμηρά: Monembasia or Old Malvasia), a town in Laconia, on the E. coast, said to have been founded by Epidaurus in Argolis, possessed a good harbour. — 3. (Old Ragusa), a town in Dalmatia.

Epidēlĭum (Ἐπιδήλιον), a town in Laconia on the E. coast, S. of Epidaurus Limera, with a temple of Apollo and an image of the god, which once thrown into the sea at Delos is said to have come to land at this place.

Epĭgĕnes (Ἐπιγένης). 1. An Athenian poet of the middle comedy, flourished abont B. C. 380. — 2. Of Sicyon, who has been confounded by some with his namesake the comic poet, preceded Thespis, and is said to have been the most ancient writer of tragedy. It is probable that Epigenes was the first to introduce into the old dithyrambic and satyrical τραγῳδία other subjects than the original one of the fortunes of Dionysus. — 3. Of Byzantium, a Greek astronomer, mentioned by Seneca, Pliny, and Censorinus. He professed to have studied in Chaldea, but his date is uncertain.

Epĭgŏni (Ἐπίγονοι), that is, "the Descendants," the name in ancient mythology of the sons of the 7 heroes who perished before Thebes. [ADRASTUS.] Ten years after their death, the descendants of the 7 heroes marched against Thebes to avenge their fathers. The names of the Epigoni are not the same in all accounts; but the common lists contain Alcmaeon, Aegialeus, Diomedes, Promachus, Sthenelus, Thersander, and Euryalus. Alcmaeon nndertook the command, in accordance with an oracle, and collected a considerable body of Argives. The Thebans marched out against the enemy, under the command of Laodamas, after whose death they fled into the city. On the part of the Epigoni, Aegialeus had fallen. The seer Tiresias, knowing that the city was doomed to fall, persuaded the inhabitants to quit it, and take their wives and children with them. The Epigoni thereupon took possession of Thebes, and razed it to the ground. They sent a portion of the booty and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, to Delphi, and then returned to Peloponnesus. The war of the Epigoni was made the subject of epic and tragic poems.

Epimĕnĭdes (Ἐπιμενίδης). 1. A celebrated poet and prophet of Crete, whose history is to a great extent mythical. He was reckoned among the Curetes, and is said to have been the son of a nymph. He was a native of Phaestus in Crete, and appears to have spent the greatest part of his life at Cnossus, whence he is sometimes called a Cnossian. There is a legend that when a boy, he was sent out by his father in search of a sheep, and that seeking shelter from the heat of the mid-day sun, he went into a cave, and there fell into a deep sleep, which lasted 57 years. On waking and returning home, he found to his great amazement that his younger brother had in the mean time grown an old man. He is further said to have attained the age of 154, 157, or even of 229 years. — His visit to Athens, however, is an historical fact, and determines his date. The Athenians, who were visited by a plague in consequence of the crime of Cylon [CYLON], consulted the Delphic oracle about the means of their delivery. The god commanded them to get their city purified, and the Athenians invited Epimenides to come and undertake the purification. Epimenides accordingly came to Athens, about B. C. 596, and performed the desired task by certain mysterious rites and sacrifices, in consequence of which the plague ceased. Epimenides was reckoned by some among the 7 wise men of Greece; but all that tradition has handed down about him suggests a very different character from that of the seven; he must rather be ranked in the class of priestly bards and sages who are generally comprised under the name of the Orphici. Many works, both in prose and verse, were attributed to him by the ancients, and the Apostle Paul has preserved (Titus, i. 12) a celebrated verse of his against the Cretans.

Epimētheus. [PROMETHEUS and PANDORA.]

Epĭphănes, a surname of Antiochus IV. and Antiochus XI., kings of Syria.

Epiphanīa or ēa (Ἐπιφάνεια). 1. In Syria (O. T. Hamath: Hamah), in the district of Cassiotis, on the left bank of the Orontes, an early colony of the Phoenicians; may be presumed, from its later name, to have been restored or improved by Antiochus Epiphanes. — 2. In Asia Minor (Urzin), on the S. E. border of Cilicia, close to the Pylae Amanides, was formerly called Oeniandus, and probably owed its new name to Antiochus Epiphanes. Pompey repeopled this city with some of the pirates whom he had conquered. — There were some other Asiatic cities of the name.

Epiphanīus (Ἐπιφάνιος), one of the Greek fathers, was born near Eleutheropolis in Palestine, about A. D. 320, of Jewish parents. He went to Egypt when young, and there appears to have been tainted with Gnostic errors, but afterwards fell into the hands of some monks, and by them was made a strong advocate for the monastic life. He returned to Palestine, and lived there for some time as a monk, having founded a monastery near his native place. In A. D. 367 he was chosen bishop of Constantia, the metropolis of Cyprus, formerly called Salamis. His writings shew him to have been a man of great reading; for he was acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, Egyptian, and Latin. But he was entirely without critical or logical power; of real piety, but also of a very bigoted and dogmatical turn of mind. He distinguished himself by his opposition to heresy, and especially to Origen's errors. He died 402. His most important work is entitled Panarium, being a discourse against heresies. The best edition of his works is by Petavius, Paris, 1622, and Lips. 1682, with a commentary by Valesius.

Epipŏlae. [SYRACUSAE.]

Epīrus (Ἤπειρος: Ἠπειρώτης, fem. Ἠπειρῶτις: Albania), that is, "the mainland," a country in the N. W. of Greece, so called to distinguish it from Corcyra and the other islands off the coast. Homer gives the name of Epirus to the whole of the W. coast of Greece, thus including Acarnania in it. Epirus was bounded by Illyria and Macedonia on the N., by Thessaly on the E., by Acarnania and the Ambracian gulf on the S., and by the Ionian sea on the W. The principal mountains were the Acroceraunii, forming the N. W. boundary, and Pindus, forming the E. boundary; besides which there were the mountains Tomarus in the E., and Crania in the S. The chief rivers were the Celydnus, Thyamis, Acheron, and Arachthus. — The inhabitants of Epirus were numerous, but were not of pure Hellenic blood. The original population appears to have been Pelasgic; and the ancient oracle of Dodona in the country was always regarded as of Pelasgic origin. These Pelasgians were subsequently mingled with Illyrians, who at various times invaded Epirus and settled in the country. Epirus contained 14 different tribes. Of these the most important were the CHAONES, THESPROTI and MOLOSSI, who gave their names to the 3 principal divisions of the country CHAONIA, THESPROTIA, and MOLOSSIS. The different tribes were originally governed by their own princes. The Molossian princes, who traced their descent from Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus), son of Achilles, subsequently acquired the sovereignty over the whole country, and took the title of kings of Epirus. The first who bore this title was Alexander, who invaded Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Lucanians and Bruttii, and perished at the battle of Pandosia, B. C. 326. The most celebrated of the later kings was PYRRHUS, who carried on war with the Romans. About B. C. 200 the Epirots established a republic; and the Romans, after the conquest of Philip, 197, guaranteed its independence. But in consequence of the support which the Epirots afforded to Antiochus and Perseus, Aemilius Paulus received orders from the senate to punish them with the utmost severity. He destroyed 70 of their towns, and sold 150,000 of the inhabitants for slaves. In the time of Augustus the country had not yet recovered from the effects of this devastation.

Epīrus Nova. [ILLYRICUM.]

Epŏna (from epus, that is, equus), a Roman goddess, the protectress of horses. Images of her, either statues or paintings, were frequently seen in niches of stables.

Epŏpeus (Ἐπωπεύς). 1. Son of Poseidon and Canace, came from Thessaly to Sicyon, of which place he became king. He carried away from Thebes the beautiful Antiope, daughter of Nycteus, who therefore made war upon Epopeus. The two kings died of the wounds which they received in the war. — 2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Bacchus, but were changed by the god into dolphins.

Eporēdia (Ivrea), a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the Duria in the territory of the Salassi, colonised by the Romans, B. C. 100, on the command of the Sibylline books, to serve as a bulwark against the neighbouring Alpine tribes.

Eporedŏrix, a chieftain of the Aedui, was one of the commanders of the Aeduan cavalry, which was sent to Caesar's aid against Vercingetorix, in B.C. 52; but he himself revolted soon afterwards and joined the enemy.

Epȳtus, a Trojan, father of Periphas, who was a companion of Iulus, and is called by the patronymic Epytides.

Equester (Ἵππιος), a surname of several divinities, but especially of Poseidon (Neptune), who had created the horse, and in whose honour horse-races were held.

Equus Tūticus or Aequum Tūticum, a small town of the Hirpini in Samnium, 21 miles from Beneventum. The Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 5. 87), supposes, but without sufficient reasons, that it is the town, quod versu dicere non est.

Erae (Ἔραι: Sighajik?), a small but strong seaport town on the coast of Ionia, N. of Teos.

Erăna, a town in M. Amanus, the chief seat of the Eleutherocilices in the time of Cicero.

Erannobŏas (Ἐραννοϐόας: Gunduk), a river of India, one of the chief tributaries of the Ganges, into which it fell at Palimbothra.

Erasinīdes (Ἐρασινίδης), one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Arginusae. He was among the 6 commanders who returned to Athens after the victory, and were put to death, B.C. 406.

Erasīnus (Ἐρασῖνος). 1. (Kephalari), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the lake Stymphalus, then disappears under the earth, rises again out of the mountain Chaon, and after receiving the river Phrixus, flows through the Lernaean marsh into the Argolic gulf.—2. A small river near Brauron in Attica.

Erasistrătus (Ἐρασίστρατος), a celebrated physician and anatomist, was born at Iulis in the island of Ceos. He was a pupil of Chrysippus of Cnidos, Metrodorus, and apparently Theophrastus. He flourished from B. C. 300 to 260. He lived for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, where he acquired great reputation by discovering that the illness of Antiochus, the king's eldest son, was owing to his love for his mother-in-law, Stratonice, the young and beautiful daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, whom Seleucus had lately married. Erasistratus afterwards lived at Alexandria, which was at that time beginning to be a celebrated medical school. He gave up practice in his old age, that he might pursue his anatomical studies without interruption. He prosecuted his experiments in this branch of medical science with great success, and with such ardour that he is said to have dissected criminals alive. He had numerous pupils and followers, and a medical school bearing his name continued to exist at Smyrna in Ionia about the beginning of the Christian era.

Erătīdae (Ἐρατίδαι), an illustrious family of Ialysus in Rhodes, to which Damagetus and his son Diagoras belonged.

Erăto (Ἐρατώ). 1. Wife of Arcas, and mother of Elatus and Aphidas. [ARCAS.]—2. One of the Muses. [MUSAE.]

Eratosthĕnes (Ἐρατοσθένης), of Cyrene, was born B. C. 276. He first studied in his native city and then at Athens. He was taught by Ariston of Chius, the philosopher; Lysanias of Cyrene, the grammarian; and Callimachus, the poet. He left Athens at the invitation of Ptolemy Evergetes, who placed him over the library at Alexandria. Here he continued till the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes. He died at the age of 80, about B. C. 196, of voluntary starvation, having lost his sight, and being tired of life. He was a man of very extensive learning, and wrote on almost all the branches of knowledge then cultivated — astronomy, geometry, geography, philosophy, history, and grammar. He is supposed to have constructed the large armillae or fixed circular instruments which were long in use at Alexandria. His works have perished, with the exception of some fragments. His most celebrated work was a systematic treatise on geography, entitled Γεωγραφικά, in 3 books. The first book, which formed a sort of introduction, contained a critical review of the labours of his predecessors from the earliest to his own times, and investigations concerning the form and nature of the earth, which, according to him, was an immovable globe. The second book contained what is now called mathematical geography. He was the first person who attempted to measure the magnitude of the earth, in which attempt he brought forward and used the method which is employed to the present day. The third book contained political geography, and gave descriptions of the various countries, derived from the works of earlier travellers and geographers. In order to be able to determine the accurate site of each place, he drew a line parallel with the equator, running from the pillars of Hercules to the extreme east of Asia, and dividing the whole of the inhabited earth into two halves. Connected with this work was a new map of the earth, in which towns, mountains, rivers, lakes, and climates were marked according to his own improved measurements. This important work of Eratosthenes forms an epoch in the history of ancient geography. Strabo, as well as other writers, made great use of it. Eratosthenes also wrote 2 poems on astronomical subjects: one entitled Ἑρμῆς or Καταστερισμοί, which treated of the constellations; and another entitled Ἠριγόνη: but the poem Καταστερισμοί, which is still extant under his name, is not the work of Eratosthenes. He wrote several historical works, the most important of which was a chronological work entitled Χρονογραφία, in which he endeavoured to fix the dates of all the important events in literary, as well as political history. The most celebrated of his grammatical works was On the Old Attic Comedy (Περὶ τῆς Ἀρχαίας Κωμῳδίας). The best collection of his fragments is by Bernhardy, Eratosthenica, Berol. 1822.

Erbessus (Ἐρϐησσός), a town in Sicily, N.E. of Agrigentum near the sources of the Acragas, which must not be confounded with the town Herbessus near Syracuse.

Ercta (Εἰρκτή or Εἰρκταί), a fortress in Sicily on a hill with a harbour near Panormus.

Erĕbus (Ἔρεϐος), son of Chaos, begot Aether and Hemera (Day) by Nyx (Night), his sister. The name signifies darkness, and is therefore applied also to the dark and gloomy space under the earth, through which the shades pass into Hades.

Erechthēum. [ERICHTHONIUS.]

Erechtheus. [ERICHTHONIUS.]

Erēsus or Eressus (Ἔρεσος, Ἔρεσσος: Ἐρέσιος), a town on the W. coast of the island of Lesbos, the birthplace of Theophrastus and Phanias, and, according to some, of Sappho.

Eretrĭa (Ἐρέτρια: Ἐρετριεύς: Palaeo-Castro), an ancient and important town in Euboea on the Euripus, with a celebrated harbour Porthmos (Porto Bufalo), was founded by the Athenians, but had a mixed population, among which was a considerable number of Dorians. Its commerce and navy raised it in early times to importance; it contended with Chalcis for the supremacy of Euboea; it ruled over several of the neighbouring islands, and planted colonies in Macedonia and Italy. It was destroyed by the Persians, B.C. 490, and most of its inhabitants were carried away into slavery. Those who were left behind built, at a little distance from the old city, the town of New Eretria, which, however, never became a place of importance.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly near Pharsalus.

Ergīnus (Ἐργῖνος), son of Clymenus, king of Orchomenos. After Clymenus had been killed at Thebes, Erginus, who succeeded him, marched against Thebes, and compelled them to pay him an annual tribute of 100 oxen. The Thebans were released from the payment of this tribute by Hercules, who killed Erginus.

Erichthŏnĭus (Ἐριχθόνιος), or Erechtheus (Ἐρεχθεύς). In the ancient myths these two names indicate the same person; but later writers mention 2 heroes, one of whom is usually called Erichthonius or Erechtheus I. and the other Erechtheus II. Homer knows only one Erechtheus, as an autochthon and king of Athens; and the first writer who distinguishes 2 personages is Plato.—1. Erichthonius or Erechtheus I., son of Hephaestus and Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus. Athena reared the child without the knowledge of the other gods, and entrusted him to Agraulos, Pandrosos, and Herse, concealed in a chest. They were forbidden to open the chest, but they disobeyed the command. Upon opening the chest they saw the child in the form of a serpent, or entwined by a serpent, whereupon they were seized with madness, and threw themselves down the rock of the acropolis, or, according to others, into the sea. When Erichthonius had grown up, he expelled Amphictyon, and became king of Athens. His wife Pasithea bore him a son Pandion. He is said to have introduced the worship of Athena, to have instituted the festival of the Panathenaea, and to have built a temple of Athena on the acropolis. When Athena and Poseidon disputed about the possession of Attica, Erichthonius declared in favour of Athena. He was further the first who used a chariot with 4 horses, for which reason he was placed among the stars as auriga. He was buried in the temple of Athena, and was worshipped as a god after his death. His famous temple, the Erechthēum, stood on the acropolis, and contained 3 separate temples; one of Athena Polias or the protectress of the state, the Erechtheum proper or sanctuary of Erechtheus, and the Pandrosium or sanctuary of Pandrosos.—2. Erechtheus II., grandson of the former, son of Pandion by Zeuxippe, and brother of Butes, Procne, and Philomela. After his father's death, he succeeded him as king of Athens, and was regarded in later times as one of the Attic eponymi. He was married to Praxithea, by whom he became the father of Cecrops, Pandoros, Metion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. In the war between the Eleusinians and Athenians, Eumolpus, the son of Poseidon, was slain; whereupon Poseidon demanded the sacrifice of one of the daughters of Erechtheus. When one was drawn by lot, her 3 sisters resolved to die with her; and Erechtheus himself was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning at the request of Poseidon.

Erichthŏnĭus, son of Dardanus and Batēa, husband of Astyoche or Callirrhoë, and father of Tros or Assaracus. He was the wealthiest of all mortals; 3000 mares grazed in his fields, which were so beautiful, that Boreas fell in love with them. He is mentioned also among the kings of Crete.

Ericinĭum, a town in Thessaly near Gomphi.

Erĭdănus (Ἠρίδανος), a river god, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Zeuxippe. He is called the king of rivers, and on his banks amber was found. In Homer the name does not occur, and the first writer who mentions it is Hesiod. The position which the ancient poets assign to the river Eridanus differed at different times. In later times the Eridanus was supposed to be the same as the Padus, because amber was found at its mouth. Hence the Electrides Insulae or "Amber Islands" are placed at the mouth of the Po, and here Phaethon was supposed to have fallen when struck by the lightning of Zeus. The Latin poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Po. [PADUS.]

Erĭgon (Ἐρίγων), a tributary of the Axius in Macedonia the Agrianus of Herodotus. [AXIUS.]

Erĭgŏnē (Ἠριγόνη). 1. Daughter of Icarius, beloved by Bacchus. For the legend respecting her, see ICARIUS.—2. Daughter of Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, and mother of Penthilus by Orestes. Another legend relates that Orestes wanted to kill her with her mother, but that Artemis removed her to Attica, and there made her her priestess. Others state that Erigone put an end to herself when she heard that Orestes was acquitted by the Areopagus.

Erīnĕus (Ἐρινεός or Ἐρινεόν: Ἐρινεύς, Ἐρινεάτης). 1. A small but ancient town in Doris, belonging to the Tetrapolis. [DORIS.]—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly.

Erinna (Ἤριννα), a Greek poetess, a contemporary and friend of Sappho (about B.C. 612), who died at the age of 19, but left behind her poems which were thought worthy to rank with those of Homer. Her poems were of the epic class: the chief of them was entitled Ἠλακάτη, the Distaff: it consisted of 300 lines, of which only 4 are extant. It was written in a dialect which was a mixture of the Doric and Aeolic, and which was spoken at Rhodes, where, or in the adjacent island of Telos, Erinna was born. She is also called a Lesbian and a Mytilenaean, on account of her residence in Lesbos with Sappho. There are several epigrams upon Erinna, in which her praise is celebrated, and her untimely death is lamented. 3 epigrams in the Greek Anthology are ascribed to her, of which the first has the genuine air of antiquity; but the other two, addressed to Baucis, seem to be a later fabrication.—Eusebius mentions another Erinna, a Greek poetess, contemporary with Demosthenes and Philip of Macedon, B.C. 352; but this statement ought probably to be rejected.

Erīnyes. [EUMENIDES.]

Erĭphus (Ἔριφος), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy.

Erĭphўle (Ἐριφύλη), daughter of Talaus and

Lysimache, and wife of Amphiaraus, whom she betrayed for the sake of the necklace of Harmonia. For details see AMPHIARAUS, ALCMAEON, HARMONIA.

Eris (Ἔρις), the goddess of Discord. Homer describes her as the friend and sister of Ares, and as delighting with him in the tumult of war and the havoc and anguish of the battle-field. According to Hesiod she was a daughter of Night, and the poet describes her as the mother of a variety of allegorical beings, which are the causes or representatives of man's misfortunes. It was Eris who threw the apple into the assembly of the gods, the cause of so much suffering and war. [PARIS.] —Virgil introduces Discordia as a being similar to the Homeric Eris; for Discordia appears in company with Mars, Bellona, and the Furies, and Virgil is evidently imitating Homer.

Erīza (τὰ Ἔριζα: Ἐριζηνός), a city of Caria, on the borders of Lycia and Phrygia, on the river Chaüs (or rather Caüs). The surrounding district was called Asia Erizēna.

Eros (Ἔρος), in Latin, Amor or Cupīdo, the god of Love. In order to understand the ancients properly we must distinguish 3 gods of this name: 1. The Eros of the ancient cosmogonies; 2. The Eros of the philosophers and mysteries, who bears great resemblance to the first; and 3. The Eros whom we meet with in the epigrammatic and erotic poets. Homer does not mention Eros, and Hesiod, the earliest author who speaks of him, describes him as the cosmogonic Eros. First, says Hesiod, there was Chaos, then came Ge, Tartarus, and Eros, the fairest among the gods, who rules over the minds and the council of gods and men. By the philosophers and in the mysteries Eros was regarded as one of the fundamental causes in the formation of the world, inasmuch as he was the uniting power of love, which brought order and harmony among the conflicting elements of which Chaos consisted. The Orphic poets described him as a son of Cronus, or as the first of the gods who sprang from the world's egg; and in Plato's Symposium he is likewise called the oldest of the gods. The Eros of later poets, who gave rise to that notion of the god which is most familiar to us, is one of the youngest of all the gods. The parentage of this Eros is very differently described. He is usually represented as a son of Aphrodite (Venus), but his father is either Ares (Mars), Zeus (Jupiter), or Hermes (Mercury). He was at first represented as a handsome youth; but shortly after the time of Alexander the Great the epigrammatists and erotic poets represented him as a wanton boy, of whom a thousand tricks and cruel sports were related, and from whom neither gods nor men were safe. In this stage Eros has nothing to do with uniting the discordant elements of the universe, or with the higher sympathy or love which binds human kind together; but he is purely the god of sensual love, who bears sway over the inhabitants of Olympus as well as over men and all living creatures. His arms consist of arrows, which he carries in a golden quiver, and of torches which no one can touch with impunity. His arrows are of different power: some are golden, and kindle love in the heart they wound; others are blunt and heavy with lead, and produce aversion to a lover. Eros is further represented with golden wings, and as fluttering about like a bird. His eyes are sometimes covered, so that he acts blindly. He is the usual companion of his mother Aphrodite, and poets and artists represent him moreover as accompanied by such allegorical beings as Pothos, Himeros, Tyche, Peitho, the Charites or Muses. — Anteros, which literally means return-love, is usually represented as the god who punishes those who did not return the love of others: thus he is the avenging Eros, or a deus ultor (Ov. Met. xiii. 750). But in some accounts he is described as a god opposed to Eros and struggling against him. — The number of Erotes (Amores and Cupidines) is playfully extended ad libitum by later poets, and these Erotes are described either as sons of Aphrodite or of nymphs. — Among the places distinguished for the worship of Eros, Thespiae in Boeotia stands foremost: there a quinquennial festival, the Erotidia or Erotia, was celebrated in his honour. In ancient works of art, Eros is represented either as a full-grown youth of the most perfect beauty, or as a wanton and sportive boy. — Respecting the connection between Eros and Psyche, see PSYCHE.

Erotiānus (Ἐρωτιανός), a Greek grammarian or physician in the reign of Nero, wrote a work still extant, entitled Τῶν παρ' Ἱπποκράτει Λέξεων Συναγωγή, Vocum, quae apud Hippocratem sunt, Collectio, which is dedicated to Andromachus, the archiater of the emperor. The best edition is by Franz, Lips. 1780.

Erubrus (Ruber), a small tributary of the Moselle, near Trèves.

Erymanthus (Ἐρύμανθος). 1. A lofty mountain in Arcadia on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis, celebrated in mythology as the haunt of the savage Erymanthian boar destroyed by Hercules. [HERCULES.]—The Arcadian nymph Callisto, who was changed into a she-bear, is called Erymanthis ursa, and her son Arcas Erymanthidis ursae custos. [ARCTOS.]—2. A river in Arcadia, which rises in the above-mentioned mountain, and falls into the Alpheus.

Erymanthus or Etymandrus (Ἐρύμανθος, Ἐτύμανδρος Arrian.: Helmund), a considerable river in the Persian province of Arachosia, rising in M. Paropamisus, and flowing S.W. and W. into the lake called Aria (Zarah). According to other accounts, it lost itself in the sand, or flowed on through Gedrosia into the Indian Ocean.

Erysichthon (Ἐρυσίχθων), that is, "the Tearer up of the Earth." 1. Son of Triopas, cut down trees in a grove sacred to Demeter, for which he was punished by the goddess with fearful hunger. — 2. Son of Cecrops and Agraulos, died without issue in his father's lifetime on his return from Delos, from whence he brought to Athens the ancient image of Ilithyia.

Erythīni (Ἐρυθῖνοι), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Cromna and Amastris. A range of cliffs near it was called by the same name.

Erythrae (Ἐρυθραί: Ἐρυθραῖος). 1. (Nr. Pigadia Ru.), an ancient town in Boeotia, not far from Plataeae and Hysia, and celebrated as the mother city of Erythrae in Asia Minor. — 2. A town of the Locri Ozŏlae, but belonging to the Aetolians, E. of Naupactus. — 3. (Ritri, Ru.), one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia Minor, stood at the bottom of a large bay, on the W. side of the peninsula which lies opposite to Chios. Tradition ascribed its foundation to a mixed colony of Cretans, Lycians, Carians, and Pamphylians, under Erythros the son of Rhadamanthus; and the leader of the Ionians, who afterwards took possession of it, was said to have been Cnopus, the son of Codrus, after whom the city was also called Cnōpōpŏlis (Κνωπούπολις). The little river Aleos (or rather Axus, as it appears on coins) flowed past the city, and the neighbouring sea-port towns of Cyssus or CASYSTES, and Phoenicus, formed its harbours. Erythrae contained a temple of Hercules and Athena Polias, remarkable for its antiquity; and on the coast near the city was a rock called Nigrum Promontorium (ἄκρα μέλαινα), from which excellent mill-stones were hewn.

Erythraeum Mare (ἡ Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, also rarely Ἐρυθραῖος πόντος), was the name applied originally to the whole expanse of sea between Arabia and Africa on the W., and India on the E., including its two great gulfs (the Red Sea and Persian Gulf). In this sense it is used by Herodotus, who also distinguishes the Red Sea by the name of Ἀράβιος κόλπος. [ARABICUS SINUS.] Supposing the shores of Africa and Arabia to trend more and more away from each other the further S. you go, he appears to have called the head of the sea between them ὁ Ἀράβιος κόλπος, and the rest of that sea, as far S. as it extended, and also E.wards to the shores of India, ἡ Ἐρυθρὴ θάλασσα, and also ἡ Νοτίη θάλασσα; though there are, again, some indications of a distinction between these 2 terms, the latter being applied to the whole expanse of ocean S. of the former; in one passage, however, they are most expressly identified (ii. 158). Afterwards, when the true form of these seas became to be better known, through the progress of maritime discovery under the Ptolemies, their parts were distinguished by different names, the main body of the sea being called Indicus Oceanus, the Red Sea Arabicus Sinus, the Persian Gulf Persicus Sinus, and the name Erythraeum Mare being confined by some geographers to the gulf between the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb and the Indian Ocean, but far more generally used as identical with Arabicus Sinus, or the corresponding genuine Latin term, Mare Rubrum (Red Sea). Still, however, even long after the commencement of our era, the name Erythraeum Mare was sometimes used in its ancient sense, as in the Περίπλους τῆς Ἐρυθρᾶς θαλάσσης, ascribed to Arrian, but really the work of a later period, which is a description of the coast from Myos Hormos on the Red Sea to the shores of India. The origin of the name is doubtful, and was disputed by the ancients: it is generally supposed that the Greek Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα is a significant name, identical in meaning with the Latin and English names of the Red Sea; but why red no very satisfactory reason has been given; the Hebrew name signifies the sedgy sea.

Eryx (Ἔρυξ). 1. Also Erўcus Mons (S. Giuliano), a steep and isolated mountain in the N.W. of Sicily near Drepanum. On the summit of this mountain stood an ancient and celebrated temple of Aphrodite (Venus), said to have been built by Eryx, king of the Elymi, or, according to Virgil, by Aeneas, but more probably by the Phoenicians, who introduced the worship of Aphrodite into Sicily. [APHRODITE.] From this temple the goddess bore the surname Erycīna, under which name her worship was introduced at Rome about the beginning of the 2nd Punic war. At present there is standing on the summit of the mountain the remains of a castle, originally built by the Saracens. — 2. The town of this name was on the W. slope of the mountain. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the time of Pyrrhus; was subsequently rebuilt; but was again destroyed by the Carthaginians in the 1st Punic war, and its inhabitants removed to Drepanum.

Esdraēla (Ἐσδραηλά) and Esdraēlon or Esdrēlon, or -om (Ἐσδρηλών or -ώμ), the Greek names for the city and valley of Jezreel in Palestine.

Esquilīae. [ROMA.]

Essŭi, a people in Gaul, W. of the Sequana, probably the same as the people elsewhere called Esubii and Sesuvii.

Estiōnes, a people in Rhaetia Secunda or Vindelicia, whose capital was Campodūnum (Kempten) on the Iller.

Eteocles (Ἐτεοκλῆς.) 1. Son of Andreus and Evippe, or of Cephisus; said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to the Charites at Orchomenos in Boeotia. — 2. A son of Oedipus and Jocaste. After his father's flight from Thebes, he and his brother Polynīces undertook the government of Thebes by turns. But, disputes having arisen between them, Polynices fled to Adrastus, who then brought about the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. [ADRASTUS.] When many of the heroes had fallen, Eteocles and Polynices resolved upon deciding the contest by single combat, and both the brothers fell.

Eteoclus (Ἐτέοκλος), a son of Iphis, was, according to some traditions, one of the 7 heroes who went with Adrastus against Thebes. He had to make the attack upon the Neïtian gate, where he was opposed by Megareus.

Eteōnus (Ἐτεωνός), a town in Boeotia, belonging to the district Parasopia, mentioned by Homer, subsequently called Scarphe.

Etēsīae (Ἐτησίαι, sc. ἄνεμοι), the Etesian Winds, derived from ἔτος "year," signified any periodical winds, but the word was used more particularly by the Greeks to indicate the northerly winds, which blew in the Aegean for 40 days from the rising of the dog star.

Etis or Etīa (Ἦτις, Ἤτεια: Ἤτιος, Ἠτεῖος), a town in the S. of Laconia near Boeae, said to have been founded by Aeneas, and named after his daughter Etias. Its inhabitants were transplanted at an early time to Boeae, and the place disappeared.

Etovissa, a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Etrūrīa or Tuscia, called by the Greeks Tyrrhēnīa or Tyrsēnīa (Τυῤῥηνία, Τυρσηνία), a country in central Italy. The inhabitants were called by the Romans Etrusci or Tusci, by the Greeks Tyrrhēni or Tyrsēni (Τυῤῥηνοί, Τυρσηνοί), and by themselves Rasēna. Etruria was bounded on the N. and N.W. by the Apennines and the river Macra, which divided it from Liguria, on the W. by the Tyrrhene sea or Mare Inferum, on the E. and S. by the river Tiber, which separated it from Umbria and Latium, thus comprehending almost the whole of modern Tuscany, the Duchy of Lucca, and the Transtiberine portion of the Roman states. It was intersected by numerous mountains, offshoots of the Apennines, consisting of long ranges of hills in the N., but in the S. lying in detached masses, and of smaller size. The land was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility, and yielded rich harvests of corn, wine, oil, and flax. The upper part of the country was the most healthy, namely, the part at the foot of the Apennines, near the sources of the Tiber and the Arnus, in the neighbourhood of Arretium, Cortona, and Perusia. The lower part of the country on the coast was marshy and unhealthy, like the Maremma at the present day. — The early history of the population of Etruria has given rise to much discussion in modern times. It is admitted on all hands that the people known to the Romans under the name of Etruscans were not the original inhabitants of the country, but a mixed race. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Ligurians in the N. and Siculians in the S., both of whom were subsequently expelled from the country by the Umbrians. So far most accounts agree; but from this point there is great difference of opinion. The ancients generally believed that a colony of Lydians, led by Tyrsenus, son of the king of Lydia, settled in the country, to which they gave the name of their leader; and it has been maintained by some modern writers that the Oriental character of many of the Etruscan institutions is in favour of this account of their origin. But most modern critics adopt an entirely different opinion. They believe that a Pelasgic race, called Tyrrheni, subdued the Umbrians, and settled in the country, and that these Tyrrhene-Pelasgians were in their turn conquered by a powerful Rhaetian race, called Rasena, who descended from the Alps and the valley of the Po. Hence it was from the union of the Tyrrhene-Pelasgians and the Rasena that the Etruscan nation was formed. It is impossible, however, to come to any definite conclusion respecting the real origin of the Etruscans; since we are entirely ignorant of the language which they spoke; and the language of a people is the only means by which we can pronounce with certainty respecting their origin. But whatever may have been the origin of the Etruscans, we know that they were a very powerful nation when Rome was still in its infancy, and that they had at an early period extended their dominion over the greater part of Italy, from the Alps and the plains of Lombardy on the one hand, to Vesuvius and the gulf of Sarento on the other. These dominions may be divided into 3 great districts: Circumpadane Etruria in the N., Etruria Proper in the centre, and Campanian Etruria in the S. In each of these districts there were 12 principal cities or states, who formed a confederacy for mutual protection. Through the attacks of the Gauls in the N., and of the Sabines, Samnites, and Greeks in the S., the Etruscans became confined within the limits of Etruria Proper, and continued long to flourish in this country, after they had disappeared from the rest of Italy. Of the 12 cities, which formed the confederacy in Etruria Proper, no list is given by the ancients. They were most probably CORTONA, ARRETIUM, CLUSIUM, PERUSIA, VOLATERRAE, VETULONIA, RUSELLAE, VOLSINII, TARQUINII, VALERII, VEII, CAERE more anciently called Agylla. Each state was independent of all the others. The government was a close aristocracy, and was strictly confined to the family of the Lucumones, who united in their own persons the ecclesiastical as well as the civil functions. The people were not only rigidly excluded from all share in the government, but appear to have been in a state of vassalage or serfdom. From the noble and priestly families of the Lucumones a supreme magistrate was chosen, who appears to have been sometimes elected for life, and to have borne the title of king; but his power was much fettered by the noble families. At a later time the kingly dignity was abolished, and the government entrusted to a senate. A meeting of the confederacy of the 12 states was held annually in the spring, at the temple of Voltumna near Volsinii.— The Etruscans were a highly civilised people, and from them the Romans borrowed many of their religious and political institutions. The 3 last kings of Rome were undoubtedly Etruscans, and they left in the city enduring traces of Etruscan power and greatness. The Etruscans paid the greatest attention to religion; and their religious system was closely interwoven with all public and private affairs. The principal deities were divided into 2 classes. The highest class were the "Shrouded Gods," who did not reveal themselves to man, and to whom all the other gods were subject. The 2nd class consisted of the 12 great gods, 6 male and 6 female, called by the Romans Dii Consentes. They formed the council of Tina or Tinia, the Roman Jupiter, and the 2 other most powerful gods of the 12 were Cupra, corresponding to Juno, and Menrva or Menerva, corresponding to the Roman Minerva. Besides these 2 classes of gods, there was a great number of other gods, penates and lares, to whom worship was paid. The mode in which the gods were worshipped was prescribed in certain sacred books, said to have been written by TAGES. These books contained the "Etrusca Disciplina," and gave minute directions respecting the whole of the ceremonial worship. They were studied in the schools of the Lucumones, to which the Romans also were accustomed to send some of their noblest youths for instruction; since it was from the Etruscans that the Romans borrowed most of their arts of divination. — In architecture, statuary, and painting, the Etruscans attained to great eminence. They were acquainted with the use of the arch at an early period, and they employed it in constructing the great cloacae at Rome. Their bronze candelabra were celebrated at Athens even in the time of Pericles; and the beauty of their bronze statues is still attested by the She Wolf of the Capitol and the Orator of the Florence Gallery. The beautiful vases, which have been discovered in such numbers in Etruscan tombs, cannot be cited as proofs of the excellence of Etruscan workmanship, since it is now admitted by the most competent judges, that these vases were either made in Greece, or by Greek artists settled in Italy. — Of the private life of the Etruscans we have a lively picture from the paintings discovered in their tombs; but into this subject our limits forbid us to enter. — The later history of Etruria is a struggle against the rising power of Rome, to which it was finally compelled to yield. After the capture of Veii by the dictator Camillus, B. C. 396, the Romans obtained possession of the E. part of Etruria; and the Ciminian forest, instead of the Tiber, now became the boundary of the 2 people. The defeat of the Etruscans by Q. Fabius Maximus in 310, was a great blow to their power. They still endeavoured to maintain their independence with the assistance of the Samnites and the Gauls; but after their decisive defeat by Cornelius Dolabella in 283, they became the subjects of Rome. In 91 they received the Roman franchise. The numerous military colonies established in Etruria by Sulla and Augustus destroyed to a great extent the national character of the people, and the country thus became in course of time completely Romanized.

Euboea (Εὔβοια: Εὐβοιεύς, Εὐβοεύς, fem. Εὐβοΐς). 1. (Negropont), the largest island of the Aegaean sea, lying along the coasts of Attica, Boeotia, and the S. part of Thessaly, from which countries it is separated by the Euboean sea, called the Euripus in its narrowest part. Euboea is about 90 miles in length: its extreme breadth is 30 miles, but in the narrowest part it is only 4 miles across. Throughout the length of the island runs a lofty range of mountains, which rise in one part as high as 7266 feet above the sea. It contains nevertheless many fertile plains, and was celebrated in antiquity for the excellence of its pasturage and cornfields. According to the ancients it was once united to Boeotia, from which it was separated by an earthquake. In Homer the inhabitants are called Abantes, and are represented as taking part in the expedition against Troy. In the N. of Euboea dwelt the Histiaei, from whom that part of the island was called Histiaea; below these were the Ellopii, who gave the name of Ellopia to the district, extending as far as Aegae and Cerinthus; and in the S. were the Dryopes. The centre of the island was inhabited chiefly by Ionians. It was in this part of Euboea that the Athenians planted the colonies of Chalcis and Eretria, which were the 2 most important cities in the island. After the Persian wars Euboea became subject to the Athenians, who attached much importance to its possession; and consequently Pericles made great exertions to subdue it, when it revolted in B. C. 445. Under the Romans Euboea formed part of the province of Achaia. — Since Cumae in Italy was a colony from Chalcis in Euboea, the adjective Euboicus is used by the poets in reference to the former city. Thus Virgil (Aen. vi. 2) speaks of Euboicis Cumarum oris. — 2. A town in the interior of Sicily, founded by Chalcis in Euboea, but destroyed at an early period.

Eubūlĭdes (Εὐβουλίδης), of Miletus, a philosopher of the Megaric school. He was a contemporary of Aristotle, against whom he wrote with great bitterness; and he is stated to have given Demosthenes instruction in dialectics. He is said to have invented the forms of several of the most celebrated false and captious syllogisms.

Eubūlus (Εὔβουλος). 1. An Athenian, of the demus Anaphlystus, a distinguished orator and statesman, was one of the most formidable opponents of Demosthenes. It was with him that Aeschines served as secretary in the earlier part of his life. — 2. An Athenian, son of Euphranor, of the Cettian demus, a distinguished poet of the middle comedy, flourished B. C. 376. He wrote 104 plays, of which there are extant more than 50 titles. His plays were chiefly on mythological subjects. Several of them contained parodies of passages from the tragic poets, and especially from Euripides.

Euclīdes (Εὐκλείδης). 1. The celebrated mathematician, who has almost given his own name to the science of geometry, in every country in which his writings are studied; but we know next to nothing of his private history. The place of his birth is uncertain. He lived at Alexandria in the time of the first Ptolemy, B. C. 323—283, and was the founder of the Alexandrian mathematical school. He was of the Platonic sect, and well read in its doctrines. It was his answer to Ptolemy, who asked if geometry could not be made easier, that there was no royal road. Of the numerous works attributed to Euclid the following are still extant:—1. Στοιχεῖα, the Elements, in 13 books, with a 14th and 15th added by Hypsicles. 2. Δεδομένα, the Data, containing 100 propositions, with a preface by Marinus of Naples. 3. Εἰσαγωγὴ Ἁρμονική, a Treatise on Music; and 4. Κατατομὴ Κανόνος, the Division of the Scale: one of these works, most likely the former, must be rejected. 5. Φαινόμενα, the Appearances (of the heavens). 6. Ὀπτικά, on Optics; and 7. Κατοπτρικά, on Catoptrics. The only complete edition of all the reputed works of Euclid is that published at Oxford, 1703, folio, by David Gregory, with the title Εὐκλείδου τὰ σωζόμενα. The Elements and the Data were published in Greek, Latin, and French, in 3 vols. 4to. Paris, 1814—16—18, by Peyrard. The most convenient edition for scholars of the Greek text of the Elements is the one by August, Berol. 1826, 8vo. — 2. Of Megara, was one of the chief of the disciples of Socrates, but before becoming such, he had studied the doctrines, and especially the dialectics, of the Eleatics. Socrates on one occasion reproved him for his fondness for subtle and captious disputes. On the death of Socrates (B. C. 399), Euclides took refuge in Megara, and there established a school which distinguished itself chiefly by the cultivation of dialectics. The doctrines of the Eleatics formed the basis of his philosophical system. With these he blended the ethical and dialectical principles of Socrates. He was the author of 6 dialogues, none of which however have come down to us. He has frequently been erroneously confounded with the mathematician of the same name. The school which he founded was called sometimes the Megaric, sometimes the Dialectic or Eristic.

Eucrătĭdes (Εὐκρατίδης), king of Bactria, from about B. C. 181 to 161, was one of the most powerful of the Bactrian kings, and made great conquests in the N. of India.

Euctēmon, the astronomer. [Meton.]

Eudāmĭdas (Εὐδαμίδας). I. King of Sparta, reigned from B. C. 330 to about 300. He was the younger son of Archidamus III. and succeeded his brother Agis III. — II. King of Sparta, was son of Archidamus IV., whom he succeeded, and father of Agis IV.

Eudēmus (Εὔδημος). 1. Of Cyprus, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom Aristotle dedicated the dialogue Εὔδημος ἢ περὶ ψυχῆς, which is lost. — 2. Of Rhodes, also a peripatetic philosopher, and one of the most important of Aristotle's disciples. He edited many of Aristotle's writings; and one of them even bears the name of Eudemus, namely, the Ἠθικὰ Εὐδήμεια, which work was in all probability a recension of Aristotle's lectures edited by Eudemus. [See p. 85, b.] — 3. The physician of Livilla, the wife of Drusus Caesar, who assisted her and Sejanus in poisoning her husband, A. D. 23.

Eudŏcĭa (Εὐδοκία). 1. Originally called Athenais, daughter of the sophist Leontius, was distinguished for her beauty and attainments. She married the emperor Theodosius II., A. D. 421; and on her marriage she embraced Christianity, and received at her baptism the name of Eudocia. She died at Jerusalem, A. D. 460. She wrote several works; and to her is ascribed by some the extant poem Homero-Centones, which is composed of verses from Homer, and relates the history of the fall and of the redemption of man by Jesus Christ; but its genuineness is very doubtful. — 2.

Of Macrembolis, wife of the emperors Constantine XI. Ducas and Romanus IV. Diogenes (A. D. 1059—1071), wrote a dictionary of history and mythology, which she called Ἰωνιά, Violarium, or Bed of Violets. It was printed for the first time by Villoison, in his Anecdota Graeca, Venice, 1781. The sources from which the work was compiled are nearly the same as those used by Suidas.

Eudoses, a people in Germany near the Varini, probably in the modern Mecklenburg.

Eudoxus (Εὔδοξος). 1. Of Cnidus, son of Aeschines, a celebrated astronomer, geometer, physician, and legislator, lived about B. C. 366. He was a pupil of Archytas and Plato, and also went to Egypt, where he studied some time with the priests. He afterwards returned to Athens, but it would appear that he must have spent some time in his native place, for Strabo says that the observatory of Eudoxus at Cnidus was existing in his time. He died at the age of 53. He is said to have been the first who taught in Greece the motions of the planets; and he is also stated to have made separate spheres for the stars, sun, moon, and planets. He wrote various works on astronomy and geometry, which are lost; but the substance of his Φαινόμενα is preserved by Aratus, who turned into verse the prose work by Eudoxus with that title. — 2. An Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, was by birth a Sicilian and the son of Agathocles — 3. Of Cyzicus, a geographer, who went from his native place to Egypt, and was employed by Ptolemy Evergetes and his wife Cleopatra, in voyages to India; but afterwards being robbed of all his property by Ptolemy Lathyrus, he sailed away down the Red Sea, and at last arrived at Gades. He afterwards made attempts to circumnavigate Africa in the opposite direction, but without success. He lived about B. C. 130.

Eugamon (Εὐγάμων), one of the Cyclic poets, was a native of Cyrene, and lived about B. C. 568. His poem (Τηλεγονία) was a continuation of the Odyssey, and formed the conclusion of the epic cycle. It concluded with the death of Ulysses.

Eugănĕi, a people who formerly inhabited Venetia on the Adriatic sea, and were driven towards the Alps and the Lacus Benacus by the Heneti or Veneti. According to some traditions they founded Patavium and Verona, in the neighbourhood of which were the Euganei Colles. They possessed numerous flocks of sheep, the wool of which was celebrated. (Juv. viii. 15.)

Euhēmĕrus (Εὐήμερος), probably a native of Messene in Sicily, lived at the court of Cassander in Macedonia, about B. C. 316. Cassander furnished him with the means to undertake a voyage of discovery. He is said to have sailed down the Red Sea and round the southern coasts of Asia, until he came to an island called Panchaea. After his return he wrote a work entitled Ἱερὰ Ἀναγραφή, or a Sacred History, in 9 books. He gave this title to his work, because he pretended to have derived his information from Ἀναγραφαί, or inscriptions in temples, which he had discovered in his travels, especially in the island of Panchaea. Euhemerus had been trained in the school of the Cyrenaics, who were notorious for their scepticism in matters connected with the popular religion; and the object of his work was to exclude every thing supernatural from the popular religion, and to dress up the myths as so many plain histories. In his work the several gods were represented as having originally been men who had distinguished themselves either as warriors, or benefactors of mankind, and who after their death were worshipped as gods by the grateful people. Zeus, for example, was a king of Crete, who had been a great conqueror; and he asserted that he had seen in the temple of Zeus Triphylius a column with an inscription detailing all the exploits of the kings Uranus, Cronus, and Zeus. The book was written in an attractive style, and became very popular, and many of the subsequent historians, such as Diodorus, adopted his mode of dealing with myths. The great popularity of the work is attested by the circumstance that Ennius made a Latin translation of it. But the pious believers, on the other hand, called Euhemerus an atheist. The Christian writers often refer to him to prove that the pagan mythology was nothing but a heap of fables invented by men.

Eulaeus (Εὐλαῖος: O. T. Ulai: Karoon), a river in Susiana, on the borders of Elymaïs, rising in Great Media, flowing S. through Mesobatene, passing E. of Susa, and, after uniting with the Pasitigris, falling into the head of the Persian Gulf. Some of the ancient geographers make the Eulaeus fall into the Choaspes, and others identify the two rivers.

Eumaeus (Εὔμαιος), the faithful swineherd of Ulysses, was a son of Ctesius, king of the island of Syrie; he had been carried away from his father's house by a Phoenician slave, and Phoenician sailors sold him to Laërtes, the father of ULYSSES.

Eumēlus (Εὔμηλος). 1. Son of Admetus and Alcestis, went with 11 ships from Pherae to Troy. He was distinguished for his excellent horses, which had once been under the care of Apollo, and with which Eumelus would have gained the prize at the funeral games of Patroclus, if his chariot had not been broken. His wife was Iphthima, daughter of Icarius. — 2. Of Corinth, one of the Bacchiadae, an ancient Epic poet, belonged, according to some, to the Epic cycle. His name is significant, referring to his skill in poetry. He flourished about B. C. 760. His principal poem seems to have been his Corinthian History.

Eumĕnes (Εὐμένης). 1. Of CARDIA, served as private secretary to Philip and Alexander, whom he accompanied throughout his expedition in Asia, and who treated him with marked confidence and distinction. After the death of Alexander (B. C. 323) Eumenes obtained the government of Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, which provinces had never yet been conquered by the Macedonians. Eumenes entered into a close alliance with Perdiccas, who subdued these provinces for him. When Perdiccas marched into Egypt against Ptolemy, he committed to Eumenes the conduct of the war against Antipater and Craterus in Asia Minor. Eumenes met with great success; he defeated Neoptolemus, who had revolted from Perdiccas; and subsequently he again defeated the combined armies of Craterus and Neoptolemus: Craterus himself fell, and Neoptolemus was slain by Eumenes with his own hand, after a deadly struggle in the presence of the 2 armies. Meantime the death of Perdiccas in Egypt changed the aspect of affairs. Antigonus now employed the whole force of the Macedonian army to crush Eumenes. The struggle was carried on for some years (320—316). It was conducted by Eumenes with consummate skill; and notwithstanding the numerical inferiority of his forces, he maintained his ground against his enemies, till he was surrendered by the Argyraspids to Antigonus, by whom he was put to death, 316. He was 45 years old at the time of his death. Of his ability, both as a general and a statesman, no doubt can be entertained; and it is probable that he would have attained a far more important position among the successors of Alexander, had it not been for the accidental disadvantage of his birth. But as a Greek of Cardia, and not a native Macedonian, he was constantly looked upon with dislike both by his opponents and companions in arms. — 2. I. King of PERGAMUS, reigned B. C. 263—241; and was the successor of his uncle Philetaerus. He obtained a victory near Sardis over Antiochus Soter, and thus established his dominion over the provinces in the neighbourhood of his capital. — 3. II. King of PERGAMUS, reigned B. C. 197—159; and was the son and successor of Attalus I. He inherited from his predecessor the friendship and alliance of the Romans, which he took the utmost pains to cultivate. He supported the Romans in their war against Antiochus; and after the conquest of the latter (190) he received from the senate Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygias, and Lycaonia, as well as Lysimachia, and the Thracian Chersonese. By this means he was at once raised from a state of comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a powerful monarchy. Subsequently he was involved in war with Pharnaces, king of Pontus, and Prusias, king of Bithynia, but both wars were brought to a close by the interposition of the Romans. At a later period Eumenes was regarded with suspicion by the Roman senate, because he was suspected of having corresponded secretly with Perseus, king of Macedonia, during the war of the latter with the Romans. Eumenes assiduously cultivated all the arts of peace: Pergamus became under his rule a great and flourishing city, which he adorned with splendid buildings, and in which he founded that celebrated library which rose to be a rival even to that of Alexandria.

Eumenīa (Εὐμένεια or Εὐμενία: Ishekli), a city of Great Phrygia, on the rivers Glaucus and Cludrus, N. of the Maeander, named by Attalus II. after his brother and predecessor Eumenes II. There are indications which seem to connect the time of its foundation with that of the destruction of Corinth.

Eumĕnĭdes (Εὐμενίδες), also called Erīnyes, not Erinnyes (Ἐρινύες, Ἐρινῦς), and by the Romans Furiae or Dirae, the Avenging Deities, were originally only a personification of curses pronounced upon a criminal. The name Erinys is the more ancient one; its etymology is uncertain, but the Greeks derived it from ἐρίνω or ἐρευνάω, I hunt up or persecute, or from the Arcadian ἐρινύω, I am angry; so that the Erinyes were either the angry goddesses, or the goddesses who hunt up or search after the criminal. The name Eumenides, which signifies "the well-meaning," or "soothed goddesses," is a mere euphemism, because people dreaded to call these fearful goddesses by their real name. It was said to have been first given them after the acquittal of Orestes by the Areopagus, when the anger of the Erinyes had become soothed. It was by a similar euphemism that at Athens the Erinyes were called σεμναὶ θεαί, or the venerable goddesses. — Homer sometimes mentions an Erinys, but more frequently Erinyes in the plural. He represents them as inhabitants of Erebos, where they remain quiet until some curse pronounced upon a criminal calls them into activity. The crimes which they punish are disobedience towards parents, violation of the respect due to old age, perjury, murder, violation of the law of hospitality, and improper conduct towards suppliants. They took away from men all peace of mind, and led them into misery and misfortune. Hesiod says that they were the daughters of Ge, and sprung from the drops of blood that fell upon her from the body of Uranus. Aeschylus calls them the daughters of Night; and Sophocles of Darkness and Ge. In the Greek tragedians neither the names nor the number of the Erinyes are mentioned. Aeschylus describes them as divinities more ancient than the Olympian gods, dwelling in the deep darkness of Tartarus, dreaded by gods and men; with bodies all black, serpents twined in their hair, and blood dripping from their eyes. Euripides and other later poets describe them as winged. With later writers their number is usually limited to 3, and their names are Tisiphŏne, Alecto, and Megaera. They gradually assumed the character of goddesses who punished men after death, and they seldom appeared upon earth. The sacrifices offered to them consisted of black sheep and nephalia, i. e. a drink of honey mixed with water. They were worshipped at Athens, where they had a sanctuary and a grotto near the Areopagus: their statues, however, had nothing formidable, and a festival Eumenidea was there celebrated in their honour. Another sanctuary, with a grove which no one was allowed to enter, existed at Colonus.

Eumenĭus, a Roman rhetorician of Augustodunum (Autun) in Gaul, held a high office under Constantius Chlorus. He is the author of 4 orations in the "Panegyrici Veteres," namely: 1. Oratio pro instaurandis scholis, a lecture delivered on the re-establishment by Constantius Chlorus of the school at Autun, A. D. 296 or 297. 2. Panegyricus Constantio Caesari dictus, delivered 296 or 297. 3. Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, delivered 310. 4. Gratiarum actio Constantino Augusto Flaviensium nomine, delivered 311.

Eumolpus (Εὔμολπος), that is "the good singer," a Thracian bard, usually represented as a son of Poseidon and Chione, the daughter of Boreas. As soon as he was born, he was thrown into the sea by his mother, who was anxious to conceal her shame, but was preserved by his father Poseidon, who had him educated in Ethiopia by his daughter Benthesicyma. When he had grown up, he married a daughter of Benthesicyma; but as he made an attempt upon the chastity of his wife's sister, he was expelled together with his son Ismarus. They went to the Thracian king Tegyrius, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismarus; but as Eumolpus drew upon himself the suspicion of Tegyrius, he was again obliged to take to flight, and came to Eleusis in Attica, where he formed a friendship with the Eleusinians. After the death of his son Ismarus, he returned to Thrace at the request of Tegyrius. The Eleusinians, who were involved in a war with Athens, called Eumolpus to their assistance. Eumolpus came with a numerous band of Thracians, but he was slain by Erechtheus. Eumolpus was regarded as the founder of the Eleusinian mysteries, and as the first priest of Demeter and Dionysus. He was succeeded in the priestly office by his son Ceryx (who was, according to some accounts, the son of Hermes), and his family, the Eumolpidae, continued till the latest times the priests of Demeter at Eleusis. — The legends connected Eumolpus with Hercules, whom he is said to have instructed in music, or initiated into the mysteries. There were so many different traditions about Eumolpus that some of the ancients supposed that there were 2 or 3 persons of that name.

Eunapĭus (Εὐνάπιος), a Greek sophist, was born at Sardis A. D. 347, and lived and taught at Athens as late as the reign of Theodosius II. He wrote, 1. Lives of Sophists (Βίοι φιλοσόφων καὶ σοφιστῶν), still extant, containing 23 biographies of sophists, most of whom were contemporaries of Eunapius, or had lived shortly before him. Though these biographies are extremely brief, and the style is intolerably inflated, yet they supply us with important information respecting a period, on which we have no other information. Eunapius was an enthusiastic admirer of the philosophy of the New Platonists, and a bitter enemy of Christianity. Edited by Boissonade, Amsterdam, 1822. 2. A continuation of the history of Dexippus (Μετὰ Δέξιππον χρονικὴ ἱστορία), in 14 books, began with A. D. 270, and went down to 404. Of this work we have only extracts, which are published along with Dexippus. [DEXIPPUS.]

Eunēus (Εὔνηος or Εὔνευς), a son of Jason and Hypsipyle in Lemnos, supplied the Greeks with wine during their war against Troy. He purchased Lycaon of Patroclus for a silver urn.

Eunŏmĭa. [HORAE.]

Eunŏmus (Εὔνομος), king of Sparta, is described by some as the father of Lycurgus and Polydectes. Herodotus, on the contrary, places him in his list after Polydectes. In all probability, the name was invented with reference to the Lycurgean Εὐνομία, and Eunomus, if not wholly rejected, must be identified with Polydectes.

Eunus (Εὔνους), a Sicilian slave, and a native of Apamea in Syria, was the leader of the Sicilian slaves in the servile war. He first attracted attention by pretending to the gift of prophecy, and by interpreting dreams; to the effect of which he added by appearing to breathe flames from his mouth and other similar juggleries. He was proclaimed king, and soon collected formidable forces, with which he defeated several Roman armies. The insurrection now became so formidable that for 3 successive years (B. C. 134—132) 3 consuls were sent against the insurgents, and it was not till the 3rd year (132) that the revolt was finally put down by the consul Rupilius. Eunus was taken prisoner, and died in prison at Morgantia, of the disease called morbus pedicularis.

Eupălĭum or Eupŏlĭum (Εὐπάλιον, Εὐπόλιον: Εὐπαλιεύς), a town of the Locri Ozolae, N. of Naupactus, subsequently included in Aetolia Epictetus.

Eupător (Εὐπάτωρ), a surname assumed by many of the kings in Asia after the time of Alexander the Great. See ANTIOCHUS, MITHRIDATES.

Eupatŏrĭum or Eupatŏrĭa (Εὐπατόριον, Εὐπατορία) a town in the Chersonesus Taurica, founded by Mithridates Eupator, and named after him.

Euphāes (Εὐφάης), king of the Messenians, fell in battle against the Spartans in the first Messenian war. He was succeeded by ARISTODEMUS.

Euphēmus (Εὔφημος), son of Poseidon by Europe, the daughter of Tityus, or by Mecionice or Oris, a daughter of Orion or Eurotas. According to one account he was an inhabitant of Panopeus on the Cephissus in Phocis, and according to another of Hyria in Boeotia, and afterwards lived at Taenarus. He was married to Laonome, the sister of Hercules; he was one of the Calydonian hunters, and the helmsman of the vessel of the Argonauts, and, by a power which his father had granted to him, he could walk on the sea just as on firm ground. He is mentioned also as the ancestor of Battus, the founder of Cyrene.

Euphorbus (Εὔφορβος). 1. Son of Panthous, one of the bravest of the Trojans, was slain by Menelaus, who subsequently dedicated the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Hera, near Mycenae. Pythagoras asserted that he had once been the Trojan Euphorbus, and in proof of his assertion took down at first sight the shield of Euphorbus from the temple of Hera (clipeo Trojana refixo tempora testatus, Hor. Carm. i. 28. 11).—2. Physician of Juba II., king of Mauretania, about the end of the first century B. C., and brother to Antonius Musa, the physician to Augustus.

Euphŏrĭon (Εὐφορίων). 1. Father of the poet Aeschylus.—2. Son of Aeschylus, and himself a tragic poet.—3. Of Chalcis in Euboea, an eminent grammarian and poet, son of Polymnetus, was born about B. C. 274. He became the librarian of Antiochus the Great, 221, and died in Syria, either at Apamea, or at Antioch. The following were the most important of the poems of Euphorion in heroic verse: — 1. Ἡσίοδος, probably an agricultural poem. 2. Μοψοπία, so called from an old name of Attica, the legends of which country seem to have been the chief subject of the poem. 3. Χιλιάδες, a poem written against certain persons, who had defrauded Euphorion of money which he had entrusted to their care. It probably derived its title from each of its books consisting of 1000 verses. He also wrote epigrams, which were imitated by many of the Latin poets, and also by the emperor Tiberius, with whom he was a great favourite. Euphorion likewise wrote many historical and grammatical works. All his works are lost, but the fragments are collected by Meineke, in his Analecta Alexandrina, Berol. 1843.

Euphrānor (Εὐφράνωρ), a distinguished statuary and painter, was a native of the Corinthian isthmus, but practised his art at Athens. He flourished about B. C. 336. His most celebrated statue was a Paris, which expressed alike the judge of the goddesses, the lover of Helen, and the slayer of Achilles; the very beautiful sitting figure of Paris, in marble, in the Museo Pio-Clementino is, no doubt, a copy of this work. His best paintings were preserved in a porch in the Ceramicus at Athens. On the one side were the 12 gods; and on the opposite wall, Theseus, with Democracy and Demos. —Euphranor also wrote works on proportion and on colours (de Symmetria et Coloribus), the two points in which his own excellence seems chiefly to have consisted. Pliny says that he was the first who properly expressed the dignity of heroes, by the proportions he gave to their statues. He made the bodies somewhat more slender, and the heads and limbs larger.

Euphrātes (Εὐφράτης), an eminent Stoic philosopher, was a native of Tyre, or, according to others, of Byzantium. He was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny. In his old age he became tired of life, and asked and obtained from Hadrian permission to put an end to himself by poison.

Euphrātes (Εὐφράτης: O. T. Phrat: El-Frat), a great river of W. Asia, forming the boundary of Upper and Lower Asia, consists, in its upper course, of 2 branches, both of which rise in the mountains of Armenia. The N. branch (Kara-Sou), which is the true Euphrates, rises in the mountain above Erzeroum (the M. Abus or Capotes of the ancients) and flows W. and S.W. to a little above lat. 39° and E. of long. 39°, where it breaks through the chain of the Anti-Taurus, and, after receiving the S. branch (Mourad-Chai), or, as the ancients called it, the ARSANIAS, it breaks through the main chain of the Taurus between Melitene and Samosata, and then flows in a general S. direction, till it reaches lat. 36°, whence it flows in a general S.E. direction, till it approaches the Tigris opposite to Seleucia, where the distance between the 2 rivers was reckoned at only 200 stadia. Then it flows through the plain of Babylonia, at first receding further from the Tigris, and afterwards approaching it again, till it joins it about 60 miles above the mouth of the Persian Gulf, having already had its waters much diminished by numerous canals, which irrigated the country in ancient times, but the neglect of which at present has converted much of the once fertile district watered by the Euphrates into a marshy desert. The whole length of the Euphrates is between 500 and 600 miles. In its upper course, before reaching the Taurus, its N. branch and a part of the united stream divided Armenia Major from Colchis and Armenia Minor, and its lower course divided Mesopotamia from Syria. Its chief tributary, besides the Arsanias, was the Aborrhas.

Euphron (Εὔφρων), an Athenian poet of the new comedy, whose plays, however, partook largely of the character of the middle comedy.

Euphrŏsўnē, one of the Charites or Graces. [CHARIS.]

Eupŏlis (Εὔπολις), son of Sosipolis, an Athenian poet of the old comedy, and one of the 3 who are distinguished by Horace, in his well-known line, "Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque poetae," above all the . . . "alii quorum prisca comoedia virorum est." He was born about B. C. 446, and is said to have exhibited his first drama in his 17th year, 429, two years before Aristophanes. The date of his death is uncertain. The common story was, that Alcibiades, when sailing to Sicily (415), threw Eupolis into the sea, in revenge for an attack which he had made upon him in his Βάπται; but this cannot be true, as we know that Eupolis produced plays after the Sicilian expedition. He probably died in 411. The chief characteristic of the poetry of Eupolis seems to have been the liveliness of his fancy, and the power which he possessed of imparting its images to the audience. In elegance he is said to have even surpassed Aristophanes, while in bitter jesting and personal abuse he emulated Cratinus. Among the objects of his satire was Socrates, on whom he made a bitter, though less elaborate attack than that in the Clouds of Aristophanes. The dead were not exempt from his abuse, for there are still extant some lines of his, in which Cimon is most unmercifully treated.—A close relation subsisted between Eupolis and Aristophanes, not only as rivals, but as imitators of each other. Cratinus attacked Aristophanes for borrowing from Eupolis, and Eupolis in his Βάπται made the same charge, especially with reference to the Knights. The Scholiasts specify the last Parabasis of the Knights as borrowed from Eupolis. On the other hand, Aristophanes, in the second (or third) edition of the Clouds, retorts upon Eupolis the charge of imitating the Knights in his Maricas, and taunts him with the further indignity of jesting on his rival's baldness.

Eupompus (Εὔπομπος), of Sicyon, a distinguished Greek painter, was the contemporary of Zeuxis, Parrhasius, and Timanthes, and the instructor of Pamphilus, the master of Apelles. The fame of Eupompus led to the creation of a 3rd school of Greek art, the Sicyonian, at the head of which he was placed.

Eurīpĭdes (Εὐριπίδης). 1. The distinguished tragic poet, was the son of Mnesarchus and Clito, and is said to have been born at Salamis, B. C. 480, on the very day that the Greeks defeated the Persians off that island, whither his parents had fled from Athens on the invasion of Xerxes. Some writers relate that his parents were in mean circumstances, and his mother is represented by Aristophanes as a herb-seller, and not a very honest one either; but much weight cannot be accorded to these statements. It is more probable that his family was respectable. We are told that the poet, when a boy, was cup-bearer to a chorus of noble Athenians at the Thargelian festival,—an office for which nobility of blood was requisite. We know also that he was taught rhetoric by Prodicus, who was certainly not moderate in his terms for instruction, and who was in the habit of seeking his pupils among youths of high rank. It is said that the future distinction of Euripides was predicted by an oracle, promising that he should be crowned with "sacred garlands," in consequence of which his father had him trained to gymnastic exercises; and we learn that, while yet a boy, he won the prize at the Eleusinian and Thesean contests, and offered himself, when 17 years old, as a candidate at the Olympic games, but was not admitted because of some doubt about his age. But he soon abandoned gymnastic pursuits, and studied the art of painting, not, as we learn, without success. To philosophy and literature he devoted himself with much interest and energy, studying physics under Anaxagoras, and rhetoric, as we have already seen, under Prodicus. He lived on intimate terms with Socrates, and traces of the teaching of Anaxagoras have been remarked in many passages of his plays. He is said to have written a tragedy at the age of 18; but the first play, which was exhibited in his own name, was the Peliades, when he was 25 years of age (B. C. 455). In 441 he gained for the first time the first prize, and he continued to exhibit plays until 408, the date of the Orestes. Soon after this he left Athens for the court of Archelaüs, king of Macedonia, his reasons for which step can only be matter of conjecture. Traditionary scandal has ascribed it to his disgust at the intrigue of his wife with Cephisophon, and the ridicule which was showered upon him in consequence by the comic poets. But the whole story has been refuted by modern writers. Other causes more probably led him to accept an invitation from Archelaüs, at whose court the highest honours awaited him. The attacks of Aristophanes and others had probably not been without their effect; and he must have been aware that his philosophical tenets were regarded with considerable suspicion. He died in Macedonia in 406, at the age of 75. Most testimonies agree in stating that he was torn in pieces by the king's dogs, which, according to some, were set upon him through envy by Arrhidaeus and Crateuas, two rival poets. The regret of Sophocles for his death is said to have been so great, that at the representation of his next play he made his actors appear uncrowned. The accounts which we find in some writers of the profligacy of Euripides are mere idle scandal, and scarcely worthy of serious refutation. Nor does there appear to be any better foundation for that other charge which has been brought against him, of hatred to the female sex. This is said to have been occasioned by the infidelity of his wife; but, as has been already remarked, this tale does not deserve credit. He was a man of a serious and austere temper: and it was in consequence of this that the charge probably originated. It is certain that the poet who drew such characters as Antigone, Iphigenia, and, above all, Alcestis, was not blind to the gentleness, the strong affection, the self-abandoning devotedness of women. With respect to the world and the Deity, he seems to have adopted the doctrines of Anaxagoras, not unmixed apparently with pantheistic views. [ANAXAGORAS.] To class him with atheists, as some have done, is undoubtedly unjust. At the same time, it must be confessed that we look in vain in his plays for the high faith of Aeschylus; nor can we fail to admit that the pupil of Anaxagoras could not sympathise with the popular religious system around him, nor throw himself cordially into it. He frequently altered in the most arbitrary manner the ancient legends. Thus, in the Orestes, Menelaüs comes before us as a selfish coward, and Helen as a worthless wanton; in the Helena, the notion of Stesichorus is adopted, that the heroine was never carried to Troy at all, and that it was a mere εἴδωλον of her for which the Greeks and Trojans fought; Andromache, the widow of Hector and slave of Neoptolemus, seems almost to forget the past in her quarrel with Hermione and the perils of her present situation; and Electra, married by the policy of Aegisthus to a peasant, scolds her husband for inviting guests to dine without regard to the ill-prepared state of the larder. In short, with Euripides tragedy is brought down into the sphere of every-day life; men are represented, according to the remark of Aristotle, not as they ought to be, but as they are; under the names of the ancient heroes, the characters of his own time are set before us; it is not Medea, or Iphigenia, or Alcestis that is speaking, but abstractedly a mother, a daughter, or a wife. All this, indeed, gave fuller scope, perhaps, for the exhibition of passion and for those scenes of tenderness and pathos in which Euripides especially excelled; and it will serve also to account in great measure for the preference given to his plays by the practical Socrates, who is said to have never entered the theatre unless when they were acted, as well as for the admiration felt for him by Menander and Philemon, and other poets of the new comedy. The most serious defects in his tragedies, artistically speaking, are: his constant employment of the "Deus ex machina;" the disconnexion of his choral odes from the subject of the play; the extremely awkward and formal character of his prologues; and the frequent introduction of frigid γνῶμαι and of philosophical disquisitions, making Medea talk like a sophist, and Hecuba like a free thinker, and aiming rather at subtilty than simplicity. On the same principles on which he brought his subjects and characters to the level of common life, he adopted also in his style the every-day mode of speaking. According to some accounts, he wrote, in all, 75 plays; according to others, 92. Of these, 18 are extant, if we omit the Rhesus, which is probably spurious. A list is subjoined of the extant plays of Euripides, with their dates, ascertained or probable:—Alcestis, B. C. 438. This play was brought out as the last of a tetralogy, and stood therefore in the place of a satyric drama, to which indeed it bears, in some parts, great similarity, particularly in the representation of Hercules in his cups. Medea, 431. Hippolytus Coronifer, 428, gained the first prize. Hecuba, exhibited before 423. Heraclidae, about 421. Supplices, about 421. Ion, of uncertain date. Hercules Furens, of uncertain date. Andromache, about 420—417. Troades, 415. Electra, about 415—413. Helena, 412. Iphigenia at Tauri of uncertain date. Orestes, 408. Phoenissae, of uncertain date. Bacchae: this play was apparently written for representation at Macedonia, and therefore at a very late period of the life of Euripides. Iphigenia at Aulis: this play, together with the Bacchae and the Alcmaeon, was brought out at Athens, after the poet's death, by the younger Euripides. Cyclops, of uncertain date: it is interesting as the only extant specimen of the Greek satyric drama. Besides the plays, there are extant 5 letters, purporting to have been written by Euripides, but they are spurious.—Editions. By Musgrave, Oxford, 1778; by Beck, Leipzig, 1778—88; by Matthiae, Leipzig, 1813—29; and a variorum edition, Glasgow, 1821. Of separate plays there have been many editions, e. g. by Porson, Elmsley, Valckenaer, Monk, Pflugk, and Hermann. — 2. The youngest of the 3 sons of the above. After the death of his father he brought out 3 of his plays at the great Dionysia, viz. the Alcmaeon (no longer extant), the Iphigenia at Aulis, and the Bacchae.

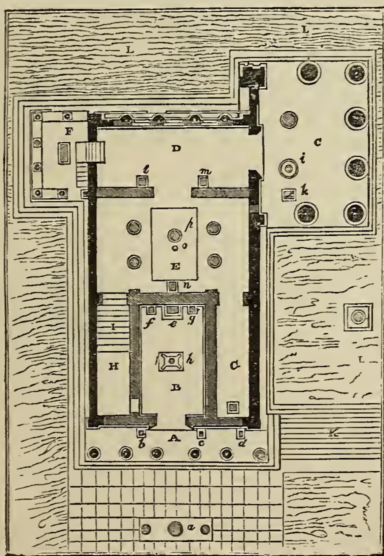
Eurīpus (Εὔριπος), any part of the sea where the ebb and flow of the tide were remarkably violent, is the name especially of the narrow strait which separates Euboea from Boeotia, in which the ancients asserted that the sea ebbed and flowed 7 times in the day. The extraordinary tides of the Euripus have been noticed by modern observers: the water sometimes runs as much as 8 miles an hour. At Chalcis there was a bridge over the Euripus, uniting Euboea with the mainland.

Eurōmus (Εὔρωμος: Jaklys), a small town of Caria, at the foot of Mt. Grion (a ridge parallel to Mt. Latmus), in the conventus juridicus of Alabanda. It lay 8 English miles N.W. of Mylasa.

Eurōpa (Εὐρώπη), according to the Iliad (xiv. 321), a daughter of Phoenix, but according to the common tradition a daughter of the Phoenician king Agenor. Her surpassing beauty charmed Zeus, who assumed the form of a bull and mingled with the herd as Europa and her maidens were sporting on the sea-shore. Encouraged by the tameness of the animal, Europa ventured to mount his back; whereupon Zeus rushed into the sea, and swam with her in safety to Crete. Here she became by Zeus the mother of Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpēdon. She afterwards married Asterion, king of Crete, who brought up the children whom she had had by the king of the gods.



Eurōpa (Εὐρώπη), one of the 3 divisions of the ancient world. The name is not found in the Iliad and Odyssey, and first occurs in the Homeric Hymn to Apollo (251), but even there it does not indicate the continent, but simply the mainland of Hellas proper, in opposition to Peloponnesus and the neighbouring islands. Herodotus is the first writer who uses it in the sense of one of the divisions of the world. The origin of the name is doubtful; but the most probable of the numerous conjectures is that which supposes that the Asiatic Greeks called it Europa (from εὐρύς, "broad," and the root ὀπ, "to see"), from the wide extent of its coast. Most of the ancients supposed the name to be derived from Europa, the daughter of Agenor. The boundaries of Europe on the E. differed at various periods. In earlier times the river Phasis was usually supposed to be its boundary, and sometimes even the Araxes and the Caspian sea; but at a later period the river Tanais and the Palus Maeotis were usually regarded as the boundaries between Asia and Europe. The N. of Europe was little known to the ancients, but it was generally believed, at least in later times, that it was bounded on the N. by the Ocean.

Eurōpus. [Titaresius.]

Eurōpus (Εὔρωπος). 1. A city of Caria, afterwards named Idrias. — 2. (Yerabolus, or Kulat-el-Nejin?), a city in the district of Cyrrhestice in Syria, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, a few miles S. of Zeugma; called after the town of the same name in Macedonia. — 3. Europus was the earlier name of Dura Nicanoris in Mesopotamia; and (4) it was also given by Seleucus Nicator to Rhagae in Media. [Arsacia.]

Eurōtas (Εὐρώτας). 1. (Basilipotamo), the chief river in Laconia, but not navigable, rises in Mt. Borēum in Arcadia, then disappears under the earth, rises again near Sciritis, and flows S.wards, passing Sparta on the E., through a narrow and fruitful valley, into the Laconian gulf. — 2. See Titaresius.

Eurўalus (Εὐρύαλος). 1. Son of Mecisteus, one of the Argonauts, and of the Epigoni, accompanied Diomedes to Troy, where he slew several Trojans. — 2. One of the suitors of Hippodamīa.

Euryanassa. [Pelops.]

Eurўbātes (Εὐρυβάτης). 1. Called Eribotes by Latin writers, son of Teleon, and one of the Argonauts. — 2. The herald of Ulysses, whom he followed to Troy.

Eurўbātus (Εὐρύβατος), an Ephesian, whom Croesus sent with a large sum of money to the Peloponnesus to hire mercenaries for him in his war with Cyrus. He, however, went over to Cyrus, and betrayed the whole matter to him. In consequence of this treachery, his name passed into a proverb amongst the Greeks.

Eurўbīa (Εὐρυβία), daughter of Pontus and Ge, mother by Crius of Astraeus, Pallas, and Perses.

Eurybīădes. [Themistocles.]

Euryclēa (Εὐρύκλεια), daughter of Ops, was purchased by Laërtes and brought up Telemachus. When Ulysses returned home, she recognised him by a scar, and afterwards faithfully assisted him against the suitors.

Eurўdĭcē (Εὐρυδίκη). 1. Wife of Orpheus [Orpheus.]. — 2. An Illyrian princess, wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of the famous Philip. — 3. An Illyrian, wife of Philip of Macedon, and mother of Cynane or Cynna. — 4. Daughter of Amyntas, son of Perdiccas III., king of Macedonia, and Cynane, daughter of Philip. After the death of her mother in Asia [Cynane], Perdiccas gave her in marriage to the king Arrhidaeus. She was a woman of a masculine spirit, and entirely ruled her weak husband. On her return to Europe with her husband, she became involved in war with Polysperchon and Olympias, but she was defeated in battle, taken prisoner, and compelled by Olympias to put an end to her life, B.C. 317. — 5. Daughter of Antipater, and wife of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. She was the mother of 3 sons, viz. Ptolemy Ceraunus, Meleager, and a third (whose name is not mentioned); and of 2 daughters, Ptolemaïs, afterwards married to Demetrius Poliorcetes, and Lysandra, the wife of Agathocles, son of Lysimachus. — 6. An Athenian, of a family descended from the great Miltiades. She was first married to Ophellas, the conqueror of Cyrene, and after his death returned to Athens, where she married Demetrius Poliorcetes, on occasion of his first visit to that city.

Eurўlŏchus (Εὐρύλοχος). 1. Companion of Ulysses in his wanderings, was the only one that escaped from the house of Circe, when his friends were metamorphosed into swine. Another personage of the same name is mentioned among the sons of Aegyptus. — 2. A Spartan commander, in the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 426, defeated and slain by Demosthenes at Olpae.

Eurўmĕdon (Εὐρυμέδων). 1. One of the Cabīri, son of Hephaestus and Cabiro, and brother of Alcon. — 2. An attendant of Nestor. — 3. Son of Ptolemaeus, and charioteer of Agamemnon. — 4. Son of Thucles, an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders in the expedition to Corcyra, B. C. 428, and also in the expedition to Sicily, 425. In 414, he was appointed, in conjunction with Demosthenes, to the command of the second Syracusan armament, and fell in the first of the two sea-fights in the harbour of Syracuse.

Eurўmĕdon (Εὐρυμέδων: Kapri-Su), a small river in Pamphylia, navigable as far up as the city of Aspendus, through which it flowed; celebrated for the victory which Cimon gained over the Persians on its banks (B. C. 469).

Eurўmĕnae (Εὐρυμεναί), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, E. of Ossa.

Eurўnŏmē (Εὐρυνόμη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus. When Hephaestus was expelled by Hera from Olympus, Eurynome and Thetis received him in the bosom of the sea. Before the time of Cronos and Rhea, Eurynome and Ophion had ruled in Olympus over the Titans. — 2. A surname of Artemis at Phigalea in Arcadia, where she was represented half woman and half fish.

Eurўphon (Εὐρυφῶν), a celebrated physician of Cnidos in Caria, was a contemporary of Hippocrates, but older. He is quoted by Galen, who says that he was considered to be the author of the ancient medical work entitled Κνίδιαι Γνῶμαι, and also that some persons attributed to him several works included in the Hippocratic Collection.

Eurypon, otherwise called Eurўtīon (Εὐρυπῶν, Εὐρυτίων), grandson of Procles, was the third king of that house at Sparta, and thenceforward gave it the name of Eurypontidae.

Eurўpўlus (Εὐρύπυλος). 1. Son of Euaemon and Ops, appears in different traditions as king either of Ormenion, or Hyria, or Cyrene. In the Iliad he is represented as having come from Ormenion to Troy with 40 ships. He slew many Trojans, and when wounded by Paris, he was nursed and cured by Patroclus. Among the heroes of Hyria, he is mentioned as a son of Poseidon and Celaeno, who went to Libya where he ruled in the country afterwards called Cyrene, and there became connected with the Argonauts. He married Sterope, the daughter of Helios, by whom he became the father of Lycaon and Leucippus. — 2. Son of Poseidon and Astypalaea, king of Cos, was killed by Hercules who on his return from Troy landed in Cos, and being taken for a pirate, was attacked by its inhabitants. According to another tradition Hercules attacked the island of Cos, in order to obtain possession of Chalciope, the daughter of Eurypylus, whom he loved. — 3. Son of Telephus and Astyoche, king of Mysia or Cilicia, was induced by the presents which Priam sent to his mother or wife, to assist the Trojans against the Greeks. Eurypylus killed Machaon, but was himself slain by Neoptolemus.

Eurўsăces (Εὐρυσάκης), son of the Telamonian Ajax and Tecmessa, named after the "broad shield" of his father. An Athenian tradition related, that Eurysaces and his brother Philaeus had given up to the Athenians the island of Salamis, which they had inherited from their grandfather, and that the 2 brothers received in return the Attic franchise. Eurysaces was honoured like his father, at Athens, with an altar.

Eurysthĕnes (Εὐρυσθένης), and Procles (Προκλῆς), the twin sons of Aristodemus, were born, according to the common account before, but, according to the genuine Spartan story, after their father's return to Peloponnesus and occupation of his allotment of Laconia. He died immediately after the birth of his children, and had not even time to decide which of the 2 should succeed him. The mother professed to be unable to name the elder, and the Lacedaemonians applied to Delphi, and were instructed to make them both kings, but give the greater honour to the elder. The difficulty thus remaining was at last removed at the suggestion of Panites, a Messenian, by watching which of the children was first washed and fed by the mother; and the first rank was accordingly given to Eurysthenes and retained by his descendants. From these 2 brothers, the 2 royal families in Sparta were descended, and were called respectively the Eurysthenidae and Proclidae. The former were also called the Agidae from Agis, son of Eurysthenes; and the latter Eurypontidae from Eurypon, grandson of Procles.

Eurystheus. [Hercules.]

Eurўtus (Εὔρυτος). 1. Son of Melaneus and Stratonice, was king of Oechalia, probably the Thessalian town of this name. He was a skilful archer and married to Antioche, by whom he became the father of Iole, Iphitus, Molion or Deïon, Clytius, and Toxeus. He was proud of his skill in using the bow, and is said to have instructed even Hercules in his art. He offered his daughter Iole as a prize to him who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Hercules won the prize, but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give up Iole, because they feared lest Hercules should kill the children he might have by her. Hercules accordingly marched against Oechalia with an army, took the place and killed Eurytus and his sons. According to Homer, on the other hand, Eurytus was killed by Apollo whom he presumed to rival in using the bow. (Od. viii. 226.) — 2. Son of Actor and Molione of Elis. [Moliones.] — 3. Son of Hermes and Antianīra, and brother of Echion, was one of the Argonauts. — 4. An eminent Pythagorean philosopher, a disciple of Philolaus.

Eusĕbĭus (Εὐσέβιος), surnamed Pamphili to commemorate his devoted friendship for Pamphilus, bishop of Caesarea. Eusebius was born in Palestine about A. D. 264, was made bishop of Caesarea 315, and died about 340. He had a strong leaning towards the Arians, though he signed the creed of the council of Nicaea. He was a man of great learning. His most important works are:—1. The Chronicon (χρονικὰ παντοδαπῆς ἱστορίας), a work of great value to us in the study of ancient history. It is in 2 books. The first, entitled χρονογραφία, contains a sketch of the history of several ancient nations, as the Chaldaeans, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Lydians, Hebrews, and Egyptians. It is chiefly taken from the work of Africanus [Africanus], and gives lists of kings and other magistrates, with short accounts of remarkable events from the creation to the time of Eusebius. The second book consists of synchronological tables, with similar catalogues of rulers and striking occurrences, from the time of Abraham to the celebration of Constantine's Vicennalia at Nicomedia, A. D. 327, and at Rome, A. D. 328. The Greek text of the Chronicon is lost, but there is extant part of a Latin translation of it by Jerome, published by Scaliger, Leyden, 1606, of which another enlarged edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1658. There is also extant an Armenian translation, which was discovered at Constantinople, and published by Mai and Zohrab at Milan, 1818, and by Aucher, Venice, 1818.—2. The Praeparatio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικῆς ἀποδείξεως προπαρασκευή) in 15 books, is a collection of various facts and quotations from old writers, by which it was supposed that the mind would be prepared to receive the evidences of Christianity. This book is almost as important to us in the study of ancient philosophy, as the Chronicon is with reference to history, since in it are preserved specimens from the writings of almost every philosopher of any note whose works are not now extant. Edited by R. Stephens, Paris, 1544, and again in 1628, and by F. Viger, Cologne, 1688. — 3. The Demonstratio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικὴ ἀπόδειξις) in 20 books, of which 10 are extant, is a collection of evidences, chiefly from the Old Testament, addressed principally to the Jews. This is the completion of the preceding work, giving the arguments which the Praeparatio was intended to make the mind ready to receive. Edited with the Praeparatio in the editions both of R. Stephens and Viger. — 4. The Ecclesiastical History (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία), in 10 books, containing the history of Christianity from the birth of Christ to the death of Licinius, A. D. 324. Edited with the other Ecclesiastical historians by Reading, Cambridge, 1720, and separately by Burton, Oxford, 1838. — 5. De Martyribus Palaestinae, being an account of the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximin from A. D. 303 to 310. It is in one book, and generally found as an appendix to the eighth of the Ecclesiastical History.—6. Against Hierocles. Hierocles had advised Diocletian to begin his persecution, and had written 2 books, called λόγοι φιλαληθεῖς, comparing our Lord's miracles to those of Apollonius of Tyana. In answering this work, Eusebius reviews the life of Apollonius by Philostratus. It is published with the works of Philostratus. — 7. Against Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, in 2 books.

8. De Ecclesiastica Theologia, a continuation of the former work. — 9. De Vita Constantini, 4 books, a panegyric rather than a biography. It has generally been published with the Ecclesiastical History, but edited separately by Heinichen, 1830. — 10. Onomasticon de Locis Hebraicis, a description of the towns and places mentioned in Holy Scripture, arranged in alphabetical order. It was translated into Latin by Jerome.

Eustathĭus (Εὐστάθιος). 1. Of Cappadocia, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, was a pupil of Iamblichus and Aedesius. In A. D. 358, he was sent by Constantius as ambassador to king Sapor, and remained in Persia, where he was treated with the greatest honour. — 2. Or Eumathius, probably lived as late as the twelfth century of our era. He wrote a Greek romance in 11 books, still extant, containing an account of the loves of Hysminias and Hysmine. The tale is wearisome and improbable, and shows no power of invention on the part of its author. Edited by Gaulmin, Paris, 1617, and by Teucher, Lips. 1792. — 3. Archbishop of Thessalonica, was a native of Constantinople, and lived during the latter half of the twelfth century. He was a man of great learning and wrote numerous works, the most important of which is his commentary on the Iliad and Odyssey (Παρεκβολαὶ εἰς τὴν Ὁμήρου Ἰλιάδα καὶ Ὀδυσσείαν), or rather his collection of extracts from earlier commentators on those two poems. This vast compilation was made from the numerous and extensive works of the Alexandrian grammarians and critics; and as nearly all the works from which Eustathius made his extracts are lost, his commentary is of incalculable value to us. Editions: At Rome, 1542—1550, 4 vols. fol.; at Basle, 1559-60; at Leipzig, 1825-26, containing the commentary on the Odyssey, and at Leipzig, 1827-29, the commentary on the Iliad. There is also extant by Eustathius a commentary on Dionysius Periegetes, which is published with most editions of Dionysius. Eustathius likewise wrote a commentary on Pindar, which seems to be lost. — 4. Usually called Eustathius Romanus, a celebrated Graeco-Roman jurist, filled various high offices at Constantinople, from A. D. 960 to 1000.

Eustratĭus (Εὐστράτιος), one of the latest commentators on Aristotle, lived about the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ, under the emperor Alexius Comnenus, as metropolitan of Nicaea. Of his writings only two are extant, and these in a very fragmentary state: viz. 1. A Commentary on the 2nd book of the Analytica. 2. A Commentary on the Ethica Nicomachea.

Euterpē. [MUSAE.]

Euthydēmus (Εὐθύδημος). 1. A sophist, was born at Chios, and migrated with his brother Dionysodorus to Thurii in Italy. Being exiled thence, they came to Athens, where they resided many years. The pretensions of Euthydemus and his brother are exposed by Plato in the dialogue which bears the name of the former. — 2. King of Bactria, was a native of Magnesia. We know nothing of the circumstances attending his elevation to the sovereignty of Bactria. He extended his power over the neighbouring provinces, so as to become the founder of the greatness of the Bactrian monarchy. His dominions were invaded about B. C. 212, by Antiochus the Great, with whom he eventually concluded a treaty of peace.

Euthȳmus (Εὔθυμος), a hero of Locri in Italy, son of Astycles or of the river-god Caecinus. He was famous for his strength and skill in boxing, and delivered the town of Temesa from the evil spirit Polites, to whom a fair maiden was sacrificed every year. Euthymus himself disappeared at an advanced age in the river Caecinus.

Eutŏcĭus (Εὐτόκιος) of Ascalon, the commentator on Apollonius of Perga and on Archimedes, lived about A. D. 560. His commentaries are printed in the editions of APOLLONIUS and ARCHIMEDES.

Eutrăpĕlus, P. Volumnĭus, a Roman knight, obtained the surname of Eutrapelus (Εὐτράπελος), on account of his liveliness and wit. He was an intimate friend of Antony, and a companion of his pleasures and debauches. Cytheris, the mistress of Antony, was originally the freedwoman and mistress of Volumnius Eutrapelus, whence we find her called Volumnia, and was surrendered to Antony by his friend. Eutrapelus is mentioned by Horace. (Epist. i. 18. 31.)

Eutrēsĭi (Εὐτρήσιοι), the inhabitants of a district in Arcadia, N. of Megalopolis.

Eutrēsis (Εὔτρησις), a small town in Boeotia between Thespiae and Plataeae, with a temple and oracle of Apollo, who hence had the surname Eutrēsītes.

Eutrŏpĭus. 1. An eunuch, the favourite of Arcadius, became the virtual governor of the E. on the death of Rufinus, A. D. 395. He was consul in 399, but in that year was deprived of his power by the intrigues of the empress Eudoxia and Gainas, the Goth; he was first banished to Cyprus, was shortly afterwards recalled and put to death at Chalcedon. The poet Claudian wrote an invective against Eutropius. — 2. A Roman historian, held the office of a secretary under Constantine the Great, was patronised by Julian the Apostate, whom he accompanied in the Persian expedition, and was alive in the reign of Valentinian and Valens. He is the author of a brief compendium of Roman history in 10 books, from the foundation of the city to the accession of Valens, A. D. 364, to whom it is inscribed. In drawing up this abridgment Eutropius appears to have consulted the best authorities, and to have executed his task in general with care. The style is in perfect good taste and keeping with the nature of the undertaking, being plain, precise, and simple. The best editions are by Tzschucke, Lips. 1796, and by Grosse, Hal., 1813.

Eutychĭdes (Εὐτυχίδης), of Sicyon, a statuary, and a disciple of Lysippus, flourished B. C. 300.

Euxīnus Pontus. [PONTUS EUXINUS.]

Evadnē (Εὐάδνη). 1. Daughter of Poseidon and Pitane, who was brought up by the Arcadian king Aepytus, and became by Apollo the mother of Iamus. — 2. Daughter of Iphis (hence called Iphias), or Philax, and wife of Capaneus. For details see CAPANEUS.

Evagŏras (Εὐαγόρας), king of Salamis in Cyprus. He was sprung from a family which claimed descent from Teucer, the reputed founder of Salamis; and his ancestors appear to have been during a long period the hereditary rulers of that city under the supremacy of Persia. They had, however, been expelled by a Phoenician exile, who obtained the sovereignty for himself, and transmitted it to his descendants. Evagoras succeeded in recovering his hereditary kingdom, and putting the reigning tyrant to death, about B. C. 410. His rule was distinguished for its mildness and equity, and he greatly increased the power of Salamis, specially by the formation of a powerful fleet. He gave a friendly reception to Conon, when the latter took refuge at Salamis after the defeat of the Athenians at Aegospotami, 405; and it was at his intercession that the king of Persia allowed Conon the support of the Phoenician fleet. But his growing power excited the jealousy of the Persian court, and at length war was declared against him by Artaxerxes. Evagoras received the assistance of an Athenian fleet under Chabrias, and at first met with great success; but the fortune of war afterwards turned against him, and he was glad to conclude a peace with Persia, by which he resigned his conquests in Cyprus, but was allowed to retain possession of Salamis, with the title of king. This war was brought to a close in 385. Evagoras was assassinated in 374, together with his eldest son Pnytagoras. He was succeeded by his son Nicocles. There is still extant an oration of Isocrates in praise of Evagoras, addressed to his son Nicocles.

Evagrīus (Εὐάγριος), of Epiphania in Syria, born about A. D. 536, was by profession a "scholasticus" (advocate or pleader), and probably practised at Antioch. He wrote An Ecclesiastical History, still extant, which extends from A. D. 431 to 594. It is published with the other Ecclesiastical Historians, by Reading, Camb. 1720.

Evander (Εὔανδρος). 1. Son of Hermes by an Arcadian nymph, called Themis or Nicostrata, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtis. About 60 years before the Trojan war, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Pallantium in Arcadia into Italy, and there to have built a town, Pallantium, on the Tiber, at the foot of the Palatine Hill, which town was subsequently incorporated with Rome. Evander taught his neighbours milder laws and the arts of peace and of social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been made acquainted by Hercules, and music; he also introduced among them the worship of the Lycaean Pan, of Demeter, Poseidon, and Hercules. Virgil (Aen. viii. 51) represents Evander as still alive at the time when Aeneas arrived in Italy, and as forming an alliance with him against the Latins. Evander was worshipped at Pallantium in Arcadia, as a hero. At Rome he had an altar at the foot of the Aventine. — 2. A Phocian, was the pupil and successor of Lacydes as the head of the Academic School at Athens, about B. C. 215.

Evēnus (Εὔηνος). 1. Son of Ares and Demonice, and father of Marpessa. For details see MARPESSA. — 2. Two elegiac poets of Paros. One of these poets, though it is uncertain whether the elder or the younger, was a contemporary of Socrates, whom he is said to have instructed in poetry; and Plato in several passages refers to Evenus, somewhat ironically, as at once a sophist or philosopher and a poet. There are 16 epigrams in the Greek Anthology bearing the name of Evenus, but it is difficult to determine which of them should be assigned to the elder and which to the younger Evenus.

Evēnus (Εὐηνός: Fidhari), formerly called Lycormas, rises in Mt. Oeta, and flows with a rapid stream through Aetolia into the sea, 120 stadia W. of Antirrhium.

Evēnus (Εὔηνος: Sandarli), a river of Mysia, rising in Mt. Temnus, flowing S. through Aeolis, and falling into the Sinus Elaïticus near Pitane. The city of Adramyttium, which stood nearly due W. of its sources, was supplied with water from it by an aqueduct.

Evergĕtes (Εὐεργέτης), the "Benefactor," a title of honour, frequently conferred by the Greek states upon those from whom they had received benefits. It was assumed by many of the Greek kings in Egypt and elsewhere [PTOLEMAEUS.]

Evīus (Εὔιος), an epithet of Bacchus, given him from the cheering and animating cry, εὖα, εὐοῖ (Lat. evoe), in the festivals of the god.

Exădīus (Ἐξάδιος), one of the Lapithae, fought at the nuptials of Pirithoüs.

Exsuperantīus, Julīus, a Roman historian, who lived perhaps about the 5th or 6th century of our era. He is the author of a short tract entitled De Marii, Lepidi, ac Sertorii bellis civilibus, which many suppose to have been abridged from the Histories of Sallust. It is appended to several editions of Sallust.

Eziongĕber. [BERENICE, No. 1.]

F.

Făbăris or Farfărus (Farfa), a small river in Italy in the Sabine territory between Reate and Cures.

Făbātus, L. Roscīus, one of Caesar's lieutenants in the Gallic war, and praetor in B. C. 49. He espoused Pompey's party, and was twice sent with proposals of accommodation to Caesar. He was killed in the battle at Mutina, B. C. 43.

Fabātus, Calpurnīus, a Roman knight, accused in A. D. 64, but escaped punishment. He was grandfather to Calpurnia, wife of the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him.

Faberīus. 1. A debtor of M. Cicero. — 2. One of the private secretaries of C. Julius Caesar.

Făbĭa, 2 daughters of M. Fabius Ambustus. The elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, a patrician, and one of the military tribunes B. C. 376, and the younger to the plebeian C. Licinius Stolo.

Fabĭa Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, which traced its origin to Hercules and the Arcadian Evander. The Fabii occupy a prominent part in history soon after the commencement of the republic; and 3 brothers belonging to the gens are said to have been invested with 7 successive consulships, from B. C. 485 to 479. The house derived its greatest lustre from the patriotic courage and tragic fate of the 306 Fabii in the battle on the Cremera, B. C. 477. [VIBULANUS.] The principal families of this gens bore the names of AMBUSTUS, BUTEO, DORSO, LABEO, MAXIMUS, PICTOR, and VIBULANUS.

Fabĭānus, Papīrīus, a Roman rhetorician and philosopher in the time of Tiberius and Caligula. He wrote works on philosophy and physics, which are referred to by Seneca and Pliny.

Fabratĕrĭa (Fabraternus: Falvaterra), a town in Latium on the right bank of the Trerus, originally belonged to the Volscians, but was subsequently colonised by the Romans.

Fabrĭcĭi belonged originally to the Hernican town of Aletrium, where some of this name lived as late as the time of Cicero. 1. C. Fabricius Luscīnus, was probably the first of his family who quitted Aletrium and settled at Rome. He was one of the most popular heroes in the Roman annals, and, like Cincinnatus and Curius, is the representative of the purity and honesty of the good old times. In his first consulship, B. C. 282, he defeated the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnites, gained a rich booty and brought into the treasury more than 400 talents. Fabricius probably served as legate in the unfortunate campaign against Pyrrhus in 280; and at its close he was one of the Roman ambassadors sent to Pyrrhus at Tarentum to negotiate a ransom or exchange of prisoners. The conduct of Fabricius on this occasion formed one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and was embellished in every possible way by subsequent writers. So much, however, seems certain,—that Pyrrhus used every effort to gain the favour of Fabricius; that he offered him the most splendid presents, and endeavoured to persuade him to enter into his service, and accompany him to Greece; but that the sturdy Roman was proof against all his seductions, and rejected all his offers. On the renewal of the war in the following year (279), Fabricius again served as legate, and shared in the defeat at the battle of Asculum. In 278 Fabricius was consul a second time, and had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king was anxious for peace; and the generosity with which Fabricius sent back to Pyrrhus the traitor who had offered to poison him, afforded an opportunity for opening negotiations, which resulted in the evacuation of Italy by Pyrrhus. Fabricius then subdued the allies of the king in the S. of Italy. He was censor in 275, and distinguished himself by the severity with which he attempted to repress the growing taste for luxury. His censorship is particularly celebrated, from his expelling from the senate P. Cornelius Rufinus, on account of his possessing ten pounds' weight of silver plate. The love of luxury and the degeneracy of morals which had already commenced, brought out still more prominently the simplicity of life and the integrity of character which distinguished Fabricius as well as his contemporary Curius Dentatus; and ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which they lived on their hereditary farms, and how they refused the rich presents which the Samnite ambassadors offered them. Fabricius died as poor as he had lived; he left no dowry for his daughters, which the senate, however, furnished; and in order to pay the greatest possible respect to his memory, the state interred him within the pomaerium, although this was forbidden by the 12 Tables.—2. L. Fabricius, curator viarum in B. C. 62, built a new bridge of stone, which connected the city with the island in the Tiber, and which was, after him, called pons Fabricius. The name of its author is still seen on the remnants of the bridge, which now bears the name of ponte quattro capi.—3. Q. Fabricius, tribune of the plebs, 57, proposed as early as the month of January of that year, that Cicero should be recalled from exile; but this attempt was frustrated by P. Clodius by armed force.

Fadus, Cuspĭus, appointed by the emperor Claudius procurator of Judaea in A. D. 44. He was succeeded by Tiberius Alexander.

Faesŭlae (Faesulānus: Fiesole), a city of Etruria, situated on a hill 3 miles N.E. of Florence, was probably not one of the 12 cities of the League. Sulla sent to it a military colony; and it was the head-quarters of Catiline's army. There are still to be seen the remains of its ancient walls, of a theatre, &c.

Falacrīne or Falacrīnum, a Sabine town at the foot of the Apennines on the Via Salaria between Asculum and Reate, the birthplace of the emperor Vespasian.

Fălĕrĭi or Fălĕrĭum, a town in Etruria, situated on a steep and lofty height near Mt. Soracte, was an ancient Pelasgic town, and is said to have been founded by Halesus, who settled there with a body of colonists from Argos. Its inhabitants were called Falisci, and were regarded by many as of the same race as the Aequi, whence we find them often called Aequi Falisci. Falerii afterwards became one of the 12 Etruscan cities; but its inhabitants continued to differ from the rest of the Etruscans both in their language and customs even in the time of Augustus. After a long struggle with Rome, the Faliscans yielded to Camillus B. C. 394. They subsequently joined their neighbours several times in warring against Rome, but were finally subdued. At the close of the 1st Punic war, 241, they again revolted. The Romans now destroyed Falerii and compelled the Faliscans to build a new town in the plain. The ruins of the new city are to be seen at Falleri; while the remains of the more ancient one are at Civita Castellana. The ancient town of Falerii was afterwards colonised by the Romans under the name of "Colonia Etruscorum Falisca," or "Colonia Junonia Faliscorum," but it never became again a place of importance. The ancient town was celebrated for its worship of Juno Curitis or Quiritis, and it was in honour of her that the Romans founded the colony. Minerva and Janus were also worshipped in the town.—Falerii had extensive linen manufactories, and its white cows were prized at Rome as victims for sacrifice.

Fălernus Ager, a district in the N. of Campania, extending from the Massic hills to the river Vulturnus. It produced some of the finest wine in Italy, which was reckoned only second to the wine of Setia. Its choicest variety was called Faustianum. It became fit for drinking in 10 years, and might be used when 20 years old.

Falesia Portus, a harbour in Etruria, S. of Populonium, opposite the island Ilva.

Falisci. [FALERII.]

Faliscus, Gratĭus, a contemporary of Ovid, and the author of a poem upon the chase, entitled Cynegeticon Liber, in 540 hexameter lines. Printed in Burmann's and Wernsdorf's Poet. Lat. Min.

Fannĭa. 1. A woman of Minturnae, who hospitably entertained Marius, when he came to Minturnae in his flight, B. C. 88, though he had formerly pronounced her guilty of adultery.—2. The second wife of Helvidius Priscus.

Fannĭus. 1. C., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 187.—2. L., deserted from the Roman army in 84, with L. Magius, and went over to Mithridates, whom they persuaded to enter into negotiations with Sertorius in Spain. Fannius afterwards commanded a detachment of the army of Mithridates against Lucullus.—3. C., one of the persons who signed the accusation brought against P. Clodius in 61. In 59 he was mentioned by L. Vettius as an accomplice in the alleged conspiracy against Pompey.—4. C., tribune of the plebs, 59, opposed the lex agraria of Caesar. He belonged to Pompey's party, and in 49 went as praetor to Sicily.—5. C., a contemporary of the younger Pliny, the author of a work, very popular at the time, on the deaths of persons executed or exiled by Nero.

Fannīus Caepīo. [CAEPIO.]

Fannīus Strabo. [STRABO.]

Fannius Quadrātus. [QUADRATUS.]

Fānum Fortūnae (Fano), an important town in Umbria at the mouth of the Metaurus, with a celebrated temple of Fortuna, whence the town derived its name. Augustus sent to it a colony of veterans, and it was then called "Colonia Julia Fanestris." Here was a triumphal arch in honour of Augustus.

Farfărus. [FABARIS.]

Fascĭnus, an early Latin divinity, and identical with Mutinus or Tutinus. He was worshipped as the protector from sorcery, witchcraft, and evil daemons; and represented in the form of a phallus, the genuine Latin for which is fascinum, as this symbol was believed to be most efficacious in averting all evil influences.

Faula or Fauna, according to some, a concubine of Hercules in Italy; according to others, the wife or sister of Faunus. [FAUNUS.]

Faunus, son of Picus, grandson of Saturnus, and father of Latinus, was the third in the series of the kings of the Laurentes. Faunus acts a very prominent part in the mythical history of Latium, and was in later times worshipped in 2 distinct capacities: first, as the god of fields and shepherds, because he had promoted agriculture and the breeding of cattle; and secondly, as an oracular divinity, because he was one of the great founders of the religion of the country. The festival of the Faunalia, celebrated on the 5th of December by the country people, had reference to him as the god of agriculture and cattle. As a prophetic god, he was believed to reveal the future to man, partly in dreams, and partly by voices of unknown origin, in certain sacred groves, one near Tibur, around the well Albunea, and another on the Aventine, near Rome. What Faunus was to the male sex, his wife Faula or Fauna was to the female. — At Rome there was a round temple of Faunus, surrounded with columns, on Mount Caelius; and another was built to him, in B.C. 196, on the island in the Tiber, where sacrifices were offered to him on the ides of February. — As the god manifested himself in various ways, the idea arose of a plurality of Fauns (Fauni), who are described as half men, half goats, and with horns. Faunus gradually came to be identified with the Arcadian Pan, and the Fauni with the Greek Satyrs.

Fausta. 1. Cornēlĭa, daughter of the dictator Sulla, and twin sister of Faustus Sulla, was born about B.C. 88. She was first married to C. Memmius, and afterwards to Milo. She was infamous for her adulteries, and the historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours, and to have received a severe flogging from Milo when he was detected on one occasion in the house of the latter. Villius was another of her paramours, whence Horace calls him "Sullae gener." (Sat. i. 2. 64.) — — 2. Flavĭa Maximiāna, daughter of Maximianus, and wife of Constantine the Great, to whom she bore Constantinus, Constantius, and Constans.

Faustīna. 1. Annia Galeria, commonly distinguished as Faustina Senior, the wife of Antoninus Pius, died in the 3d year of his reign, A.D. 141. Notwithstanding the profligacy of her life, her husband loaded her with honours both before and after her decease. It was in honour of her that Antoninus established a hospital for the education and support of young females, who were called after her puellae alimentariae Faustinianae. — 2. Annia, or Faustina Junior, daughter of the elder Faustina, was married to M. Aurelius in A.D. 145 or 146, and she died in a village on the skirts of Mount Taurus, in 175, having accompanied the emperor to Syria. Her profligacy was so open and infamous, that the good nature or blindness of her husband, who cherished her fondly while alive, and loaded her with honours after her death, appears truly marvellous. — 3. Annia, grand-daughter or great-grand-daughter of M. Aurelius, the third of the numerous wives of Elagabalus.

Faustŭlus. [ROMULUS.]

Faventĭa (Faventīnus: Faenze), a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the river Anemo and on the Via Aemilia, celebrated for its linen manufactories.

Favōnii Portus (Porto Favone), a harbour on the coast of Corsica.

M. Favōnĭus, an imitator of Cato Uticensis, whose character and conduct he copied so servilely as to receive the nickname of Cato's ape. He was always a warm supporter of the party of the optimates, and actively opposed all the measures of the first triumvirate. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, he joined Pompey, notwithstanding his personal aversion to the latter, and opposed all proposals of reconciliation between Caesar and Pompey. He served in the campaign against Caesar in Greece in 48, and after the defeat of his party at Pharsalus, he accompanied Pompey in his flight, and showed him the greatest kindness and attention. Upon Pompey's death he returned to Italy, and was pardoned by Caesar. He took no part in the conspiracy against Caesar's life, but after the murder of the latter, he espoused the side of Brutus and Cassius. He was taken prisoner in the battle of Philippi in 42, and was put to death by Octavianus.

Favorīnus, a philosopher and sophist in the reign of Hadrian, was a native of Arles in Gaul. He resided at different periods of his life in Rome, Greece, and Asia Minor, and obtained high distinctions. He was intimate with some of his most distinguished contemporaries, among others, with Plutarch, who dedicated to him his treatise on the principle of cold, and with Herodes Atticus, to whom he bequeathed his library and house at Rome. He wrote several works on various subjects, but none of them are extant.

Febris, the goddess, or rather the averter, of fever. She had 3 sanctuaries at Rome, in which amulets were dedicated which people had worn during a fever.

Febrŭus, an ancient Italian divinity, to whom the month of February was sacred, for in the latter half of that month general purifications and lustrations were celebrated. The name is connected with februare (to purify), and februae (purifications). Februus was also regarded as a god of the lower world, and the festival of the dead (Feralia) was celebrated in February.

Felīcĭtas, the personification of happiness, to whom a temple was erected by Lucullus in B.C. 75, which was burnt down in the reign of Claudius. Felicitas is frequently seen on Roman medals, in the form of a matron, with the staff of Mercury (caduceus) and a cornucopia.

Fēlix, Antōnĭus, procurator of Judaea, in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, was a brother of the freedman Pallas, and was himself a freedman of the emperor Claudius. Hence he is also called Claudius Felix. In his private and his public character alike Felix was unscrupulous and profligate. Having fallen in love with Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I., and wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, he induced her to leave her husband; and she was still living with him in 60, when St. Paul preached before him "of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." His government, though cruel and oppressive, was strong; he suppressed all disturbances, and cleared the country of robbers. He was recalled in 62, and succeeded by Porcius Festus; and the Jews having lodged accusations against him at Rome, he was saved from condign punishment only by the influence of his brother Pallas with Nero.

Fēlix, M. Minūcius, a Roman lawyer, who flourished about A. D. 230, wrote a dialogue entitled Octavius, which occupies a conspicuous place among the early Apologies for Christianity. Edited by Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1707; by Ernesti, ibid. 1773; and by Muralto, Turic. 1836.

Felsina. [BONONIA.]

Feltrĭa (Feltrīnus: Feltre), a town in Rhaetia, a little N. of the river Plavis.

Fenestella, a Roman historian, who lived in the time of Augustus, and died A. D. 21, in the 70th year of his age. His work, entitled Annales, extended to at least 22 books. The few fragments preserved relate to events subsequent to the Carthaginian wars; and we know that it embraced the greater part of Cicero's career. A treatise, De Sacerdotiis et Magistratibus Romanorum Libri II., ascribed to Fenestella, is a modern forgery.

Fenni, a savage people living by the chase, whom Tacitus (Germ. 46) reckons among the Germans. They appear to have dwelt in the further part of E. Prussia, and to have been the same as the modern Finns.

Ferentīnum (Ferentīnas, Ferentīnus). 1. (Ferento), a town of Etruria, S. of Volsinii, the birthplace of the emperor Otho. It is called both a colonia and a municipium. There are still remains of its walls, of a theatre and of sepulchres at Ferento. — 2. (Ferento), an ancient town of the Hernici in Latium, S.W. of Anagnia, colonised by the Romans in the 2nd Punic war. There are still remains of its ancient walls. In its neighbourhood was the source of the sacred brook Ferentina, at which the Latins used to hold their meetings.

Ferentum. [FORENTUM.]

Feretrĭus, a surname of Jupiter, derived from ferire, to strike; for persons who took an oath called upon Jupiter to strike them if they swore falsely, as they struck the victim which they sacrificed to him. Others derived it from ferre, because he was the giver of peace, or because people dedicated (ferebant) to him spolia opima.

Ferōnĭa, an ancient Italian divinity, who originally belonged to the Sabines and Faliscans, and was introduced by them among the Romans. It is difficult to form a definite notion of the nature of this goddess. Some consider her to have been the goddess of liberty; others look upon her as the goddess of commerce and traffic, and others again regard her as a goddess of the earth or the lower world. Her chief sanctuary was at Terracina, near mount Soracte.

Ferox, Urseius, a Roman jurist, who probably flourished between the time of Tiberius and Vespasian.

Ferrātus Mons (Jebel-Jurjurah), one of the principal mountain-chains in the Lesser Atlas system, in N. Africa, on the borders of Mauretania Caesariensis and Mauretania Sitifensis.

Fescennĭum or Fescennĭa (Fescennīnus), a town of the Falisci in Etruria, and consequently like Falerii of Pelasgic origin. [FALERII.] From this town the Romans are said to have derived the Fescennine songs. The site of the town is uncertain; it may perhaps be placed at S. Silvesto. Many writers place it at Civita Castellana, but this was the site of Falerii.

Festus, Sext. Pompeius, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the 4th century of our era. His name is attached to a dictionary or glossary of Latin words and phrases, divided into 20 books, and commonly called Sexti Pompeii Festi de Verborum Significatione. It was abridged by Festus from a work with the same title by M. Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian in the reign of Augustus. Festus made a few alterations and criticisms of his own, and inserted numerous extracts from other writings of Verrius; but altogether omitted those words which had fallen into disuse, intending to make these the subject of a separate volume. Towards the end of the 8th century, Paul, son of Warnefrid, better known as Paulus Diaconus, from having officiated as a deacon of the church at Aquileia, abridged the abridgment of Festus. The original work of Verrius Flaccus has perished with the exception of one or two inconsiderable fragments. Of the abstract by Festus one imperfect MS. only has come down to us. The numerous blanks in this MS. have been ingeniously filled up by Scaliger and Ursinus, partly from conjecture and partly from the corresponding paragraphs of Paulus, whose performance appears in a complete form in many MSS. The best edition of Festus is by K. O. Müller, Lips. 1839, in which the text of Festus is placed face to face with the corresponding text of Paulus, so as to admit of easy comparison. The work is one of great value, containing a rich treasure of learning upon many points connected with antiquities, mythology, and grammar.

Festus, Porcĭus, succeeded Antonius Felix as procurator of Judaea in A. D. 62, and died not long after his appointment. It was he who bore testimony to the innocence of St. Paul, when he defended himself before him in the same year.

Fibrēnus. [ARPINUM.]

Ficāna (Ficanensis), one of the ancient Latin towns destroyed by Ancus Martius.

Ficulĕa (Ficuleas, -ātis, Ficolensis), an ancient town of the Sabines, E. of Fidenae, said to have been founded by the Aborigines, but early sunk into decay.

Fidēnae, sometimes Fidena (Fidenas, -ātis: Castel Giubileo), an ancient town in the land of the Sabines, 40 stadia (5 miles) N.E. of Rome, situated on a steep hill, between the Tiber and the Anio. It is said to have been founded by Alba Longa, and also to have been conquered and colonised by Romulus; but the population appears to have been partly Etruscan, and it was probably colonised by the Etruscan Veii, with which city we find it in close alliance. It frequently revolted and was frequently taken by the Romans. Its last revolt was in B. C. 438, and in the following year it was destroyed by the Romans. Subsequently the town was rebuilt; but it is not mentioned again till the reign of Tiberius; when in consequence of the fall of a temporary wooden theatre in the town 20,000, or, according to some accounts, 50,000 persons lost their lives.

Fidentĭa (Fidentīnus: Borgo S. Donino), a town in Cisalpine Gaul on the Via Aemilia between Parma and Placentia, memorable for the victory which Sulla's generals gained over Carbo, B.C. 82.

Fĭdes, the personification of fidelity or faithfulness. Numa is said to have built a temple to Fides publica, on the Capitol, and another was built there in the consulship of M. Aemilius Scaurus, B.C. 115. She was represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive or laurel leaves, and carrying in her hand corn ears, or a basket with fruit.

Fĭdĭus, an ancient form of filius, occurs in the connection of Dius Fidius, or Medius Fidius, that is, me Dius (Διός) filius, or the son of Jupiter, that is, Hercules. Hence the expression medius fidius is equivalent to me Hercules, scil. juvet. Sometimes Fidius is used alone. Some of the ancients connected fidius with fides.

Fĭgŭlus, C. Marcĭus. 1. Consul B.C. 162, and again consul 156, when he carried on war with the Dalmatae in Illyricum. — 2. Consul 64, supported Cicero in his consulship.

Fĭgŭlus, P. Nigidĭus, a Pythagorean philosopher of high reputation, who flourished about B.C. 60. Mathematical and physical investigations appear to have occupied a large share of his attention; and such was his fame as an astrologer, that it was generally believed, in later times at least, that he had predicted the future greatness of Octavianus on hearing the announcement of his birth. He, moreover, possessed considerable influence in political affairs; was one of the senators selected by Cicero to take down the depositions of the witnesses who gave evidence with regard to Catiline's conspiracy, B.C. 63; was praetor, 59; took an active part in the civil war on the side of Pompey; was compelled in consequence by Caesar to live abroad, and died in exile, 44.

Fimbrĭa, C. Flavĭus. 1. A homo novus, who rose to the highest honours through his own merits and talents. Cicero praises him both as a jurist and an orator. He was consul B.C. 104, and was subsequently accused of extortion in his province, but was acquitted. — 2. Probably son of the preceding, was one of the most violent partizans of Marius and Cinna during the civil war with Sulla. In B.C. 86 he was sent into Asia as legate of Valerius Flaccus, and took advantage of the unpopularity of his commander with the soldiers to excite a mutiny against him. Flaccus was killed at Chalcedon, and was succeeded in the command by Fimbria, who carried on the war with success against the generals of Mithridates. In 84 Sulla crossed over from Greece into Asia, and, after concluding peace with Mithridates, marched against Fimbria. The latter was deserted by his troops, and put an end to his life.

Fines, the name of a great number of places, either on the borders of Roman provinces or of different tribes. These places are usually found only in the Itineraries, and are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated here.

Firmānus, Tarutĭus, a mathematician and astrologer, contemporary with M. Varro and Cicero. At Varro's request Firmanus took the horoscope of Romulus, and from the circumstances of the life and death of the founder determined the era of Rome.

Firmiānus Sympŏsius, Caelĭus, of uncertain age and country, the author of 100 insipid riddles, each comprised in 3 hexameter lines, collected, as we are told in the prologue, for the purpose of promoting the festivities of the Saturnalia. Printed in the Poet. Lat. Min. of Wernsdorf, vol. vi.

Firmĭcus Maternus, Julĭus, or perhaps Vilĭius, the author of a work entitled Matheseos Libri VIII., which is a formal introduction to judicial astrology, according to the discipline of the Egyptians and Babylonians. The writer lived in the time of Constantine the Great, and had during a portion of his life practised as a forensic pleader. There is also ascribed to this Firmicus Maternus a work in favour of Christianity, entitled De Errore Profanarum Religionum ad Constantium et Constantem. This work was, however, probably written by a different person of the same name, since the author of the work on astrology was a pagan.

Firmum (Firmānus: Fermo), a town in Picenum, 3 miles from the coast, and S. of the river Tinna, colonised by the Romans at the beginning of the 1st Punic war. On the coast was its strongly fortified harbour, Castellum Firmānum or Firmanorum (Porto di Fermo).

M. Firmus, a native of Seleucia, the friend and ally of Zenobia, seized upon Alexandria, and proclaimed himself emperor, but was defeated and slain by Aurelian, A.D. 273.

Flaccus, Calpurnĭus, a rhetorician in the reign of Hadrian, whose 51 declamations are frequently printed with those of Quintilian.

Flaccus, Fulvĭus. 1. M., consul with App. Claudius Caudex, B.C. 264, in which year the first Punic war broke out. — 2. Q., son of No. 1, consul 237, fought against the Ligurians in Italy. In 224 he was consul a 2nd time, and conquered the Gauls and Insubrians in the N. of Italy. In 215 he was praetor, after having been twice consul; and in the following year (214) he was re-elected praetor. In 213 he was consul for the 3rd time, and carried on the war in Campania against the Carthaginians. He and his colleague, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, took Hanno's camp by storm, and then laid siege to Capua, which they took in the following year (212). In 209 he was consul for the 4th time, and continued the war against the Carthaginians in the S. of Italy. — 3. Cn., brother of No. 2, was praetor 212, and had Apulia for his province: he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonea. In consequence of his cowardice in this battle he was accused before the people, and went into voluntary exile before the trial. — 4. Q., son of No. 2, was praetor 182, and carried on war in Spain against the Celtiberians, whom he defeated in several battles. He was consul 179 with his brother, L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus, who had been adopted by Manlius Acidinus. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurians. In 174 he was censor with A. Postumius Albinus. Shortly afterwards he became deranged, and hung himself in his bedchamber. — 5. M., nephew of No. 4, and a friend of the Gracchi, was consul 125, when he subdued the Transalpine Ligurians. He was one of the triumvirs for carrying into execution the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus, and was slain together with C. Gracchus in 121. He was a man of a bold and determined character, and was more ready to have recourse to violence and open force than C. Gracchus. — 6. Q., praetor in Sardinia, 187, and consul 180.—7. Ser., consul 135, subdued the Vardaeans in Illyricum.

Flaccus, Granius, a contemporary of Julius Caesar, wrote a book, De Jure Papiriano, which was a collection of the laws of the ancient kings of Rome, made by Papirius. [PAPIRIUS].

Flaccus, Horātius. [HORATIUS.]

Flaccus, Hordeōnius, consular legate of Upper Germany at Nero's death, A. D. 68. He was secretly attached to the cause of Vespasian, for which reason he made no effectual attempt to put down the insurrection of Civilis [CIVILIS]. His troops, who were in favour of Vitellius, compelled him to give up the command to VOCULA, and shortly afterwards put him to death.

Flaccus, C. Norbānus, a general of Octavian and Antony in the campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B. C. 42. He was consul in 38.

Flaccus, Persīus. [PERSIUS.]

Flaccus Sicŭlus, an agrimensor by profession, probably lived about the reign of Nerva. He wrote a treatise entitled De Conditionibus Agrorum, of which the commencement is preserved in the collection of Agrimensores. [FRONTINUS.]

Flaccus, Valĕrius. 1. L., curule aedile B. C. 201, praetor 200, and consul 195, with M. Porcius Cato. In his consulship, and in the following year, he carried on war, with great success, against the Gauls in the N. of Italy. In 184 he was the colleague of M. Cato in the censorship, and in the same year was made princeps senatus. He died 180. — 2. L., consul 131, with P. Licinius Crassus. — 3. L., consul 100 with C. Marius, when he took an active part in putting down the insurrection of Saturninus. In 97 he was censor with M. Antonius, the orator. In 86 he was chosen consul in place of Marius, who had died in his 7th consulship, and was sent by Cinna into Asia to oppose Sulla, and to bring the war against Mithridates to a close. The avarice and severity of Flaccus made him unpopular with the soldiers, who at length rose in mutiny at the instigation of Fimbria. Flaccus was then put to death by order of Fimbria. [FIMBRIA.] — 4. L., the interrex, who proposed that Sulla should be made dictator, 82, and who was afterwards made by Sulla his magister equitum. — 5. C., praetor 98, consul 93, and afterwards proconsul in Spain. — 6. L., praetor 63, and afterwards propraetor in Asia, where he was succeeded by Q. Cicero. In 59 he was accused by D. Laelius of extortion in Asia; but, although undoubtedly guilty, he was defended by Cicero (in the oration pro Flacco, which is still extant) and Q. Hortensius, and was acquitted. — 7. C., a poet, was a native of Padua, and lived in the time of Vespasian. He is the author of the Argonautica, an unfinished heroic poem in 8 books, on the Argonautic expedition, in which he follows the general plan and arrangement of Apollonius Rhodius. The 8th book terminates abruptly, at the point where Medea is urging Jason to make her the companion of his homeward journey. Flaccus is only a second-rate poet. His diction is pure; his general style is free from affectation; his versification is polished and harmonious; his descriptions are lively and vigorous; but he displays no originality, nor any of the higher attributes of genius. Editions by Burmannus, Leid. 1724; by Harles, Altenb. 1781; and by Wagner, Gotting. 1805.

Flaccus, Verrīus, a freedman by birth, and a distinguished grammarian, in the reign of Augustus, who entrusted him with the education of his grandsons, Caius and Lucius Caesar. He died at an advanced age, in the reign of Tiberius. At the lower end of the market-place at Praeneste was a statue of Verrius Flaccus, fronting the Hemicyclium, on the inner curve of which were set up marble tablets, inscribed with the Fasti Verriani. These Fasti were a calendar of the days and vacations of public business — dies fasti, nefasti, and intercisi — of religious festivals, triumphs, &c., especially including such as were peculiar to the family of the Caesars. In 1770 the foundations of the Hemicyclium of Praeneste were discovered, and among the ruins were found fragments of the Fasti Verriani. They are given at the end of Wolf's edition of Suetonius, Lips. 1802. — Flaccus wrote numerous works on philology, history, and archaeology. Of these the most celebrated was his work De Verborum Significatione, which was abridged by Festus. [FESTUS.]

Flaminīnus, Quintīus. 1. T., a distinguished general, was consul B. C. 198, and had the conduct of the war against Philip of Macedonia, which he carried on with ability and success. He pretended to have come to Greece to liberate the country from the Macedonian yoke, and thus induced the Achaean league, and many of the other Greek states, to give him their support. The war was brought to a close in 197, by the defeat of Philip by Flamininus, at the battle of Cynoscephalae in Thessaly; and peace was shortly afterwards concluded with Philip. Flamininus continued in Greece for the next 3 years, in order to settle the affairs of the country. At the celebration of the Isthmian games at Corinth in 196, he caused a herald to proclaim, in the name of the Roman senate, the freedom and independence of Greece. In 195 he made war against Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, whom he soon compelled to submit to the Romans; and in 194 he returned to Rome, having won the affections of the Greeks by his prudent and conciliating conduct. In 192 he was again sent to Greece as ambassador, and remained there till 190, exercising a sort of protectorate over the country. In 183 he was sent as ambassador to Prusias of Bithynia, in order to demand the surrender of Hannibal. He died about 174. — 2. L., brother of the preceding, was curule aedile 200, praetor 199, and afterwards served under his brother as legate in the war against Macedonia. He was consul in 192, and received Gaul as his province, where he behaved with the greatest barbarity. On one occasion he killed a chief of the Boii who had taken refuge in his camp, in order to afford amusement to a profligate favourite. For this and similar acts of cruelty he was expelled from the senate in 184, by M. Cato, who was then censor. He died in 170. — 3. T., consul 150, with M'. Acilius Balbus. — 4. T., consul 123, with Q. Metellus Balearicus. Cicero says that he spoke Latin with elegance, but that he was an illiterate man.

Flaminīus. 1. C., was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 232, in which year, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the senate, he carried an agrarian law, ordaining that the Ager Gallicus Picenus, which had recently been conquered, should be distributed among the plebeians. In 227, in which year 4 praetors were appointed for the first time, he was one of them, and received Sicily for his province, where he earned the goodwill of the provincials by his integrity and justice. In 223 he was consul, and marched against the Insubrian Gauls. As the senate were anxious to deprive Flaminius of his office, they declared that the consular election was not valid on account of some fault in the auspices, and sent a letter to the consuls, with orders to return to Rome. But as all preparations had been made for a battle against the Insubrians, the letter was left unopened until the battle was gained. In 220 he was censor, and executed 2 great works, which bore his name, viz. the Circus Flaminius and the Via Flaminia. In 217 he was consul a second time, and marched against Hannibal, but was defeated by the latter at the fatal battle of the Trasimene lake, on the 23d of June, in which he perished with the greater part of his army. — 2. C., son of No. 1, was quaestor of Scipio Africanus in Spain, 210; curule aedile 196, when he distributed among the people a large quantity of grain at a low price, which was furnished him by the Sicilians as a mark of gratitude towards his father and himself; was praetor 193, and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with success; and was consul 185, when he defeated the Ligurians.

Flanatĭcus or Flanonĭcus Sinus (Gulf of Quarnaro), a bay of the Adriatic sea on the coast of Liburnia, named after the people Flanates and their town Flanōna (Fianona).

Flāvĭa, a surname given to several towns in the Roman empire in honour of the Flavian family.

Flāvĭa gens, celebrated as the house to which the emperor Vespasian belonged. During the later period of the Roman empire, the name Flavius descended from one emperor to another, Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, being the first in the series.

Flāvĭa Domitilla. [DOMITILLA.]

Flāvĭus, Cn., the son of a freedman, became secretary to App. Claudius Caecus, and, in consequence of this connection, attained distinguished honours in the commonwealth. He is celebrated in the annals of Roman law for having been the first to divulge certain technicalities of procedure, which previously had been kept secret as the exclusive patrimony of the pontiffs and the patricians. He was elected curule aedile B.C. 303, in spite of his ignominious birth.

Flāvĭus Fimbrĭa. [FIMBRIA.]

Flāvĭus Josēphus. [JOSEPHUS.]

Flāvĭus Vopiscus. [VOPISCUS.]

Flāvus, L. Caesetĭus, tribune of the plebs. B.C. 44, was deposed from his office by C. Julius Caesar, because, in concert with C. Epidius Marullus, one of his colleagues in the tribunate, he had removed the crowns from the statues of the dictator, and imprisoned a person who had saluted Caesar as "king."

Flāvus or Flavĭus, Subrĭus, tribune in the Praetorian guards, was the most active agent in the conspiracy against Nero, A.D. 66, which, from its most distinguished member, was called Piso's conspiracy.

Flevum, a fortress in Germany at the mouth of the Amisia (Ems).

Flevum, Flevo. [RHENUS.]

Flōra, the Roman goddess of flowers and spring. The writers, whose object was to bring the Roman religion into contempt, relate that Flora was a courtezan, who had accumulated a large property, and bequeathed it to the Roman people, in return for which she was honoured with the annual festival of the Floralia. But her worship was established at Rome in the very earliest times, for a temple is said to have been vowed to her by king Tatius, and Numa appointed a flamen to her. The resemblance between the names Flora and Chloris led the later Romans to identify the two divinities. Her temple at Rome was situated near the Circus Maximus, and her festival was celebrated from the 28th of April till the 1st of May, with extravagant merriment and lasciviousness. (Dict. of Ant. art. Floralia.)

Florentĭa (Florentīnus). 1. (Firenze, Florence), a town in Etruria on the Arnus, was a Roman colony, and was probably founded by the Romans during their wars with the Ligurians. In the time of Sulla it was a flourishing municipium, but its greatness as a city dates from the middle ages.—2. (Fiorenzuola), a town in Cisalpine Gaul on the Aemilia Via between Placentia and Parma.

Florentīnus, a jurist, one of the council of the emperor Severus Alexander, wrote Institutiones in 12 books, which are quoted in the Corpus Juris.

Floriānus, M. Annĭus, the brother, by a different father, of the emperor Tacitus, upon whose decease he was proclaimed emperor at Rome, A.D. 276. He was murdered by his own troops at Tarsus, after a reign of about 2 months, while on his march against Probus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria.

Flōrus, Annaeus. 1. L., a Roman historian, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote a summary of Roman history, divided into 4 books, extending from the foundation of the city to the establishment of the empire under Augustus, entitled Rerum Romanarum Libri IV., or Epitome de Gestis Romanorum. This compendium presents within a very moderate compass a striking view of the leading events comprehended by the above limits. It is written in a declamatory style, and the sentiments frequently assume the form of tumid conceits expressed in violent metaphors. The best editions are, by Duker, Lug. Bat. 1722, 1744, reprinted Lips. 1832; by Titze, Prag. 1819; and by Seebode, Lips. 1821. — 2. A Roman poet in the time of Hadrian.

Flōrus, Gessĭus, a native of Clazomenae, succeeded Albinus as procurator of Judaea, A.D. 64—65. His cruel and oppressive government was the main cause of the rebellion of the Jews. He is sometimes called Festus and Cestius Florus.

Flōrus, Julĭus, addressed by Horace in 2 epistles (i. 3, ii. 2), was attached to the suite of Claudius Tiberius Nero, when the latter was despatched by Augustus to place Tigranes upon the throne of Armenia. He was both a poet and an orator.

Foca or Phocas, a Latin grammarian, author of a dull, foolish life of Virgil in hexameter verse, of which 119 lines are preserved. Printed in the Anthol. Lat. of Burmann and Wernsdorf.

Foeniculārius Campus, i. e., the Fennel Fields, a plain covered with fennel, near Tarraco in Spain.

Fontēius, M., governed as propraetor Narbonnese Gaul, between B.C. 76—73, and was accused of extortion in his province by M. Plaetorius in 69. He was defended by Cicero in an oration (pro M. Fonteio), part of which is extant.

Fontēius Căpĭto. [CAPITO.]

Fontus, a Roman divinity, son of Janus, had an altar on the Janiculus, which derived its name from his father, and on which Numa was believed to be buried. The name of this divinity is connected with fons, a fountain; and he was the personification of the flowing waters. On the 13th of October the Romans celebrated the festival of the fountains called Fontinalia, at which the fountains were adorned with garlands.

Fŏrentum or Fĕrentum (Forentanus: Forenza), a town in Apulia, surrounded by fertile fields and in a low situation, according to Horace (arvum pingue humilis Forenti, Carm. iii. 4. 16). Livy (ix. 20) describes it as a fortified place, which was taken by C. Junius Bubulcus, B.C. 317. The modern town lies on a hill.

Formĭae (Formianus: nr. Mola di Gaëta, Ru.), a town in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the innermost corner of the beautiful Sinus Caietanus (Gulf of Gaëta). It was a very ancient town, founded by the Pelasgic Tyrrhenians; and it appears to have been one of the head-quarters of the Tyrrhenian pirates, whence later poets supposed the city of Lamus, inhabited by the Laestrygones, of which Homer speaks (Od. x. 81), to be the same as Formiae. Formiae became a municipium and received the Roman franchise at an early period. The beauty of the surrounding country induced many of the Roman nobles to build villas at this spot: of these the best known is the Formianum of Cicero, in the neighbourhood of which he was killed. The remains of Cicero's villa are still to be seen at the Villa Marsana near Castiglione. The hills of Formiae produced good wine. (Hor. Carm. i. 20.)

Formĭo (Formione, Rusano), a small river, forming the N. boundary of Istria.

Fornax, a Roman goddess, said to have been worshipped that she might ripen the corn, and prevent its being burnt in baking in the oven (fornax). Her festival, the Fornacalia, was announced by the curio maximus.

Fortūna (Τύχη), the goddess of fortune, was worshipped both in Greece and Italy. Hesiod describes her as a daughter of Oceanus; Pindar in one place calls her a daughter of Zeus the Liberator, and in another place one of the Moerae or Fates. She was represented with different attributes. With a rudder, she was conceived as the divinity guiding and conducting the affairs of the world; with a ball, she represents the varying unsteadiness of fortune; with Plutos or the horn of Amalthea, she was the symbol of the plentiful gifts of fortune. She was worshipped in most cities in Greece. Her statue at Smyrna held with one hand a globe on her head, and in the other carried the horn of Amalthea. Fortuna was still more worshipped by the Romans than by the Greeks. Her worship is traced to the reigns of Ancus Martius and Servius Tullius, and the latter is said to have built 2 temples to her, the one in the forum boarium, and the other on the banks of the Tiber. The Romans mention her with a variety of surnames and epithets, as publica, privata, muliebris (said to have originated at the time when Coriolanus was prevented by the entreaties of the women from destroying Rome), regina, conservatrix, primigenia, virilis, &c. Fortuna Virginensis was worshipped by newly-married women, who dedicated their maiden garments and girdle in her temple. Fortuna Virilis was worshipped by women, who prayed to her that she might preserve their charms, and thus enable them to please their husbands. Her surnames, in general, express either particular kinds of good fortune, or the persons or classes of persons to whom she granted it. Her worship was of great importance also at Antium and Praeneste, where her sortes or oracles were very celebrated.

Fortunātae or -orum Insŭlae (αἱ τῶν μακάρων νῆσοι, i.e. the Islands of the Blessed). The early Greeks, as we learn from Homer, placed the Elysian fields, into which favoured heroes passed without dying, at the extremity of the earth, near the river Oceanus. [ELYSIUM.] In poems later than Homer, an island is clearly spoken of as their abode; and though its position was of course indefinite, both the poets, and the geographers who followed them, placed it beyond the pillars of Hercules. Hence when, just after the time of the Marian civil wars, certain islands were discovered in the Ocean, off the W. coast of Africa, the name of Fortunatae Insulae was applied to them. As to the names of the individual islands, and the exact identification of them by their modern names, there are difficulties: but it may be safely said, generally, that the Fortunatae Insulae of Pliny, Ptolemy, and others, are the Canary Islands, and probably the Madeira group; the latter being perhaps those called by Pliny (after Juba) Purpurariae.

Fortunatiānus, Atilĭus, a Latin grammarian, author of a treatise (Ars) upon prosody, and the metres of Horace, printed in the collection of Putschius.

Fortunatiānus, Curĭus or Chirĭus, a Roman lawyer, flourished about A.D. 450. He is the author of a compendium of technical rhetoric, in 3 books, under the title Curii Fortunatiani Consulti Artis Rhetoricae Scholicae Libri tres, which at one period was held in high esteem as a manual. Printed in the Rhetores Latini Antiqui, of Pithou, Paris, 1599.

Fŏrum, an open space of ground, in which the people met for the transaction of any kind of business. At Rome the number of fora increased with the growth of the city. They were level pieces of ground of an oblong form, and were surrounded by buildings, both private and public. They were divided into 2 classes; fora civilia, in which justice was administered and public business transacted, and fora venalia, in which provisions and other things were sold, and which were distinguished as the forum boarium, olitorium, suarium, piscarium, &c. The principal fora at Rome were: 1. Forum Romanum, also called simply the Forum, and at a later time distinguished by the epithets vetus or magnum. It is usually described as lying between the Capitoline and Palatine hills; but to speak more correctly, it lay between the Capitoline and the Velian ridge, which was a hill opposite the Palatine. It ran lengthwise from the foot of the Capitol or the arch of Septimius Severus in the direction of the arch of Titus; but it did not extend so far as the latter, and came to an end at the commencement of the ascent to the Velian ridge, where was the temple of Antoninus and Faustina. Its shape was that of an irregular quadrangle, of which the 2 longer sides were not parallel, but were much wider near the Capitol than at the other end. Its length was 630 French feet, and its breadth varied from 190 to 100 feet, an extent undoubtedly small for the greatness of Rome; but it must be recollected that the limits of the forum were fixed in the early days of Rome and never underwent any alteration. The origin of the forum is ascribed to Romulus and Tatius, who are said to have filled up the swamp or marsh which occupied its site, and to have set it apart as a place for the administration of justice and for holding the assemblies of the people. The forum in its widest sense included the forum properly so called, and the Comitium. The Comitium occupied the narrow or upper end of the forum, and was the place where the patricians met in their comitia curiata: the forum, in its narrower sense, was originally only a market-place, and was not used for any political purpose. At a later time the forum in its narrower sense was the place of meeting for the plebeians in their comitia tributa, and was separated from the comitium by the Rostra or platform, from which the orators addressed the people. The most important of the public buildings which surrounded the forum in early times was the Curia Hostilia, the place of meeting of the senate, which was said to have been erected by Tullus Hostilius. It stood on the N. side of the Comitia. In the time of Tarquin the forum was surrounded by a range of shops, probably of a mean character, but they gradually underwent a change, and were eventually occupied by bankers and money-changers. The shops on the N. side underwent this change first, whence they were called Novae or Argentariae Tabernae; while the shops on the S. side, though they subsequently experienced the same change, were distinguished by the name of Veteres Tabernae. As Rome grew in greatness, the forum was adorned with statues of celebrated men, with temples and basilicae, and with other public buildings. The site of the ancient forum is occupied by the Campo Vaccino.—2. Forum Julium or Forum Caesaris, was built by Julius Caesar, because the old forum was found too small for the transaction of public business. It was close by the old forum, behind the church of St. Martina. Caesar built here a magnificent temple of Venus Genitrix.—3. Forum Augusti, built by Augustus, because the 2 existing fora were not found sufficient for the great increase of business which had taken place. It stood behind the Forum Julium, and its entrance at the other end was by an arch, now called Arco de' Pantani. Augustus adorned it with a temple of Mars Ultor, and with the statues of the most distinguished men of the republic. This forum was used for causae publicae and sortitiones judicum.—4. Forum Nervae or Forum Transitorium, was a small forum lying between the Temple of Peace and the fora of Julius Caesar and Augustus. The Temple of Peace was built by Vespasian; and as there were private buildings between it and the fora of Caesar and Augustus, Domitian resolved to pull down those buildings, and thus form a 4th forum, which was not, however, intended like the other 3 for the transaction of public business, but simply to serve as a passage from the Temple of Peace to the fora of Caesar and Augustus: hence its name Transitorium. The plan was carried into execution by Nerva, whence the forum is also called by the name of this emperor.—5. Forum Trajani, built by the emperor Trajan, who employed the architect Apollodorus for the purpose. It lay between the forum of Augustus and the Campus Martius. It was the most splendid of all the fora, and considerable remains of it are still extant. Here were the Basilica Ulpia and Bibliotheca Ulpia, the celebrated Columna Trajani, an equestrian statue and a triumphal arch of Trajan, and a temple of Trajan built by Hadrian.

Fŏrum, the name of several towns in various parts of the Roman empire, which were originally simply markets or places for the administration of justice. 1. Aliēni (Ferrara?), in Cisalpine Gaul.—2. Appĭi (nr. S. Donato, Ru.), in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the midst of the Pomptine marshes, 43 miles S. E. of Rome, founded by the censor Appius Claudius when he made the Appia Via. Here the Christians from Rome met the Apostle Paul (Acts, xxviii. 15).—3. Amēlĭi or Amelium (Montalto), in Etruria on the Aurelia Via.—4. Cassĭi, in Etruria on the Cassia Via, near Viterbo.—5. Clōdĭi (Oriulo), in Etruria.—6. Cornēlĭi (Imola), in Gallia Cispadana, on the Aemilia Via, between Bononia and Faventia, a colony founded by Cornelius Sulla.—7. Flaminĭi, in Umbria on the Flaminia Via.—8. Fulvĭi, surnamed Valentīnum (Valenza), in Liguria on the Po, on the road from Dertona to Asta.—9. Gallorum (Castel Franco), in Gallia Cisalpina on the Aemilia Via between Mutina and Bononia, memorable for the 2 battles fought between Antonius and the consuls Pansa and Hirtius.—10. Hadriāni (Voorburg), in the island of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica, where several Roman remains have been found.—11. Julĭi or Julĭum (Forojuliensis: Frejus), a Roman colony founded by Julius Caesar, B. C. 44, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the river Argenteus and on the coast, 600 stadia N. E. of Massilia. It possessed a good harbour, and was the usual station of a part of the Roman fleet. It was the birthplace of Agricola. At Frejus are the remains of a Roman aqueduct, circus, arch, &c.—12. Julĭi or Julĭum (Friaul), a fortified town and a Roman colony in the country of the Carni, N. E. of Aquileia: in the middle ages it became a place of importance.—13. Julĭum. See ILLITURGIS.—14. Livĭi (Forli), in Cisalpine Gaul, in the territory of the Boii, on the Aemilia Via, S. W. of Ravenna: here the Gothic king Athaulf married Galla Placidia.—15. Popĭlĭi (Forlimpopoli), in Gallia Cisalpina, E. of No. 14, and on the same road.—16. Popĭlĭi (Polla), in Lucania, E. of Paestum on the Tanger and on the Popilia Via. On the wall of an inn at Polla was discovered an inscription respecting the praetor Popilius.—17. Segusiānōrum (Feurs), in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Liger, and W. of Lugdunum, a town of the Segusiani and a Roman colony with the surname Julia Felix.—18. Semprōnĭi (Forosemproniensis: Fossombrone), a municipium in Umbria, on the Flaminia Via.—19. Vocontĭi (Vidauban E. of Canet), a town of the Salyes in Gallia Narbonensis.

Fŏsi, a people of Germany, the neighbours and allies of the Cherusci, in whose fate they shared. [CHERUSCI.] It is supposed that their name is retained in the river Fuse in Brunswick.

Fossa or Fossae, a canal. 1. Clōdĭa, a canal between the mouth of the Po and Altinum in the N. of Italy; there was a town of the same name upon it.—2. Cluilĭa or Cluiliae, a trench about 5 miles from Rome, said to have been the ditch with which the Alban king Cluilius protected his camp, when he marched against Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius.—3. Corbulōnis, a canal in the island of the Batavi, connecting the Maas and the Rhine, dug by command of Corbulo in the reign of Claudius.—4. Drusiānae or Drusīnae, a canal which Drusus caused his soldiers to dig in B. C. 11, uniting the Rhine with the Yssel. It probably commenced near Arnheim on the Rhine and fell into the Yssel near Doesberg. — 5. Mariāna or Mariānae, a canal dug by command of Marius during his war with the Cimbri, in order to connect the Rhone with the Mediterranean, and thus make an easier passage for vessels into the Rhone, because the mouths of the river were frequently choked up with sand. The canal commenced near Arelate, but in consequence of the frequent changes in the course of the Rhone, it is impossible now to trace the course of the canal. — 6. Xerxis. See Athos.

Franci, i. e., " the Free men," a confederacy of German tribes, formed on the Lower Rhine in the place of the ancient league of the Cherusci, and consisting of the Sigambri, the chief tribe, the Chamavi, Ampsivarii, Bructeri, Chatti, &c. They are first mentioned about A. D. 240. After carrying on frequent wars with the Romans, they at length settled permanently in Gaul, of which they became the rulers under their great king Clovis, A. D. 496.

Fregellae (Fregellānus: Ceprano), an ancient and important town of the Volsci on the Liris in Latium, conquered by the Romans, and colonised B. C. 328. It took part with the allies in the Social war, and was destroyed by Opimius.

Fregēnae, sometimes called Fregellae (Torre Maccarese), a town of Etruria on the coast between Alsium and the Tiber, on a low swampy shore, colonised by the Romans, B. C. 245.

Frentāni, a Samnite people, inhabiting a fertile and well watered territory on the coast of the Adriatic, from the river Sagrus on the N. (and subsequently almost as far N. as from the Aternus) to the river Frento on the S., from the latter of which rivers they derived their name. They were bounded by the Marrucini on the N., by the Peligni and by Samnium on the W., and by Apulia on the S. They submitted to the Romans in B. C. 304, and concluded a peace with the republic.

Frento (Fortore), a river in Italy forming the boundary between the Frentani and Apulia, rises in the Apennines and falls into the Adriatic sea.

Friniātes, a people in Liguria, probably the same as the Briniates, who, after being subdued by the Romans, were transplanted to Samnium.

Frisiabōnes, probably a tribe of the Frisii, inhabiting the islands at the mouth of the Rhine.

Frīsii, a people in the N. W. of Germany, inhabited the coast from the E. mouth of the Rhine to the Amisia (Ems), and were bounded on the S. by the Bructeri, consequently in the modern Friesland, Gröningen, &c. Tacitus divided them into Majores and Minores, the former probably in the E., and the latter in the W. of the country. The Frisii were on friendly terms with the Romans from the time of the first campaign of Drusus till A. D. 28, when the oppressions of the Roman officers drove them to revolt. In the 5th century we find them joining the Saxons and Angli in their invasion of Britain.

Frontīnus, Sex. Julīus, was praetor A. D. 70, and in 75 succeeded Cerealis as governor of Britain, where he distinguished himself by the conquest of the Silures, and maintained the Roman power unbroken until superseded by Agricola in 78. In 97 Frontinus was nominated curator aquarum. He died about 106. Two works undoubtedly by this author are still extant :— 1. Strategematicon Libri IV., a sort of treatise on the art of war, developed in a collection of the sayings and doings of the most renowned leaders of antiquity. 2. De Aquaeductibus Urbis Romae Libri II., which forms a valuable contribution to the history of architecture. The best editions of the Strategematica are, by Oudendorp, Lug. Bat. 1779, and by Schwebel, Lips. 1772 ; of the De Aquaeductibus by Polenus, Patav. 1722. — In the collection of the Agrimensores or Rei Agrariae Auctores (ed. Goesius, Amst. 1674 ; ed. Lachmann, Berlin, 1848), are preserved some treatises usually ascribed to Sex. Julius Frontinus. The collection consists of fragments connected with the art of measuring land and ascertaining boundaries. It was put together without skill, pages of different works being mixed up together, and the writings of one author being sometimes attributed to another.

Fronto, M. Cornēlius, was born at Cirta in Numidia, in the reign of Domitian, and came to Rome in the reign of Hadrian, where he attained great celebrity as a pleader and a teacher of rhetoric. He was entrusted with the education of the future emperors, M. Aurelius and L. Verus, and was rewarded with wealth and honours. He was raised to the consulship in 143. So great was his fame as a speaker, that a sect of rhetoricians arose who were denominated Frontoniani. Following the example of their founder, they avoided the exaggeration of the Greek sophistical school, and bestowed especial care on the purity of their language and the simplicity of their style. Fronto lived till the reign of M. Aurelius. The latest of his epistles belongs to the year 166. — Up to a recent period no work of Fronto was known to be in existence, with the exception of a corrupt and worthless tract entitled De Differentiis Vocabulorum, and a few fragments preserved by the grammarians. But about the year 1814 Angelo Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the Ambrosian library at Milan a considerable number of letters which had passed between Fronto, Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and various friends, together with some short essays. These were published by Mai at Milan in 1815, and in an improved form by Niebuhr, Buttmann and Heindorf, Berlin, 1816. Subsequently Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the Vatican library at Rome, upwards of 100 new letters ; and he published these at Rome in 1823, together with those which had been previously discovered.

Fronto, Papīrius, a jurist, who probably lived about the time of Antoninus Pius, or rather earlier.

Frusīno (Frusinas, -ātis : Frosinone), a town of the Hernici in Latium, in the valley of the river Cosas, and subsequently a Roman colony. It was celebrated for its prodigies, which occurred here almost more frequently than at any other place.

Fucentis, Fucentīa. [Alba, No. 4.]

Fucīnus Lacus (Lago di Celano or Capistrano), a large lake in the centre of Italy and in the country of the Marsi, about 30 miles in circumference, into which all the mountain streams of the Apennines flow. As the water of this lake had no visible outlet, and frequently inundated the surrounding country, the emperor Claudius constructed an emissarium or artificial channel for carrying off the waters of the lake into the river Liris. This emissarium is still nearly perfect : it is almost 3 miles in length. It appears that the actual drainage was relinquished soon after the death of Claudius, for it was reopened by Hadrian.

Fufīus Calēnus. [Calenus.]

Fufidĭus, a jurist, who probably lived between the time of Vespasian and Hadrian.

Fulgentĭus, Fabĭus Planciădes, a Latin grammarian of uncertain date, probably not earlier than the 6th century after Christ, appears to have been of African origin. He is the author of: 1. Mythologiarum Libri III. ad Catum Presbyterum, a collection of the most remarkable tales connected with the history and exploits of gods and heroes. 2. Expositio Sermonum Antiquorum cum Testimoniis ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum, a glossary of obsolete words and phrases; of very little value. 3. Liber de Expositione Virgilianae Continentiae ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum, a title which means, an explanation of what is contained in Virgil, that is to say, of the esoteric truths allegorically conveyed in the Virgilian poems. — The best edition of these works is in the Mythographi Latini of Muncker, Auct. 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lug. Bat. 1742.

Fulgīnĭa, Fulgīnĭum (Fulginas, -ātis: Foligno), a town in the interior of Umbria on the Via Flaminia, was a municipium.

Fulvĭa. 1. The mistress of Q. Curius, one of Catiline's conspirators, divulged the plot to Cicero. — 2. A daughter of M. Fulvius Bambalio of Tusculum, thrice married, 1st to the celebrated P. Clodius, by whom she had a daughter Clodia, afterwards the wife of Octavianus; 2ndly to C. Scribonius Curio, and 3rdly to M. Antony, by whom she had 2 sons. She was a bold and ambitious woman. In the proscription of B. C. 43 she acted with the greatest arrogance and brutality: she gazed with delight upon the head of Cicero, the victim of her husband. Her turbulent and ambitious spirit excited a new war in Italy in 41. Jealous of the power of Octavianus, and anxious to withdraw Antony from the E., she induced L. Antonius, the brother of her husband, to take up arms against Octavianus. But Lucius was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into Perusia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year (40). Fulvia fled to Greece and died at Sicyon in the course of the same year.

Fulvĭa Gens, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious Roman gentes. It originally came from Tusculum. The principal families in the gens are those of Centumalus, Flaccus, Nobilior, and Paetinus.

Fundānĭus. 1. C., father of Fundania, the wife of M. Terentius Varro, is one of the speakers in Varro's dialogue, De Re Rustica. — 2. M., defended by Cicero, B. C. 65; but the scanty fragments of Cicero's speech do not enable us to understand the nature of the charge. — 3. A writer of comedies praised by Horace (Sat. i. 10. 41, 42).

Fundi (Fundanus: Fondi), an ancient town in Latium on the Appia Via, at the head of a narrow bay of the sea running a considerable way into the land, called the Lacus Fundānus. Fundi was a municipium, and was subsequently colonised by the veterans of Augustus. The surrounding country produced good wine. There are still remains at Fondi of the walls of the ancient town.

Furcŭlae Caudīnae. [Caudium.]

Fūrĭa Gens, an ancient patrician gens, probably came from Tusculum. The most celebrated families of the gens bore the names of Camillus, Medullinus, Pacilus, and Philus. For others of less note see Bibaculus, Crassipes, Purpureo.

Fŭrĭae. [Eumenides.]

Furīna, an ancient Roman divinity, who had a sacred grove at Rome. Her worship seems to have become extinct at an early time. An annual festival (Furinalia or Furinales feriae) had been celebrated in honour of her, and a flamen (flamen Furinalis) conducted her worship. She had also a temple in the neighbourhood of Satricum.

C. Furnĭus, a friend and correspondent of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 50; sided with Caesar in the civil war; and after Caesar's death was a staunch adherent of Antony. After the battle of Actium, 31, he was reconciled to Augustus, through the mediation of his son, was appointed consul in 29, and was prefect of Hither Spain in 21.

Fuscus. 1. Arellĭus, a rhetorician at Rome in the latter years of Augustus, instructed in rhetoric the poet Ovid. He declaimed more frequently in Greek than in Latin, and his style of declamation is described by Seneca, as more brilliant than solid, antithetical rather than eloquent. His rival in teaching and declaiming was Porcius Latro. [Latro.] — 2. Aristĭus, a friend of the poet Horace, who addressed to him an ode (Carm. i. 22) and an epistle (Ep. i. 10), and who also introduces him elsewhere (Sat. i. 9. 61; 10. 83). — 3. Cornēlĭus, one of the most active adherents of Vespasian in his contest for the empire, A. D. 69. In the reign of Domitian he was sent against the Dacians, by whom he was defeated. Martial wrote an epitaph on Fuscus (Ep. vi. 76), in which he refers to the Dacian campaign.

G.

Găbae (Γάβαι). 1. (Darabgherd ?), a fortress and royal residence in the interior of Persis, S. E. of Pasargadae, near the borders of Carmania. — 2. Or Gabaza, or Cazaba, a fortress in Sogdiana. on the confines of the Massagetae.

Găbăla (Γάβαλα), a sea-port town of Syria Seleucis, S. of Laodicea; whence good storax was obtained.

Gabăli, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, whose country possessed silver mines and good pasturage. Their chief town was Anderitum (Anterieux).

Găbĭāna or -ēnē (Γαβιανή, Γαβιηνή), a fertile district in the Persian province of Susiana, W. of M. Zagros.

Găbĭi (Gabīnus: nr. Castiglione Ru.), a town in Latium, on the Lacus Gabinus (Lago di Gavi), between Rome and Praeneste, was in early times one of the most powerful Latin cities; a colony from Alba Longa; and the place, according to tradition, where Romulus was brought up. It was taken by Tarquinius Superbus by stratagem, and it was in ruins in the time of Augustus (Gabiis desertior vicus, Hor. Ep. i. 11. 7). The cinctus Gabinus, a peculiar mode of wearing the toga at Rome, appears to have been derived from this town. In the neighbourhood of Gabii are the immense stone quarries, from which a part of Rome was built.

A. Gabīnĭus, dissipated his fortune in youth by his profligate mode of life. He was tribune of the plebs B. C. 66, when he proposed and carried a law conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates. He was praetor in 61, and consul in 58 with L. Piso. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. In 57 Gabinius went to Syria as proconsul. His first attention was directed to the affairs of Judea.

He restored Hyrcanus to the high priesthood, of which he had been dispossessed by Alexander, the son of Aristobulus. He next marched into Egypt, and restored Ptolemy Auletes to the throne. The restoration of Ptolemy had been forbidden by a decree of the senate, and by the Sibylline books; but Gabinius had been promised by the king a sum of 10,000 talents for this service, and accordingly set at nought both the senate and the Sibyl. His government of the province was marked in other respects by the most shameful venality and oppression. He returned to Rome in 54. He was accused of majestas or high treason, on account of his restoration of Ptolemy Auletes, in defiance of the Sibyl, and the authority of the senate. He was acquitted on this charge; but he was forthwith accused of repetundae, for the illegal receipt of 10,000 talents from Ptolemy. He was defended by Cicero, who had been persuaded by Pompey, much against his will, to undertake the defence. Gabinius, however, was condemned on this charge, and went into exile. He was recalled from exile by Caesar in 49, and in the following year (48) was sent into Illyricum by Caesar with some newly levied troops, in order to reinforce Q. Cornificius. He died in Illyricum about the end of 48, or the beginning of the following year.

Gădăra (Γάδαρα: Γαδαρηνός: Um-Keis), a large fortified city of Palestine, one of the 10 which formed the Decapolis in Peraea, stood a little S. of the Hieromax (Yarmuk), an eastern tributary of the Jordan. The surrounding district, S. E. of the Lake of Tiberias, was called Gadăris, and was very fertile. Gadara was probably favoured by the Greek kings of Syria, as it is sometimes called Antiochia and Seleucia; it was restored by Pompey: Augustus presented it to king Herod, after whose death it was assigned to the province of Syria. It was made the seat of a Christian bishopric. There were celebrated baths in its neighbourhood, at Amatha.

Gādes (τὰ Γάδειρα: Γαδειρεύς, Gaditānus: Cadiz), a very ancient town in Hispania Baetica, W. of the Pillars of Hercules, founded by the Phoenicians, and one of the chief seats of their commerce in the W. of Europe, was situated on a small island of the same name (I. de Leon), separated from the mainland by a narrow channel, which in its narrowest part was only the breadth of a stadium, and over which a bridge was built. Herodotus says (iv. 8) that the island of Erythīa was close to Gadeira; whence most later writers supposed the island of Gades to be the same as the mythical island of Erythia, from which Hercules carried off the oxen of Geryon. A new town was built by Cornelius Balbus, a native of Gades, and the circumference of the old and new towns together was only 20 stadia. There were, however, several inhabitants on the mainland opposite the island, as well as on a smaller island (S. Sebastian or Trocadero) in the immediate neighbourhood of the larger one. After the 1st Punic War Gades came into the hands of the Carthaginians; and in the 2nd Punic war it surrendered of its own accord to the Romans. Its inhabitants received the Roman franchise from Julius Caesar. It became a municipium, and was called Augusta urbs Julia Gaditana.—Gades was from the earliest to the latest times an important commercial town. Its inhabitants were wealthy, luxurious, and licentious; and their lascivious dances were celebrated at Rome. (Juv. xi. 162.) Gades possessed celebrated temples of Cronus and Hercules. Its drinking water was as bad in antiquity as it is in the present day.—Gades gave its name to the Fretum Gaditānum, the straits at the entrance of the Mediterranean between Europe and Africa (Straits of Gibraltar).

Gaea or Ge (Γαῖα or Γῆ), the personification of the earth. Homer describes her as a divine being, to whom black sheep were sacrificed, and who was invoked by persons taking oaths; and he calls her the mother of Erechtheus and Tithyus. In Hesiod she is the first being that sprang from Chaos, and gave birth to Uranus and Pontus. By Uranus she became the mother of Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rheia, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, Thetys, Cronos, the Cyclopes, Brontes, Steropes, Arges, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges. These children were hated by their father, and Ge therefore concealed them in the bosom of the earth; but she made a large iron sickle, gave it to her sons, and requested them to take vengeance upon their father. Cronos undertook the task, and mutilated Uranus. The drops of blood, which fell from him upon the earth (Ge), became the seeds of the Erinnyes, the Gigantes, and the Melian nymphs. Subsequently Ge became, by Pontus, the mother of Nereus, Thaumas, Phorcys, Ceto, and Eurybia. Ge belonged to the gods of the nether world (θεοὶ χθόνιοι), and hence she is frequently mentioned where they are invoked. The surnames and epithets given to her have more or less reference to her character as the all-producing and all-nourishing mother (mater omniparens et alma). Her worship appears to have been universal among the Greeks, and she had temples or altars in almost all the cities of Greece. At Rome the earth was worshipped under the name of Tellus (which is only a variation of Terra). She was regarded by the Romans also as one of the gods of the nether world (Inferi), and is mentioned in connection with Dis and the Manes. A temple was built to her by the consul P. Sempronius Sophus, in B. C. 304. Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of April, and was called Fordicidia or Hordicidia. The sacrifice, consisting of cows, was offered up in the Capitol in the presence of the Vestals.

Gaeson, Gaesus, or Gessus (Γαίσων), a river of Ionia in Asia Minor, falling into the Gulf of Maeander near the promontory of Mycale.

Gaetūlia (Γαιτουλία), the interior of N. Africa, S. of Mauretania, Numidia, and the region bordering on the Syrtes, reaching to the Atlantic Ocean on the W., and of very indefinite extent towards the E. and S. The people included under the name Gaetūli (Γαιτοῦλοι), in its widest sense, were the inhabitants of the region between the countries just mentioned and the Great Desert, and also in the Oases of the latter, and nearly as far S. as the river Niger. They were a great nomad race, including several tribes, the chief of whom were the Autololes and Pharusii on the W. coast, the Darae, or Gaetuli-Darae, in the steppes of the Great Atlas, and the Melanogaetuli, a black race resulting from the intermixture of the Gaetuli with their S. neighbours, the Nigritae. The pure Gaetulians were not an Aethiopic (i. e. negro), but a Libyan race, and were most probably of Asiatic origin. They are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Berbers.

Gainas. [ARCADIUS.]

Gāius or Cāius, a celebrated Roman jurist, wrote under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. His works were very numerous, and great use was made of them in the compilation of the Digest. One of his most celebrated works was an elementary treatise on Roman law, entitled Institutiones, in 4 books. This work was for a long time the ordinary text book used by those who were commencing the study of the Roman law; but it went out of use after the compilation of the Institutiones of Justinian, and was finally lost. This long lost work was discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 in the library of the Chapter at Verona. The MS. containing Gaius was a palimpsest one. The original writing of Gaius had on some pages been washed out, and on others scratched out, and the whole was re-written with the Letters of St. Jerome. The task of deciphering the original MS. was a very difficult one, and some parts were completely destroyed. It was first published by Göschen in 1821: a second edition appeared in 1824, and a third in 1842.

Gagae (Γάγαι), a town on the coast of Lycia, E. of Myra, whence was obtained the mineral called Gagātes lapis, that is, jet, or, as it is still called in German, gagat.

Galanthis. [GALINTHIAS.]

Gălătēa (Γαλάτεια), daughter of Nereus and Doris. For details, see ACIS.

Gălătĭa (Γαλατία: Γαλάτης: in the E. part of Anadoli and the W. part of Rumili), a country of Asia Minor, composed of parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia, and bounded on the W., S., and S. E. by those countries, and on the N. E., N., and N. W. by Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. It derived its name from its inhabitants, who were Gauls that had invaded and settled in Asia Minor at various periods during the 3d century B. C. First, a portion of the army which Brennus led against Greece, separated from the main body, and marched into Thrace, and, having pressed forward as far as the shores of the Propontis, some of them crossed the Hellespont on their own account, while others, who had reached Byzantium, were invited to pass the Bosporus by Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, who required their aid against his brother Zipoetus (B. C. 279). They speedily overran all Asia Minor within the Taurus, and exacted tribute from its various princes, and served as mercenaries not only in the armies of these princes, but also of the kings of Syria and Egypt; and, according to one account, a body of them found their way to Babylon. During their ascendancy, other bodies of Gauls followed them into Asia. Their progress was at length checked by the arms of the kings of Pergamus: Eumenes fought against them with various fortune; but Attalus I. gained a complete victory over them (B. C. 230), and compelled them to settle down within the limits of the country thenceforth called Galatia, and also, on account of the mixture of Greeks with the Celtic inhabitants, which speedily took place, Graeco-Galatia and Gallograecia. The people of Galatia adopted to a great extent Greek habits and manners and religious observances, but preserved their own language, which is spoken of as resembling that of the Treviri. They retained also their political divisions and forms of government. They consisted of 3 great tribes, the Tolistobogi, the Trocmi, and the Tectosages, each subdivided into 4 parts, called by the Greeks τετραρχίαι. At the head of each of these 12 Tetrarchies was a chief, or Tetrarch, who appointed the chief magistrate (δικαστής), and the commander of the army (στρατοφύλαξ), and 2 lieutenant-generals (ὑποστρατοφύλακες). The 12 tetrarchs together had the general government of the country, but their power was checked by an assistant senate of 300, who met in a place called Drynaemetum (or, probably, Dryaenetum, i. e. the oak-grove), and had jurisdiction in all capital cases. This form of government had a natural tendency to monarchy, according as either of the 12 tetrarchs became more powerful than the rest, especially under the protection of the Romans, to whom Galatia became virtually subject as the result of the campaign which the consul Cn. Manlius undertook against the Gauls, to punish them for the assistance they had given to Antiochus the Great (B. C. 189). At length one of the tetrarchs, DEIOTARUS, was rewarded for his services to the Romans in the Mithridatic War, by the title of king, together with a grant of Pontus and Armenia Minor; and after the death of his successor Amyntas, Galatia was made by Augustus a Roman province (B. C. 25). It was soon after enlarged by the addition of Paphlagonia. Under Constantine it was restricted to its old limits, and under Valens it was divided into 2 provinces, Galatia Prima and Galatia Secunda. The country was beautiful and fertile, being watered by the rivers Halys and Sangarius. Its only important cities were, in the S.W. PESSINUS, the capital of the Tolistobogi; in the centre ANCYRA, the capital of the Tectosages; and in the N. E., TAVIUM, the capital of the Trocmi. — From the Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians, we learn not only that many Christian churches had been formed in Galatia during the apostolic age, but also that those churches consisted, in great part, of Jewish converts.

Galaxius (Γαλάξιος), a small river in Boeotia, on which stood a temple of Apollo Galaxios: it derived its name from its milky colour, which was owing to the chalky nature of the soil through which it flowed.

Galba, Sulpĭcius, patricians. 1. P., consul B. C. 211, received Macedonia as his province, where he remained as proconsul till 204, and carried on the war against Philip. In 200, he was consul a second time, and again obtained Macedonia as his province; but he was unable to accomplish any thing of importance against Philip, and was succeeded in the command in the following year by Villius Tappulus. He was one of the 10 commissioners sent to Greece in 196, after the defeat of Philip by Flamininus, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Antiochus in 193. — 2. Ser., was praetor 151, and received Spain as his province. His name is infamous on account of his treacherous and atrocious murder of the Lusitanians, with their wives and children, who had surrendered to him on the promise of receiving grants of land. Viriathus was one of the few Lusitanians, who escaped from the bloody scene. [VIRIATHUS.] On his return to Rome in 149, he was brought to trial on account of his horrible massacre of the Lusitanians. His conduct was denounced in the strongest terms by Cato, who was then 85 years old, but he was nevertheless acquitted. He was consul 144. Cicero praises his oratory in the highest terms. — 3. Ser., great-grandfather of the emperor Galba, served under Caesar in the Gallic war, and was praetor in 54. After Caesar's death he served against Antony in the war of Mutina.—4. C., father of the emperor Galba, was consul in A. D. 22.

Galba, Ser. Sulpĭcius, Roman emperor, from June A. D. 68 to January, A. D. 69. He was born near Terracina, on the 24th of December, B. C. 3. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him, that one day he would be at the head of the Roman world, from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents. From his parents he inherited great wealth. He was invested with the curule offices before attaining the legitimate age. He was praetor A. D. 20, and consul 33. After his consulship he had the government of Gaul, 39, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him to seize the empire, but he preferred living in a private station. Claudius entrusted him, in 45, with the administration of Africa, which he governed with wisdom and integrity. In the reign of Nero he lived for several years in retirement, through fear of becoming the victim of the tyrant's suspicion; but in 61, Nero gave him the government of Hispania Tarraconensis, where he remained for 8 years. In 68 Vindex rebelled in Gaul. About the same time Galba was informed that Nero had sent secret orders for his assassination. He therefore resolved at once to follow the example of Vindex; but he did not assume the imperial title, and professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. Shortly afterwards Nero was murdered; and Galba thereupon proceeded to Rome, where he was acknowledged as emperor. But his severity and avarice soon made him unpopular with his new subjects, and especially with the soldiers. His powers had also become enfeebled by age, and he was completely under the sway of favourites, who perpetrated many enormities in his name. Perceiving the weakness of his government, he adopted Piso Licinianus, a noble young Roman, as his successor. But this only hastened his ruin. Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, formed a conspiracy among the soldiers, who rose in rebellion 6 days after the adoption of Piso. Galba was murdered, and Otho was proclaimed emperor.

Galēnus, Claudĭus, commonly called Galen, a very celebrated physician, whose works have had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times. He was born at Pergamum in A. D. 130. His father Nicon, who was an architect and geometrician, carefully superintended his education. In his 17th year (146), his father, who had hitherto destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and, in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of Medicine. He at first studied medicine in his native city. In his 20th year (149), he lost his father, and about the same time he went to Smyrna for the purpose of studying under Pelops the physician, and Albinus the Platonic philosopher. He afterwards studied at Corinth and Alexandria. He returned to Pergamum in his 29th year (158), and was immediately appointed physician to the school of gladiators, an office which he filled with great reputation and success. In 164 he quitted his native country on account of some popular commotions, and went to Rome for the first time. Here he stayed about 4 years, and gained great reputation from his skill in anatomy and medicine. He returned to Pergamum in 168, but had scarcely settled there, when he received a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia. From Aquileia Galen followed M. Aurelius to Rome in 170. When the emperor again set out, to conduct the war on the Danube, Galen with difficulty obtained permission to be left behind at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Aesculapius. Before leaving the city the emperor committed to the medical care of Galen his son Commodus, who was then 9 years of age. Galen stayed at Rome some years, during which time he employed himself in lecturing, writing, and practising, with great success. He subsequently returned to Pergamum, but whether he again visited Rome is uncertain. He is said to have died in the year 200, at the age of 70, in the reign of Septimius Severus; but it is not improbable that he lived some years longer. Galen wrote a great number of works on medical and philosophical subjects. The works still extant under the name of Galen consist of 83 treatises acknowledged to be genuine; 19 whose genuineness has been doubted; 45 undoubtedly spurious; 19 fragments; and 15 commentaries on different works of Hippocrates. Galen attached himself exclusively to none of the medical sects into which the profession was divided, but chose from the tenets of each what he believed to be good and true, and called those persons slaves who designated themselves as followers of Hippocrates, Praxagoras, or any other man. The best edition of his works is by Kühn, Lips. 1821—1833, 20 vols. 8vo.

Galepsus (Γαληψός: Γαλήψιος), a town in Macedonia, on the Toronaic gulf.

Gālĕrĭus Maximiānus. [MAXIMIANUS.]

Gālĕrĭus Trachălus. [TRACHALUS.]

Galēsus (Galeso), a river in the S. of Italy, flows into the gulf of Tarentum, through the meadows where the sheep fed whose wool was so celebrated in antiquity (dulce pellitis ovibus Galaesi flumen, Hor. Carm. ii. 6. 10.)

Gālĕus (Γάλεος), that is, "the lizard," son of Apollo and Themisto, the daughter of the Hyperborean king Zabius. In pursuance of an oracle of the Dodonean Zeus, Galeus emigrated to Sicily, where he built a sanctuary to his father Apollo. The Galeōtae, a family of Sicilian soothsayers, derived their origin from him. The principal seat of the Galeotae was the town of Hybla, which was hence called Galeotis or Galeatis.

Galilaea (Γαλιλαία), at the birth of Christ, was the N.-most of the 3 divisions of Palestine W. of the Jordan. It lay between the Jordan and the Mediterranean on the E. and W., and the mountains of Hermon and Carmel on the N. and S. It was divided into Upper or N. Galilee, and Lower or S. Galilee. It was very fertile and densely peopled; but its inhabitants were a mixed race of Jews, Syrians, Phoenicians, Greeks, and others, and were therefore despised by the Jews of Judaea. [PALAESTINA.]

Galinthĭas or Galanthis (Ov. Met. ix. 306), daughter of Proetus of Thebes and a friend of Alcmene. When Alcmene was on the point of giving birth to Hercules, and the Moerae and Ilithyiae, at the request of Hera, were endeavouring to delay the birth, Galinthias suddenly rushed in with the false report that Alcmene had given birth to a son. The hostile goddesses were so surprised at this information that they dropped their arms.

Thus the charm was broken, and Alcmene was enabled to give birth to Hercules. The deluded goddesses avenged the deception practised upon them by metamorphosing Galinthias into a weasel or cat (γαλῆ). Hecate, however, took pity upon her, and made her her attendant, and Hercules afterwards erected a sanctuary to her. At Thebes it was customary at the festival of Hercules first to offer sacrifices to Galinthias.

Galla. 1. Wife of Constantius, son of the emperor Constantius Chlorus. She was the mother of Gallus Caesar. [GALLUS.]—2. Daughter of the emperor Valentinian I., and 2nd wife of Theodosius the Great.—3. GALLA PLACIDIA or simply PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius the Great by No. 2. She fell into the hands of Alaric, when he took Rome, A. D. 410; and Ataulphus, the Gothic king, married her in 414. After the death of Ataulphus, she was restored to Honorius; and in 417 she was married to Constantius, to whom she bore the emperor Valentinian III. During the minority of the latter she governed the Western empire. She died about 450.

Gallaecĭa, the country of the Gallaeci (Καλλαϊκοί), in the N. of Spain, between the Astures and the Durius, was in earlier times included in Lusitania. Gallaecia was sometimes used in a wider sense to include the country of the Astures and the Cantabri. It produced tin, gold, and a precious stone called gemma Gallaica. Its inhabitants were some of the most uncivilised in Spain. They were defeated with great slaughter by D. Brutus, consul B. C. 138, who obtained in consequence the surname of Gallaecus.

Gallĭa (ἡ Κελτική, Γαλατία), was used before the time of Julius Caesar, to indicate all the land inhabited by the Galli or Celtae, and consequently included not only the later Gaul and the N. of Italy, but a part of Spain, the greater part of Germany, the British isles, and other countries. The early history of the Celtic race, and their various settlements in different parts of Europe, are related under CELTAE.—1. Gallĭa, also called Gallĭa Transalpīna or Gallĭa Ulterĭor, to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina, or the N. of Italy. Gallĭa Braccāta and Gallĭa Comāta are also used in contradistinction to Gallia Togata or the N. of Italy, but these names are not identical with the whole of Gallia Transalpina. Gallia Braccata was the part of the country first subdued by the Romans, the later Provincia, and was so called, because the inhabitants wore braccae or trowsers. Gallia Comata was the remainder of the country, excluding Gallia Braccata, and derived its name from the inhabitants wearing their hair long. The Romans were acquainted with only a small portion of Transalpine Gaul till the time of Caesar. In the time of Augustus it was bounded on the S. by the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean; on the E. by the river Varus and the Alps, which separated it from Italy, and by the river Rhine, which separated it from Germany; on the N. by the German Ocean and the English Channel; and on the W. by the Atlantic; thus including not only the whole of France and Belgium, but a part of Holland, a great part of Switzerland, and all the provinces of Germany W. of the Rhine. The greater part of this country is a plain, well watered by numerous rivers. The principal mountains were Mons CEBENNA or Gebenna in the S.; the lofty range of Mons JURA in the E., separating the Sequani and the Helvetii; and Mons VOSEGUS or VOGESUS, a continuation of the Jura. The chief forest was the Silva ARDUENNA, extending from the Rhine and the Treviri as far as the Scheldt. The principal rivers were, in the E. and N., the RHENUS (Rhine), with its tributaries the MOSA (Maas) and MOSELLA (Moselle); the SEQUANA (Seine), with its tributary the MATRONA: in the centre the LIGERIS (Loire); in the W. the GARUMNA (Garonne); and in the S. the RHODANUS (Rhone). The country was celebrated for its fertility in ancient times, and possessed a numerous and warlike population.—The Greeks, at a very early period, became acquainted with the S. coast of Gaul, where they founded, in B. C. 600, the important town of MASSILIA, which in its turn founded several colonies, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the neighbouring districts. The Romans did not attempt to make any conquests in Transalpine Gaul till they had finally conquered not only Africa, but Greece and a great part of Western Asia. In B. C. 125 the consul M. Fulvius Flaccus commenced the subjugation of the Salluvii in the S. of Gaul. In the next 3 years (124—122) the Salluvii were completely subdued by Sextius Calvinus, and the colony of Aquae Sextiae (Aix) was founded in their country. In 121 the Allobroges were defeated by the proconsul Domitius Ahenobarbus; and in the same year Q. Fabius Maximus gained a great victory over the united forces of the Allobroges and Arverni, at the confluence of the Isara and the Rhone. The S. of Gaul was now made a Roman province; and in 118 was founded the colony of Narbo Martius (Narbonne), which was the chief town of the province. In Caesar's Commentaries the Roman province is called simply Provincia, in contradistinction to the rest of the country: hence comes the modern name of Provence. The rest of the country was subdued by Caesar after a struggle of several years (58—50). At this time Gaul was divided into 3 parts, Aquitania, Celtica, and Belgica, according to the 3 different races by which it was inhabited. The Aquitani dwelt in the S.W. between the Pyrenees and the Garumna; the Celtae, or Galli proper, in the centre and W., between the Garumna and the Sequana and the Matrona; and the Belgae in the N.E. between the two last mentioned rivers and the Rhine. The different tribes inhabiting Aquitania and Belgica are given elsewhere. [AQUITANIA: BELGAE.] The most important tribes of the Celtae or Galli were: 1. Between the Sequana and the Liger: the ARMORICI, the name of all the tribes dwelling on the coast between the mouths of these 2 rivers; the AULERCI, dwelling inland close to the Armorici; the NAMNETES, ANDECAVI or ANDES on the banks of the Liger; E. of them the CARNUTES; and on the Sequana, the PARISII, SENONES, and TRICASSES.—2. Between the Liger and the Garumna: on the coast the PICTONES and SANTONES; inland the TURONES, probably on both sides of the Liger, the BITURIGES CUBI, LEMOVICES, PETROCORII, and CADURCI; E. of these, in the mountains of Cebenna, the powerful ARVERNI (in the modern Auvergne); and S. of them the RUTENI.—3. On the Rhone and in the surrounding country, between the Rhone and the Pyrenees, the VOLCAE; between the Rhone and the Alps, the SALYES or SALLUVII; N. of them the CAVARES; between the Rhone, the Isara, and the Alps, the ALLOBROGES; and further N. the AEDUI, SEQUANI, and HELVETII, 3 of the most powerful people in all Gaul. —Augustus divided Gaul into 4 provinces. 1. Gallia Narbonensis, the same as the old Provincia. 2. G. Aquitanica, which extended from the Pyrenees to the Liger. 3. G. Lugdunensis, the country between the Liger, the Sequana, and the Arar, so called from the colony of Lugdunum (Lyon), founded by Munatius Plancus. 4. G. Belgica, the country between the Sequana, the Arar, and the Rhine. Shortly afterwards the portion of Belgica bordering on the Rhine, and inhabited by German tribes, was subdivided into 2 new provinces, called Germania Prima and Secunda, or Germania Superior and Inferior. At a later time the provinces of Gaul were still further subdivided, till at length, under the emperor Gratian, they reached the number of 17. — Gallia Narbonensis belonged to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul; the other provinces belonged to the emperor, and were governed by imperial legati. After the time of Claudius, when a formidable insurrection of the Gauls was suppressed, the country became more and more Romanized. The Latin language gradually became the language of the inhabitants, and Roman civilisation took deep root in all parts of the country. The rhetoricians and poets of Gaul occupy a distinguished place in the later history of Roman literature; and Burdigala, Narbo, Lugdunum, and other towns, possessed schools, in which literature and philosophy were cultivated with success. On the dissolution of the Roman empire, Gaul, like the other Roman provinces, was overrun by barbarians, and the greater part of it finally became subject to the Franci or Franks, under their king Clovis, about A. D. 496. — 2. Gallĭa Cisalpīna, also called G. Citerĭor and G. Togāta, a Roman province in the N. of Italy, was bounded on the W. by Liguria and Gallia Narbonensis (from which it was separated by the Alps), on the N. by Rhaetia and Noricum, on the E. by the Adriatic and Venetia (from which it was separated by the Athesis), and on the S. by Etruria and Umbria (from which it was separated by the river Rubico). It was divided by the Po into Gallia Transpadāna, also called Italia Transpadāna, in the N., and Gallia Cispadāna in the S. The greater part of the country is a vast plain, drained by the PADUS (Po) and its affluents, and has always been one of the most fertile countries of Europe. It was originally inhabited by Ligurians, Umbrians, Etruscans, and other races; but its fertility attracted the Gauls, who at different periods crossed the Alps, and settled in the country, after expelling the original inhabitants. We have mention of 5 distinct immigrations of Gauls into the N. of Italy. The 1st was in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, and is said to have been led by Bellovesus, who settled with his followers in the country of the Insubres, and built Milan. The 2nd consisted of the Cenomani, who settled in the neighbourhood of Brixia and Verona. The 3rd of the Salluvii, who pressed forward as far as the Ticinus. The 4th of the Boii and Lingones, who crossed the Po, and took possession of the country as far as the Apennines, driving out the Etruscans and Umbrians. The 5th immigration was the most important, consisting of the warlike race of the Senones, who invaded Italy in immense numbers, under the command of Brennus, and took Rome in B. C. 390. Part of them subsequently recrossed the Alps and returned home; but a great number of them remained in the N. of Italy, and were for more than a century a source of terror to the Romans. After the 1st Punic war the Romans resolved to make a vigorous effort to subdue their dangerous neighbours. In the course of 4 years (225—222) the whole country was conquered, and upon the conclusion of the war (222) was reduced to the form of a Roman province. The inhabitants, however, did not bear the yoke patiently, and it was not till after the final defeat of the Boii in 191 that the country became submissive to the Romans. — The most important tribes were: In Gallia Transpadana, in the direction of W. to E., the TAURINI, SALASSI, LIBICI, INSUBRES, CENOMANI: in G. Cispadana, in the same direction, the BOII, LINGONES, SENONES.

Galliēnus, with his full name, P. LICINIUS VALERIANUS EGNATIUS GALLIENUS, Roman emperor A. D. 260—268. He succeeded his father Valerian, when the latter was taken prisoner by the Persians in 260; but he had previously reigned in conjunction with his father from his accession in 253. Gallienus was indolent, profligate, and indifferent to the public welfare; and his reign was one of the most ignoble and disastrous in the history of Rome. The barbarians ravaged the fairest portion of the empire, and the inhabitants were swept away by one of the most frightful plagues recorded in history. This pestilence followed a long protracted famine. When it was at its greatest height, 5000 sick are said to have perished daily at Rome; and, after the scourge had passed away, it was found that the inhabitants of Alexandria were diminished by nearly two thirds. The complete dissolution of the empire was averted mainly by a series of internal rebellions. In every district able officers sprang up, who asserted and strove to maintain the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished as The Thirty Tyrants, in many cases arrested the progress of the invaders, and restored order in the provinces which they governed. Gallienus was at length slain by his own soldiers in 268, while besieging Milan, in which the usurper Aureolus had taken refuge.

Gallināria. 1. (Galinara), an island off the coast of Liguria, celebrated for its number of hens; whence its name. — 2. Silva, a forest of pine-trees near Cumae in Campania.

Gallĭo, Jūnĭus. 1. A Roman rhetorician, and a friend of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, whose son he adopted. He was put to death by Nero. In early life he had been a friend of Ovid (Ex Pont. iv. 11). — 2. Son of the rhetorician M. Annaeus Seneca, and an elder brother of the philosopher Seneca, was adopted by No. 1.

Q. Gallĭus, was a candidate for the praetorship in B. C. 64, and was accused of ambitus or bribery by M. Calidius. He was defended on that occasion by Cicero in an oration of which a few fragments have come down to us. He was praetor urbanus B. C. 63, and presided at the trial of C. Cornelius. — He left two sons, Q. Gallius, who was praetor in 43, and was put to death by the triumvirs; and M. Gallius, who is mentioned as one of Antony's partizans in 43.

Gallograecĭa. [GALATIA.]

Gallōnĭus, a public crier at Rome, probably contemporary with the younger Scipio, whose wealth and gluttony passed into the proverb "to live like Gallonius." He was satirised by Horace (Sat. ii. 2. 46).

Gallus, Aelius. 1. A jurist, contemporary with Cicero and Varro, though probably rather older than either. He was the author of a treatise, De Verborum, quae ad Jus Civile pertinent, Significatione, which is frequently cited by the grammarians. — 2. An intimate friend of the geographer Strabo, was praefect of Egypt in the reign of Augustus. In B. C. 24 he invaded Arabia, and after his army had suffered dreadfully from the heat and want of water, he was obliged to retreat with great loss.

Gallus, L. Anicius, praetor B. C. 168, conducted the war against Gentius, king of the Illyrians, whom he compelled to submit to the Romans.

Gallus, C. Aquillius, a distinguished Roman jurist, was a pupil of Q. Mucius Scaevola, and the instructor of Serv. Sulpicius. He was praetor along with Cicero, B.C. 66. He is often cited by the jurists in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from his own works in the Digest.

Gallus Saloninus, L. Asinius, son of C. Asinius Pollio, was consul B. C. 8. He was hated by Tiberius, because he had married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius. In A. D. 30, Tiberius got the senate to sentence him to death, and kept him imprisoned for 3 years, on the most scanty supply of food. He died in prison of starvation, but whether his death was compulsory or voluntary is unknown. Gallus wrote a work, entitled De Comparatione patris ac Ciceronis, which was unfavourable to the latter, and against which the emperor Claudius wrote his defence of Cicero.

Gallus, L. Caninius, was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 56, when he supported the views of Pompey. During the civil war he appears to have remained neutral. He died in 44.

Gallus, Cestius, governor of Syria (legatus, A. D. 64, 65), under whom the Jews broke out into the rebellion which ended in the destruction of their city and temple by Titus.

Gallus, Constantius, son of Julius Constantius and Galla, grandson of Constantius Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and elder brother by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. In A. D. 351 he was named Caesar by Constantius II., and was left in the command of the E., where he conducted himself with the greatest haughtiness and cruelty. In 354 he went to the W. to meet Constantius at Milan, but was arrested at Petovio in Pannonia, and sent to Pola in Istria, where he was beheaded in a prison.

Gallus, C. Cornelius, was born at Forum Julii (Frejus) in Gaul, of poor parents, about B. C. 66. He went to Italy at an early age, and began his career as a poet when he was about 20. He had already attained considerable distinction at the time of Caesar's death, 44; and upon the arrival of Octavian in Italy after that event, Gallus embraced his party, and soon acquired great influence with him. In 41 he was one of the triumviri appointed by Octavian to distribute lands in the N. of Italy among his veterans, and on that occasion he afforded protection to the inhabitants of Mantua and to Virgil. He afterwards accompanied Octavian to the battle of Actium, 31, and commanded a detachment of the army. After the battle, Gallus was sent with the army to Egypt, in pursuit of Antony; and when Egypt was made a Roman province, Octavian appointed Gallus the first prefect of the province. He remained in Egypt for nearly 4 years; but he incurred at length the enmity of Octavian, though the exact nature of his offence is uncertain. According to some accounts he spoke of the emperor in an offensive and insulting manner; he erected numerous statues of himself in Egypt, and had his own exploits inscribed on the pyramids. The senate deprived him of his estates, and sent him into exile; whereupon he put an end to his life by throwing himself upon his own sword, B. C. 26. The intimate friendship existing between Gallus and the most eminent men of the time, as Asinius Pollio, Virgil, Varus, and Ovid, and the high praise they bestow upon him, prove that he was a man of great intellectual powers and acquirements. Ovid (Trist. iv. 10. 5) assigns to him the first place among the Roman elegiac poets; and we know that he wrote a collection of elegies in 4 books, the principal subject of which was his love of Lycoris. But all his productions have perished; for the 4 epigrams in the Latin Anthology attributed to Gallus could not have been written by a contemporary of Augustus. Gallus translated into Latin the poems of Euphorion of Chalcis, but this translation is also lost. Some critics attribute to him the poem Ciris, usually printed among the works of Virgil, but the arguments do not appear satisfactory.

Gallus, Sulpicius, a distinguished orator, was praetor B. C. 169, and consul 166, when he fought against the Ligurians. In 168 he served as tribune of the soldiers under Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia, and during this campaign predicted an eclipse of the moon.

Gallus, Trebonianus, Roman emperor, A. D. 251–254. His full name was C. VIBIUS TREBONIANUS GALLUS. He served under Decius in the campaign against the Goths, 251, and he is said to have contributed by his treachery to the disastrous issue of the battle, which proved fatal to Decius and his son Herennius. Gallus was thereupon elected emperor, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of Decius, was nominated his colleague. He purchased a peace of the Goths by allowing them to retain their plunder, and promising them a fixed annual tribute. In 253 the Goths again invaded the Roman dominions, but they were driven back by Aemilianus, whose troops proclaimed him emperor in Moesia. Aemilianus thereupon marched into Italy; and Gallus was put to death by his own soldiers, together with his son Volusianus, before any collision had taken place between the opposing armies. The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonour. In addition to the misery produced by the inroads of the barbarians during this reign, a deadly pestilence broke out in 252, and continued its ravages over every part of the empire for 15 years.

Gallus. 1. A river in Bithynia, rising near Modra, on the borders of Phrygia, and falling into the Sangarius near Leucae (Lefkeh). — 2. A river in Galatia, which also fell into the Sangarius, near Pessinus. From it the priests of Cybele are said to have obtained their name of Galli.

Gamelii (γαμήλιοι θεοί), that is, the divinities protecting and presiding over marriage. These divinities are usually regarded as the protectors of marriage. Respecting the festival of the Gamelia see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.

Gandarae (Γανδᾶραι), an Indian people in the Paropamisus, on the N.W. of the Punjab, between the rivers Indus and Suastus. Under Xerxes they were subjects of the Persian empire. Their country was called Gandaritis (Γανδαρῖτις).

Gandarĭdae or Gandarītae (Γανδαρίδαι, Γανδαρῖται), an Indian people, in the middle of the Punjab, between the rivers Acesines (Chenab) and Hydraotes (Ravee), whose king, at the time of Alexander's invasion, was a cousin and namesake of the celebrated Porus. Whether they were different from the GANDARAE is uncertain. Sanskrit writers mention the Ghandâra in the centre of the Punjab.

Gangărĭdae (Γαγγαρίδαι), an Indian people about the mouths of the Ganges.

Ganges (Γάγγης: Ganges or Ganga), the greatest river of India, which it divided into the 2 parts named by the ancients India intra Gangem (Hindustan) and India Extra Gangem (Burmah, Cochin China, Siam, and the Malay Peninsula). It rises in the highest part of the Emodi Montes (Himalaya), and flows in a general S. E. direction till it falls by several mouths into the head of the Gangeticus Sinus (Bay of Bengal). Like the Nile, it overflows its banks periodically, and these inundations render its valley the most fertile part of India. The knowledge of the ancients respecting it was very imperfect, and they give very various accounts of its source, its size, and the number of its mouths. The breadth, which Diodorus Siculus assigns to it in the lower part of its course, 32 stadia, or about 3 miles, is perfectly correct. The following rivers are mentioned as its tributaries: Cainas, Jomanes or Diamunas, Sarabus, Condochates, Oedanes, Cosoagus or Cossoanus, Erannoboas, Sonus or Soas, Sittocestis, Solomatis, Sambus, Magon, Agoranis, Omalis, Commenases, Cacuthis, Andomatis, Amystis, Oxymagis, and Errhenysis.—The name is also applied to a city in the interior of India, on the Ganges, where it makes its great bend to the E., perhaps Allahabad.

Gangra (Γάγγρα: Kankari), a city of Paphlagonia, near the confines of Galatia, was originally a fortress; in the time of king Deiotarus, a royal residence; and under the later emperors, the capital of Paphlagonia.

Ganos (Γάνος), a fortress in Thrace, on the Propontis.

Ganȳmēdes (Γανυμήδης), son of Tros and Callirrhoë, and brother of Ilus and Assaracus, was the most beautiful of all mortals, and was carried off by the gods that he might fill the cup of Zeus, and live among the eternal gods. This is the Homeric account; but other traditions give different details. Some call him son of Laomedon, others son of Ilus, and others again of Erichthonius or Assaracus. The manner in which he was carried away from the earth is likewise differently described; for while Homer mentions the gods in general, later writers state that Zeus himself carried him off, either in his natural shape, or in the form of an eagle, or by means of his eagle. There is, further, no agreement as to the place where the event occurred; though later writers usually represent him as carried off from Mount Ida (captus ab Ida, Hor. Carm. iv. 4). The early legend simply states that Ganymedes was carried off that he might be the cup-bearer of Zeus, in which office he was conceived to have succeeded Hebe; but later writers describe him as the beloved and favourite of Zeus, without allusion to his office. Zeus compensated the father for his loss by a pair of divine horses. Astronomers have placed Ganymedes among the stars under the name of Aquarius. The Romans called him by a corrupt form of his name, Catamitus.

Gărāma. [GARAMANTES.]

Gărāmantes (Γαράμαντες), the S.most people known to the ancients in N. Africa, dwelt far S. of the Great Syrtis in the region called Phazania (Fezzan), where they had a capital city, Gărămă (Γάραμα: Mourzouk, lat. 25° 53′ N., long. 14° 10′ E.). They are mentioned by Herodotus as a weak unwarlike people; he places them 19 days' journey from Aethiopia and the shores of the Indian Ocean, 15 days' journey from Ammonium, and 30 days' journey from Egypt. The Romans obtained fresh knowledge of them by the expedition of Cornelius Balbus into their country, in B. C. 43.

Gargānus Mons (Monte Gargano), a mountain and promontory in Apulia, on which were oak forests (querceta Gargani, Hor. Carm. ii. 9. 7.)

Gargără, -on, or -us (Γάργαρα, ον, ος: Γαργαρεύς). 1. (Kaz-Dagh) the S. summit of M. Ida, in the Troad.—2. A city at the foot of M. Ida, on the shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, between Assus and Antandrus; said to have been founded originally on the summit of the mountain by the Leleges; afterwards colonised from Miletus; and removed to the lower site on account of the inclemency of its situation on the mountain. Its neighbourhood was rich in corn.

Gargettus (Γαργηττός: Γαργήττιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, on the N.W. slope of Mt. Hymettus; the birthplace of the philosopher Epicurus.

Garītes, a people in Aquitania, neighbours of the Ausci, in the modern Comté de Gauve.

Garocēli, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, near Mt. Cenis, in the neighbourhood of St. Jean de Maurienne.

Garsăūrĭa, or -ītis (Γαρσαουρία, or -ῖτις), a praefectura in Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia and Tyanitis. Its chief town was called Γαρσάουρα.

Garŭli, a people of Liguria in the Apennines.

Garumna (Garonne), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in the Pyrenees, flows N.W. through Aquitania, and becomes a bay of the sea below Burdigala (Bordeaux).

Garumni, a people in Aquitania on the Garumna.

Gathĕae (Γαθέαι), a town in Arcadia on the Gatheātas, a river which flows into the Alphēus, W.S.W. of Megalopolis.

Gaugămēla (τὰ Γαυγάμηλα: Karmelis), a village in the district of Aturia in Assyria, the scene of the last and decisive battle between Alexander and Darius Codomannus, B. C. 331, commonly called the battle of ARBELA.

Gaulanītis (Γαυλα- or -ονῖτις: Jaulan), a district in the N. of Palestine, on the E. side of the Lake of Tiberias, as far S. as the river Hieromax, named from the town of Golan (Γαύλανα).

Gaulos (Γαῦλος: Γαυλίτης: Gozzo), an island in the Sicilian sea near Melite (Malta).

Gaurelĕon, Gaurīon. [ANDROS.]

Gaurus Mons, Gauranus or -ni M. (Monte Gauro), a volcanic range of mountains in Campania, between Cumae and Neapolis, in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, which produced good wine, and was memorable for the defeat of the Samnites by M. Valerius Corvus, B. C. 343.

Gaza (Γάζα). 1. (Ghuzzeh), the last city on the S. W. frontier of Palestine, and the key of the country on the side of Egypt, stood on an eminence about 2 miles from the sea, and was, from the very earliest times of which we have any record, very strongly fortified. It was one of the 5 cities of the Philistines; and, though taken from them more than once by the Jews, was each time recovered. It was taken by Cyrus the Great, and remained in the hands of the Persians till the time of Alexander, who only gained possession of it after an obstinate defence of several months. In B. C. 315, it fell into the power of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, as the result of his victory over Demetrius before the city, and was destroyed by him. But it again recovered, and was possessed alternately by the kings of Syria and Egypt, during their prolonged wars, and afterwards by the Asmonaean princes of Judaea, one of whom, Alexander Jannaeus, again destroyed it, B. C. 96. It was rebuilt by Gabinius; given by Augustus to Herod the Great; and, after Herod's death, united to the Roman province of Syria. In A. D. 65, it was again destroyed in an insurrection of its Jewish inhabitants; but it recovered once more, and remained a flourishing city till it fell into the hands of the Arabs in A. D. 634. In addition to its importance as a military post, it possessed an extensive commerce, carried on through its port, Majuma, or CONSTANTIA. — 2. (Ghaz), a city in the Persian province of Sogdiana, between Alexandria and Cyropolis; one of the 7 cities which rebelled against Alexander in B. C. 328.

Gāzăca (Γάζακα: Tubreez), a city in the N. of Media Atropatene, equidistant from Artaxata and Ecbatana, was a summer residence of the kings of Media.

Gaziūra (Γαζίουρα), a city in Pontus Galaticus, on the river Iris, below Amasia, was the ancient residence of the kings of Pontus; but in Strabo's time it had fallen to decay.

Gĕbălēnē (Γεβαληνή), the district of Arabia Petraea around the city of Petra.

Gebenna Mons. [CEBENNA.]

Gedrōsĭa (Γεδρωσία, and Γαδρωσία: S.E. part of Beloochistan), the furthest province of the Persian empire on the S. E., and one of the subdivisions of ARIANA, was bounded on the W. by Carmania, on the N. by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the E. by India (or, as the country about the lower course of the Indus was called, Indo-Scythia), and on the S. by the Mare Erythraeum, or Indian Ocean. It is formed by a succession of sandy steppes, rising from the sea-coast towards the table land of Ariana, and produced little besides aromatic shrubs. The slip of land between the coast and the lowest mountain range is watered by several rivers, the chief of which was called Arabis (Doosee?); but even this district is for the most part only a series of salt marshes. Gedrosia is known in history chiefly through the distress suffered for want of water, in passing through it, by the armies of Cyrus and of Alexander. The inhabitants were divided by the Greek writers into 2 races, the Ichthyophagi on the sea coast, and the Gedrosi in the interior. The latter were a wild nomade people, whom even Alexander was only able to reduce to a temporary subjection. The whole country was divided into 8 districts. Its chief cities were Rhambacia and Pura, or Parsis.

Geganĭa Gens, traced its origin to the mythical Gyas, one of the companions of Aeneas. It was one of the most distinguished Alban houses, transplanted to Rome on the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled among the Roman patricians. There appears to have been only one family in this gens, that of Macerinus, many members of which filled the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic.

Gĕla (ἡ Γέλα, Ion. Γέλη: Γελῷος, Gelensis: nr. Terra Nuova Ru.), a city on the S. coast of Sicily, on a river of the same name (Fiume di Terra Nuova), founded by Rhodians from Lindos, and by Cretans, B. C. 690. It soon obtained great power and wealth; and, in 582, it founded Agrigentum, which, however, became more powerful than the mother city. Like the other cities of Sicily, it was subject to tyrants, of whom the most important were HIPPOCRATES, GELON, and HIERON. Gelon transported half of its inhabitants to Syracuse; the place gradually fell into decay, and in the time of Augustus was no longer inhabited. The poet Aeschylus died here. — N. of Gela were the celebrated Campi Gelōi, which produced rich crops of wheat.

Gelae. [CADUSII.]

Gelānor (Γελάνωρ), king of Argos, was expelled by Danaus.

Geldŭba (Gelb, below Cologne), a fortified place of the Ubii on the Rhine in Lower Germany.

Gellĭa Gens, plebeian, was of Samnite origin, and afterwards settled at Rome. There were 2 generals of this name in the Samnite wars, Gellius Statius in the 2nd Samnite war, who was defeated and taken prisoner, B. C. 305, and Gellius Egnatius in the 3rd Samnite war. [EGNATIUS.] The chief family of the Gellii at Rome bore the name of PUBLICOLA.

Gellĭus. 1. Cn., a contemporary of the Gracchi, the author of a history of Rome from the earliest epoch down to B. C. 145 at least. The work is lost, but it is frequently quoted by later writers. — 2. Aulus, a Latin grammarian of good family, was probably a native of Rome. He studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calvisius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, and enjoyed also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto. While yet a youth he was appointed by the praetor to act as an umpire in civil causes. The precise date of his birth and death is unknown; but he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius, A. D. 117—180. He wrote a work entitled Noctes Atticae, because it was composed in a country house near Athens, during the long nights of winter. It is a sort of miscellany, containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, the whole thrown together into 20 books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. The 8th book is entirely lost with the exception of the index. — The best editions are by Jac. Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1706 (reprinted by Conradi, Lips. 1762), and by Lion, Gotting. 1824. — 3. Publĭcĭus, a jurist, one of the disciples of Ser. Sulpicius.

Gĕlōn (Γέλων). 1. Son of Dinomenes, tyrant of Gela, and afterwards of Syracuse, was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gela. He held the chief command of the cavalry in the service of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela; shortly after whose death he obtained the supreme power, B. C. 491. In 485 he availed himself of the internal dissensions of Syracuse to make himself master of this city also. From this time he neglected Gela, and bent all his efforts to the aggrandisement of Syracuse, to which place he removed many of the inhabitants of the other cities of Sicily. In 480 he gained a brilliant victory at Himera over the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily with an army, amounting, it is said, to the incredible number of 300,000 men. Scarcely any of this vast host survived to carry the news to Carthage. The victory is said to have been gained on the very same day as that of Salamis. He died in 478 of a dropsy, after reigning 7 years at Syracuse. He was succeeded by his brother HIERON. He is represented as a man of singular leniency and moderation, and as seeking in every way to promote the welfare of his subjects; and his name even appears to have become almost proverbial as an instance of a good monarch. A splendid tomb was erected to him by the Syracusans at the public expense, and heroic honours were decreed to his memory.—2. Son of Hieron II., king of Syracuse, who died before his father, at the age of more than 50 years. He received the title of king in the lifetime of his father.

Gĕlōni (Γελωνοί), a Scythian people, who dwelt in Sarmatia Asiatica, to the E. of the river Tanaïs (Don). They were said to have been of Greek origin, and to have migrated from the shores of the Euxine; but they intermixed with the Scythians so as to lose all traces of their Hellenic race. Their chief city was called Gelonus (Γελωνός).

Gemīnus (Γεμῖνος), an astronomer, was a native of Rhodes, and flourished about B.C. 77. He is the author of an extant work, entitled Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰ Φαινόμενα, which is a descriptive treatise on elementary astronomy, with a great deal of historical allusion. It is printed in the Uranologion of Petavius, Paris, 1630, and in Halma's edition of Ptolemy, Paris, 1819.

Gĕmīnus, Servīlius. 1. P., twice consul with C. Aurelius Cotta in the 1st Punic war, namely, in B.C. 252 and 248. In both years he carried on war against the Carthaginians.—2. Cn., son of No. 1, was consul 217 with C. Flaminius, in the 2nd Punic war, and ravaged the coast of Africa. He fell in the battle of Cannae, 216.—3. M., also surnamed Pulex, consul 202 with Tib. Claudius Nero, obtained Etruria for his province. He is mentioned on several occasions subsequently.

Gemonĭae (scalae) or Gemonĭi (gradus), a flight of steps cut out of the Aventine, down which the bodies of criminals strangled in the prison were dragged, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber.

Genābum or Cenābum (Orleans), a town in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the N. bank of the Ligeris, was the chief town of the Carnutes: it was plundered and burnt by Caesar, but subsequently rebuilt. In later times it was called Civitas Aurelianorum or Aurelianensis Urbs, whence its modern name.

Genauni, a people in Vindelicia, the inhabitants of the Alpine valley, now called Valle di Non, were subdued by Drusus. (Hor. Carm. iv. 14. 10.)

Genēsĭus, Josēphus, lived about A.D. 940, and wrote in 4 books a history of the Byzantine emperors from A.D. 813 to 886, consequently of the reigns of Leo V., Michael II., Theophilus, Michael III., and Basil I. Edited by Lachmann, Bonn, 1834.

Genetaeus (Γενηταῖος), a surname of Zeus, from Cape Genetus on the Euxine, where he was worshipped as εὔξεινος, i.e. "the hospitable."

Genetyllis (Γενετυλλίς), the protectress of births, occurs both as a surname of Aphrodite, and as a distinct divinity and a companion of Aphrodite. We also find the plural, Γενετυλλίδες, or Γενναΐδες, as a class of divinities presiding over generation and birth, and as companions of Aphrodite Colias.

Gĕnēva or Genāva (Genevensis: Geneva), the last town of the Allobroges, on the frontiers of the Helvetii, was situated on the S. bank of the Rhone, at the spot where the river flowed out of the Lacus Lemannus. There was a bridge here over the Rhone.

Gĕnĭtrix, that is, "the mother," is used by Ovid (Met. xiv. 536) as a surname of Cybele, in the place of mater, or magna mater; but it is better known as a surname of Venus, to whom Caesar dedicated a temple at Rome, as the mother of the Julia Gens.

Gĕnĭus, a protecting spirit, analogous to the guardian angels invoked by the Church of Rome. The belief in such spirits existed both in Greece and at Rome. The Greeks called them δαίμονες, Daemons, and appear to have believed in them from the earliest times, though Homer does not mention them. Hesiod says that the Daemons were 30,000 in number, and that they dwelled on earth unseen by mortals, as the ministers of Zeus, and as the guardians of men and of justice. He further conceives them to be the souls of the righteous men who lived in the golden age of the world. The Greek philosophers took up this idea, and developed a complete theory of daemons. Thus we read in Plato, that daemons are assigned to men at the moment of their birth, that they accompany men through life, and after death conduct their souls to Hades. Pindar, in several passages, speaks of γενέθλιος δαίμων, that is, the spirit watching over the fate of man from the hour of his birth. The daemons are further described as the ministers and companions of the gods, who carry the prayers of men to the gods, and the gifts of the gods to men, and accordingly float in immense numbers in the space between heaven and earth. There was also a distinct class of daemons, who were exclusively the ministers of the gods.—The Romans seem to have received their notions respecting the genii from the Etruscans, though the name Genius itself is Latin (it is connected with gi-gn-o, gen-ui, and equivalent in meaning to generator or father). The genii of the Romans are the powers which produce life (dii genitales), and accompany man through it as his second or spiritual self. They were further not confined to man, but every living being, animal as well as man, and every place had its genius. Every human being at his birth obtained (sortitur) a genius, whom he worshipped as sanctus et sanctissimus deus, especially on his birthday, with libations of wine, incense, and garlands of flowers. The bridal bed was sacred to the genius, on account of his connection with generation, and the bed itself was called lectus genialis. On other merry occasions, also, sacrifices were offered to the genius, and to indulge in merriment was not unfrequently expressed by genio indulgere, genium curare, or placare. The whole body of the Roman people had its own genius, who is often seen represented on coins of Hadrian and Trajan. He was worshipped on sad as well as joyous occasions; thus, sacrifices were offered to him at the beginning of the 2nd year of the war with Hannibal. The genii are usually represented in works of art as winged beings. The genius of a place appears in the form of a serpent eating fruit placed before him.

Genseric, king of the Vandals, and the most terrible of all the barbarian invaders of the empire. In A. D. 429 he crossed over from Spain to Africa, and ravaged the country with frightful severity. Hippo was taken by him in 431, but Carthage did not fall into his hands till 439. Having thus become master of the whole of the N.W. of Africa, he attacked Italy itself. In 455 he took Rome and plundered it for 14 days, and in the same year he destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. Twice the empire endeavoured to revenge itself, and twice it failed: the first was the attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (457), whose fleet was destroyed in the bay of Carthagena. The 2nd was the expedition sent by the Eastern emperor Leo (468), which was also baffled by the burning of the fleet off Bona. Genseric died in 477, at a great age. He was an Arian; and in the cruelties exercised under his orders against his Catholic subjects he exhibited the first instance of persecution carried on upon a large scale by one body of Christians against another.

Gentius, son of Pleuratus, a king of the Illyrians. As early as B. C. 180, he had given offence to the Romans on account of the piracies of his subjects; and in 168 he entered into an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia. In the following year the praetor L. Anicius Gallus was sent against him. The war was finished within 30 days. Gentius was defeated in battle, and then surrendered himself to Anicius, who carried him to Rome to adorn his triumph. He was afterwards kept as a prisoner at Spoletium.

Genua (Genuas, -ātis, Genuensis: Genoa), an important commercial town in Liguria, situated at the extremity of the Ligurian gulf (Gulf of Genoa), was in the possession of the Romans at the beginning of the 2nd Punic war, but towards the end of the war was held for some time by the Carthaginian Mago. It was a Roman municipium. but it did not become of political importance till the middle ages, when it was commonly called Janua.

Genucia Gens, patrician, of which the principal families bore the names of AVENTINENSIS and AUGURINUS.

Genūsus (Iskumi), a river in Greek Illyria, N. of the Apsus.

Gephyraei (Γεφυραῖοι), an Athenian family, to which Harmodius and Aristogiton belonged. They said that they came originally from Eretria in Euboea. Herodotus believed them to be of Phoenician descent, to have followed Cadmus into Boeotia, and from thence to have emigrated to Athens. They dwelt on the banks of the Cephisus, which separated the territory of Athens from that of Eleusis, and their name was said to have been derived from the bridge (γέφυρα), which was built over the river at this point. Such a notion, however, is quite untenable, since "bridge" appears to have been a comparative recent meaning of γέφυρα. We find that there were temples at Athens, belonging peculiarly to the Gephyraei, to the exclusion of the rest of the Athenians, especially one to Demeter Achaea, whose worship they seem to have brought with them from Boeotia.

Gĕpĭdae, a Gothic people, who came from Scandinavia, and first settled in the country between the Oder and the Vistula, from which they expelled the Burgundiones. Subsequently they joined the numerous hosts of Attila; and after his death they settled in Dacia, on the banks of the Danube. As they were dangerous neighbours to the Eastern empire, Justinian invoked the aid of the Langobardi or Lombards, who conquered the Gepidae and destroyed their kingdom.

Ger or Gir (Γείρ: Ghir or Mansolig), a river of Gaetulia in Africa, S. of Mauretania Caesariensis; flowing S. E. from the S. slope of M. Atlas, till it is lost in the desert. It first became known to the Romans through the expedition of Suetonius Paulinus in the reign of Nero.

Geraestus (Γεραιστός: Γεραίστιος), a promontory and harbour at the S. extremity of Euboea, with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, in whose honour the festival of the Geraestia (Γεραίστια) was here celebrated.

Geranēa (ἡ Γεράνεια), a range of mountains, beginning at the S.W. slope of Cithaeron, and running along the W. coast of Megaris, till it terminated in the promontory Olmiae in the Corinthian territory; but the name is sometimes confined to the mountain in the Corinthian territory.

Gerēnĭa (Γερηνία), an ancient town in Messenia, the birthplace of Nestor, who is hence called Gerenian (Γερήνιος). It was regarded by some as the same place as the Homeric Enope.

Gergis, or Gergītha, or -es, or -us, (Γέργις, Γέργιθα, or -ες, or -ος: Γεργίθιος), a town in the Troad, N. of the Scamander, inhabited by Teucrians. Attalus removed the inhabitants to the sources of the Caïcus, where mention is made of a place called Gergētha or Gergithion, in the territory of Cyme.

Gergŏvĭa. 1. A fortified town of the Arverni in Gaul, situated on a high and inaccessible hill, W. or S.W. of the Elaver (Allier). Its site is uncertain; but it was probably in the neighbourhood of the modern Clermont. — 2. A town of the Boii in Gaul, of uncertain site.

Germa (Γέρμη), the name of 3 cities in Asia Minor. 1. (Germaslu, Ru.) in Mysia Minor, near Cyzicus.—2. (Yermatepe) in Mysia, between Pergamus and Thyatira.—3. (Yerma), in Galatia, between Pessinus and Ancyra; a colonia.

Germānĭa, was bounded by the Rhine on the W., by the Vistula and the Carpathian mountains on the E., by the Danube on the S., and by the German Ocean and the Baltic on the N. It thus included much more than modern Germany on the N. and E., but much less in the W. and S. The N. and N.E. of Gallia Belgica were likewise called Germania Prima and Secunda under the Roman emperors [see p. 275, a.]; and it was in contradistinction to these provinces that Germania proper was also called Germania Magna or G. Transrhenāna or G. Barbăra. It was not till Caesar's campaigns in Gaul (B. C. 58—50) that the Romans obtained any accurate knowledge of the country. The Roman writers represent Germany as a dismal land, covered for the most part with forests and swamps, producing little corn, and subject to intense frosts and almost eternal winter. Although these accounts are probably exaggerated, yet there can be no doubt that, before the immense woods were cleared and the morasses drained, the climate of Germany was much colder than it is at present. — The N. of Germany is a vast plain, but in the S. there are many mountains, which were covered in antiquity with vast forests, and thus were frequently called Silvae. Of these the most important was the HERCYNIA SILVA.—The chief rivers were the RHENUS (Rhine), DANUBIUS (Danube), VISTULA, AMISIA (Ems), VISURGIS (Weser), ALBIS (Elbe), VIADUS (Oder). — The inhabitants were called GERMANI by the Romans. Tacitus says (Germ. 2) that Germani was the name of the Tungri, who were the first German people that crossed the Rhine. It would seem that this name properly belonged only to those tribes who were settled in Gaul ; and as these were the first German tribes with which the Romans came into contact, they extended the name to the whole nation. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Some modern writers derive it from the German ger, gwer, Heer, Wehr, so that the word would be equivalent to Wehrman, Wehrmänner, that is, warriors. The Germans themselves do not appear to have used any one name to indicate the whole nation ; for there is no reason to believe, as some have done, that the name Teutones (i. e. Teuten, Deutsche), was the general name of the nation in the time of the Romans. The Germans regarded themselves as indigenous in the country ; but there can be no doubt that they were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who, along with the Celts, migrated into Europe from the Caucasus and the countries around the Black and Caspian seas, at a period long anterior to historical records. They are described as a people of high stature and of great bodily strength, with fair complexions, blue eyes, and yellow or red hair. Notwithstanding the severity of their climate, they wore little clothing, and their children went entirely naked. They had scarcely any defensive armour: their chief offensive weapon was the framea, a long spear with a narrow iron point, which they either darted from a distance or pushed in close combat. Their houses were only low huts, made of rough timber, and thatched with straw. A number of these were of course often built near each other ; but they could not be said to have any towns properly so called. Many of their tribes were nomad, and every year changed their place of abode. —The men found their chief delight in the perils and excitement of war. In peace they passed their lives in listless indolence, only varied by deep gaming and excessive drinking. Their chief drink was beer ; and their carouses frequently ended in bloody brawls. The women were held in high honour. Their chastity was without reproach. They accompanied their husbands to battle, and cheered them on by their presence, and frequently by their example as well. Both sexes were equally distinguished for their unconquerable love of liberty ; and the women frequently destroyed both themselves and their children, rather than fall into the power of their husbands' conquerors. — In each tribe we find the people divided into 4 classes: the nobles ; the freemen ; the freedmen or vassals ; and the slaves. All questions relating to peace and war, and the general interests of the tribe, were decided in the popular assembly, in which each freeman had a right to take part. In these assemblies a king was elected from among the nobles ; but his power was very limited, and he only acted as the supreme magistrate in time of peace ; for when a war broke out, the people elected a distinguished warrior as their leader, upon whom the prerogatives of the king devolved. — The religion of the Germans is known to us only from the Greek and Roman writers, who have confused the subject by seeking to identify the gods of the Germans with their own divinities. We know that they worshipped the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars. They are also said to have paid especial honour to Mercury, who was probably the German Wodan or Odin. Their other chief divinities were Isis (probably Freia, the wife of Odin) ; Mars (Tyr or Zio, the German god of war) ; the mother of the gods, called Nerthus (less correctly Herthus or Hertha) ; and Jupiter (Thor, or the god of thunder). The worship of the gods was simple. They had both priests and priestesses to attend to their service ; and some of the priestesses, such as Veleda among the Bructeri, were celebrated throughout Germany for their prophetic powers. — The Germani first appear in history in the campaigns of the Cimbri and Teutones (B. C. 113), the latter of whom were undoubtedly a Germanic people. [TEUTONES.] About 50 years afterwards Ariovistus, a German chief, crossed the Rhine, with a vast host of Germans, and subdued a great part of Gaul ; but he was defeated by Caesar with great slaughter (58), and driven beyond the Rhine. Caesar twice crossed this river (55, 53), but made no permanent conquest on the E. bank. In the reign of Augustus, his step-son Drusus carried on war in Germany with great success for 4 years (12—9), and penetrated as far as the Elbe. On his death (9), his brother Tiberius succeeded to the command ; and under him the country between the Rhine and the Visurgis (Weser) was entirely subjugated, and bid fair to become a Roman province. But in A. D. 9, the impolitic and tyrannical conduct of the Roman governor Quintilius Varus, provoked a general insurrection of the various German tribes, headed by Arminius, the Cheruscan. Varus and his legions were defeated and destroyed, and the Romans lost all their conquests E. of the Rhine. [VARUS.] The defeat of Varus was avenged by the successful campaigns of Germanicus, who would probably have recovered the Roman dominions E. of the river, had not the jealousy of Tiberius recalled him to Rome, A. D. 16. From this time the Romans abandoned all further attempts to conquer Germany ; but in consequence of the civil dissensions which broke out in Germany soon after the departure of Tiberius, they were enabled to obtain peaceable possession of a large portion of the S.W. of Germany between the Rhine and the Danube, to which they gave the name of the AGRI DECUMATES. [See p. 27, b.] On the death of Nero, several of the tribes in W. Germany joined the Batavi in their insurrection against the Romans (A. D. 69—71). Domitian and Trajan had to repel the attacks of some German tribes ; but in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Marcomanni, joined by various other tribes, made a more formidable attack upon the Roman dominions, and threatened the empire with destruction. From this time the Romans were often called upon to defend the left bank of the Rhine against their dangerous neighbours, especially against the 2 powerful confederacies of the Alemanni and Franks [ALEMANNI ; FRANCI] ; and in the 4th and 5th centuries the Germans obtained possession of some of the fairest provinces of the empire. — The Germans are divided by Tacitus into 3 great tribes: 1. Ingaevones, on the Ocean. 2. Hermiones, inhabiting the central parts. 3. Istaevones, in the remainder of Germany, consequently in the E. and

S. parts. These 3 names were said to be derived from the 3 sons of Mannus, the son of Tuisco. Pliny makes 5 divisions: 1. Vindili, including Burgundiones, Varini, Carini, and Guttones. 2. Ingaevones, including Cimbri, Teutones, and Chauci. 3. Istaevones, including the midland Cimbri. 4. Hermiones, including the Suevi, Hermunduri, Chatti, and Cherusci. 5. Peucini and Bastarnae, bordering on the Dacians. But whether we adopt the division of Tacitus or Pliny, we ought to add the inhabitants of the Scandinavian peninsula, the Hilleviones, divided into the Sinones and Sitones. It is difficult to fix with accuracy the position of the various tribes, as they frequently migrated from one spot to another. An account of each is given under the name of the tribe. See CHAUCI, CHERUSCI, CIMBRI, SUEVI, &c.

Germānĭcus Caesar, son of Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir Antony, was born B. C. 15. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius in the lifetime of Augustus, and was raised at an early age to the honours of the state. He assisted Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A. D. 7—10), and also fought along with Tiberius against the Germans in the 2 following years (11, 12). He had the command of the legions in Germany, when the alarming mutiny broke out among the troops in Germany and Illyricum, upon the death of Augustus (14). Germanicus was a favourite with the soldiers, and they offered to place him at the head of the empire; but he rejected their proposal, and exerted all his influence to quell the mutiny, and reconcile them to their new sovereign. After restoring order among the troops, he crossed the Rhine, and laid waste the country of the Marsi with fire and sword. In the following year (15), he again crossed the Rhine, and marched into the interior of the country. He penetrated as far as the Saltus Teutoburgiensis, N. of the Lippe, in which forest the army of Quintilius Varus had been destroyed by the Germans. Here his troops gathered up the bones of their ill-fated comrades, and paid the last honours to their memory. But meantime Arminius had collected a formidable army, with which he attacked the Romans; and it was not without considerable loss that Germanicus made good his retreat to the Rhine. It was in this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of Germanicus. [ARMINIUS.] Next year (16) Germanicus placed his troops on board a fleet of 1000 vessels, and sailed through the canal of his father, Drusus [see p. 233, b.], and the Zuydersee to the ocean, and from thence to the mouth of the Amisia (Ems), where he landed his forces. After crossing the Ems and the Weser, he fought 2 battles with Arminius, in both of which the Germans were completely defeated. The Germans could no longer offer him any effectual resistance, and Germanicus needed only another year to reduce completely the whole country between the Rhine and the Elbe. But the jealousy of Tiberius saved Germany. Upon pretence of the dangerous state of affairs in the E., the emperor recalled Germanicus to Rome, which he entered in triumph on the 26th of May, 17. In the same year all the Eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus; but Tiberius placed Cn. Piso in command of Syria, with secret instructions to check and thwart Germanicus. Piso soon showed his hostility to Germanicus; and his wife Plancina, in like manner, did every thing in her power to annoy Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. In 18, Germanicus proceeded to Armenia, where he placed Zeno on the throne, and in the following year (19) he visited Egypt, and on his return he was seized with a dangerous illness, of which he died. He believed that he had been poisoned by Piso, and shortly before he died, he summoned his friends, and called upon them to avenge his murder. He was deeply and sincerely lamented by the Roman people; and Tiberius was obliged to sacrifice Piso to the public indignation. [PISO.] By Agrippina he had 9 children, of whom 6 survived him. Of these the most notorious were the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Germanicus was an author of some repute. He wrote several poetical works. We still possess the remains of his Latin translation of the Phaenomena of Aratus. The latest edition of this work is by Orelli at the end of his Phaedrus, Zurich, 1831.

Germanīcĭa or Caesărēa Germanīca (Γερμανίκεια, Καισάρεια Γερμανική), a town in the Syrian province of Commagene, near the borders of Cappadocia; the birthplace of the heretic Nestorius.

Gerra (Γέῤῥα: near El-Katif), one of the chief cities of Arabia, and a great emporium for the trade of Arabia and India, stood on the N. E. coast of Arabia Felix, 200 stadia (20 geog. miles) from the shore of the Sinus Gerraeus or Gerraicus (Elwah Bay?), a bay on the W. side of the Persian Gulf, 2400 stadia (240 geog. miles=4° of lat.) from the mouth of the Tigris. The city was 5 Roman miles in circuit. The inhabitants, called Gerraei (Γεῤῥαῖοι) were said to have been originally Chaldaeans, who were driven out of Babylon. There was a small place of the same name on the N. E. frontier of Egypt, between Pelusium and M. Casius, 50 stadia or 8 Roman miles from the former.

Gerrhus (Γέῤῥος), a river of Scythia, flowing through a country of the same name, was a branch of the Borysthenes, and flowed into the Hypacyris, dividing the country of the Nomad Scythians from that of the Royal Scythians.

Gerunda (Gerona), a town of the Ausetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Narbo in Gaul.

Gēry̆on or Gēry̆ŏnes (Γηρυόνης), son of Chrysaor and Callirrhoë, a monster with 3 heads, or, according to others, with 3 bodies united together, was a king in Spain, and possessed magnificent oxen, which Hercules carried away. For details see HERCULES.

Gesoriăcum (Boulogne), a port of the Morini in Gallia Belgica, at which persons usually embarked to cross over to Britain: it was subsequently called Bononĭa, whence its modern name.

Gessĭus Flōrus. [FLORUS.]

Gĕta, Septĭmĭus, brother of Caracalla, by whom he was assassinated, A. D. 212. For details see CARACALLA.

Gĕtae, a Thracian people, called Daci by the Romans. Herodotus and Thucydides place them S. of the Ister (Danube) near its mouths; but in the time of Alexander the Great they dwelt beyond this river and N. of the Triballi. They were driven by the Sarmatians further W. towards Germany. For their later history see DACIA.

Gĭgantes (Γιγάντες), the giants. According to Homer, they were a gigantic and savage race of men, dwelling in the distant W. in the island of Trinacia, and were destroyed on account of their insolence towards the gods. — Hesiod considers them as divine beings, who sprang from the blood that fell from Uranus upon the earth, so that Ge (the earth) was their mother. Neither Homer nor Hesiod know any thing about their contest with the gods. — Later poets and mythographers frequently confound them with the Titans, and represent them as enemies of Zeus and the gods, whose abode on Olympus they attempt to take by storm. Their battle with the gods seems to be only an imitation of the revolt of the Titans against Uranus. Ge, it is said, indignant at the fate of her former children, the Titans, gave birth to the Gigantes, who were beings of a monstrous size, with fearful countenances and the tails of dragons. They were born, according to some, in the Phlegraean plains in Sicily, Campania, or Arcadia, and, according to others, in the Thracian Pallene. In their native land they made an attack upon heaven, being armed with huge rocks and trunks of trees. The gods were told that they could not conquer the giants without the assistance of a mortal; whereupon they summoned Hercules to their aid. The giants Alcyoneus and Porphyrion distinguished themselves above their brethren. Alcyoneus was immortal so long as he fought in his native land; but Hercules dragged him away to a foreign land, and thus killed him. Porphyrion was killed by the lightning of Zeus and the arrows of Hercules. The other giants, whose number is said to have been 24, were then killed one after another by the gods and Hercules, and some of them were buried by their conquerors under (volcanic) islands. — It is worthy of remark, that most writers place the giants in volcanic districts; and it is probable that the story of their contest with the gods took its origin from volcanic convulsions.

Gigōnus (Γίγωνος: Γιγώνιος), a town and promontory of Macedonia on the Thermaic gulf.

Gildo, or Gildon, a Moorish chieftain, governed Africa for some years as a subject of the Western empire; but in A. D. 397, he transferred his allegiance to the Eastern empire, and the emperor Arcadius accepted him as a subject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, sent an army against him. Gildo was defeated; and being taken prisoner, he put an end to his own life by hanging himself (398). The history of this war forms the subject of one of Claudian's poems (De Bello Gildonico).

Gindărus (Γίνδαρος: Gindaries), a very strong fortress in the district of Cyrrhestice in Syria, N. E. of Antioch.

Girba, a city on the island of Meninx (Jerbah), at the S. extremity of the Lesser Syrtis, in N. Africa: celebrated for its manufactures of purple.

Gisco or Gisgo (Γίσκων or Γέσκων). 1. Son of Hamilcar who was defeated and killed in the battle of Himera, B. C. 480. In consequence of this calamity, Gisgo was banished from Carthage. He died at Selinus in Sicily. — 2. Son of Hanno, was in exile when the Carthaginians were defeated at the river Crimissus by Timoleon, 339. He was then recalled from exile, and sent to oppose Timoleon, but was unable to accomplish any thing of importance. — 3. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybaeum, at the end of the first Punic war. After the conclusion of peace, 241, he was deputed by the government to treat with the mercenaries who had risen in revolt, but he was seized by them and put to death.

Gitĭădas (Γιτιάδας), a Lacedaemonian architect statuary, and poet. He completed the temple of Athena Poliouchos at Sparta, and ornamented it with works in bronze, from which it was called the Brazen House, and hence the goddess received the surname of Χαλκοίοικος. He composed a hymn to the goddess, besides other poems. He flourished about B. C. 516, and is the last Spartan artist of any distinction.

Glabrĭo, Acīlĭus, plebeians. 1. C., quaestor B. C. 203, and tribune of the plebs 197. He acted as interpreter to the Athenian embassy in 155, when the 3 philosophers, Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus came as envoys to Rome. He wrote in Greek a history of Rome from the earliest period to his own times. It was translated into Latin by one Claudius, and his version is cited by Livy, under the titles of Annales Aciliani (xxv. 39) and Libri Aciliani (xxxv. 14). — 2. M'., tribune of the plebs 201, praetor 196, and consul 191. In his consulship he defeated Antiochus at Thermopylae, and subsequently the Aetolians likewise. — 3. M'., married a daughter of M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul 115, whom Sulla, in 82, compelled him to divorce. Glabrio was praetor urbanus in 70, when he presided at the impeachment of Verres. He was consul in 67, and in the following year proconsul of Cilicia. He succeeded L. Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithridates, but remained inactive in Bithynia. He was superseded by Cn. Pompey. — 4. M'., son of No. 3, was born in the house of Cn. Pompey, B. C. 81, who married his mother after her compulsory divorce from the elder Glabrio. Aemilia died in giving birth to him. In the civil war, Glabrio was one of Caesar's lieutenants; commanded the garrison of Oricum in Epirus in 48, and was stationed in Sicily in 46. He was twice defended on capital charges by Cicero, and acquitted.

Glanis, more usually written CLANIS.

Glānum Līvĭi (nr. St. Remy Ru.), a town of the Salyes in Gallia Narbonensis.

Glaphȳra. [ARCHELAUS, No. 6.]

Glaucē (Γλαύκη). 1. One of the Nereides, the name Glauce being only a personification of the colour of the sea. — 2. Daughter of Creon of Corinth, also called Creusa. For details see CREON.

Glaucĭa, C. Servīlĭus, praetor B. C. 100, the chief supporter of Saturninus, with whom he was put to death in this year. [SATURNINUS.]

Glaucĭas (Γλαυκίας). 1. King of the Taulantians, one of the Illyrian tribes, fought against Alexander the Great, B. C. 335. In 316 he afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander. In 307 he invaded Epirus, and placed Pyrrhus, then 12 years old, upon the throne. — 2. A Greek physician, who probably lived in the 3rd or 2nd century B. C. — 3. A statuary of Aegina, who made the bronze chariot and statue of Gelon, flourished B. C. 488.

Glaucon (Γλαύκων). 1. Son of Critias, brother of Callaeschrus, and father of Charmides and of Plato's mother, Perictione. — 2. Brother of Plato, who makes him one of the speakers in the Republic.

Glaucus (Γλαῦκος). 1. Grandson of Aeolus, son of Sisyphus and Merope, and father of Bellerophontes. He lived at Potniae, despised the power of Aphrodite, and did not allow his mares to breed, that they might be the stronger for the horse race. According to others he fed them with human flesh. This excited the anger of Aphrodite, who destroyed him. According to some accounts his horses became frightened and threw him out of his chariot, as he was contending in the funeral games celebrated by Acastus in honour of his father Pelias. According to others, his horses tore him to pieces, having drunk from the water of a sacred well in Boeotia, in consequence of which they were seized with madness. Glaucus of Potniae (Γλαῦκος Ποτνιεύς) was the title of one of the lost tragedies of Aeschylus. — 2. Son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bellerophontes, was a Lycian prince, and assisted Priam in the Trojan war. He was connected with Diomedes by ties of hospitality; and when they recognised one another in the battle, they abstained from fighting, and exchanged arms with one another. Glaucus was slain by Ajax. — 3. Son of the Messenian king Aepytus, whom he succeeded on the throne. — 4. One of the sons of the Cretan king Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete. When a boy, he fell into a cask full of honey, and was smothered. Minos searched for his son in vain, and was at length informed by Apollo or the Curetes that the person who should devise the most appropriate comparison between a cow, which could assume 3 different colours, and any other object, would find the boy. The soothsayer Polyidus of Argos solved the problem by likening the cow to a mulberry, which is at first white, then red, and in the end black. By his prophetic powers he then discovered the boy. Minos now required Polyidus to restore his son to life; but as he could not accomplish this, Minos ordered him to be entombed alive with the body of Glaucus. When Polyidus was thus shut up in the vault, he saw a serpent approaching the dead body, and killed the reptile. Presently another serpent came, and placed a herb upon the dead serpent, which was thereby restored to life. Thereupon Polyidus covered the body of Glaucus with the same herb, and the boy at once rose into life again. The story of Glaucus and Polyidus was a favourite subject with the ancient poets and artists. — 5. Of Anthedon in Boeotia, a fisherman, who became immortal by eating a part of the divine herb which Cronos had sown. His parentage is differently stated: some called his father Copeus, others Polybus, the husband of Euboea, and others again Anthedon or Poseidon. He was further said to have been a clever diver, to have built the ship Argo, and to have accompanied the Argonauts as their steersman. In the sea-fight of Jason against the Tyrrhenians, Glaucus alone remained unhurt; he sank to the bottom of the sea, where he was visible to none save Jason. From this moment he became a marine deity, and was of service to the Argonauts. The story of his sinking or leaping into the sea was variously modified in the different traditions. There was a belief in Greece that once in every year Glaucus visited all the coasts and islands, accompanied by marine monsters, and gave his prophecies. Fishermen and sailors paid particular reverence to him, and watched his oracles, which were believed to be very trustworthy. He is said to have even instructed Apollo in the prophetic art. Some writers stated that he dwelt in Delos, where he prophesied in conjunction with the nymphs; but the place of his abode varied in different traditions. The stories about his various loves were favourite subjects with the ancient poets. — 6. Of Chios, a statuary in metal, distinguished as the inventor of the art of soldering metals (κόλλησις), flourished B. C. 490. His most noted work was an iron base (ὑποκρητηρίδιον), which, with the silver bowl it supported, was presented to the temple at Delphi by Alyattes, king of Lydia.

Glaucus (Γλαῦκος). 1. A small river of Phrygia, falling into the Maeander near Eumenia. — 2. A small river of Lycia, on the borders of Caria, flowing into the Sinus Glaucus (Gulf of Makri).

Glaucus Sinus. [GLAUCUS.]

Glessārĭa (Ameland), an island off the coast of the Frisii, so called from "glessum" or amber which was found there: its proper name was Austeravia.

Glīsas (Γλίσας: Γλισάντιος), an ancient town in Boeotia, on Mt. Hypaton. It was in ruins in the time of Pausanias.

Glycas, Michael, a Byzantine historian, the author of a work entitled Annals (βίβλος χρονική), containing the history of the world from the creation to the death of Alexis I. Comnenus, A. D. 1118. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836.

Glycĕra (Γλυκέρα), "the sweet one," a favourite name of hetairae. The most celebrated hetairae of this name are, 1. The daughter of Thalassis, and the mistress of Harpalus. — 2. Of Sicyon, and the mistress of Pausias. — 3. A favourite of Horace.

Glycĕrĭus, became emperor of the W. A. D. 473, after the death of Olybrius, by the assistance of Gundobald the Burgundian. But the Byzantine court did not acknowledge Glycerius, and proclaimed Julius Nepos emperor, by whom Glycerius was dethroned (474), and compelled to become a priest. He was appointed bishop of Salona in Dalmatia.

Glycon (Γλύκων), an Athenian sculptor, known to us by his magnificent colossal marble statue of Hercules, commonly called the "Farnese Hercules." It was found in the baths of Caracalla, and, after adorning the Farnese palace for some time, was removed to the royal museum at Naples. It represents the hero resting on his club, after one of his labours. The swollen muscles admirably express repose after severe exertion. Glycon probably lived under the early Roman emperors.

Gnipho, M. Antōnĭus, a Roman rhetorician, was born B. C. 114, in Gaul, but studied at Alexandria. He afterwards established a school at Rome, which was attended by many distinguished men, and among others by Cicero, when he was praetor.

Gnōsus, Gnossus. [CNOSUS.]

Gōbrȳas (Γωβρύας), a noble Persian, one of the 7 conspirators against Smerdis the Magian. He accompanied Darius into Scythia. He was doubly related to Darius by marriage: Darius married the daughter of Gobryas, and Gobryas married the sister of Darius.

Golgi (Γολγοί: Γόλγιος), a town in Cyprus, of uncertain site, was a Sicyonian colony, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus).

Gomphi (Γόμφοι: Γομφεύς), a town in Hestiaeotis in Thessaly, was a strong fortress on the confines of Epirus, and commanded the chief pass between Thessaly and Epirus: it was taken and destroyed by Caesar (B. C. 48), but was afterwards rebuilt.

Gonni, Gonnus (Γόννοι, Γόννος: Γόννιος), a strongly fortified town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, on the river Peneus and at the entrance of the vale of Tempe, was, from its position, of great military importance; but it is not mentioned after the time of the wars between the Macedonians and Romans.

Gordiānus, M. Antōnius, the name of 3 Roman emperors, father, son, and grandson. 1. Surnamed Africanus, son of Metius Marullus and Ulpia Gordiana, possessed a princely fortune, and was distinguished alike by moral and intellectual excellence. In his 1st consulship, A. D. 213, he was the colleague of Caracalla ; in his 2nd of Alexander Severus ; and soon afterwards was nominated proconsul of Africa. After governing Africa for several years with justice and integrity, a rebellion broke out in the province in consequence of the tyranny of the procurator of Maximinus. The ringleaders of the conspiracy compelled Gordian, who was now in his 80th year, to assume the imperial title. He entered on his new duties at Carthage in the month of February, associated his son with him in the empire, and despatched letters to Rome, announcing his elevation. Gordianus and his son were at once proclaimed Augusti by the senate, and preparations were made in Italy to resist Maximinus. But meantime a certain Capellianus, procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the authority of the Gordiani and marched against them. The younger Gordianus was defeated by him, and slain in the battle ; and his aged father thereupon put an end to his own life, after reigning less than 2 months. — 2. Son of the preceding and of Fabia Orestilia, was born A. D. 192, was associated with his father in the purple, and fell in battle, as recorded above. — 3. Grandson of the elder Gordianus, either by a daughter or by the younger Gordianus. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor in July, A. D. 238, after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus, although he was a mere boy, probably not more than 12 years old. He reigned 6 years, from 238 to 244. In 241 he married the daughter of Misitheus, and in the same year set out for the E. to carry on the war against the Persians. With the assistance of Misitheus, he defeated the Persians in 242. Misitheus died in the following year ; and Philippus, whom Gordian had taken into his confidence, excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length rose in open mutiny, and assassinated Gordian in Mesopotamia, 244. He was succeeded by PHILIPPUS.

Gordĭum (Γόρδιον, Γορδίου Κώμη), the ancient capital of Phrygia, the royal residence of the kings of the dynasty of Gordius, and the scene of Alexander's celebrated exploit of "cutting the Gordian knot." [GORDIUS]. It was situated in the W. of that part of Phrygia which was afterwards called Galatia, N. of Pessinus, on the N. bank of the Sangarius. In the reign of Augustus it received the name of Juliopolis (Ἰουλιούπολις).

Gordĭus (Γόρδιος), an ancient king of Phrygia, and father of Midas, was originally a poor peasant. Internal disturbances having broken out in Phrygia, an oracle informed the inhabitants that a waggon would bring them a king, who should at the same time put an end to the disturbances. When the people were deliberating on these points, Gordius, with his wife and son, suddenly appeared riding in his waggon in the assembly of the people, who at once acknowledged him as king. Gordius, out of gratitude, dedicated his chariot to Zeus, in the acropolis of Gordium. The pole was fastened to the yoke by a knot of bark ; and an oracle declared that whosoever should untie the knot should reign over all Asia. Alexander, on his arrival at Gordium, cut the knot with his sword, and applied the oracle to himself.

Gordĭūtīchos (Γορδίου τεῖχος), a town in Caria, near the borders of Phrygia, between Antiochia ad Maeandrum and Tabae.

Gordyaei. [GORDYENE.]

Gordyaei Montes (τὰ Γορδυαῖα ὄρη: Mountains of Kurdistan), the name given by Strabo to the N. part of the broad belt of mountains, which separates the Tigris valley from the great table land of Iran, and which divided Mesopotamia and Assyria from Armenia and Media. They are connected with the mountains of Armenia at Ararat, whence they run S. E. between the Arsissa Palus (Lake Van) and the sources of the Tigris and its upper confluents as far as the confines of Media, where the chain turns more to the S. and was called ZAGROS.

Gordȳēnē or Cordŭēnē (Γορδυηνή, Κορδουηνή), a mountainous district in the S. of Armenia Major, between the Arsissa Palus (Lake Van) and the GORDYAEI MONTES. After the Mithridatic War, it was assigned by Pompey to Tigranes, with whom its possession had been disputed by the Parthian king Phraates. Trajan added it to the Roman empire; and it formed afterwards a constant object of contention between the Romans and the Parthian and Persian kings, but was for the most part virtually independent. Its warlike inhabitants, called Γορδυαῖοι or Corduēni, were no doubt the same people as the CARDUCHI of the earlier Greek geographers, and the Kurds of modern times.

Gorgē (Γόργη), daughter of Oeneus and Althea. She and her sister Deianira alone retained their original forms, when their other sisters were metamorphosed by Artemis into birds.

Gorgĭas (Γοργίας). 1. Of Leontini, in Sicily, a celebrated rhetorician and orator, sophist and philosopher, was born about B. C. 480, and is said to have lived 105, or even 109 years. Of his early life we have no particulars ; but when he was of advanced age (B. C. 427) he was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Athens, for the purpose of soliciting its protection against Syracuse. He seems to have returned to Leontini only for a short time, and to have spent the remaining years of his vigorous old age in the towns of Greece Proper, especially at Athens and the Thessalian Larissa, enjoying honour everywhere as an orator and teacher of rhetoric. The common statement that Pericles and the historian Thucydides were among his disciples, cannot be true, as he did not go to Athens till after the death of Pericles ; but Alcibiades, Alcidamas, Aeschines, and Antisthenes, are called either pupils or imitators of Gorgias, and his oratory must have had great influence upon the rhetorician Isocrates. The high estimation in which he was held at Athens appears from the way in which he is introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name. The eloquence of Gorgias was chiefly calculated to tickle the ear by antitheses, alliterations, the symmetry of its parts, and similar artifices. Two declamations have come down to us under the name of Gorgias, viz. the Apology of Palamedes, and the Encomium on Helena, the genuineness of which is doubtful. Besides his orations, which were mostly what the Greeks called Epideitic or speeches for display, such as his oration addressed to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, Gorgias also wrote loci communes, probably as rhetorical exercises ; a work on dissimilar and homogeneous words, and another on rhetoric. The works of Gorgias did not even contain the elements of a scientific theory of oratory, any more than his oral instructions. He confined himself to teaching his pupils a variety of rhetorical artifices, and made them learn by heart certain formulas relative to them. — 2. Of Athens, gave instruction in rhetoric to young M. Cicero, when he was at Athens. He wrote a rhetorical work, a Latin abridgment of which by Rutilius Lupus is still extant, under the title De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis.

Gorgo and Gorgŏnes (Γοργώ and Γόργονες). Homer mentions only one Gorgo, who appears in the Odyssey (xi. 633) as one of the frightful phantoms in Hades: in the Iliad the Aegis of Athena contains the head of Gorgo, the terror of her enemies. Hesiod mentions 3 Gorgones, Stheno, Euryale, and Medūsa, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whence they are sometimes called Phorcȳdes. Hesiod placed them in the far W. in the Ocean, in the neighbourhood of Night and the Hesperides; but later traditions transferred them to Libya. They were frightful beings; instead of hair, their heads were covered with hissing serpents; and they had wings, brazen claws, and enormous teeth. Medusa, who alone of her sisters was mortal, was, according to some legends, at first a beautiful maiden, but her hair was changed into serpents by Athena, in consequence of her having become by Poseidon the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus, in one of Athena's temples. Her head now became so fearful that every one who looked at it was changed into stone. Hence the great difficulty which Perseus had in killing her. [PERSEUS.] Athena afterwards placed the head in the centre of her shield or breastplate.

Gortȳn, Gortȳna (Γόρτυν, Γόρτυνα: Γορτύνιος). 1. (Nr. Hagios Dkeka Ru., 6 miles from the foot of Mt. Ida), one of the most ancient cities in Crete, on the river Lethaeus, 90 stadia from its harbour Lebēn, and 130 stadia from its other harbour Matalia. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Europa, whence it was called Hellotis; and it was subsequently peopled by Minyans and Tyrrhene-Pelasgians, whence it also bore the name of Larissa. It was the 2nd city in Crete, being only inferior to Cnossus; and on the decline of the latter place under the Romans, it became the metropolis of the island. — 2. Also Gortys (Nr. Atzikolo Ru.), a town in Arcadia on the river Gortynius, a tributary of the Alpheus.

Gotarzes. [ARSACES XX. XXI.]

Gothi, Gothōnes, Guttōnes, a powerful German people, who played an important part in the overthrow of the Roman empire. They originally dwelt on the Prussian coast of the Baltic at the mouth of the Vistula, where they are placed by Tacitus; but they afterwards migrated S., and at the beginning of the 3rd century, they appear on the coasts of the Black Sea, where Caracalla encountered them on his march to the E. In the reign of the emperor Philippus (A. D. 244—249), they obtained possession of a great part of the Roman province of Dacia; and in consequence of their settling in the countries formerly inhabited by the Getae and Scythians, they are frequently called both Getae and Scythians by later writers. From the time of Philippus the attacks of the Goths against the Roman empire became more frequent and more destructive. In A. D. 272 the emperor Aurelian surrendered to them the whole of Dacia. It is about this time that we find them separated into 2 great divisions, the Ostrogoths or E. Goths, and the Visigoths or W. Goths. The Ostrogoths settled in Moesia and Pannonia, while the Visigoths remained N. of the Danube.—The Visigoths under their king Alaric invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). A few years afterwards they settled permanently in the S. W. of Gaul, and established a kingdom of which Tolosa was the capital. From thence they invaded Spain, where they also founded a kingdom, which lasted for more than 2 centuries, till it was overthrown by the Arabs.—The Ostrogoths meantime had extended their dominions almost up to the gates of Constantinople; and the emperor Zeno was glad to get rid of them by giving them permission to invade and conquer Italy. Under their king Theodoric the Great they obtained possession of the whole of Italy (493). Theodoric took the title of king of Italy, and an Ostrogothic dynasty reigned in the country, till it was destroyed by Narses, the general of Justinian, A. D. 553.—The Ostrogoths embraced Christianity at an early period; and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the sacred Scriptures into Gothic, about the middle of the 4th century.

Gothini, a Celtic people in the S. E. of Germany, subject to the Quadi.

Gracchānus, M. Jūnius, assumed his cognomen on account of his friendship with C. Gracchus. He wrote a work, De Potestatibus, which gave an account of the Roman constitution and magistracies from the time of the kings. It was addressed to T. Pomponius Atticus, the father of Cicero's friend. This work, which appears to have been one of great value, is lost, but some parts of it are cited by Joannes Lydus. [LYDUS.]

Gracchus, Semprōnius, plebeians. — 1. Tib., a distinguished general in the 2nd Punic war. In B.C. 216 he was magister equitum to the dictator, M. Junius Pera; in 215 consul for the first time; and in 213 consul for the 2nd time. In 212 he fell in battle against Mago, at Campi Veteres, in Lucania. His body was sent to Hannibal, who honoured it with a magnificent burial. — 2. Tib., was tribune of the plebs in 187; and although personally hostile to P. Scipio Africanus, he defended him against the attacks of the other tribunes, for which he received the thanks of the aristocratical party. Soon after this occurrence Gracchus was rewarded with the hand of Cornelia, the youngest daughter of P. Scipio Africanus. In 181 he was praetor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with great success against the Celtiberians. After defeating them in battle, he gained their confidence by his justice and kindness. He returned to Rome in 178; and was consul in 177, when he was sent against the Sardinians, who revolted. He reduced them to complete submission in 176, and returned to Rome in 175. He brought with him so large a number of captives, that they were sold for a mere trifle, which gave rise to the proverb Sardi venales. In 169 he was censor with C. Claudius Pulcher, and was consul a 2nd time in 163.—He had 12 children by Cornelia, all of whom died at an early age, except the 2 tribunes, Tiberius and Caius, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to P. Scipio Africanus the younger. — 3. Tib., elder son of No. 2, lost his father at an early age. He was educated together with his brother Caius by his illustrious mother, Cornelia, who made it the object of her life to render her sons worthy of their father and of her own ancestors. She was assisted in the education of her children by eminent Greeks, who exercised great influence upon the minds of the two brothers, and among whom we have especial mention of Diophanes of Mytilene, Menelaus of Marathon, and Blossius of Cumae. Tiberius was 9 years older than his brother Caius; and although they grew up under the same influence, and their characters resembled each other in the main outlines, yet they differed from each other in several important particulars. Tiberius was inferior to his brother in talent, but surpassed him in the amiable traits of his gentle nature: the simplicity of his demeanour, and his calm dignity, won for him the hearts of the people. His eloquence, too, formed a strong contrast with the passionate and impetuous harangues of Caius; for it was temperate, graceful, persuasive, and, proceeding as it did from the fulness of his own heart, it found a ready entrance into the hearts of his hearers. Tiberius served in Africa under P. Scipio Africanus the younger, who had married his sister, and was present at the destruction of Carthage (146). In 137 he was quaestor, and in that capacity he accompanied the consul, Hostilius Mancinus, to Hispania Citerior, where he gained both the affection of the Roman soldiers, and the esteem and confidence of the victorious enemy. The distressed condition of the Roman people had deeply excited the sympathies of Tiberius. As he travelled through Etruria on his journey to Spain, he observed with grief and indignation the deserted state of that fertile country; thousands of foreign slaves in chains were employed in cultivating the land and tending the flocks upon the immense estates of the wealthy, while the poorer classes of Roman citizens, who were thus thrown out of employment, had scarcely their daily bread or a clod of earth to call their own. He resolved to use every effort to remedy this state of things by endeavouring to create an industrious middle class of agriculturists, and to put a check upon the unbounded avarice of the ruling party, whose covetousness, combined with the disasters of the 2nd Punic war, had completely destroyed the middle class of small landowners. With this view, he offered himself as a candidate for the tribuneship, and obtained it for the year 133. The agrarian law of Licinius, which enacted that no one should possess more than 500 jugera of public land, had never been repealed, but had for a long series of years been totally disregarded. The first measure, therefore, of Tiberius was to propose a bill to the people, renewing and enforcing the Licinian law, but with the modification, that besides the 500 jugera allowed by that law, any one might possess 250 jugera of the public land for each of his sons. This clause, however, seems to have been limited to 2; so that a father of 2 sons might occupy 1000 jugera of public land. The surplus was to be taken from them and distributed in small farms among the poor citizens. The business of measuring and distributing the land was to be entrusted to triumvirs, who were to be elected as a permanent magistracy. This measure encountered the most vehement opposition from the senate and the aristocracy, and they got one of the tribunes M. Octavius, to put his intercessio or veto upon the bill. When neither persuasions nor threats would induce Octavius to withdraw his opposition, the people, upon the proposition of Tiberius, deposed Octavius from his office. The law was then passed; and the triumvirs appointed to carry it into execution were Tib. Gracchus, App. Claudius, his father-in-law, and his brother C. Gracchus, who was then little more than 20 years old, and was serving in the camp of P. Scipio at Numantia. About this time Attalus died, bequeathing his kingdom and his property to the Roman people. Gracchus thereupon proposed that this property should be distributed among the people, to enable the poor, who were to receive lands, to purchase the necessary implements, cattle and the like. When the time came for the election of the tribunes for the following year, Tiberius again offered himself as a candidate. The senate declared that it was illegal for any one to hold this office for 2 consecutive years; but Tiberius paid no attention to the objection. While the tribes were voting, a band of senators, headed by P. Scipio Nasica, rushed from the senate house into the forum and attacked the people. Tiberius was killed as he was attempting to escape. He was probably about 35 years of age at the time of his death. Whatever were the errors of Tiberius in legislation, his motives were pure; and he died the death of a martyr in the protection of the poor and oppressed. All the odium that has for many centuries been thrown upon Tiberius and his brother Caius arose from party prejudice, and more especially from a misunderstanding of the nature of a Roman agrarian law, which did not deal with private property, but only with the public land of the state. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Agrariae Leges.) —4. C., brother of No. 3, was in Spain at the time of his brother's murder, as has been already stated. He returned to Rome in the following year (132), but kept aloof from public affairs for some years. In 126 he was quaestor, and went to Sardinia, under the consul L. Aurelius Orestes; and there gained the approbation of his superiors and the attachment of the soldiers. The senate attempted to keep him in Sardinia, dreading his popularity in Rome; but after he had remained there 2 years, he left the province without leave, and returned to the city in 124. Urged on by the popular wish, and by the desire of avenging the cause of his murdered brother, he became a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs, and was elected for the year 123. His reforms were far more extensive than his brother's, and such was his influence with the people that he carried all he proposed; and the senate were deprived of some of their most important privileges. His first measure was the renewal of the agrarian law of his brother. He next carried several laws for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, enacting, that the soldiers should be equipped at the expense of the republic; that no person under the age of 17 should be drafted for the army; and that every month corn should be sold at a low fixed price to the poor. In order to weaken the power of the senate, he enacted, that the judices in the judicia publica, who had hitherto been elected from the senate, should in future be chosen from the equites; and that in every year, before the consuls were elected, the senate should determine the 2 provinces which the consuls should have. No branch of the public administration appears to have escaped his notice. He gave a regular organisation to the province of Asia, which had for many years been left unsettled. In order to facilitate intercourse between the several parts of Italy, and at the same time to give employment to the poor, he made new roads in all directions, repaired the old ones, and set up milestones along them. — Caius was elected tribune again for the following year, 122. The senate, finding it impossible to resist the measures of Caius, resolved if possible to destroy his influence with the people, that they might retain the government in their own hands. For this purpose they persuaded M. Livius Drusus, one of the colleagues of Caius, to propose measures still more popular than those of Caius. The people allowed themselves to be duped by the treacherous agent of the senate, and the popularity of Caius gradually waned. During his absence in Africa, whither he had gone as one of the triumvirs to establish a colony at Carthage, in accordance with one of his own laws, his party had been considerably weakened by the influence of Drusus and the aristocracy, and many of his friends had deserted his cause. He failed in obtaining the tribuneship for the following year (121); and when his year of office expired, his enemies began to repeal several of his enactments. Caius appeared in the forum to oppose these proceedings. One of the attendants of the consul Opimius was slain by the friends of Caius. Opimius gladly availed himself of this pretext to persuade the senate to confer upon him unlimited power to act as he thought best for the good of the republic. Fulvius Flaccus, and the other friends of Caius, called upon him to repel force by force; but he refused to arm, and while his friends fought in his defence, he fled to the grove of the Furies, where he fell by the hands of his slave, whom he had commanded to put him to death. The bodies of the slain, whose number is said to have amounted to 3000, were thrown into the Tiber, their property was confiscated, and their houses demolished. All the other friends of Gracchus who fell into the hands of their enemies were thrown into prison, and there strangled.

Gradīvus, i. e. the marching (probably from gradior), a surname of Mars, who is hence called gradivus pater and rex gradivus. Mars Gradivus had a temple outside the porta Capena on the Appian road, and it is said that king Numa appointed 12 Salii as priests of this god.

Graeae (Γραῖαι), that is, "the old women," daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, were 3 in number, Pephredo, Enyo, and Dino, and were also called Phorcȳdes. They had grey hair from their birth; and had only one tooth and one eye in common, which they borrowed from each other when they wanted them. They were perhaps marine deities, like the other children of Phorcys.

Graecĭa or Hellas (ἡ Ἑλλάς), a country in Europe, the inhabitants of which were called Graeci or Hellēnes (Ἕλληνες). Among the Greeks Hellas did not signify any particular country, bounded by certain geographical limits, but was used in general to signify the abode of the Hellenes, wherever they might happen to be settled. Thus the Greek colonies of Cyrene in Africa, of Syracuse in Sicily, of Tarentum in Italy, and of Smyrna in Asia, are said to be in Hellas. In the most ancient times Hellas was a small district of Phthiotis in Thessaly, in which was situated a town of the same name. As the inhabitants of this district, the Hellenes, gradually spread over the surrounding country, their name was adopted by other tribes, who became assimilated in language, manners and customs to the original Hellenes; till at length the whole of the N. of Greece from the Ceraunian and Cambunian mountains to the Corinthian isthmus was designated by the name of Hellas.* Peloponnesus was generally spoken of during the flourishing times of Greek independence, as distinct from Hellas proper; but subsequently Peloponnesus and the Greek islands were also included under the general name of Hellas, in opposition to the land of the barbarians. Still later even Macedonia, and the S. part of Illyria were sometimes reckoned part of Hellas. The Romans called the land of the Hellenes Graecia, whence we have derived the name of Greece. They probably gave this name to the country from their first becoming acquainted with the tribe of the Graeci, who were said to be descended from Graecus, a son of Thessalus, and who appear at an early period to have dwelt on the W. coast of Epirus.—Hellas or Greece proper, including Peloponnesus, lies between the 36th and 46th degrees of N. latitude, and between the 21st and 26th degrees of E. longitude. Its greatest length from Mt. Olympus to Cape Taenarus is about 250 English miles: its greatest breadth from the W. coast of Acarnania to Marathon in Attica is about 180 miles. Its area is somewhat less than that of Portugal. On the N. it was separated by the Cambunian and Ceraunian mountains from Macedonia and Illyria; and on the other 3 sides it is bounded by the sea, namely, by the Ionian sea on the W., and by the Aegaean on the E. and S. It is one of the most mountainous countries of Europe, and possesses few extensive plains and few continuous valleys. The inhabitants were thus separated from one another by barriers which it was not easy to surmount, and were naturally led to form separate political communities. At a later time the N. of Greece was generally divided into 10 districts: EPIRUS, THESSALIA, ACARNANIA, AETOLIA, DORIS, LOCRIS, PHOCIS, BOEOTIA, ATTICA and MEGARIS. The S. of Greece or Peloponnesus was usually divided into 10 districts likewise: CORINTHIA, SICYONIA, PHLIASIA, ACHAIA, ELIS, MESSENIA, LACONICA, CYNURIA, ARGOLIS and ARCADIA. An account of the geography, early inhabitants, and history of each of these districts is given in separate articles. It is only necessary to remark here that before the Hellenes had spread over the country, it was inhabited by various tribes, whom the Greeks call by the general name of barbarians. Of these the most celebrated were the Pelasgians, who had settled in most parts of Greece, and from whom a considerable part of the Greek population was undoubtedly descended. These Pelasgians were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, and spoke a language akin to that of the Hellenes, whence the amalgamation of the 2 races was rendered much easier. [PELASGI.] The Hellenes traced their origin to a mythical ancestor Hellen, from whose sons and grandsons they were divided into the 4 great tribes of Dorians, Aeolians, Achaeans and Ionians. [HELLEN.]

Graecĭa Magna or G. Major (ἡ μεγάλη Ἑλλάς), a name given to the districts in the S. of Italy, inhabited by the Greeks. This name was never used simply to indicate the S. of Italy; it was always confined to the Greek cities and their territories, and did not include the surrounding districts, inhabited by the Italian tribes. It appears to have been applied chiefly to the cities on the Tarentine

* Epirus is, for the sake of convenience, usually included in Hellas by modern geographers, but was excluded by the Greeks themselves, as the Epirots were not regarded as genuine Hellenes.

gulf, Tarentum, Sybaris, Croton, Caulonia, Siris (Heraclea), Metapontum, Locri and Rhegium; but it also included the Greek cities on the W. coast, such as Cumae and Neapolis. Strabo extends the appellation even to the Greek cities of Sicily. The origin of the name is doubtful; whether it was given to the Greek cities by the Italian tribes from their admiring the magnificence of these cities, or whether it was assumed by the inhabitants themselves out of vanity and ostentation, to show their superiority to the mother country.

Grampīus Mons (Grampian Hills), a range of mountains in Britannia Barbara or Caledonia, separating the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland. Agricola penetrated as far as these mountains and defeated Galgacus at their foot.

Granīcus (Γράνικος : Koja-Chai), a river of Mysia Minor, rising in M. Cotylus, the N. summit of Ida, flowing N.E. through the plain of Adrastea, and falling into the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) E. of Priapus: memorable as the scene of the first of the 3 great victories by which Alexander the Great overthrew the Persian empire (B. C. 334), and, in a less degree, for a victory gained upon its banks by Lucullus over Mithridates, B. C. 73.

Granis (Γράνις : Khisht), a river of Persis, with a royal palace on its banks. It fell into the Persian Gulf near Taoce.

Q. Granīus, a clerk employed by the auctioneers at Rome to collect the money at sales, lived about B.C. 110. Although his occupation was humble, his wit and caustic humour rendered him famous among his contemporaries, and have transmitted his name to posterity.

Granua (Γρανούα : Graan), a river in the land of the Quadi and the S. E. of Germany, and a tributary of the Danube, on the banks of which M. Aurelius wrote the 1st book of his Meditations.

Grātīae. [CHARITES.]

Grātīānus. 1. Emperor of the Western Empire, A. D. 367—383, son of Valentinian I., was raised by his father to the rank of Augustus in 367, when he was only 8 years old. On the death of Valentinian in 375, Gratian did not succeed to the sole sovereignty; as Valentinian II., the half brother of Augustus, was proclaimed Augustus by the troops. By the death of his uncle, Valens (378), the Eastern empire devolved upon him; but the danger to which the E. was exposed from the Goths led Gratian to send for Theodosius, and appoint him emperor of the E. (379). Gratian was fond of quiet and repose, and was greatly under the influence of ecclesiastics, especially of Ambrose of Milan. He became unpopular with the army. Maximus was declared emperor in Britain, and crossed over to Gaul, where he defeated Gratian, who was overtaken and slain in his flight after the battle.—2. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain, and was murdered by his troops about 4 months after his elevation (407). He was succeeded by Constantine. [CONSTANTINUS, No. 3.]

Gratianŏpŏlis. [CULARO.]

Gratiārum Collis (Χαρίτων λόφος, Herod. iv. 175: Hills of Tarhounah), a range of wooded hills running parallel to the coast of N. Africa between the Syrtes, and containing the source of the CINYPS and the other small rivers of that coast.

Grātīus Faliscus. [FALISCUS.]

Grātus, Valĕrīus, procurator of Judaea from A. D. 15 to 27, and the immediate predecessor of Pontius Pilate.

Graviscae, an ancient city of Etruria, subject to Tarquinii, was colonised by the Romans B. C. 183, and received new colonists under Augustus. It was situated in the Maremma, and its air was unhealthy (intempestae Graviscae, Virg. Aen. x. 184); whence the ancients ridiculously derived its name from aër gravis. Its ruins are on the right bank of the river Marta, about 2 miles from the sea, where are the remains of a magnificent arch.

Gregŏras, Nicēphŏrus, one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born about A. D. 1295, and died about 1359. His principal work is entitled Historia Byzantina. It is in 38 books, of which only 24 have been printed. It begins with the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, and goes down to 1359; the 24 printed books contain the period from 1204 to 1351. Edited by Schopen, Bonn, 1829.

Grĕgŏrĭus (Γρηγόριος). 1. Surnamed Nazianzēnus, and usually called Gregory Nazianzen, was born in a village near Nazianzus in Cappadocia about A. D. 329. His father took the greatest pains with his education, and he afterwards prosecuted his studies at Athens, where he earned the greatest reputation for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and mathematics. Among his fellow students was Julian, the future emperor, and Basil, with the latter of whom he formed a most intimate friendship. Gregory appears to have remained at Athens about 6 years (350—356), and then returned home. Having received ordination, he continued to reside at Nazianzus, where he discharged his duties as a presbyter, and assisted his aged father, who was bishop of the town. In 372 he was associated with his father in the bishopric; but after the death of the latter in 374, he refused to continue bishop of Nazianzus, as he was averse from public life, and fond of solitary meditation. After living some years in retirement, he was summoned to Constantinople in 379, in order to defend the orthodox faith against the Arians and other heretics. In 380 he was made bishop of Constantinople by the emperor Theodosius; but he resigned the office in the following year (381), and withdrew altogether from public life. He lived in solitude at his paternal estate at Nazianzus, and there he died in 389 or 390. His extant works are, 1. Orations or Sermons; 2. Letters; 3. Poems. His discourses, though sometimes really eloquent, are generally nothing more than favourable specimens of the rhetoric of the schools. He is more earnest than Chrysostom, but not so ornamental. He is more artificial, but also more attractive, than Basil. Edited by Morell, Paris, 2 vols. fol., 1609—1611, reprinted 1630. Of the Benedictine edition, only the first volume containing the discourses, was published, Paris, 1778.—2. Nyssēnus, bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, was the younger brother of Basil, and was born at Caesarea in Cappadocia, about 331. He was made bishop of Nyssa about 372, and, like his brother Basil and their friend Gregory Nazianzen, was one of the pillars of orthodoxy. He died soon after 394. Like his brother, he was an eminent rhetorician, but his oratory often offends by its extravagance. His works are edited by Morell and Gretser, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1615—1618.—3. Surnamed Thaumaturgus, from his miracles, was born at Neocaesarea in Cappadocia, of heathen parents. He was converted to Christianity by Origen, about 234, and subsequently became the bishop of his native town. He died soon after 265. His works are not numerous. The best edition is the one published at Paris, 1622.

Grudĭi, a people in Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii, N. of the Scheldt.

Grumentum (Grumentīnus: Il Palazzo), a town in the interior of Lucania on the road from Beneventum to Heraclea, frequently mentioned in the 2nd Punic war.

Gryllus (Γρύλλος), elder son of Xenophon, fell at the battle of Mantinea, B.C. 362, after he had, according to some accounts, given Epaminondas his mortal wound.

Grȳnīa or -īum (Γρύνεια, Γρύνιον), a very ancient fortified city on the coast of the Sinus Elaïticus, in the S. of Mysia, between Elaea and Myrina, 70 stadia from the former and 40 from the latter; celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo, who is hence called Grynaeus Apollo (Virg. Aen. iv. 345). It possessed also a good harbour. Parmenion, the general of Alexander, destroyed the city and sold the inhabitants as slaves. It was never again restored.

Gryps or Gryphus (Γρύψ), a griffin, a fabulous animal, dwelling in the Rhipaean mountains, between the Hyperboreans and the one-eyed Arimaspians, and guarding the gold of the north. The Arimaspians mounted on horseback, and attempted to steal the gold, and hence arose the hostility between the horse and the griffin. The body of the griffin was that of a lion, while the head and wings were those of an eagle. It is probable that the origin of the belief in griffins must be looked for in the East, where it seems to have been very ancient. They are also mentioned among the fabulous animals which guarded the gold of India.

Gugerni or Guberni, a people of Germany, probably of the same race as the Sigambri, crossed the Rhine, and settled on its left bank, between the Ubii and Batavi.

Gulussa, a Numidian, 2nd son of Masinissa, and brother to Micipsa and Mastanabal. On the death of Masinissa, in B.C. 149, he succeeded along with his brothers to the dominions of their father. He left a son, named MASSIVA.

Gūraeus (Γουραῖος, Γαῤῥοίας), a river of India, flowing through the country of the Guraei (in the N.W. of the Punjab), into the Cophen.

Guttŏnes. [GOTHI.]

Gyărus or Gyăra (ἡ Γύαρος, τὰ Γύαρα: Γυαρεύς: Chiura or Jura), one of the Cyclades, a small island S.W. of Andros, poor and unproductive, and inhabited only by fishermen. Under the Roman emperors it was a place of banishment. (Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris et carcere dignum, Juv. i. 73.)

Gyēs or Gyges (Γύης, Γύγης), son of Uranus (Heaven) and Ge (Earth), one of the giants with 100 hands, who made war upon the gods.

Gȳgaeus Lacus (ἡ Γυγαίη λίμνη: Lake of Marmora), a small lake in Lydia, between the rivers Hermus and Hyllus, N. of Sardis, the necropolis of which city was on its banks. It was afterwards called Coloë.

Gȳgēs (Γύγης), the first king of Lydia of the dynasty of the Mermnadae, dethroned Candaules, and succeeded to the kingdom, as related under CANDAULES. He reigned B.C. 716—678. He sent magnificent presents to Delphi, and carried on various wars with the cities of Asia Minor, such as Miletus, Smyrna, Colophon, and Magnesia. "The riches of Gyges" became a proverb.

Gȳlippus (Γύλιππος), a Spartan, son of Cleandridas, was sent as the Spartan commander to Syracuse, to oppose the Athenians, B.C. 414. Under his command the Syracusans annihilated the great Athenian armament, and took Demosthenes and Nicias prisoners, 413. In 404 he was commissioned by Lysander, after the capture of Athens, to carry home the treasure; but by opening the seams of the sacks underneath, he abstracted a considerable portion. The theft was discovered, and Gylippus went at once into exile. — The syllable Γυλ- in the name of Gylippus is probably identical with the Latin Gilvus.

Gymnēsĭae. [BALEARES.]

Gynaecŏpŏlis (Γυναικόπολις, or Γυναικῶν πόλις), a city in the Delta of Egypt, on the W. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Momemphis. It was the capital of the Nomos Gynaecopolites.

Gyndes (Γύνδης), a river of Assyria, rising in the country of the Matieni (in the mountains of Kurdistan), and flowing into the Tigris, celebrated through the story that Cyrus the Great drew off its waters by 360 channels. (Herod. i. 189.) It is very difficult to identify this river: perhaps it is the same as the Delas or Silla (Diala), which falls into the Tigris just above Ctesiphon and Seleucia. It is also doubtful whether the Sindes of Tacitus (Ann. xi. 10.) is the same river.

Gyrtōn, Gyrtōna (Γυρτών, Γυρτώνη: Γυρτώνιος: nr. Tatari Ru.), an ancient town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, on the Peneus.

Gȳthēum, Gythīum (τὸ Γύθειον, Γύθιον: Γυθεάτης: Palaeopolis nr. Marathonisi), an ancient town on the coast of Laconia, founded by the Achaeans, lay near the head of the Laconian bay, S.W. of the mouth of the river Eurotas. It served as the harbour of Sparta, and was important in a military point of view. In the Persian war the Lacedaemonian fleet was stationed at Gytheum, and here the Athenians under Tolmides burnt the Lacedaemonian arsenal, B.C. 455. After the battle of Leuctra (370) it was taken by Epaminondas. In 195 it was taken by Flamininus, and made independent of Nabis, tyrant of Sparta; whereupon it joined the Achaean league.

Gyzantes (Γύζαντες), a people in the W. part of Libya (N. Africa), whose country was rich in honey and wax. They seem to have dwelt in Byzacium.

H.

Hādēs or Plūto (Ἅιδης, Πλούτων, or poetically Ἀΐδης, Ἀϊδωνεύς, Πλουτεύς), the God of the Nether World. Plato observes that people preferred calling him Pluto (the giver of wealth) to pronouncing the dreaded name of Hades or Aïdes. Hence we find that in ordinary life and in the mysteries the name Pluto became generally established, while the poets preferred the ancient name Aïdes or the form Pluteus. The Roman poets use the names Dis, Orcus, and Tartarus, as synonymous with Pluto, for the god of the Nether World. Hades was son of Cronus and Rhea, and brother of Zeus and Poseidon. His wife was Persephŏne or Proserpĭna, the daughter of Demeter, whom he carried off from the upper world, as is related elsewhere. [See p. 212.] In the division of the world among the 3 brothers, Hades obtained the Nether World, the abode of the shades, over which he ruled. Hence he is called the infernal Zeus (Ζεὺς καταχθόνιος), or the king of the shades (ἄναξ ἐνέρων). He possessed a helmet which rendered the wearer invisible, and later traditions stated that this helmet was given him as a present by the Cyclopes after their delivery from Tartarus. Ancient story mentions both gods and men who were honoured by Hades with the temporary use of this helmet. His character is described as fierce and inexorable, whence of all the gods he was most hated by mortals. He kept the gates of the lower world closed (and is therefore called Πυλάρτης), that no shades might be able to escape or return to the region of light. When mortals invoked him, they struck the earth with their hands; the sacrifices which were offered to him and Persephone consisted of black sheep; and the person who offered the sacrifice had to turn away his face. The ensign of his power was a staff, with which, like Hermes, he drove the shades into the lower world. There he sat upon a throne with his consort Persephone. Like the other gods, he was not a faithful husband; the Furies are called his daughters; the nymph Mintho, whom he loved, was metamorphosed by Persephone into the plant called mint; and the nymph Leuce, with whom he was likewise in love, was changed by him after her death into a white poplar, and transferred to Elysium. Being the king of the lower world, Pluto is the giver of all the blessings that come from the earth: he is the possessor and giver of all the metals contained in the earth, and hence his name Pluto. He bears several surnames referring to his ultimately assembling all mortals in his kingdom, and bringing them to rest and peace; such as Polydegmon, Polydectes, Clymenus, &c. He was worshipped throughout Greece and Italy. We possess few representations of this divinity, but in those which still exist, he resembles his brother Zeus and Poseidon, except that his hair falls down his forehead, and that his appearance is dark and gloomy. His ordinary attributes are the key of Hades and Cerberus. In Homer Aïdes is invariably the name of the god; but in later times it was transferred to his house, his abode or kingdom, so that it became a name for the nether world.

Hadrānum. [ADRANUM.]

Hādrĭa. [ADRIA.]

Hādrĭānŏpŏlis (Ἀδριανόπολις: Ἀδριανοπολίτης: Adrianople), a town in Thrace on the right bank of the Hebrus, in an extensive plain, founded by the emperor Hadrian. It was strongly fortified; possessed an extensive commerce; and in the middle ages was the most important town in the country after Constantinople.

Hādrĭānothēra or -ae (Ἀδριανουθήρα), a city in Mysia, between Pergamus and Miletopolis, founded by the emperor Hadrian.

Hādrĭānus, P. Aelĭus, usually called Hadrian, Roman emperor, A. D. 117—138, was born at Rome, A. D. 76. He lost his father at the age of 10, and was brought up by his kinsman Ulpius Trajanus (afterwards emperor) and by Caelius Attianus. From an early age he studied with zeal the Greek language and literature. At the age of 15 he went to Spain, where he entered upon his military career; and he subsequently served as military tribune in Lower Moesia. After the elevation of Trajan to the throne (98), he married Julia Sabina, a granddaughter of Trajan's sister Marciana. This marriage was brought about through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan; and from this time Hadrian rose rapidly in the emperor's favour. He was raised successively to the quaestorship (101), praetorship (107), and consulship (109). He accompanied Trajan in most of his expeditions, and distinguished himself in the second war against the Dacians, 104—106; was made governor of Pannonia in 108; and subsequently fought under Trajan against the Parthians. When Trajan's serious illness obliged him to leave the E., he placed Hadrian at the head of the army. Trajan died at Cilicia on his journey to Rome (117). Hadrian, who pretended that he had been adopted by Trajan, was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria, and the senate ratified the election. Hadrian's first care was to make peace with the Parthians, which he obtained by relinquishing the conquests of Trajan, E. of the Euphrates. He returned to Rome in 118; but almost immediately afterwards set out for Moesia, in consequence of the invasion of this province by the Sarmatians. After making peace with the Sarmatians, and suppressing a formidable conspiracy which had been formed against his life by some of the most distinguished Roman nobles, all of whom he put to death, he returned to Rome in the course of the same year. He sought to gain the goodwill of the senate by gladiatorial exhibitions and liberal largesses, and he also cancelled all arrears of taxes due to the state for the last 15 years. The remainder of Hadrian's reign was disturbed by few wars. He spent the greater part of his reign in travelling through the various provinces of the empire, in order that he might inspect personally the state of affairs in the provinces, and apply the necessary remedies wherever mismanagement was discovered. He commenced these travels in 119, visiting first Gaul, Germany, and Britain, in the latter of which countries he caused a wall to be built from the Solway to the mouth of the river Tyne. He afterwards visited Spain, Africa, and the E., and took up his residence at Athens for 3 years (123—126). Athens was his favourite city, and he conferred upon its inhabitants many privileges. The most important war during his reign was that against the Jews, which broke out in 131. The Jews had revolted in consequence of the establishment of a colony under the name of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem, and of their having been forbidden to practise the rite of circumcision. The war was carried on by the Jews as a national struggle with the most desperate fury, and was not brought to an end till 136, after the country had been nearly reduced to a wilderness. During the last few years of Hadrian's life, his health failed. He became suspicious and cruel, and put to death several persons of distinction. As he had no children, he adopted L. Aelius Verus, and gave him the title of Caesar in 136. Verus died on the 1st of January, 138, whereupon Hadrian adopted Antoninus, afterwards surnamed Pius, and conferred upon him likewise the title of Caesar. In July in the same year, Hadrian himself died in his 62nd year, and was succeeded by ANTONINUS. — The reign of Hadrian may be regarded as one of the happiest periods in Roman history. His policy was to preserve peace with foreign nations, and not to extend the boundaries of the empire, but to secure the old provinces, and promote their welfare. He paid particular attention to the administration of justice in the provinces as well as in Italy. His reign forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. It was at Hadrian's command that the jurist Salvius Julianus drew up the edictum perpetuum, which formed a fixed code of laws. Some of the laws promulgated by Hadrian are of a truly humane character, and aimed at improving the public morality of the time. The various cities which he visited received marks of his favour or liberality; in many places he built aquaeducts, and in others harbours or other public buildings, either for use or ornament. But what has rendered his name more illustrious than any thing else are the numerous and magnificent architectural works which he planned and commenced during his travels, especially at Athens, in the S. part of which he built an entirely new city, Adrianopolis. We cannot here enter into an account of the numerous buildings he erected; it is sufficient to direct attention to his villa at Tibur, which has been a real mine of treasures of art, and his mausoleum at Rome, which forms the groundwork of the present castle of St. Angelo. Hadrian was a patron of learning and literature, as well as of the arts, and he cultivated the society of poets, scholars, rhetoricians, and philosophers. He founded at Rome a scientific institution under the name of Athenaeum, which continued to flourish for a long time after him. He was himself an author, and wrote numerous works both in prose and in verse, all of which are lost, with the exception of a few epigrams in the Greek and Latin Anthologies.

Hadriānus, the rhetorician. [ADRIANUS.]

Hadrūmētum or Adrūmētum (Ἀδρύμη: Hammeim), a flourishing city founded by the Phoenicians in N. Africa, on the E. coast of Byzacena, of which district it was the capital under the Romans. Trajan made it a colony; and it was afterwards called Justinianopolis.

Haemon (Αἵμων). 1. Son of Pelasgus and father of Thessalus, from whom the ancient name of Thessaly, Haemonia or Aemonia, was believed to be derived. The Roman poets frequently use the adjective Haemonius as equivalent to Thessalian. — 2. Son of Lycaon, and the reputed founder of Haemonia in Arcadia. — 3. Son of Creon of Thebes, was destroyed, according to some accounts, by the sphinx. But, according to other traditions, he was in love with Antigone, and killed himself on hearing that she was condemned by his father to be entombed alive.

Haemŏnĭa (Αἱμονία). [HAEMON, No. 1.]

Haemus (Αἷμος), son of Boreas and Orithyia, wife of Rhodope, and father of Hebrus. As he and his wife presumed to assume the names of Zeus and Hera, both were metamorphosed into mountains.

Haemus (ὁ Αἷμος, τὸ Αἷμον: Balkan), a lofty range of mountains, separating Thrace and Moesia, extended from M. Scomius, or, according to Herodotus, from M. Rhodope on the W. to the Black Sea on the E. The name is probably connected with the Sanscrit hima (whence comes the word Himalaya), the Greek χειμών, and the Latin hiems; and the mountains were so called on account of their cold and snowy climate. The height of these mountains was greatly exaggerated by the ancients: the mean height does not exceed 3000 or 4000 feet above the sea. There are several passes over them; but the one most used in antiquity was in the W. part of the range, called "Succi" or "Succorum angustiae," also "Porta Trajani" (Ssulu Derbend), between Philippopolis and Serdica. The later province of "Haemimontus" in Thrace derived its name from this mountain.

Hagnūs (Ἁγνοῦς, -οῦντος: Ἁγνούσιος: nr. Markopulo), a demus in Attica, W. of Paeania, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Halae (Ἁλαί, Ἅλαι, Ἀλαί: Ἁλαιεύς). 1. H. Araphēnĭdes (Ἀραφηνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, was situated on the E. coast of Attica, and served as the harbour of Brauron: it possessed a temple of Artemis. — 2. H. Aexōnĭdes (Αἰξωνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, situated on the W. coast. — 3. A town, formerly of the Opuntii Locri, afterwards of Boeotia, situated on the Opuntian gulf.

Hales (Ἅλης). 1. A river of Ionia in Asia Minor, near Colophon, celebrated for the coldness of its water. — 2. A river in the island of Cos.

Halēsa (Ἅλαισα: Halesīnus: Torre di Pittineo), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, on the river Halēsus (Pittineo), was founded by the Greek mercenaries of Archonides, a chief of the Siculi, and was originally called Archonidion. It became a place of considerable importance, and was in later times a municipium, exempt from taxes.

Halēsus, a chief of the Auruncans and Oscans, the son of a soothsayer, and an ally of Turnus, was slain by Evander. He came to Italy from Argos in Greece, whence he is called Agamemnonius, Atrides, or Argolicus. He is said to have founded the town of Falerii.

Halex. [ALEX.]

Haliacmon (Ἁλιάκμων: Vistriza), an important river in Macedonia, rises in the Tymphaean mountains, flows first S.E. through Elimaea, then N.E. forming the boundary between Eordaea and Pieria, and falls into the Thermaic gulf in Bottiaeis. Caesar (B. C. iii. 36) incorrectly makes it the boundary between Macedonia and Thessaly.

Haliartus (Ἁλίαρτος: Ἁλιάρτιος: Mazi), an ancient town in Boeotia on the S. of the lake Copais. It was destroyed by Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B. C. 480), but was rebuilt, and appears as an important place in the Peloponnesian war. Under its walls Lysander lost his life (395). It was destroyed by the Romans (171), because it supported Perseus, king of Macedonia, and its territory was given to the Athenians.

Halĭas (Ἁλιας: Ἁλιεύς), a district on the coast of Argolis between Asine and Hermione, so called because fishing was the chief occupation of its inhabitants. Their town was called Halĭae (Ἁλιαί) or Halĭēs (Ἁλιεῖς).

Hălĭcarnassus (Ἁλικαρνασσός, Ion. Ἁλικαρνησσός: Ἁλικαρνασσεύς, Halicarnassensis, Halicarnassius: Budrum, Ru.), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, stood in the S.W. part of Caria, on the N. coast of the Sinus Ceramicus, opposite to the island of Cos. It was said to have been founded by Dorians from Troezene, and was at first called Zephyra. It was one of the 6 cities that originally formed the Dorian Hexapolis, but it was early excluded from the confederacy, as a punishment for the violation, by one of its citizens, of a law connected with the common worship of the Triopian Apollo. (Herod. i. 144.) With the rest of the coast of Asia Minor, it fell under the dominion of the Persians, at an early period of whose rule Lygdamis made himself tyrant of the city, and founded a dynasty which lasted for some generations. His daughter Artemisia assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece [ARTEMISIA, No.

1]. Her grandson Lygdamis was overthrown by a revolution, in which Herodotus is said to have taken part [HERODOTUS]. In the Peloponnesian War, we find Halicarnassus, with the other Dorian cities of Caria, on the side of the Athenians; but we do not know what was its form of government, until the reestablishment, by HECATOMNUS, of a dynasty ruling over all Caria, with its capital first at Mylasa, and afterwards at Halicarnassus, and virtually independent of Persia; before B. C. 380. It seems not unlikely that both this and the older dynasty of tyrants of Halicarnassus, were a race of native Carian princes, whose ascendancy at Halicarnassus may be accounted for by the prevalence of the Carian element in its population at an early period. Hecatomnus left 3 sons and 2 daughters, who all succeeded to his throne in the following order, Mausolus, Artemisia, Idrieus, Ada, Pixodarus, and Ada again. In B. C. 334, Alexander took the city, after an obstinate defence by the Persian general Memnon, and destroyed it. From this blow it never recovered, although it continued to be celebrated for the Mausoleum, a magnificent edifice which Artemisia II. built as a tomb for Mausolus, and which was adorned with the works of the most eminent Greek sculptors of the age. Fragments of these sculptures, which were discovered built into the walls of the citadel of Budrum, are now in the British Museum. With the rest of Caria, Halicarnassus was assigned by the Romans, after their victory over Antiochus the Great, to the government of Rhodes, and was afterwards united to the province of Asia. The city was very strongly fortified, and had a fine harbour, which was protected by the island of ARCONNESUS: its citadel was called Salmacis (Σαλμακίς) from the name of a spring which rose from the hill on which it stood. Halicarnassus was the birthplace of the historians HERODOTUS and DIONYSIUS.

Halicyae (Ἁλικύαι: Halicyensis), a town in the N.W. of Sicily, between Entella and Lilybaeum, was long in the possession of the Carthaginians, and in Cicero's time was a municipium, exempt from taxes.

Halimūs (Ἁλιμοῦς -οῦντος: Ἁλιμούσιος), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, on the W. coast, a little S. of Athens.

Halipĕdon (Ἁλίπεδον), a plain near the Piraeus, probably between the Piraeus and the Academy.
